Denis Burnell had a small clipped beard which had turned so prematurely grey that when he and his father were together, strangers who caught the likeness between them took them for brothers. He had the same affable manner as his father and the same quizzical hazel eyes; but there the likeness ended. Nor would it have been easy for Rhisiart to say what did arrest him so about the man. It was some kind of personal power; but exactly where it lay he would have been puzzled to define. One quality Denis obviously possessed, and that was an unruffled calm; but along with this calm Rhisiart got the impression that the man suffered from a perpetual absentmindedness, just as if his mind were forever functioning on two levels.

One of these levels was a world of practical necessity, in regard to which he was quick and competent; but the other was a world of inner vision which apparently reduced the former, for all his competence in it, to something as futile as it was frivolous.

Rhisiart was fully aware that in his desperate temptation he was frantically trying to put his interest in the Constable between himself and the Constable's lady. His whole nature suffered so much from the contrast within him that just as in the case of that accurst bronze sword his narrow forehead became wet with sweat.

Lowri kept addressing faintly ironical questions to the Lollard, but certain little twitchings about the corner of her mouth which was nearest to Rhisiart, accentuated by a drop of saliva left there by the tip of her tongue, seemed to convey to him a wordless intimation.

"I'm still holding you," that electric communication seemed to say. "Wait till our hands meet, and tie, and then you won't resist any more!"

And the cruel thing was that this tantalizing profile, with that quivering corner that so disturbed him, seemed as youthful as Tegolin's own.

But what was she saying to the Lollard? It seemed incredible to our friend; but she was actually asking Master Brut questions about the miserable Simon, questions about his attempts to escape, questions about the treatment he had received from the Seneschal.

To these questions the disciple of Wycliffe answered with an eloquent appeal on behalf of the wretched prisoner and with reiterated asseverations about what he described as "his change of heart".

Our friend was so disturbed that all manner of subtle impressions forced themselves upon his mind that ordinarily he would have lacked the wit to catch. He noted, for instance, as Denis gravely commented upon the startling news that the old Seneschal was at last freely imparting, how the young grey-bearded man was alluding as casually to such troublesome intruders as Hywel Sele and David Gam as if they were figures on a pictured tapestry only brought into momentary life by a suddenly-risen wind! And even while he struggled against Lowri's fatal appeal something in him exulted in vibrant spasms of sympathetic devilry as she led the Lollard on to describe in detail the various spiritual transformations that the grace of the Redeemer had worked in the desperate soul of the Hog of Chirk.

“We’ll see,” the corners of her lips seemed to whisper in our friend’s ear, “what this conversion amounts to when we visit him to-night!”

“I mustn’t look at her! I mustn’t look at her!” Rhisiart’s better angel kept repeating; and he even went so far as to try to thrust between himself and those burning white fingers — for she was deliberately slipping off her riding-gloves now — that image of himself mounting the scaffold where stood those barrels of pitch.

But the stress of his feelings seemed to have turned his mind into such a sensitive plate that, while every little outward thing about him was mirrored upon it, those hooks and prongs failed to materialize. He noticed every detail, for instance, of the heavy accoutrements of certain Salopian yeomen; for quite a number of English levies had followed Denis up the hill.

It was indeed while his demon was forcing him to observe the fantastic belt of one worthy trooper, that was ornamented with the white skulls of stoats, that he became aware that a wild-looking body of Welshmen armed with spears were parleying with the gate-keeper. Something made him fix his gaze upon these men, whom the official at the gate was evidently admitting on the condition that they piled their spears against the wall; and in a flash his mind rushed to the bed in the tower-chamber and its tantalizing occupant.

Yes, standing under the raised portcullis was none other than Crach Ffinnant himself! The prophet of Derfel was, as the Scripture says of another tricky idolator, moving “delicately.” He ostentatiously laid down a not very dangerous-looking weapon by the side of the others, and while pleading with the Porter and holding up his arms so that his clothes might be searched, and turning his birth-marked cheek and scavenger’s eye to everything in sight, it soon became clear that he was going to be allowed to skulk in. When he did get in, Rhisiart watched him wrap his heavy mantle discreetly round him and hurry off, with his head bent and with furtive glances to left and right, straight in the direction of the Ladies' Tower.

"He looks like a stoat," thought our friend, "entering a rabbit's burrow. I shall certainly tell Luned to warn Ffraid ferch Gloyw. I wonder if they'll let him have a share of this damned banquet? I'd wish him luck if he'd throw his evil eye on Cousin Sele's smug face!"

It was with an ice-cold shiver at his heart and a rush to his lean cheekbones of blood that pricked and burnt that he now gave Lowri a nod, for he couldn't force his lips to utter a sound, when she asked him to come to her presence-room in an hour's time. "Knock three times slowly and then three times quickly," she told him, "and if I don't open at once go away at once."

Never in his life had he experienced, never was he destined to experience again, any hour like the hour that came upon him then. The Russian's ravening "insect" had now possessed itself entirely of his will; and whenever he thought of how hotly twisting her fingers would be as she let him have his pleasure while her eyes clung to the eyes of her victim, his knees shook under him and everything round him darkened and receded.

But though the Russian's "insect" had to be fed, and all questions of deciding against feeding it had come to an end, the strange thing was that the rest of his nature, his ordinary sensitized being, instead of feeling atrophied by this horrible obsession, this fact that his will was all insect, seemed to have become abnormally porous to every kind of impression. His senses felt praeternaturally alert, just as they had been three months ago, when he was hypnotized by the voice of Ffraid ferch Gloyw.

He accompanied the Lollard back to the Traitor's Chamber, conveying to him in brief and unnecessarily pessimistic words all he had learnt from the Seneschal. "They may call it a banquet," he assured the good man, "but what it is for us is a gallows' supper. It's simply a conclave of our executioners. You mark my words, Brut. Hywel Sele and David Gam will insist bluntly that we should be given up."

"Given up, lad?" questioned the other. "Given up to whom?"

"To King Harry," Rhisiart blurted out fiercely, "who'll burn you and hang and quarter me!"

The psychological disciple of Wycliffe gave his friend a very straight look. He seemed to divine that all was not well with the boy's nerves. His face assumed its most irritating look of smiling aplomb; but all he actually said was that the spirit of Christ was as powerful in the English camp as it was within the walls of Dinas Bran.

This reference to something in the castle that it couldn't eat kept the Russian's "insect" and its perambulating shard in sulky silence.

The Lollard was consequently extremely relieved when he got the obsessed young man to sit down by his side on his bed. The Traitor's Chamber was a good deal more draughty and very much damper than Myfanwy's Bower, and it was furnished more like a guard-room than a guest-room. Master Brut, however, had made his little arrangements. He had moved his straw-pallet under a portion of the roof that still kept the rain out. He had got his Greek Testament and his Consolations of Boethius neatly spread out on a battered chest at the head of this unpromising couch; and as they had done almost every evening during these months the two young men sat down together there and talked without turning their heads, as naturally as if they were talking to themselves.

"You've got something on your mind," said the Lollard at last, after trying in vain to interest his friend in the latest development of the spiritual growth of Alice of Ruthin.

But instead of answering him Rhisiart jumped to his feet. "God in Heaven!" he cried. "I'd forgotten the news I've got for the Ladies' Tower!

Our friend the Scab is here; and the Lady Ffraid ought to be warned of it at once."

"What are you going to do?" And the Lollard, also risen to his feet, bent down and very deliberately placed the Greek Testament on the top of Boethius.

Rhisiart turned on him when he reached the door. "Find someone who can be trusted in this damned place!"

The Lollard's smile vanished. "You're beginning to forget, my friend," he said sternly, "that I'm no more an Englishman than you are. There's no race in the world more trustworthy than the Welsh; when they're properly handled. To put your own head on the block isn't trustworthy: it's insane."

"Oh shut up, for Christ's sake! Sometimes I think there's no bigger fool on either side of the Dyke than you are, Walter! You may understand Greek; but you don't understand me!"

With this our irascible friend slammed the oaken door of the Traitor's Chamber and made off in a blind huff. "I'd like to take a glance at that presence-room of hers," remarked the hungry "insect" within him while its hollow shard rattled huskily. "I feel as if the mere look of the place would help me to bear the delay!"

Rhisiart knew well enough where this room was, but he had instinctively avoided it during the last three months. As he approached it now, however, whom should he meet, returning from their bird's-nesting excursion, but the two pages! The boys stopped at once. They had much to tell him. But he cut short their confidences. "Want an excuse to climb the Ladies' Tower and be sure of a welcome?" he craftily said addressing Rawlff.

"And me too?" put in the younger boy.

"Certainly, sonny, if Rawlff lets you! But the message, remember, is only to be given to the Lady Ffraid herself."

“Tell me what it is, Master Rhisiart; and I’ll decide whether under the circumstances it would be wise or unwise to take a kid like this into our confidence.”

The son of Cynan flushed fiery-red; but professional shrewdness, even in the smallest of all the pages of Dinas Bran, enabled him to be patient. “It’s no good getting angry,” he must have said to himself. “The great thing is not to be left behind. I can settle with this conceited ass later.”

“It’s a perfectly simple message,” Rhisiart said, “and since you’re both friends of Luned and Efa you’ll realize its importance. It’s to tell the Lady Ffraid that Crach Ffinnant’s already in the castle.”

The boys exchanged a quick glance of full understanding, and without another word or sign darted off towards the Ladies’ Tower. Rhisiart paused to watch them disappear; and then, urged on by his obsessed Will which dragged his conscience, his soul, his senses, his nerves, like a row of captives tied together by the neck, he advanced towards the fatal door. “It can’t be more than thirty minutes,” he said to himself, “since she said ‘come in an hour,’ but I may as well have a look at the place.”

A couple of Salopian troopers strolled past in the September twilight. They were engaged in political discussion. “What I say,” one of them was remarking, “is that the sooner it comes the better. I don’t give a damn for this chatter about bardic predictions. What I say is that these Welshies need a lesson. And they’ll get it too — you mark my words! They say in Chirk that the Earl told Grey to keep his people within the walls, so as to lead on that braggart Glendourdy. And who is Glendourdy anyway? Only a whoreson bandit! Let the beggar revolt I say! What we want is an excuse to scotch the sly snake once and for all. I wish the Welshies would come out. But they won’t! You mark my words; they won’t. They won’t give us a chance. Christmas will see things just as they are now. A few fines, maybe.

But you know what the King is. He’s too lenient. He’ll fine ’em, and let ’em go. If I had my way he’d burn the beggars out, once and for all, whether they rose or not! Burn ’em out! That’s the only way to give these whoreson bards a lesson. Let ’em skip for their own whoreson skins and you’d soon see. Of course the King ought to call up the Staffordshire folk as well as we.

“Why should we always bear the brunt on the Marches? If I were Harry do’ee know what I’d do—” but the voice died away before our listener could learn this nice point.

He walked straight towards the door and the curious thing was that his knees knocked together as he moved and he kept jerking his dagger half in, half out of its sheath. The nearer he approached the half-ruined mass of masonry on this north-west side of Dinas Bran the more hungry became the Russian’s “insect.” But if it possessed the power of dragging an individual’s reason and conscience after it, it possessed no flicker of authority over the antics of the great goddess Chance. And Chance bestirred herself now.

For what was that? His obsessed eyes had been so absorbed in that closed door, a door which was easy enough to recognize by reason of its newfangled modernity and the way some tricky craftsman had carved all manner of Frenchified levities above its lintel, a door which he knew better than any other door in the castle, just because for three months he had refused to turn his head towards it, that it was with a startled shock, a shock so great that it made him feel physically dizzy, that he now caught sight of the repulsive little figure of the tower dwarf, standing with her impish back to him and lost to the whole world as she gazed through an upper light of one of those flamboyant foliated windows.

The little creature had climbed up upon the exterior ledge of the window through which she stared; and her thin extended arms clutched mechanically at the newly-chipped mouldings of the tracery. In this position she resembled, to our friend's abnormally acute senses, a female crucifix turned back-to-front. What was she watching there with such intensity? It was indeed more than intensity. The dwarf's whole being seemed to be resolving itself into the masonry of the stone-work to which she clung! So death-still was she that her motionlessness made him think of a chrysalis; though as he stared at what was a symbol of more than staring he felt that if he could have seen this crucified chrysalis from the inside there would have been something frightful about the expression on its face.

But the Russian's "insect" now decided that it was not fair — and what a sight that purple beard would be, squeezed against the pane, if the persons within the chamber were to glance up! — that a demented dwarf should gloat alone in solitary ecstasy at such interesting spectacles.

And so our friend, under its guidance, with exquisite caution, and moving like a creature who possessed the cunning of the insane, climbed up the stone-work till he was just behind Mother Sibli. There, bringing his hand in absolute silence to within an inch of the back of that grotesque cranium, he clapped it on her mouth and lifting her from the window and pressing her like a helpless infant against his ribs, he took her place at the small broken window-light. For that was, he discovered, the reason why this peeping-hole was so ecstatically satisfying. The coloured glass in that particular pane had been broken. You could hear as well as see what was going on.

Rhisiart was soon made aware that he wasn't crushing the life out of the dwarf, by reason of the sharp teeth that began at once to draw blood from his hand; but what he was watching and listening to inside the presence-room held him so transfixed that it was a wonder he didn't break the small creature's bones in absolute unconsciousness.

The presence-room was luxuriously furnished in that fashionable end-of-the-century style that Rhisiart's mother loved so well and which his aesthetic Oxford friends regarded as the height of ostentatious vulgarity.

Huddled upon the edge of the spacious bed, his arms tied tight behind him and his feet manacled together, so that he could only have moved, had he been compelled to do so, by a series of grotesque jumps, crouched Master Simon, while before him, coolly and calmly putting the finishing touches to her toilet for the banquet, was the Lady Lowri, looking so deadly lovely, with her white cheeks and scarlet lips, her long curved eye-lashes and arctic-ice eyes, that with the same hand that was closing the dwarf's mouth Rhisiart, in feverish emotion, began twisting the creature's beard into stiff little horns. These horns he continued to make constantly stiffer and more pointed; for his fingers were hot and moist and the beard was naturally adhesive.

"Will you love me just the same when that ugly little boy comes," he heard the Lady say to the Hog of Chirk, "and I let him do anything he likes? Will you love me then?"

Shockingly husky and hollow was the man's reply. "If you kiss me," he said, "like you did just now I could bear anything. But why should the boy die when his life's only beginning?"

"You don't think I'd let him live — afterwards — do you? But I won't poison him. You needn't look like that! I'll just hand him over to the worst devil in Wales, that traitor who's coming here to-night, Sele of Nannau! Nobody will ever hear of him again. Let him tell Sele all he likes. He won't tell anybody else."

And then the husky voice began again; and Rhisiart could now catch a glimpse of the man's eyes which seemed to him all sockets, as if two diminutive glow-worms of glittering fire swam in two circular bottomless cavities!

"Will you kiss me — like you did just now — when he's gone?"

"You liked that, did you?" she whispered, hovering above him so that he could breathe her breath.

But what Rhisiart had already not failed to miss was the way these strange creatures clung with their eyes to each other's eyes, all the while they were talking. Not for one second did their eyes cease from this feverish clutch; and it seemed to the eaves-dropper that it was because their eyes were clinging in this particular way that their words sounded like the broken speech of people who are dancing, or of people who are riding in a boat, rocked by the undulating waves. That was indeed, he found out afterwards, what sank most deeply into his consciousness, the sense that this manacled man, whose gleaming eye-candles floated in such dark cavities, and this dazzling creature in yellow satin were actually dancing some strange mad love-dance together, such as might easily turn into a death-dance for anyone who meddled with it! And that was to have been his role! In the dusk outside that window he felt such a wave of gratitude at his escape that he positively murmured three "Hail Marys." He also became so conscious of the inconvenience he was causing little Sibli that he bent down and whispered in her ear.

"We're in the same galley, Mistress," he breathed, "and we've got to keep this to ourselves — do you understand?"

The sharp teeth ceased biting his hand and a sound that resembled suppressed giggling issued from the living bundle he was pressing against him.

"Will you still love me whatever I let him do?" repeated the woman in yellow satin.

"In chains," retorted the man on the bed, "and without my hands, how can I know you still love me! Oh, if I only had you back at Chirk, if I only had you back at Chirk—"

"What would you do? Not that again — not what I told Fitz-Alan?"

"Yes, yes! just that!"

"You'd never dare!"

"Try me!" and those sockets became like lanterns in a pair of mephitic wells. "You'd have hung me if Meredith ab Owen hadn't come."

"Listen, Simon. Would you love me still if I brought him in here and let him have me?"

"You don't mean young Rhisiart now?"

"Of course not! I mean Rheinalt."

The Hog of Chirk, after an unpleasant struggle to rise to his feet, during which she never put out a finger to help him, turned back to her and hopping towards her on his chained legs made frantic clutches at her body with his bound hands.

But she twitched her dress out of his fingers and clasped him round the head, blinding those obsessed eyes. "I know you," she cried. "You won't believe me that I hate him until I've driven him mad. But why should I do that?"

"Tegolin loves him."

Then it was permitted to Rhisiart — who, after a little more whispering had lifted up Sibli so that she could share with him the broken pane — to behold a queer sight. For the satin-gowned lady turned this shocking figure of a half-clothed ruffian round about in her hands, till the two of them were facing each other. His chains clanked as she turned him; and she did it just as if his coarsely-garmented hairy torso had been something inanimate. Then she forced him backwards, compelling him to make half-a-dozen grotesque leaps, until she got him against the wall. Then she flung her whole weight upon him, clutching his hair with her fingers while she assaulted his scarred face with a rain of burning kisses.

"Order me to send him mad! Order me to send him mad!" she gasped, and tugging at his hair she shook his great haggard face to and fro, as if she had been a lurcher-bitch worrying a rabbit.

It was only when she paused for a second to take breath, letting her hands sink down that Rhisiart had an opportunity to catch the look in the man's face, and it was a look he remembered all his days. It was a look of beatified bliss. It was the look Saint Stephen must have had when they were stoning him and he saw the heavens opened.

Master Simon was now propped helplessly against the wall; and indeed, if it had not been for an unevenness in the stone floor against which he pressed his heels, he would have sunk down under her weight. For oblivious of the effect upon her thin satin gown she cuddled close against him, quivering and twisting like a mesmerized serpent.

Rhisiart, as he watched them, forgot to suck in his lips. His mouth for some seconds remained open like the mouth of a gudgeon. He found himself treating the little monster who shared his eavesdropping as if she had possessed a normal feminine shape. It was upon the emotion of Lowri that the Russian's "insect" was now concentrating; and he had cause enough to open his mouth! He was witnessing just then for the first and last time in his life what few men have been privileged to contemplate; namely, the writhings of a lust-demented lady on the breast of a man whose arms were tied behind his back.

Strangely enough it was with the woman and not with the man in this singular scene that our friend was identifying himself. It was into her nerves, not into those of the Hog of Chirk, that his demon passed. Each convulsive shudder of that beautiful form under that satin robe was like a spasm of his own; and the tension between her and that unsightly torso was like the tension between the most reckless, the most desperate, the most instinctive desire in him and something, some Person, some indescribable Reciprocity that had been escaping him ever since he set out on his quest. His thoughts soon became completely inarticulate. A power, an impulse, was stirring into which his conscious mind could give no rational form. Of one thing, however, he was aware. The Russian's "insect" was submerged, drowned, lost! Had it perished of surfeit?

He suddenly felt physically light, as if no material obstacle could resist him. The fancy rushed through his brain that this whole scene was taking place in his mind, as he watched, light as a feather, the dipping of his own limbs in those barrels of pitch! He was dying for Owen. He had died for Owen. It was against the majestic torso of Owen that his soul, now quivering in spasms like hers, would soon be at rest, untroubled, dissolved, satisfied!

He had quite ceased from treating the dwarf he was supporting as if she were a woman. He in some extraordinary way was the woman now. No! not a woman; a spirit, light as a feather! Was he going off his head? Those barrels, those prongs had vanished altogether. The scaffold had vanished. He was no longer Rhisiart ab Owen. Who was he? He was Efa. He was Efa giving herself up for Owen's triumph. But not to the Scab, to Owen himself! Owen was his own prophet. Owen was his own high-priest of Derfel. Light as a feather, that's what he was! And the golden torso of Owen had now transformed itself, horribly transformed itself. It was the torso of that image of misery he had fed with the bone. It was the torso of that crucifix he'd seen in the Abbot's cell. His eyes had grown blurred! In his ears was a sound like the sound of Tegolin's cry when they were strapping Mad Huw to the cart on the gorsedd-mound.

It was through a mist now, like the mist through which he had ridden between the spears and the arrows, that he tried to see them. A wave was rocking him, so light had he become; a tidal wave that could neither sink him nor salvage him. And it was on this wave he was resting now. No, it wasn't a wave; it was Owen's breast.

Lowri's shudderings had quite ceased. She was clinging to Simon's body like yellow sea-weed to a rock. Had she fallen asleep? Was the silence that had descended upon the two of them like the silence of the sculptured dead, like the silence of King John's tomb in Worcester Cathedral? "I mustn't disturb them," he said to himself; and he suddenly became aware, in his half-bodiless state, that he dreaded to hear himself knock at that fastened door. A panic seized him. What if he couldn't descend from his perch? What if he heard himself knocking and couldn't get away?

Tightening his hold on Sibli he made a few tentative movements. Oh, thank God, he wasn't paralysed! Hurriedly he clambered down to the ground. And then forgetting entirely to put the dwarf upon her feet, he ran with her, pressed tightly against his chest, till he reached the foot of the Ladies' Tower.

Here, moved by God knows what sudden impulse, he actually imprinted his lips upon the little creature's contorted visage; and, only after having done so, gently put her down.

The autumn twilight had darkened the whole sky; but there was a lantern swinging above the stone archway; and by its light, in spite of the confusion in his mind, he saw enough to be shocked by the effect of what he had just done. The little creature stood for a moment like a bird transfixed by an arrow, too dazed to die. Then without a second's warning her twitching face melted in a tempest of tears such as Rhisiart would never have supposed such a grotesque little skull could contain.

He did all he could think of to console her. He knelt down before her and stroked her hands. He called upon the Saints, upon the Holy Virgin, upon the Blessed Bran himself. He invoked Saint Bride the patroness of the Lady of the tower. He called upon God to bear witness that he had meant no insult to her, no affront to her dignity.

"'Twas as if you were my — as if you were my — my aunt!" he stammered.

But she gasped out some words of her own now, mixed with the sobs that shook her from head to foot. "No — one — has — ever — kissed me — before!"

Something in the tone of this made him stop referring to his aunt. He even began to discover that there was a sensation at the back of his eyes suggesting that if he couldn't comfort her quickly, he would begin to cry too. All he could do was to pick up one of her tiny hands, that seemed to be loose and lifeless as a jointed doll's at the end of her thin arms, and very gravely and very formally, in his best Hereford manner, lift this small object to his lips.

"I beg and implore you, Mistress Sibli," he murmured, as reverently as if she had been a princess, "to forgive me what I did, and to allow this night, and all that has befallen us, to be a solemn and sacred secret between us two, binding us together in a covenant, in a pledge, known to no other living soul!"

Never had Rhisiart's Norman blood stood him in better stead. As a Welshman he would have been far too imaginative to have thought of using a word like "covenant" or "pledge." As a Saxon he would have been too realistic to put so much emphasis upon a point of such nice legality.

But it was just this legal turn to the matter, as if he had given her a document signed and sealed, that was the one thing needful. In her ingrown, convoluted self-pity the idea of a bond between herself and this impulsive young gentleman was something upon which she could live for months and years. It was as if he'd handed her her marriage lines after "taking advantage" of her.

Her tears dried up, her sobs ceased. Since he was still on his knees before her their faces were very close. But she had suddenly become a normal woman, a woman who had a man, and her first instinct was not to kiss him but to scold him.

"You ought to be dressing yourself for the banquet," she said crossly, straightening as she spoke the collar of his tunic. "I can't think how you'll be in time as it is! You saw how she was dressed. You'd better go first to the Traitor's Room and see what your friend is putting on. Have you a black velvet doublet with black hosen to match? If you have, put that on, If you haven't — Well! you must ask Master Brut. He's seen more of life than you."

Rhisiart rose to his feet. It was extremely disagreeable to him to be told he had seen less of life than his devoted friend. From their first encounter on the highway he had regarded Master Brut as a complete ignoramus in anything that had to do with polished society. He decided to regain his diminished prestige with his new ally by turning the conversation to the deeper psychology of love; that sphere of philosophy in which his insight had proved so startling to the page-boys. He had not yet learnt that although women love to exalt the intelligence of their man to the outer world, to the man himself they dole out this admiration in a less wholesale manner.

"I thought she hated Master Simon to the death," he now began, looking down frowningly at the lifted purple chin beneath him. "I saw her myself trying to hang him. She seemed to want to caress the rope that was doing it. He was only saved by Meredith ab Owen.”

The small upraised visage, to which he addressed this startling revelation, carried upon its features in the flickering lantern-light a mysterious kind of lustre. This lustre was no mere outward phenomenon, such as a purple reflection from the creature’s outraged chin. It proceeded from a feminine heart stirred by the emotion of first love.

But Rhisiart looking down upon it from above was only anxious to regain what he feared he had lost, her respect for his searching intelligence. With the knitted brow of a thinker, therefore, he laid before her the following disturbing question: “Is it possible for a woman to order the man she loves to be hanged; and not only so, but to watch him being hanged; and not only so, but to caress his body while it swings? I tell you, Mistress, I saw her, I heard her! She told him she would think of him burning in Hell whenever she drank a sip of water!”

While he spoke in this manner, and indeed went into yet more horrid details, Rhisiart couldn’t help noticing the lustre that shone from the dwarf’s face. It crossed his mind that Sibli’s actual features weren’t displeasing at all. If it weren’t for the purple beard her face might even, by some people any rate, be called a comely face.

But the more he was forced to confess that the countenance looking up at him was not completely ugly the more inclined he grew to take cold-blooded precautions. He set himself to withdraw every sort of magnetic reciprocity from the expression with which he looked down upon her. He tried to throw into his stare the abysmal indifference of a cold-hearted cat to the perverse advances of a dog. He began reiterating his puzzled indignation at Lowri’s behaviour. “I tell you, Mistress, I saw it with my own eyes! I would be obliged if you could tell me what has changed her since then? Or isn’t she changed? How, from hating him so, has she come to love him like that? But perhaps you’ll say it never was love, except on his side. But, Sibli, surely it was love! Wasn’t it love, Sibli?”

The dwarf evidently derived profound emotional satisfaction from being appealed to to decide this delicate point. She paused before replying, not because she didn’t know well what she wanted to say, but because it was a precious moment to her to be the arbitress in this solemn Court of Love. At last she nodded her head so vigorously that, considering the thinness of her neck, it was hard not to feel as if her little doll-like skull might suddenly slip out of its socket and roll to the ground.

“Then why did she want to hang him that day?” he protested. “And why didn’t she untie his hands to-night? Master Brut sees him every afternoon and always unties his hands. Lawnslot must have tied them when he brought him to her room. But why didn’t she untie them?”

The Presiding Judge of the Court of Love considered this problem with a radiant countenance. “She did it afterwards — after we went away. She was in a different mood then.”

“Then you do say she loves him? Loves him as much as he loves her?”

Once again there took place that alarmingly vigorous nodding of the small head.

“As much as he loves her?” repeated Rhisiart in frowning amazement; for it seemed to him that if amorous phenomena of this kind were frequent in the world, neither he nor the Lollard knew much about life.

“As much as he loves her?” he reiterated stupidly.

“More!” and with this she gave her newly covenanted friend such a sharp rap with her tiny knuckles that he stepped back a pace. “More!” she repeated, her tone rising to that familiar pitch which he hadn’t heard for so long. And then, making him, with a chuckle of hilarious glee, a low mock-curtsey, “More! more! morel” she screamed at the top of her voice, as she disappeared up the tower-steps.

XI. ROOM FOR THE PRINCE!

THE BANQUET-HALL OF Dinas Bran had fallen, by the year of grace fourteen hundred, into so ruinous a state that it was very seldom used. Indeed, if the truth must be told, the last Lord of Bromfield, Ial and Maelor to use it regularly was that treacherous representative of the old Tywysiog who on betraying his province to the English had become the ancestor of our friend Rhisiart.

It was clear enough to all the guests that evening why it was that the hall was rarely used. Several wild birds that had entered the place before it was dark still fluttered about among the stone arches, arches whose particular type of masonry resembled that of the sacristy of Valle Crucis. In many places the roof had such great jagged holes in it that it must have been evident to all that had the night been stormy the banquet would have had to have been held elsewhere.

One advantage of the hall's ruinous condition was that the great volumes of smoke, which rose from more fires and larger fires than Rhisiart had ever seen in a manorial chamber, were enabled to escape into the cloudy night. The stars, as he hadn't failed to notice before he entered, were completely invisible. It wasn't possible from where he and Master Brut were seated to detect anything through those jagged apertures but thick darkness.

Rhisiart couldn't help thinking of Ffraid ferch Gloyw, tended by little Efa, alone up there in her tower; for both Luned and his friend Sibli could be seen along with the other ladies not far from where he sat. And thinking of little Efa left alone with the old lady it was a considerable relief to Rhisiart to notice among the group of Welshmen at the lower end of the hall the unmistakeable facial disfigurement and the solitary roving eye of Crach Ffinnant. Hung at intervals on the walls — though the columns of swirling smoke prevented our friend from seeing more of them than the one just above his head — were large, rough, imaginary representations of former rulers of north-eastern Wales before the days when violence and treachery together brought down to the ground the mystic towers of Mathrafal.

These crudely-limned figures, darkened by smoke, dimmed by damp, had become no better than forlorn eidolons in faded torques and desecrated armour! “Slain in battle” had been their epitaph; and what was left of their once commanding presences had become like the half-ruined hall round which they hung: a rumour, a memory, a long reiterated sigh upon the flickering streamers of the torches and the undulant eddies of the wind.

The one figure Rhisiart could make out, though between him and its sorrowful lineaments the smoke from a great crackling fire kept rolling, was that of a dark-bearded man with an expression of resigned desolation. Was that face, he wondered, the face of the famous traitor who was his own ancestor? “Shall I have that look one day,” he thought, “when I have dodged the executioners of Bolingbroke by betraying Owen?”

The Lollard was talking to him earnestly and quietly all this while. No one else could hear them, for the uproar from all sides, now that the honey-hearted mead had begun to flow, was deafening, and all tongues, and all souls too seemed loosed in a torrent of excited speech.

But the Lollard was talking about the inevitable power of Master Wycliffe’s ideas when once the common people understood them.

“The common people!” thought Rhisiart sadly and bitterly. “Doesn’t he realize that there’s no more chance of the common people understanding such things than of their understanding Saint Thomas Aquinas?”

But Master Brut’s arguments were so forcible that our sceptical friend began trying desperately to imagine a Wales wherein every serf and every serf’s wife and daughter were alive to the metaphysics of the Redemption. He couldn’t imagine it! “This Lollardry,” he thought, “is a thing for the few; and must always be for the few! You can’t put the philosophy of religion into simple brains. You can only give them the images and the symbols that have been worn smooth by the handling of centuries!”

Lending, therefore, but half his mind to the discourse of his companion, Rhisiart allowed his attention to wander at large over the torch-lit spectacle of that ruined hall.

The women were all seated together; and he was hard put to it, as his gaze scanned their faces, to convey to each particular pair of eyes, as his own encountered them, the appropriate recognition of a special understanding. With Tegolin this was easy, and with Tegolin alone. The Maid was dressed in blue, and with her flaming hair falling loose and unbound over her shoulders she looked more beautiful than he had ever seen her.

But she met his glance in the old spontaneous manner, with a direct comprehensive smile; and he had the wit to see that his startled admiration at the transformation of her appearance pleased as well as amused her. She was seated at the end of the row of ladies and had Mad Huw at her side; nor was it hard to detect that the poor man was in a seventh heaven of happiness.

Her floating hair brushed against his grey habit, and Rhisiart could see that she made signs to the pages who carried round the sweet-smelling mead to leave his goblet empty. She herself, he noticed, did every now and then share a two-handled loving-cup with the good man, a cup that our friend suspected contained some very mild home-made wine.

Rhisiart's own mood was just then a chastened and tender one; and something about the poor Friar's beatitude as he permitted himself to sip this innocent beverage touched him to the heart.

"He must feel that his King is safe," the boy thought; and then he thought, "I know what he feels; for I feel the same about Owen,"

Entirely at ease with regard to Tegolin, between whom and himself there seemed to have fallen away, whenever their eyes met, every trace of misunderstanding, Rhisiart was rendered considerably uncomfortable by his fear of any direct glance from Tegolin's mother. This latter lady, by whose side sat the Constable, seemed however too absorbed in a contest of ironical wit with Hywel Sele of Nannau, who held the place of honour on Denis' right, to have time to exchange any sort of devilry with himself. He did notice, however, that she wore that same tight-fitting gown of yellow satin; and he couldn't resist a startled emotion that was almost like awe, as he caught amid the turmoil of voices the airy accents of her jests with Owen's worst enemy.

"I should think that dress would burn her flesh," he thought, "like the robe of Nessus!"

But it was in meeting the eyes of Luned and little Sibli that he actually suffered most. He was too proud to dodge their glances, in which there seemed to him to be a sort of mischievous conspiracy to make him feel a fool. He was certain the dwarf was murmuring remarks about him to Luned, remarks at whose nature he could make no guess, but the purport of their conversation, as he saw it go on, was something that filled him with uneasiness. It wasn't that he didn't trust Sibli absolutely in the matter of their vigil at the presence-room; but he suspected that the little creature was bringing down by as many pegs as she could whatever admiration for him and awe of him the wise Luned might have succeeded, during all these months, in hiding away in her spacious bosom.

He couldn't see Lowri's face during her wit-contests with the Lord of Nannau; but what he could see was the face of Father Rheinalt, and this concentrated image of fatal obsession revealed everything. It was clear that whenever she flirted with Hywel Sele across the Constable she took a devilish delight in throwing some significant look at the agitated monk — and well he knew what her looks could be! She threw these looks at the man just as a cruel boy might throw stones at some wretched pond-newt that refused to quit rising to the surface in obstinate but helpless defiance.

Yes, it was easy enough to read in the passionate features of Tegolin's father the desperate trouble into which these looks threw him. Our friend decided that Master Simon must have ended that strange meeting of theirs with the command, "Drive him to it!"

Father Pascentius was seated near Father Rheinalt, but between them there was an old silent lay-brother, of huge proportions and with an enormous beard, so that the two monks had nearly no opportunity to exchange confidences as they devoted themselves to the highly-seasoned meats and the heady drink.

Rhisiart's diplomatic mind was teased by this; for the longer he watched Tegolin's father, the more nervous he became lest the man should burst out into some violent patriotic indiscretion, the rashness of which would prove a vent for the turmoil into which Lowri was throwing him.

And what a fool the Lollard must be so blandly to go on explaining to him the precious "difficulties" — all pretended no doubt — which the Ruthin wench found in Wycliffite doctrine when matters were so crucial!

"The baggage has got hold of you sure enough you poor idiot," was our lad's secret comment as he muttered his mechanical surprise at what his friend was so eagerly revealing. For it was not concealed from Rhisiart that the tension, as this strange banquet went on, was growing moment by moment more perilously acute.

How should it not be so with that cold-blooded jeering devil from Nannau just come to make trouble and supported by that little red monster, who as he gulped down the mead looked more and more like one of those Pictish aboriginals that were supposed to linger still in the Plinlimmon mountains!

“Well,” thought Rhisiart, “it’s clear that I’ll get scant help from you, Master Brut, if I’m to manage to keep our honour and yet save our skins!”

He could see that the Seneschal, who kept whispering across the board to Denis, was as worried by the look of things as he was himself. The old gentleman had a couple of Welsh men-at-arms of his own — our friend knew the fellows by sight but knew no more of them — stationed at his elbow; and every now and then he would despatch one or other of these men on some discreet errand, either to the end of the banquet-hall, where Crach Ffinnant and his mountaineers were already growing uproarious, or to the entrance of the great ruinous hall, where a considerable number of Shropshire yeomen were keeping an attentive eye upon Denis Burnell.

Men-at-arms from the guard-room kept joining and leaving this stationary group, perhaps merely to share their flagons; but perhaps also, for Rhisiart soon became aware of considerable excitement as these new-comers went and came, to bring further disquieting news from the castle-gate.

At one point our friend was sure he heard, carried across the courtyard on a sudden gust of wind, the sound of trumpets from outside the walls. At any rate it soon became clear to him, as for the twentieth time he put down his own cup untasted, that, trumpets or no trumpets, some very grave and momentous news had just now reached Master Adda and had been hurriedly passed on by him to the imperturbable Denis.

As he gazed at the forlorn features of the historic personage — could it really be his ancestor? — whose crudely-depicted lineaments looked down at him through the smoke, he couldn't help recalling the sinister old tale of that banquet between the British chiefs and the heathen invaders that had been suddenly interrupted by the cry of "Knives!" and the plunging into unsuspicious Welsh hearts of a double score of hidden Saxon blades. Yes — trumpets or no trumpets — some event of a startling and unexpected kind must have occurred. There was an ominous stir among the Shropshire troopers and the flirtation between the Lord of Nannau and Mistress Lowri stopped as suddenly as if it had been interrupted by a flight of arrows.

Both Luned and the dwarf, after staring with wide-opened eyes upon the Constable, turned spontaneously towards Rhisiart; and he could see Father Rheinalt speak hurriedly to the old grey-beard at his side, while Father Pascentius fixed upon the Constable's face what looked like two burning points of black fire.

Hywel Sele, making a quite obvious effort to compose his great, sleek, clean-shaved countenance, bent down to the little ruffian at his side and whispered something to him that caused the man to turn his head and throw a most murderous glance at the three clerics from Valle Crucis.

The Scab alone and his friends from the mountains seemed oblivious to this new development. They were either too far gone in their cups, or they were so used to dramatic surprises and tensions, that twenty trumpets might have sounded without their turning their heads.

Denis Burnell's expression alone betrayed no flicker of surprise, or astonishment, or agitation. Once as he sat there with the whole banquet hall, except those preoccupied mountaineers, watching him in awed silence, he deliberately turned to our friend and gave him a pleasant reassuring smile.

As for old Adda, he had clearly reached a point when things had become too much for him. All he appeared to want to do was to efface himself completely and leave the progress of events to take their predestined course.

Suddenly Rhisiart found himself trembling violently from head to foot. He wasn’t conscious of any definite cause for alarm, beyond the awareness he had had all the evening that his life along with Master Brut’s was in extreme peril. But what afterwards struck him as significant was the manner in which he forced this trembling to stop. He stared at Tegolin in a sort of desperation, concentrating all his will to make her meet his eyes. There! She met them. She gave him a deep steady understanding look, a look like the one he had had from her that Midsummer Eve when they told each other their ages!

Nor did she smile this time as their eyes clung together. She just stared at him and he at her. Indeed he was the first to look away. But when he did so, drawn by something arresting in the Ruthin girl at her side, his trembling fit had gone.

But the Ruthin girl’s manner held him fascinated for several seconds. His prejudice against this young woman was maliciously deep. He couldn’t get out of his head her tone to that unlucky young son of Lord Grey. He couldn’t forgive her for leading his comrade such a dance. But now, as he turned to her from his eye-encounter with Tegolin, he was suddenly aware of something in her nature such as he had not realized before. The girl was now gazing at Tegolin with an intensity of regard that startled him. It was a look of a kind such as he had never seen in any woman’s face directed towards another woman. It was more than affection; it was more than admiration; it was a look of worship. Illuminated by this look the heavy, uncomely countenance of the girl was absolutely transfigured! He couldn't help glancing quickly at his companion. Had Alice's spiritual instructor, that besotted dupe, seen what he saw?

But no! The Lollard, like everybody else at that tense moment, was looking from the Seneschal to Denis, and from Denis to the Seneschal.

What was that? It seemed to him that there now reached them all, carried on the far-drawn breath of the autumnal wind, blowing the flames of the fires and the flames of the torches into long red streamers, an obscure sound of enthusiastic cheering. Was Owen already in possession of the castle? Were all its Lawnslots and Gerallts and Iorwerths going over to his side?

"I think the Constable will be on his feet in a second," he thought. And then drawn once more to the Ruthin girl, whose whole being seemed melting into that of the red-haired Maid, he said to himself, "I could never love as much as that!"

Yes, Denis did rise now to his feet and whisper something to the Seneschal. But as he moved slowly down the hall between the trestles and the torches, to pass out of sight among troopers, his whole air expressed no more than a mild concern.

But there rose at once an uproar of excited tongues, under cover of which Rhisiart announced to the Lollard that in his opinion Owen's revolt had already begun. "It may even be," he assured his friend, "that news has come that the castle is captured!"

But the Seneschal must, by now, have given some special orders; for from the further end of the vaulted chamber, from behind the place where the adherents of Derfel were revelling, there came, clear and distinct, the sound of a long-drawn sequence of penetrating pipe-notes. These notes produced an instantaneous hush — as Homer would say— "throughout the shadowy hall."

Even the Scab’s friends held their peace. Gently and slowly, with one last faintly-receding note, the pipe-music died away.

Glancing towards the entrance Rhisiart realized that the Shropshire troopers were as puzzled as he was himself. Some moved uneasily forward. Those who had been surreptitiously drinking sneaked hurriedly to the nearest trestle-board to replace their beakers. Others straightened their belts and jerked their weapons into position. All stared at one another in amazement; their broad-mouthed mutterings being the only sounds audible from end to end of the whole time-worn place.

“What is it?” whispered the Lollard, turning towards him a face of such childish and simple wonder that Rhisiart sucked in his lips in irritation.

“He took it calmly enough,” he thought, “when I told him the war had begun. But at the note of a flute he looks as if he’d seen an angel. I shall never—”

But his irritation with the childishness of his comrade was interrupted by an outbreak in chorus, without a word uttered to start it, from every male Welsh throat in that smoky hall.

Our friend tried in vain to catch the full meaning of what was sung. It was in old Welsh; and though Modry had taught him many antique words, they were mostly the names of domestic objects.

But as far as he could put the words together now, what he heard was an archaic Welsh rhyme that ran roughly like this:

Woe for us! Woe for us! The embers are dead.
The Birds of Rhiannon are all flown away.
Beauty has gone with the Blessed Head.
We are left to the sword and the wind and the clay!

It was not only the Lollard who was moved now. A wave of emotion ran down the whole length of that ruined hall as every Welshman joined in these enigmatic words. The monks from Valle Crucis alone refrained: Tegolin's father whispering conspiracy into the ear of the bearded lay-brother, while Father Pascentius wore the air of one who was ostentatiously detaching himself from everything in the world save the Summa Theologica.

But the moment the words ceased, all the women in the place rose up from their seats and with the same spontaneity as the words had been chanted moved in procession towards the door. Two by two, they moved, with a gravity like the gravity of some automatic religious ceremony.

Mad Huw hesitated a second, and it was clear to Rhisiart that the Maid was giving him his choice to go or stay, but when he saw that cloud of fiery hair drifting off between the tables, a look of terrified desolation came into his face and he hurried after her with the forward-flung concentration of one who sees his very soul escaping from him.

Master Brut was now expressing to Rhisiart his evangelical distaste for the chant the men had just sung. He declared it was a survival of a heathen celebration of the Earth-Goddess. "It is this sort of thing," he assured our friend, with a harsh expression in his guileless face not unlike Mad Huw's when he indicated the perils of Lollardry, "from which our study of the New Testament will free the Church! This sort of thing is in the Church but it is not in the New Testament. There is nothing for instance in the New Testament to suggest—"

But Rhisiart's mind had voyaged far from the New Testament. He was recalling the feeling he had had as he watched Lowri and Simon; that vision of himself weeping like a lover on the golden breast of Owen. He associated this pure emotion now with what had been revealed to him of the Ruthin girl's feeling for Tegolin. "When I made love to Luned," he thought, "my soul was hard as a bit of marble. But when I thought of Owen, as I watched those two, I felt I could lose myself in that man's soul. I felt I could melt and dissolve away, as long as I melted into him!"

The Seneschal had moved now into the place of the absent Denis, and was engaged in a heated but whispered argument with Hywel Sele. Meanwhile Sele's friend David was clearly itching for something to happen that would end all this suspense. "What an unpleasant little man!" thought Rhisiart, contemplating the scarred face and great naked hairy arms of this famous swashbuckling servant of the House of Lancaster.

Every drop of the lad's Norman blood turned physically sick at the primitive brutality, just like one might imagine emanating from some squat skeleton of the Bronze Age, that the figure of this famous soldier of fortune revealed. Teased by the whispering in front of him, which must have been, in some special way, curiously irritating to his type of nerves, David Gam deliberately drew from within his clothes an evil-looking knife and began sharpening it against the edge of the trestle-board.

Every now and then, however, he would lay down this dangerous weapon upon the table and glare round him with an expression of such murderous intention that Rhisiart said to himself: "The moment a blow's struck, if it's at the other end of the hall, this hairy wretch will leap up like a little wolf and go stabbing right and left among the Scab's Welshmen!"

It became impossible for our friend to stop himself from murmuring a few "Hail Marys", so extremely unpleasant he felt it would be to engage in a struggle with this goblinish assassin. There was something about his gnome-like stature combined with those gorilla-like arms that made the idea of any physical contest with him singularly distasteful. "I would far sooner," he thought, "stand up to Hywel Sele. At least he wouldn't tear out your liver with his own hands!"

And in imagination Rhisiart found himself with his teeth embedded in one of those hairy arms as the little monster held him down on the ground and kept stabbing him with heavy sickening thuds, while each time the blade was tugged out and the blood spurted, his mind thought clearly and distinctly, “That’s the last!”

He couldn’t help a small but very cold shiver running down his spine, for this time he had no Tegolin to meet his look, nor was the expression of Hywel Sele, under what old Adda was whispering to him, at all re-assuring.

“At least that’s what I think,” concluded Master Brut, turning his bland countenance towards the Scab’s followers, who, under the influence of what they’d drunk, were breaking into song. “And now what do you feel?”

Rhisiart made no reply. He had begun to be puzzled by the manner in which both the Cistercian Fathers were now appealing to their long-bearded companion. Where had he seen this majestic old man before? He tried to recall the various persons who had crossed their path in Valle Crucis three months ago. No! This old man escaped him; and yet there was something about him —

But a great gust of wind, bringing a palpable suggestion of rain and rain-soaked earth, made him turn his face to the entrance. Such a moan did this wind make, as it swept torch-flames and fire-flames before it, that even the Scab’s people were awed into silence. And on the wind there now came, and the thing was all the more impressive because of the choking clouds of bitter smoke, an unmistakeable sound of trumpets. The feelings that whirled through our friend’s consciousness swayed and eddied, gathered and dispersed, like wind-swept flocks of starlings. He knew now, by the movements and gestures of the troopers in the entrance, that it was not Owen who had possessed himself of Dinas Bran.

He could hear the wind still moaning through the broken masonry of the walls and through the fragments of stone-vaulting in the roof, where the ancient sleeping places above the hall had crumbled during the centuries and now lay in scattered heaps on the hill-side. The taste of the thick aromatic smoke that filled his mouth made him feel that he was once more twisting his bony limbs round the soft cedar-wood scented body of Luned while he cried to the stars to witness that he had her while she did not have him!

But to die for Owen. Never to be Rhisiart again! And for death to come to him so soon! To come to him when he hadn’t even taken his degree. When he had never killed a man, never ravished a girl, never struck a single blow for the land of his fathers! Would Tegolin cry when she heard of his execution a little more than the Ruthin girl when she heard of the burning of Master Brut? And the shameful wish stole over him, as he and the Lollard choked in the smoke and watched Father Rheinalt and Father Pascentius get up from their seats and move towards the entrance, while their long-bearded lay-brother bent himself forward over the board, pressing upon it with his elbows, and covering his eyes with his hand, that he had done what his mother always said would suit him best — become a monk!

How happy to be Father Pascentius and sit in your cell all day long, listening to the wood-pigeons, and thinking up objections to every single interpretation of Saint Thomas that was not by a Cistercian!

But this hot thunder-wind blowing the choking smoke into his face, combined with the superstitious silence of the men of Derfel and the high expectation of the guards at the entrance, produced finally a most curious impression. He had the feeling that his fate was advancing upon him in the form of a vast pair of dusky feminine breasts, each with a crater where the nipple should have been out of which proceeded fire and smoke!

He felt that to be Rhisiart still, to be Rhisiart free and independent, to be Rhisiart who could climb the steps of that scaffold, or who could fall sobbing on the breast of Owen, it was necessary that he should embrace, oh! relentlessly embrace, the fragrant darkness that thickened and deepened below that advancing vision!

"Give me your hand, my friend," he found himself gasping out to the Lollard. "I believe it's the King!"

The Lollard not only accepted the proffered fingers and held them fast; he bent forward and in full view of the great, plump, white, sneering face of Hywel Sele, that leered like a comfortable sword-fish surveying the antics of a couple of mackerel, kissed our friend on the forehead.

"Fear not" he whispered in Welsh. "Christ is greater than any—"

"Room for the high and mighty Prince, Henry of Lancaster, Prince of Wales! Room for the noble and puissant Baron, Henry Percy, Warden of the King's Marches! Room for the most noble Knight and most Honourable Member of the King's Privy Council, Thomas Fitz-Alan, Earl of Arundel!"

Everybody in the place, from one end of the hall to the other, rose to his feet; and from the Shropshire yeomen, who were a good deal more excited than the Seneschal's Welsh retainers, a deep-voiced cheer went up.

"Long live Prince Hal! Long live Harry Hotspur!"

Not a voice was raised for the grizzled Lord of Chirk. The Earl was hated by the Welsh, in spite of his conciliatory policy, even more than was Lord Grey; while the stout Salopians, of the old Mercian breed, nourished in their rustic hearts deep resentment against both these Norman barons.

Rhisiart stared with wide-open eyes at the slender figure of the little Prince, as he paused in his courtly Lancastrian fashion to receive the blessing of Father Pascentius.

Father Rheinalt drew up his swarthy tonsured head and folded his arms with such a forbidding air that our friend could see the boy cast on him a quick puzzled look as he made his way between the tables to greet the Seneschal. That diplomatic old Welshman was completely in his element; and Rhisiart felt proud of his Welsh blood when he saw the perfect tact with which he bent his knee to this alien Prince and made some easy jest that brought at once a frank response from the boy.

With something that looked like exaggerated and sarcastic diffidence Hywel Sele bent his proud knee, but our friend couldn't help remarking that it was rather upon his companion with those hairy red arms that the royal child gazed with more interest. The elderly lay-brother, who had been left alone, now himself came forward; and if Rhisiart had been impressed by the courtly dignity of old Adda he was amazed at the natural ease with which this humble retainer of Valle Crucis bent his tall frame, lifted the child's hand to his great beard, and then modestly stepped backwards into the covering smoke of the nearest fire.

Before he knew what was happening it was his own and his companion's turn. The Lollard was in front; and Rhisiart could see that his frank smile and kindly blue eyes made a favourable impression on the little Prince. But it was a complete surprise when, in the midst of his own obeisance, the young Harry began speaking to him as if to another boy, and a greater surprise still when, after a puzzled nod in the direction of the Bard of Ffinnant, who with his birth-mark ablaze and his solitary eye gleaming like a bewitched gem was uttering unintelligible words, the royal child, evidently feeling that he had completed his duty, deliberately sat down at our friend's table.

The Prince once seated, all the rest of the company found places as chance dictated; but Rhisiart for a few minutes saw nothing in that smoke-darkened hall but the unnaturally long, strangely wistful countenance of the Usurper’s heir, his dark steady gaze, his troubled nervous mouth.

But the boy was chatting freely and naturally to him now, giving no sign that he knew him as a prisoner, only delighted, it seemed, to discover someone not so remote from him in age, and someone too — it may be believed how this delighted Rhisiart — who could describe to him in detail how boys lived when they became students at Oxford.

What an extraordinarily long face the child had! And how naturally and hungrily, having once made sure that the great Hotspur was satisfied with his behaviour, he devoured the venison-pies that Lawnslot and Gerallt were privileged to set before him, and only frowned a little, but made no protest, when Master Brut, treating him like an infant, mixed water with his wine!

He was dressed in plain black and white; and had no colour at all about him except a scarlet ribbon round his neck from which hung a little silver medallion of the Blessed Virgin.

The only weapon Rhisiart could discover about his person was the hunting-knife on the opposite side from the hunting-horn, in his black leather belt. It may be believed that it was not very long before our good friend — who habitually used this antique treasure to win favour with younger boys — produced his own wonderful-looking dagger.

The Prince’s eyes gleamed with delight when he saw it, and with so much more delight when Rhisiart let him handle it, that our friend had a troublesome pang lest his chivalrous civility should compel him to make him a present of it.

“Is it sharp?” enquired the child, flashing a swift penetrating glance at the lucky possessor of such a treasure. And then, “May I try it?” he asked; and immediately began searching in the pocket of his tunic for some letter or document to practise upon.

Rhisiart couldn’t help glancing aside to see whether Hotspur saw him hand over this murderous weapon to the heir of Lancaster. But the crafty border-chief was fully occupied in propitiating the wild Welsh of Cadair Idris and Llyn Tegid. He prided himself on the fantastic estimate with which the uneducated all over these islands accepted his military prowess.

As a matter of fact Percy was a far more brilliant diplomatist than he was a formidable fighter. Indeed it was actually because of a certain temperamental distaste for desperate single combats that the front he assumed to the world was such a rough and brusque one!

And as Rhisiart glanced at him now and noted how his impassioned gestures, gleaming dark eyes, and rich deep-throated voice were casting a spell over the Derfel-men, he couldn’t help thinking, as he marked the popular hero’s unwieldy bulk compared with the flexible muscles of the young Prince, that in a couple of years he would far sooner face Harry Hotspur in the field than Harry of Monmouth.

Turning his attention to Fitz-Alan, who now sat between the Constable and the Seneschal, he seemed to detect from the mere look of the back of the man’s head that he was in a towering rage. Unscrupulously eavesdropping, as the Prince after some hesitation began cutting and stabbing with the borrowed dagger a voluminous document to which was attached the royal seal, Rhisiart was certain he caught the syllable “she” dropped more than once from the Earl’s lips. He was talking about Lowri; that was it! He was complaining to Denis, with the peculiar irritation that men of a certain type feel towards the philosophical companion of a desirable woman, that it was very early for the ladies to have left the banquet.

It was clear to our friend, who could see old Adda’s face, but not the face of the Constable, that the latter was taking the whole blame upon himself for this discourtesy; and it was plain that such coolness under the Earl's wrath excited the wonder of the old diplomatist. Denis must have jested about the little Prince, for Rhisiart quite distinctly heard the Earl protest in his harsh voice that he couldn't imagine the lady in question being shy of meeting a mere child.

Meanwhile the boy in question having proved to his lively satisfaction the sharpness of Rhisiart's dagger upon the paternal letter, and having succeeded in quaffing a deep draught of red wine before the Lollard had time to dilute it, was now engaged in a dangerous game of his own, which consisted in throwing the dagger into the air above his head and catching it by the handle as it came down.

Master Brut was evidently not a little troubled at this proceeding, and so indeed was Rhisiart, for he doubted very much that he would escape serious trouble if the heir to the throne injured his right hand with a blade borrowed from himself. But something in him was so sympathetic with the owner of that long white face and tense wrought-up nerves that he kept avoiding the Lollard's eyes; and thus, unworthy and meanly, put upon that conscientious man the responsibility of interfering.

Turning his head a little in this mischievous process, to the end that at least he shouldn't see the boy wound himself, he met the subhuman glare of David Gam, and became conscious that Hywel Sele was slowly rising to his feet with the obvious intention of stopping this dangerous game with his own hands.

But the Lollard had already interfered. "God's teeth! What d'ye mean by that?"

The boy's shrill cry of pain and rage rang through the hall; for the well-meaning scholar in snatching at his arm had brought it about that the descending dagger, which had been flung higher than usual, grazed, as it fell clattering among the cups, the Prince's bare wrist, breaking the skin and drawing blood.

Everybody leapt to his feet. The troopers came rushing forward. The Scab set up a peculiar howl of his own which sounded like the neigh of Derfel's Horse; and before either the Constable or the Earl could swing round, David Gam's hairy arms were about our friend's body, while Hywel Sele was clutching Master Brut by the throat.

"Kill the murderers! Kill the assassins!" cried the excited troopers, jostling even Fitz-Alan and Denis as they thronged forward to protect the son of their King.

But the little Prince, hurriedly mounting his chair and stepping from thence upon the table, raised his hand high in the air and made his youthful voice ring through the hall. "I'm all right, good people! I'm all right! It had nothing to do with these gentlemen. I was" — he paused nervously and then added very slowly and distinctly— "I was playing a game of my own."

The anxious troopers raised a thundering cheer and, laughing and jesting, obediently drew back; but so occupied with the safety of the child, who was now sucking his wounded wrist while he still stood erect on the table, were both the Constable and the Earl that the Lollard might have been strangled and Rhisiart's ribs cracked if chance or Providence hadn't intervened.

As it happened it was our friend who suffered most. In fact he suffered a great deal worse than Master Brut; for the latter, being harder to get at had more time to defend himself, and though dedicated for a skilful torturer Hywel Sele wasn't a born killer with his hands. But the friends were in evil plight. Crowding about the boy on the table nobody seemed to care what was going on behind the table, nor was there any sound down there save the heavy panting of four human throats.

Our friend went through what to him seemed like several hours of desperate contest. The little red man had got hold of him round both his elbows; and having seized him like this, he began, with heavily drawn breathings, to tighten his hug.

When the two Anglophiles were alone together, later that night, and Hywel Sele was almost dead drunk, he so far forgot the character of David Gam as to enquire about his feelings as he was hugging “that young fool”.

“I suppose,” he remarked, “you thought you’d just go on squeezing the little devil till you’d squeezed the Holy Ghost out of him?”

But David Gam could only return an extremely fatuous grin to this question; for the truth was he had simply given way to a wholehearted joy in the power of his hairy arms.

“You’re an idiot,” was his patron’s comment upon this grin. But Gam wasn’t an idiot. He was a person whose identity could only be fully realized when he was squeezing the life out of another person.

But if Gam’s feelings on this occasion were simple ones, Rhisiart’s were extremely complicated. Thought after thought rushed headlong through his consciousness. “He’ll break my arms first,” he said to himself, “and then my ribs.” And in his breathless pain he was surprised to find himself becoming two Rhisiarts. One Rhisiart was savagely biting the bare shoulder of the ruffian who was hugging him. The other Rhisiart, quite cool and collected, was looking on as if he were totally uninvolved. “I am being obscurely murdered,” thought this other Rhisiart. “And no one except little Sibli will care very much. But I’m not going to call for help, however it hurts. Go on! Break my bones. You can’t make me call for help! No one will ever know about this except Owen. But Owen will know about it. No! you can’t make me call out! — Owen — will — know — about it. No! I’m not crying because of the pain. I'm crying — because Owen — will know about it."

But suddenly the pain ceased to be the kind that required all his willpower to bear it without calling out. In place of murmuring, as he had been doing from the beginning, "He'll break my arms if he goes on!" Rhisiart began to find something in the pain itself that gave him a strange exultation, an exultation akin to but not identical with the old dark trembling of the "nerve perilous" that Lowri had played on. "It's for Owen," he thought. And then he thought, "Am I going mad?" For the pain had begun to take a palpable form; and the form it took was the form of a corpse, which was himself, and yet not himself!

With this corpse he was wrestling; and as he wrestled he kept crying out, "I know your name! I know your name!" And sometimes the corpse had an evil stench, and sometimes it had a lovely heavenly smell like lilies of the valley.

And he kept crying out to it, "I know your name!" though how it could have a name when it was only himself remained one of those problems that often confront a mind under some cracking tension.

Less occupied with anxiety about the little Prince than the Earl and the Constable, and by reason of their holy office more alert to the back-washes of events, the two Valle Crucis Fathers and their burly attendant pushed their way past the absorbed magnates. Father Rheinalt took Hywel Sele completely by surprise and sent him reeling, while the lay-brother, plucking the little red man from his victim like a maggot from a tasteful nut, hurled him with the force of a catapult straight into the substantial figure of Harry Hotspur, reducing that genial hero to a state of breathless speechlessness!

The first thing that Rhisiart himself felt when he recovered his senses was a fit of violent nausea. Humiliating though it was in the presence of all these notables he was forced to go down on his knees beneath the Prince's table, and vomit there like a sick dog. He knew that the kindly hands that were patting his shoulder, as he retched his heart out, were the hands of Master Brut; and when, pale and exhausted, he regained his seat he knew it was the same hands that were offering him a drink of water.

Father Rheinalt and the bearded lay-brother had moved away, and he could dimly make out their two cowled forms standing in the smoke by one of the fires; but Father Pascentius had remained on the scene and was now engaged in giving a detailed account of the whole occurrence to the ruffled Earl, while the Constable, taking care to send old Adda to intercept any false rumours that might be spreading through the castle, was preparing to bind up with his own hands the child's bleeding wrist.

But the little Prince, waving aside Denis' help, jumped lightly down from his perch, and Rhisiart caught the dark eyes in that long white face turned half-reproachfully and half-sympathetically towards himself and the Lollard. The temper of the scene changed rapidly now, from tragic tension to amused relief, a change that was accelerated by the noisy and humorous invective which Harry Percy, to recover his own aplomb, began pouring upon the head of David Gam.

In the reaction from the shock neither our friend nor Master Brut was in much of a mood to exchange confidences. Rhisiart was aware of two physical sensations, one unpleasant and one pleasant: the smell of his own vomit rising up from the darkness and the pressure upon his fingers of the Lollard's hand. Resignedly fatalistic though his mood was he did retain enough vitality to watch with fascinated interest the proceedings of Hotspur.

Though so conceited about his legal acumen our friend really had it in him to be, whether he knew it or not, a formidable novice in the art of diplomacy. It was therefore very natural that he should be so fascinated by Hotspur who was a living example of all that he most instinctively reverenced.

And he watched Hotspur now with growing amazement! The man still kept turning to the Scab and his fellow-Derfelites, treating them as if they were an independent Welsh tribe whose attitude of mind it was essential that he, as the Warden of the Marches, should be able to follow with intelligent sympathy.

But what it was impossible for Rhisiart not to notice was the haughty attitude of Fitz-Alan to both Hywel Sele and David Gam, This evidently meant little to the red-haired adventurer, who, as a mercenary freelance, expected nothing else, but that it was a surprise and a shock to the Baron of Nannau was very obvious.

It was also plain to Rhisiart that what especially hurt the self-respect of this complacent and sardonic Anglophile was the fact that the Lord of Chirk regarded him and behaved to him as if he were, socially speaking, on a level with David Gam.

“Shall we all move, my Lords and Masters” — it was Denis himself speaking— “to the further end of our poor hall, where our good friend here, the Bard of Ffinnant” — and he made a courtly bow in the direction of the Scab— “is anxious to give our gracious Prince Henry a specimen of his curious and interesting art?”

The young Henry, who had been for some while regarding the disfigured countenance and the cyclopean eye of the prophet of Derfel with excited wonder, brightened up at those words, and at once cast such an appealing and self-accusing glance at our friend, whose unlucky dagger was now safe back in its sheath, that the Constable hastened to add— “Oh yes, my Prince, Master Rhisiart and Master Brut will join us; and so I hope” — and he raised his voice so as to be heard by Father Rheinalt and the formidable lay-brother— "will our Fathers in God from Valle Crucis."

It was a blessed comfort to both Rhisiart and the Lollard to leave the spot from which they might so easily have been carried away dead; and when, following the Constable and the Prince, the whole company re-gathered about the fire at the end of the hall, our friend's spirits rose so considerably that he began to take a more hopeful view of their fate.

"I hope to God," he said to himself, "the Scab won't go and spoil it!" But encouraged by Denis, who by this time seemed to have got the situation well under control, the representative of Derfel confined himself to a series of bardic improvisations, to which, since they seemed to know by instinct the drift of his Awen, the rich bass voices of his mountaineers extemporized a kind of vocal accompaniment.

The artful monotony of these ancient melodies from the slopes of Cadair Idris soon began to have a more than soothing effect upon the less musical in the audience.

The red-haired David, who treated the occasion as if it were a bivouac in the desert, soon slipped from his seat to a couch of bracken, where neither the sparks that showed signs of igniting his bed nor the noise of his own snores were able to disturb his oblivion.

The little Prince too, though with no other movement, allowed his head to sink against the Lollard's shoulder; while the great Lord of Chirk, whose experience of life had not included Welsh minstrelsy, occupied himself in puzzling out word by word, for he was a poor scholar, a despatch which he had received that morning from the King's camp.

By the time the performance was at an end and the old Seneschal had returned from his errand of counteracting false rumours, Denis hastened to put the royal child into his care, with instructions that he should be given a bed, under a responsible guard of Shropshire troopers, in the warmest guest-room in the castle. As the sleepy little boy put his hand in the old man's hand everyone rose to their feet.

Hotspur, however, strode up to the child, whose long white face in the torch-light had something phantom-like about it, and bending down whispered in his ear and placed a coin in his hand.

"I would — like — to — bestow," the boy repeated at once, bravely straightening his shoulders and holding his head high, "this — little — token — upon — so — upon so gifted a poet." There was no need for anyone to push the Bard of Ffinnant forward, for that worthy fully comprehended, none better, what it was proper for princes to do when they were impressed by the inspirations of genius.

With the natural grace of a born courtier the rogue now went down on his knee.

"I — bestow — on you," said the little boy, losing his sleepy stare as he encountered the burning eye which was fixed upon him, "this — poor piece — of gold." He paused a moment, keeping the outstretched hand waiting, and then added, "I shall tell — my father — of — of your kindness — to me."

The hand of the prophet of Derfel had closed upon the coin and he was retiring in discreet haste, when suddenly a voice that made Rhisiart quickly turn his head, though it was only the voice of the lay-brother, called upon the mountaineers to acknowledge this gift to their leader.

The tumultuous shout that followed was so loud that the unresponsive Fitz-Alan turned upon the men with a menacing scowl. But the diplomatic Hotspur intervened. "'Tis a royal gold 'noble' of the Prince's great-grandfather," he announced in his rich hypnotic voice, "Edward the Third of Crecy and Poitiers, where the Welsh archers helped us to conquer France.

You'll see upon it, my good friend" — this addressed to the Scab who certainly by this time had seen all there was to be seen— "the image of King Edward sailing in a galley. I'm sure you all wish for his great-grandson as many more happy nights in Wales as — as there are—" But the allusion to the prowess of the Welsh at Edward's battles was enough to start a vociferous acclaim, and as, to the tune of it, old Adda led the boy away, Rhisiart gazed with renewed respect at Harry Percy. "It isn't by the sword," he thought, "it's by the tongue, that the world is ruled." As he thought of this, a bold and startling idea took possession of him, an idea so agitating that it caused the pit of his stomach to feel as if it contained a flapping sail. Why shouldn't he make an oration to these great lords, defending Owen against the treacherous machinations of Lord Grey, and indicating that if there were any sort of rising it would be solely and entirely due to the brutal selfishness of that unworthy sycophant.

Once having come into his head this awe-inspiring idea took such possession of him that he found it hard to give polite attention to anything that was spoken to him. On the little Prince's departure the sagacious Hotspur expressed the view to the Bard of Ffinnant that it would be comfortable for him and suitable to the late hour if he should follow the example of the heir to the throne and retire to rest. This advice jumped well with the wishes of the prophet, who longed to devote himself to an uninterrupted study of the king crossing the sea; and so rapidly did he leave the hall that his followers were put to it to keep pace with him.

When the Welshmen were gone our friend's trembling resolution to make his first political oration was defeated by Hywel Sele, who, already more than a little drunk, launched into a rambling attack upon his cousin Glendower. He complained openly to Hotspur that neither the present Lord of Chirk nor his predecessor took a strong enough line with the son of

Griffith Fychan. “I know him through and through,” Hywel Sele affirmed. “He’s just like his father. He never forgives and never forgets. He caught me once, in pure boyish sport of course, when we were serving the late King, cutting off one of the forks of his beard, and do you think, my Lord Warden, that he has ever forgotten that boyish jest? You can bear me out in this, Constable! His pride and touchiness and his ridiculous gravity where his personal vanity is concerned are fantastic. The man’s got no sense of—” He wanted to say “sense of humour,” knowing Hotspur’s genial reputation, but he was too drunk to remember the English word so he concluded with the French word esprit. “And what’s worse,” he blundered on, “he’s a dabbler in—” He wanted to say “black magic,” but the phrase escaped him: “You saw that rascal who snatched at your gold noble? Well, everyone on the Marches knows that this precious cousin of mine who’s so finicky about his beard — they say he washes the hairs of it every morning with liquid gold! — hires that one-eyed buffoon to pimp and pander for him under cover of — under cover of — you know! — that holy Saint’s holy Horse! I should like to ask” — here a peculiar leer of drunken cunning crossed his face— “how these Valle Crucis Fathers reconcile it with Holy Church to defend such a devil worshipper! What have they got, I should like to know, either from Griffith Fychan or from Owen? Not a groat! And yet in your own presence, my Lord, here were these Fathers meddling with — with the King’s justice! This drunken beast here” — and he contemptuously touched the oblivious Gam with his foot— “was only doing what I told him. He’s a brute of course” — and he viciously disturbed the bracken under the sleeping man’s head— “but he was doing his duty. But honest men doing their duty are to be meddled with, are they? Meddled with by Valle Crucis! Meddled with by the Lord of Chirk!”

Hywel Sele was getting confused or he wouldn't have made the blunder of expressing his spleen against the Earl in this appeal to Hotspur.

It was Fitz-Alan who now interrupted him, and he did it without a word. He did it by taking up in his hands the thin-stemmed silver beaker out of which he'd been drinking and after bending it between his fingers as if it had been made of tallow instead of metal flinging it into the fire.

It was Denis who now intervened. Leaning forward a little, and addressing Hotspur, but fixing his grey eyes on some remote point in space, "My Lord," he said, "there has been in this castle to-night, and I may remind our friend of Nannau that it is under none but the King that I am Constable here, a series of misunderstandings that will have to be unravelled. These two gentlemen now with us, Master Brut and Master Rhisiart, are not here as guilty of treason. They are here as hostages for Glendourdy. It was under a misapprehension, my Lord, that our guests from the Tassel attacked these gentlemen; and as for Valle Crucis, as long as I am Constable of Dinas Bran I shall welcome" — here he turned to the two monks and the bearded lay-brother who were now seated under the wall just beyond the man on the floor— "all the assistance I can get in the performance of my duty."

"May I say—" began the Lollard. But to Rhisiart's relief, for he felt that the last voice he wanted to hear just then was that of his friend, Harry Percy himself broke in.

"Pardon me a moment, sir. Pardon me, Constable. As far as I understand this situation, the Baron of Nannau, and his loyal but at the moment inarticulate ally, are here as representing the policy of Lord Grey of Ruthin. To the regret of Fitz-Alan and myself, Lord Grey has at the moment much influence at Court. But I will be quite frank with you, my Lords and Masters. It was to counterbalance this influence that I found a way of putting pressure on the King to trust me with the person of his eldest son. The Prince is to hold — and he’ll be soon able, in spite of his tender age, to justify my confidence — a Court of his own in Chester. In that Court Harry Percy’s, and not Lord Grey’s, will be the determining voice.

“It is to protest against this that Grey has, even now, posted back to the King; and to despatch Glendourdy’s hostages to the royal camp at this moment would be simply to give them up to Grey, a course entirely contrary to the policy of conciliation the Lord of Chirk and myself are resolved to apply to Welsh affairs. The King’s army is marching south. The royal presence is required in the south. And if by making Glendourdy see that his quarrel is a private one — with Grey and not with England — we can smooth over this present trouble, there will be no need for the royal army to delay its return south.”

There was a long silence after these words. Hywel Sele was too drunk to gather their import; but he felt things were going against him, and he drew closer to the man on the floor; bending over him and prodding him. His whole attitude towards David Gam from now on was curiously revealing of the relations between them.

Rhisiart contemplated in awed admiration the rugged countenance of the heir to the vast Northumbrian estates. There was a single black lock falling across the Percy’s forehead, and his straggling dark moustache only seemed to accentuate his full, red, Viking-looking lips. And as our friend gazed at these massive lineaments, and actually dared to meet the man’s warm, irresistibly magnetic eyes, he decided that he would postpone his first public speech until he had conversed with a few more really enlightened statesmen like this Hotspur, and a few more really great legal authorities like Master Young.

One thing he would never do. He would never interrupt a group of formidable rulers with a blunt outburst like the Lollard's. He would turn on everybody present, before he said a word, a warm, glowing, disarming, ingratiating look, like that which Hotspur had turned upon him. "If the tongue," he said to himself, "is stronger than the sword, a certain kind of look is stronger than the tongue."

Meanwhile Hywel Sele, who had imbibed so much that he was forced to withdraw himself for a moment — indeed to our friend's ideas of propriety he might have withdrawn himself further — proceeded, as he re-took his seat, to indulge in a series of angry fumblings with his great silver-mounted belt which had become unhooked. It was clear that the man missed the bodily services just then, like those of a "gentleman in attendance", which David Gam habitually performed for him; for he now began viciously kicking his slumbering friend, evidently with the intention of suggesting their departure to the Tassel Inn.

But at this point Father Pascentius suddenly left his companions and deliberately sat down, without so much as a "by your leave", in the empty space that had been left unfilled between the Lord of Nannau and the Lord of Chirk. As he did this he gave our friend a shrewd glance with his black eyes, as much as to say, "We'll drive this nail home."

. Rhisiart was now in excellent good spirits. The only thing that worried him was the teasing question as to just where, as his friend and he loitered in the monastery three months ago, he had met that powerful-looking lay-brother.

"I know I must have seen him down there," he thought. "Is he one of the men who spoke to us in the cloisters?"

But apart from this trifling puzzle he had a delicious feeling of lying back, calmly and recklessly, on the great wave of destiny. He hadn't drunk much since he had vomited so violently; but the little he had drunk, and indeed was still drinking, seemed to have a wonderful effect on his nerves. He began to experience a tender and almost tearful regard for everybody about him. Even towards the great, handsome, evil, mask-like visage of Hywel Sele, down whose unwrinkled expanse big drops of perspiration were pursuing one another, he felt nothing but pity.

As to his would-be assassin on the floor, he even found himself vaguely concerned when a burning wisp from the fire, falling on one of those great hairy arms, caused the fellow to swing over in his sleep. “What’s making me feel like this?” he wondered; and he decided that it had to do with Owen. An indescribable sweetness seemed to flood his soul whenever he thought of Owen.

The man’s figure bulked larger, fairer, more majestic, more fraught with a strange diffused glory than anything he had ever known. “If Mad Huw feels like this,” he thought, “for the late King, he and I are in the same boat.” And letting his imagination run riot he imagined all four of them safe back at Glyndyfrdwy, himself happy with the live Owen, Mad Huw happy with the dead King, and Tegolin holding both their hands!

He felt so elated that he longed to catch a glimpse of at least one of those Northern constellations whose magnetic influence through so many summer nights had calmed his soul. “But they’d be all different to-night,” he thought, “all changed. It’s autumn now.”

He cast his eyes along the cornice of the broken roof. Yes! there were certainly many ragged gaps in the unrestored crumbling masonry. And yes, he could, through one dark aperture, make out a fragment of the sky. But how dark it must have grown out there since they sat down to the banquet. There were certainly no stars to be seen that night.

When his mind returned to itself after this attempt to escape into stellar space, he found that Father Rheinalt had left the lay-brother to his own devices and was seated close to Father Pascentius.

What was the lay-brother doing now? Rhisiart saw him walking slowly up and down, examining closely the various places where the walls had fallen outwards, and where the pitch-dark patches of sky were visible. How black and mysterious those patches looked — just as if space were a palpable substance rather than a hollow negation of all substance! And backwards and forwards across these apertures in roof and walls rolled the smoke of the fires, as if, like himself, the warm interior soul of Dinas Bran were seeking to cover up its blind track through the dark by wisps of comfortable thought!

Both Master Brut and he had their backs against the wall, whereas all the others were leaning forward over a long refectory-table, some resting their chins on their hands, and some sitting bolt upright, like figures on a pack of cards.

What on earth could it be that caused the restlessness in that big lay-brother, wrapped up so close in his monastic cowl? Up and down the whole length of the hall the fellow kept wandering. Was he interested in the smoke-darkened fancy-figures of those bygone heroes? Or was he, like Rhisiart himself, longing to steady his soul by a glimpse of the stars? But there were no stars. That was certain. The night had grown pitch-dark and the wind had dropped. Dinas Bran might have been a lonely galley, like the galley on the king’s gold noble, carrying the fate of the “Isle of the Mighty” from darkness to darkness.

There! He thought that would happen soon. The Lollard’s chin had sunk down upon his chest, and the man was sleeping peacefully. The great magnates before him, that noble Hotspur, that sad, withdrawn Denis, that battle-scarred Earl, were all listening gravely — everybody was listening, except the now quite tipsy Lord of Nannau — to the steady low-pitched voice of Father Pascentius.

How like a picture it had become! “All the history of this island,” Rhisiart said to himself, “could be read, if I had the knowledge of Master Young, in those faces!”

And what would his mother say if she could see her “little monk” now? “Oh I wish I could make an impression on these great men! I wish I could say something to them now, so penetrating, so original, that they would all look at each other and think to themselves: ‘How lucky Glendourdy is to have a relative like that!’”

But instead of saying anything at this propitious moment that would force these makers of history to recognize that they had a fellow-spirit among them, our friend could do nothing but impress their faces on his attentive mind. Still lying back on that curious sweetness that the thought of Owen brought, he felt as though in some odd way his identity had lapsed, and he had become a disembodied spectator of some pause in the march of events, when Destiny itself was treading water or marking time, and when as with a full moon in an eclipse the solemn shadow of the weight of life’s procession dimmed with a coppery mask the revolution of the spheres!

Some kind of enchanted interlude had fallen upon this group of people, like that of the mysterious vigil with the head of the Blessed Bran, when a similar group of warriors were lifted up into a beatified timelessness! All it needed now, our friend thought, as his imagination struggled to disregard the commonplace attire of the men about him and to envisage them as they would have looked in the majestical days of old, was that strange singing of the Birds of Rhiannon, which, like Helen of Troy’s nepenthe, swallowed up all sadness.

“Will there ever come a time,” he said to himself, “when the art of painting will immortalize such countenances as these men have; not just in fancy-trappings, like those old Princes mouldering on the walls, but with such living details as that scar across Fitz-Alan’s cheek, that dark wart above one of Hotspur’s eyebrows, that impeccable forward-pushing point of the Constable’s clipped beard, and, above all, the life-draining, in-sucking gleam of Father Pascentius’ eyes!”

It did, however, gradually dawn upon the legal mind of our friend that the crafty theologian had taken advantage of the Lollard’s slumber to make it clear to these important personages that the worthy man was not the type of obstinate heretic whose soul it was the peculiar joy of Henry the Fourth and his bustling Archbishop to save by the anguish of being burnt alive.

“For God’s sake sleep on, Master Brut!” was the prayer our friend sent up now; and he even strengthened it by more “Hail Marys” than he had ever strung together in all his days; for though he couldn’t understand a word of Father Pascentius’ theology, he knew too well the spirit of his camerado and how the reckless man would disperse in a second all this convoluted logic by some aphorism from the mouth of his Saviour.

“Where our too zealous Bishop of Hereford,” Father Pascentius was now arguing, “was led astray in accusing Master Brut of a schismatic bias was in relation to the order of perfection among immaterial substances. Now in my examination of Master Brut three months ago I found that where the learned Bishop had become confused, and indeed had approached a grave heresy himself, was in this most equivocal, most ambiguous, most dangerous, matter of plurality in the Divine Persons, otherwise than according to the order of origin.

“For if the Holy Ghost were not from the Son they would be equally referred to the Father in point of origin; wherefore either they would not be two Persons, or there would be order of perfection between them as the Arians pretend or there would be a distinction of matter between them; which is impossible. Consequently it is impossible that the Son and the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father except in such-wise that from the Father alone one alone, that is, the Son, proceeds, and from the Father and Son, inasmuch as they are one, the Holy Ghost proceeds. Anselm was quite correct in saying that the Son and the Holy Ghost are distinct from each other by this alone, that they proceed in different ways; but, as Saint Thomas had clearly shown, they cannot proceed in different ways unless the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Son; wherefore if it be denied — and it is at this point that the learned Bishop of Hereford must have lost his bearings, quite simple as the point is, and, as you, my Lords and Masters, must clearly perceive it is — if, I say, it be denied that the Holy Ghost is from the Son it must likewise be denied that he is distinct from the Son.

"The conclusion being thus, as the angelic Richard of Saint Victor makes entirely plain, and as you, my Lords, are so clearly perceiving, it lifts the learned Bishop out of his perplexity and at the same time lifts this honest and loyal gentleman out of all neighbourhood to heresy; for as I have made clear to you, my Lords and Masters, the difference of properties, when we speak of the Divine Persons, consists merely in the number of persons producing, in that the first has being from no other, the second from one only, the third from two."

"I would like to ask you, Master Theologian," broke in Fitz-Alan, "whether in the dispensations of divine wisdom there is any special provision made for separate races? I am a plain soldier. I serve the King. But I have found it sometimes" — here Rhisiart caught a quaintly humorous expression flitting across the man's scarred face— "tedious and stupid when I come home tired with chasing my Welsh thieves to listen to my Chaplain, though he's a worthy man enough, God comfort him, and a stout drinker, preaching to me that all men are equal in the eyes of God, and have souls of the same Substance, to be hauled out of Purgatory or damned in Hell! You, Father, let me tell you, are the first scholar I've ever met who can quote your Anselms and your Ariuses; and I'd like to ask you the plain question, how without any damned Lollardry I could shut the mouth of this good priest of mine?

"What I'd like to tell him would be that the Blessed Creator when he made the soul of an English gentleman made it out of completely different stuff from the soul of a Welsh thief, just as one of my grand old wolfhounds has a different nature from a skulking, fish-eating otter. Doesn't your angelic Saint Richard of Somewhere, or your angelic Saint Thomas of Something, have anything pat to this matter, with which I could give my smug cleric a wholesome jolt? I'll take your word for it, Father, that the decent lad nodding over there is no curst heretic. But I tell 'ee 'tis no joke for a man like me, keeping the King's peace by day and by night, to be told that these sons of whores are no better than honest men when it comes to the Last Judgment!"

A silence followed this unexpected outburst. "I believe," thought our friend, "all these magnates are drunk. I believe Father Pascentius himself is drunk."

Glancing at the two monks, however, he recognized that it was from Tegolin's father, not from the theologian, that indiscretions were threatening.

The dark-swelling vein on Father Rheinalt's forehead looked as if it might suddenly burst and spout black blood over them all!

"I cannot sit here and listen," the monk began, but the theologian clapped his hand over his mouth. Rhisiart feared an outburst would follow this; but Cistercian discipline prevailed, and the man obeyed his superior. It was clear that Father Pascentius was deriving huge satisfaction from the whole situation. His voracious eyes looked as if they were actually swelling with the joy of mental contest. They looked as if they were sucking up the sacredest quintessence of these human souls into which they were thrusting their insatiable proboscis.

Hotspur shook himself now like a great friendly schoolboy when an awkward scene in the class-room has taken place; and for the second time our friend caught his eye.

"Now if Owen ever sent me," he thought, "as a special envoy to you, Harry Percy, we'd soon come to a perfect understanding. What a pity it isn't you instead of this bigoted Bolingbroke who's on—"

But he caught himself up, for he thought of that white-faced boy. But quite beyond his will what should slide into his head now but a picture of himself, dressed in the garb of a chancellor, signing in Westminster Hall an eternal treaty between Prince Owen and King Hotspur!

"The question you have raised, my Lord of Chirk" — it was the theologian speaking— "is one of profound importance. My good friend, Father Rheinalt here, completely missed its point; which was not, of course, the unphilosophical, uncanonical, un-catholic error of the superiority of one race over another, of the Welsh over the English, for instance, or the Saxon over the Norman, but the natural tendency to the cardinal virtues in some souls compared with the natural tendency, for it does as you well say seem almost to amount to this, in other souls to the cardinal vices. And while we're talking of these moral differences I would like to express a hope, good my Lord, that when the Most High chooses to take our beloved Abbot from our head, which may — God preserve him long! — happen any hour, you will feel the importance of refusing your support to Lord Grey's choice of a successor, which has only to be named to be seen in all its absurdity — our well-meaning but hopelessly incompetent Prior!"

That same flickering smile that Rhisiart had noticed before did at that moment cross the face of the Earl; but instead of pressing his original point, or making any comment upon the blunders of Lord Grey, he leaned across and gave Hotspur a rude nudge with his fist, directing his attention as he did so to the solemn antics of the tipsy Hywel Sele.

That gentleman was now gravely and absorbingly occupied in seeing how long he could scorch the hairs on his friend's bare arms without causing him to awaken. As he bent down over this task his great, handsome, sardonic physiognomy assumed an expression of frivolous but intense concentration, like the concentration of a person who plays a card-game by himself. The placing of his foot upon the arm of the sleeping man, to hinder his turning over, seemed as much part of this quiet game as did the ignition of various convenient wisps of bracken to serve as tapers.

A protracted series of these extempore tapers were now applied to the hairs on the sleeper's bare arm; but a rule of the game seemed to be that the assiduous scorcher was forbidden to approach a scarcely healed wound on the curve of the man's elbow.

Hotspur's reaction to the spectacle thus called to his attention struck Rhisiart as a somewhat singular one; for across the hero's physiognomy passed an unmistakeable contortion of extreme fear, a contortion that was accompanied by all those palpable manifestations of a childish shivering-fit that are indicated in the phrase a goose walking over your grave.

The great warrior recovered himself immediately; and Rhisiart was confirmed in his admiration of him as the first of English gentlemen, when he heard him begin at once, without the least shame, explaining to Fitz-Alan that from infancy he'd had a horror of torture; and that these curious antics of the Lord of Nannau hit for some reason that vein of weakness in him.

"Well, Lord Percy," said the Earl, with more sympathy than Rhisiart expected, "I'll give my troublesome confessor a dozen groats next feast-day to say a thousand Hail Marys that you and I, when our time comes, may die a clean death in the field."

"Amen!" murmured Hotspur from the bottom of his heart.

For some while Rhisiart had been aware, as he sat by his sleeping friend's side, and he had already induced Master Brut to stretch himself out on the bench and use him as a pillow, that Denis had been listening to the murmur of voices from the other end of the hall. Thus it was no surprise to him when Lowri's protector rose to his feet.

"With your permission, my Lords," he said, "I'll dismiss our guard. The men must be tired; and though I'm loth to interrupt our conversation, there seems no need to keep them in attendance any further."

"Surely, surely, Constable." Hotspur responded at once. And then with a friendly glance at the two young men, "And if these gentlemen—"

But Rhisiart hurriedly shook his head and murmured something about the great privilege it was to be in such exalted company.

"Well, off with those poor troopers, Constable!" Hotspur repeated. "We won't keep any of you very much longer; but I don't often get a chance to discuss matters with my Lord here, nor" — and he smilingly stretched himself in his seat and loosened the great sword in his sheath— "nor with our famous Valle Crucis scholar."

"One word, Constable." interjected Fitz-Alan. "I've no suspicions under your roof. But I'm an old soldier and have my humours and my habits. If you don't mind, you might send Trenchard and Hardy to me. You've only to mention their names, Trenchard and Hardy. Even in my closet, even in my chamber, I keep those two. They're more than servants. They're companions in arms. Chirk ain't Chirk without 'em. They can sit down behind us here."

"Trenchard — Hardy," repeated the Constable, and with a bow to his feudal superior he moved away.

Rhisiart soon heard the grateful shout, not loud but heart-felt, with which the Shropshire yeomen welcomed the permission to seek their rest; and when Denis returned, there came, striding heavily behind him, the Earl's two attendants.

"All right, Trenchard? All right, Hardy?" was Fitz-Alan's laconic greeting. "There you are, my men. Sit ye down! Here's some marrow left in this good pasty. And here — drink out of this!" And moving stiffly to where the men had seated themselves, the Lord-Marcher conveyed to them without spilling a drop his own deep flagon of mead.

"Dorset men, both," he whispered, as he and Denis resumed their places. "I have a parcel of good grazing land down there, and those fellows suit me better than any of my Arundel lads. King Richard always used to say, 'To fight for me when I'm awake give me Yorkshiremen, but to keep my bed when I'm asleep give me men from Dorset.' But if the Constable will forgive my returning to our present business—" He paused and gave Denis a look that caught our friend's eye at once, for it was a look that was like an armorial seal!

It was a look at once imperious and cajoling, the look of a born master in the nicest points of feudal relationships. "For the truth is, my Lord," and he turned to Harry Percy, "we are exceptionally fortunate to-night."

These last words were spoken with so much emphasis that everyone present — except Hywel Sele who, with his great bland face wearing the same tipsy solemnity, continued scorching the hairs on his friend’s arm — leaned forward to catch what was coming.

“I am only revealing,” he went on, “what you two Fathers, for we soldiers are children — and don’t think I don’t know it! — compared with you churchmen, must have detected already, that Percy’s brought the Prince to the Marches to cut the ground under Grey’s feet. Never mind how he got the child. The point is, having got him, and the King’s Writ with him, the boy’s Court at Chester will turn that great beggarly castle at Ruthin into a castle of sand! What, dear my Lord,” and he gave the great Hotspur a most quizzical glance from under his bristly eyebrows, “you don’t know yet is that this Father,” and he nodded in the direction of Tegolin’s parent, “is our friend Glendourdy’s private confessor. I dare warrant he’s not so stern with Owen as my terrible Father Talbot is with me! You are Owen’s confessor, Father, eh?”

Father Rheinalt’s brick-red face darkened ominously; but he bowed an unhesitating admission, while Father Pascentius murmured hurriedly in legal Latin, “It is allowed.”

Rhisiart’s eyes were glued on the great Hotspur now. Would he spoil this scene of perfect diplomacy by some brusque North-Country blunder? Fitz-Alan had gone too far, telling him about Father Rheinalt.

Not at all! Pushing back his dark forelock and crossing his iron heels, the most famous warrior in Britain only smiled his most winning smile at the embarrassed monk.

“’Tis nigh as good,” he cried, “as seeing Owen himself, and see him I can at this moment, Father, just as he rode like a madman into the hottest prick of the Douglas spears! ’Twas splendid — though of course not war, as a wily old borderer like me regards it. But tell Baron Owen from me—” but he caught himself up; and with an easy deprecatory chuckle turned to Fitz-Alan.

“Tell him from Lord Percy and me,” threw in the latter, “that we recognize his quarrel to be with Grey — with Grey and not with King Hal and you can even hint to him, if you like, that if he chased Grey back into his Red Burrow like a fox into his earth—” He stopped short and glanced, Rhisiart thought, a little nervously at Hotspur. But that border-chief to our friend’s culminating delight only clapped his great hands over his ears and murmured with a chuckle, “The King’s Warden of the Marches, tell him, suffers from a whoreson deafness!” And Rhisiart saw that it was all the reserved Denis could do — philosopher though he was — not to display his simple Saxon disgust at these frivolous Norman ways.

But having made their point, both the great men now relaxed in the most amiable manner; and Hotspur enquired of Father Pascentius whether he possessed a complete copy of the Summa of Saint Thomas. “In my father’s library when I was a child,” he said, “the good Father who tried to teach me — well! to write my own name — used to take down—”

But Father Pascentius required no further encouragement. In exactly the same tone of ironical patience that he had used to his pupil in his cell he scrupled not to plunge into an elaborate explanation of the superiority of the Cistercian libraries, and especially his own at Valle Crucis, over those of the other religious houses.

But Rhisiart turned his attention now to a lively conversation that was going on behind him between Master Trenchard and Master Hardy.

“Tis our wold Corfe, looks’ee,” the elder of the two men was now remarking, “that do coom into me vancy as us do sit here. Do’ee mind how Master Cob, down Bere way, used to mention ‘un? ‘A said his granfer, or summat, were from they parts. But I’ve a seed ‘un me wone self. Is, ’tis wold Corfe to the image this toomble-down pleace, ‘sknow?”

“So’t be, Jimmy Mummer, so’t be,” acquiesced the younger man.

“‘Twere well for I, Tom,” went on Trenchard, “if thik were the worst o’t. What do taunt me poor mind be thik reverend man what be now a-marching up and down, back and forth. Don’t’ee look behind’ee, Tom! But to tell’ee true I be worritted lest ‘un be the Wold Un his wone self!

“‘Twere conjurer Long John to Fordington who told I of me last end, and how ’twould be. ‘A said ’twould coom to I in a girt wambly pleace, same as this pleace be! ’Tis no common man, Master Trenchard, ‘a said, what I do see as thee’s doomster. ’Tis a tall man I do see, a proper tall man, but ‘a do glower at I, as the Sperrits bring un up, like a holy man, Master Trenchard.”

“Don’t’ee utter such words, Jimmy Mummer, don’t’ee utter ’em” protested the younger man. “What would Mary Elizabeth say, an her heard such dimsy words?”

Trenchard sighed heavily. “Ees, lad, ees, lad,” he groaned. “‘Tis of she I be frettin, Tom. Ye’ll be leal to me little wench, Tom, wunna, when I be gone? Ees, lad, ’tis of she I be frettin! I do see she cryin’ her heart out over me death-mound time one of they every shaven-polls do act as ‘a were spyin’ at I. ‘Taint that I be afeared for me wone self, looks’ee! Jim Mummer have had his day and have served his lord, and have kept Mary Elizabeth in twine and hosen, in smock and fairing; and now be ready to let his wold bones rest in peace. ’Tis of Mary Elizabeth I do thinky and thinky. Swear to I, lad, over thee’s dirkhandle, that thee’ll be a true man to me sely child? Her thinks the world of ‘ee, Tom, and that’s the blessed truth. And though she be only sixteen come Martinmas her ‘can beake a ceake crisp as any wold wife in Wareham.”

Our friend's attention was now diverted by the two monks rising simultaneously from their seats. But he caught one more remark of the man called Tom, apparently commenting on the care with which Jimmy the Mummer had placed his long-bow on the board beside him with an arrow across its string.

"With your pardon, my Lords," said Father Pascentius, "Father Rheinalt and I must be descending the hill. The hour is late; and, as it is, we shall have to enter by the Abbot's postern. Brother Glyn over there, Master Constable, may with your good leave have to stay the night in the castle. There are some little trifles of church-tribute due to the Almoner that he has instructions to collect. We bid ye good-night, gentles all! Dimitte populi tui, Deus, et ostende eis viam bonam per quam ambulent — et da gloriam in loco isto."

"Et da gloriam in loco isto," repeated Father Rheinalt; and they moved quickly across the hall to give their final instructions to the restless lay-brother.

The two noblemen emitted the unconscious sigh of relief that the departure of the learned commonly evokes, and moving nearer to each other began consulting in whispers.

Denis kept his eyes fixed on his accustomed point in space; while Jimmy Mummer's hands, as he listened to Master Hardy's re-assuring voice, kept fidgetting uneasily with that long-bow string, as if, beyond all rationality, he would dearly have loved to discharge its deadly missive clear at the heart of this perambulatory cleric.

"I have a notion" — it was the Constable's voice directly addressing our friend— "that this dark night may end in a storm. Perhaps this would be, therefore; a good moment—"

“Do you mean a thunder-storm, sir?” interrupted Rhisiart. “I’ve been thinking myself, sir, that there’s something queer about the darkness that has rolled up in the last hour. It has fascinated the lay-brother over there, too. Look, sir! He’s talking about it to Father Rheinalt; and it seems clear to me—”

It must have seemed clear to the philosophic Constable that like other young persons when the moment for rest is mooted, the Oxonian was saying anything that came into his head, behaving in fact like a child who hopes to make its elders forget the fatal motion of the clock.

But something so startling had just then met the lad’s eye that his childish babble was changed to an intense desire to turn away the Constable’s attention from the talk between Tegolin’s father and the lay-brother: As for Father Pascentius our friend hadn’t failed to mark the undignified haste with which, jerking up his habit like an impatient old woman, he had scuttled out of the hall.

“I must wake Brut! I must wake Brut!” was Rhisiart’s chief thought now; and he found himself trembling with excitement as he shook the Lollard by the wrist, waving that object up and down and taking care to hide the man’s face while he did so. Oh! he could feel the Constable’s steady gaze watching him; and he couldn’t help becoming cognizant too of an intense interest taken in his proceedings by Hywel Sele.

The drunken idea had evidently entered the Lord of Nannau’s head that he might pick up some new manner of tormenting a sleeper by watching Rhisiart’s roughness to his friend.

But Walter Brut was fully awake now; and our Oxonian got a glimpse into the instinctive sagacity of the Hereford squire that astonished him not a little. For the Lollard, having drawn a deep breath, and having stretched himself by throwing back his head, as a dog does when it is rudely waked, gave one slow meditative look at everyone in the hall, ending with a concentrated stare at what our friend had seen, and hurriedly rose to his feet pulling up Rhisiart with him. “Garde à toi!” he whispered. “It’s Owen himself!”

Now what our friend had seen, when he realized that he must turn the Constable’s attention away from the lay-brother, was an actual slipping down, by several inches, of that great beggarly beard, and the appearance beneath it of the familiar forked beard of shining gold.

Nor had this been all. He had noticed that before Tegolin’s father left Owen’s side and hurried out of the hall, just as rapidly, though with a bolder stride than Father Pascentius, he had received from beneath Owen’s voluminous robe a thick and newly-woven coil of rope!

“My Lords!” It was Owen himself speaking. And there he was — standing with his back to the only entrance, his right hand thrust through the handle of a sword he must have been concealing as well as the rope, so that the bare blade was now swinging from his wrist like a giant’s trinket, while in his free hands was one of the Salopian longbows that had been left by the weary troopers when they were dismissed.

Standing thus, like Odysseus confronting the suitors and tossing away his habit and his false beard, Owen emptied a full quiver of arrows upon the table in front of him.

“My Lords!”

Hotspur and Fitz-Alan were on their feet in a second, the former drawing his sword, the latter buckling his belt. Quicker than a flash of lightning could have burst did that bare blade appear in Harry Percy’s hand; but not less quick — for the brain, even of an Oxford student, can move faster than lightning — the queerest side-ways impression rushed through Rhisiart’s consciousness.

"What a friendly weapon," he thought, "that sword of Hotspur's is!" It was certainly an old sword; and it fitted the man's hand like a glove. Its ancient cross-handle in some fantastic way conveyed to the lad's mind the notion that it was a kind sword! It certainly had a homely look, and a proverbial, mellow, North-Country anvil-look. It looked like an heraldic sword, and yet it looked like the sword of a "good giant" in a fairy-tale.

Indeed before this rush of unexpected suggestions had been whirled out of the boy's head he actually found himself contemplating the gleaming object as if it weren't a death-dealing thing at all, but something for homely usage — almost like a spade!

"My Lords!" And as Rhisiart stared at Owen standing there under a great sconce of flaming torches, slowly and deliberately fitting an arrow to his string, it seemed to him that not only the forked beard and the princely torque and the gleaming breast-plate were all of gold, but that from the man's figure itself emanated a supernatural light!

Rhisiart's nerves, as may be imagined, were in a state of hyper-tension, and this tension was rather increased than diminished by the fact that a real flash of lightning, which was followed immediately by a startling burst of thunder, interrupted Owen's words. The lightning lit up for a second the entrance to the hall, but its cessation, for it was not repeated, made the dense darkness behind that golden figure more Tartarean than before.

Rhisiart had, as we know, a sturdy and un-mystical soul; but Modry's imagination had dominated his childhood, and though his intelligence assured him that it needed no magician to conjure up a storm on a night like this, it was impossible to suppress an exultation in the feeling that when his hero, his god, did show himself at last; the age-old tokens of the conspiring elements were there at his side!

"My Lords! I have only one request to make of you, and then I'll trouble you no further. You are Peers of the Realm of England, and I am Owen ap Griffith Fychan. But I have to ask you, as I stand here in this hall of my ancestors, to permit me, with all due courtesy and according to the laws of chivalry, to take away with me to-night Rhisiart ab Owen, my Secretary, and Walter Brut of Hereford, my Librarian; which same learned and honourable persons were hostages for me in this castle of Dinas Bran for as long as I didn't appear to claim them."

Hotspur began pushing back the refectory-table in his heavy, easygoing fashion. He clearly intended to walk straight up to Owen and enter upon a friendly discussion with him. Neither the dramatic stir in the elements nor the fantastical strangeness of Owen's appearance — as if the man really were the necromancer people accused him of being — seemed to impinge on his consciousness at all. He had told Father Rheinalt he wanted to see Owen; and here the fellow was. A few direct and friendly words together, and what waste of life and property might be avoided.

"One minute — one minute — Baron Owen," Rhisiart heard him say, as he stamped with one of his armed heels on the stone floor to get rid of a trifle of cramp. But before he could advance a step the explosion had occurred.

Rhisiart hadn't even time to turn his head, but it crashed through his brain, as if he'd been hit by the arrow himself, just what had happened. Without warning, without a nod from his master, old Jimmy Mummer of Puddletown had drawn his bow-string and drawn it by no means, as Scripture says, "at a venture." In fact he had smitten the transfigured lay-brother through the upper part of the very arm that was holding the Salopian's bow. Through the man's arm the well aimed arrow sped, close to the shoulder, and there it stuck fast, the barb having passed clean through; and the feathers remaining quivering and shivering on the hither side.

Hotspur must have stepped back a pace, recognizing the possibility that a sudden shock of pain might make so impetuous a chieftain start shooting indiscriminately at them all; but with the arrow still piercing his arm and obviously biting pretty sharply, for our friend could see his face twitching, Owen lifted his own borrowed weapon and, as it seemed without giving himself a second to take aim, discharged an arrow full into the throat of his assailant.

This done, and Jimmy Mummer falling choking into Master Hardy's arms, the ex-lay-brother was seen deliberately to fit another arrow to his string. His appearance certainly had for our Oxonian at that moment a more striking air than even the flash of lightning had given it.

He seemed to resemble at the same time a sacrificed god and an avenging god; for, with every movement he made, the arrow-point which stuck out of him and the arrow-feathers which stuck out of him moved with him, giving to his appearance a ghastly element of the grotesque.

As he watched him and wondered when he would have to leap to his side there came into our friend's mind a monstrous picture of Saint Sebastian which had followed the Eastern Emperor to Oxford.

The Russian gentleman who spoke of the "insect" had shown it to him and had explained to him that it answered to some special craving in Byzantine piety.

But in Owen's case the effect was further enhanced by the manner his short sword — of the kind known on the Marches as "Roman" — swung from his wrist.

But Owen was speaking again now. "I am sorry, my Lords, this thing happened. I shall pray" — and the man actually had the gall, burdened as he was, to cross himself as he stood there— "for the soul of this unhappy person. I should be as he is now, if his hand hadn't shaken; for my throat, like his, lacks a gorget. Will you be pleased, my Lords, to give me your word as gentlemen that Master Rhisiart and Master Brut may depart with me? If you will, this painful scene shall end at once! And let me repeat again — I am sorry to have killed that man; and I promise his friend that I will have Masses said—"

"Damn your Masses, you girt conjuring devil, you whoreson byblow of a Welsh whore!"

At this Fitz-Alan, who was now kneeling over the dead man, and taking no more notice of Owen than if he'd been one of the pictures on the wall, rebuked Master Hardy; but Master Hardy went on. "What wold Jimmy said to I just now, clear as Sturminster-bell, be enough to crack the heart in I, Master. 'A said, 'Mary Elizabeth,' clear and sensible, as if 'a were in Sarum choir. Ees! Durn ye! I beant afeared of 'ee, ye girt glittering Warlock, and I do pray for thee's whoreson sake thik arrow be adder-nointed!" And Tom Hardy of Milborne Port spat on his fist and shook it fiercely at Baron Owen of Glyndyfrdwy.

But Owen was speaking again. "The first man of you," he shouted, "who makes a movement towards me will get my second arrow. Let Master Rhisiart and Master Brut come here to me. I don't ask for a safe-conduct out of this castle. I came without permission and I shall go without it. But these two gentlemen must go with me!" But Fitz-Alan took no more notice of Owen than he did of Hotspur. His whole attention was absorbed in the pitiful attempts made by Master Hardy to pull the arrow out of the dead man's throat.

He now said to him in a husky voice, "Shall I do that, or do you want to do it, Tom?"

"Do't thee wone self, Master!" And Rhisiart was destined to see a sight he'd never seen before, and a horrible sight it was. For the Earl had to put his heel on the Mummer's body, and pull with his whole strength, to get the barb of the arrow out of the man's neck; and when the thing did come, the black blood that followed was a grievous sight. It was a sight, however, that caused nothing but lively interest in the Lord of Nannau.

Rhisiart was too occupied with wondering whether he ought to rush to Owen's side to pay much attention to the two gentlemen from the Tassel. But once when by chance he did turn his head it was to discover that the drunken Sele was actually on the floor by his friend's side, shouting into his ear that the Devil had come to take him to Hell in the person of Owen Glendower.

Rhisiart couldn't help a moiety of his attention being arrested by what the smooth-faced gentleman was saying. "He's come for you, Gam, and you'd better go quietly; and I'll go home to bed. I shall miss you in the morning, Gam, but it can't be helped. Better go quietly with him, Gam; and I'll to the Tassel. Say goodbye, Gam! It may after all suit you better than Purgatory. You'll find a wondrous company of whores down there, Gam. When you see those Irish girls we killed, ask 'em which they like best, us or the devils."

Master Brut by this time, heedless of the blood, was on his knees by Fitz-Alan's side. His eyes were tight shut; but he wasn't telling his beads or muttering anything in Latin. He was, to Rhisiart's amazement, addressing the Son of Mary in plain English and as if He were standing a few paces away.

Hotspur, meanwhile, leaning on his "kindly" sword, kept his puzzled but quite self-possessed gaze fixed on the strange figure at the end of the hall.

“That arrow ought to come out,” Rhisiart heard him mutter. But Denis addressed the Northumbrian without turning his head. He too kept his eyes on Owen.

“With your permission, my Lord,” he said, “I think I will let these lads go. They’re his hostages. And he’s come to claim them.”

“Let ’em go,” muttered the other. And again he repeated, “That arrow ought to come out.”

But the Constable moved to Fitz-Alan’s side. “I may tell him he can have them, my Lord?”

“Them? — us — all!” groaned the Earl, staring at his dead servant; but immediately after and with a flicker of a grim smile, “Parley with him, parley with him, Constable. Didn’t you hear what he said? She’d never forgive me if he shot you too!”

It was clear that neither of the great noblemen felt impelled at that juncture to disregard Owen’s threat.

But Denis Burnell, who had nothing but Saxon blood in his veins, and whose great-grandfather was a Shropshire shepherd, appeared to feel that the son of the King’s Sheriff had certain duties to perform which were unavoidable. So without a weapon in his hand, or a word in his mouth, he strode hurriedly up the hall, neither holding his head high nor holding it low, but keeping his eyes, as usual, fixed on some remote point in space that was neither bounded by Owen’s golden beard nor by the black darkness behind it.

Slowly, as he came near, the solitary figure beyond the trestle-board allowed his transfixed arm and his dangling sword to sink down.

Rhisiart with his eyes screwed up into burning, glittering points, out of which the soul of the lad rather than his intelligence gleamed, watched while the two whispered together, with nothing but the table between them; but presently Denis turned round and easily and naturally beckoned to him.

After muttering he hardly knew what to the two Lord-Marchers, and literally dragging his friend from his knees, Rhisiart advanced up the hall.

“That arrow ought to come out!” was the last word he was privileged to hear from the lips of Harry Percy. “A keepsake, Constable!” he caught in a hoarse murmur from Owen, and with a gasp of consternation he saw his hero hand over to Denis his precious “Roman” sword.

Well! It was all over now, and into the heart of the scriptural “outer darkness” Glyn Dŵr led his youthful hostages from that lighted hall.

“We are going the wrong way,” our friend heard the Lollard mutter, as they moved through the impenetrable obscurity. “This isn’t the way to the gate!” he repeated.

“We’re not going to the gate,” their guide replied. “We’re going by the ramparts. Father Rheinalt is there with our rope.” With our rope? Was this astonishing man assuming that a monk, a scholar and an Oxford student had the knowledge and courage of sailor-boys.

Presently they heard the deep-throated voice of Tegolin’s father. And the voice came from the precise direction towards which they were hurrying. All they had to do was to increase their speed. How on earth had their guide known which way to go? Was the substance of this extraordinary man’s nature actually porous in some way, like that of animals and birds, to the chemistry of the elements? Or was he really, as his enemies were always hinting, a black magician?

“I don’t care,” our friend thought, as with his fingers in Master Brut’s belt he hurried after his hero, “what he is! I shall never leave—”

But suddenly with a deep interior shiver came the thought of that rope! Ah! here were the ramparts — broken and jagged at this point — and here was the dark form of Father Rheinalt!

The monk was tugging with might and main to make his great coil sure and fast round the abutment of a massive and unbroken stone.

Rhisiart shuddered when he peered into the black gulf into which that rope descended. How high did the wall just here rise above the ground? A sickening sensation seized him, like fingers of ice clutching at his vitals. He could feel his torn and bleeding hands slipping, sliding, losing their hold.

“Can you do it?” he whispered to Master Brut; and he knew the Lollard was smiling by the familiar tone of his response.

“Of course, lad, if the monk can! Twist your legs round it, that’s the great thing; and take it hand under hand. Don’t let it slide through your fingers. We used to do it to get crows’ nests. Kick yourself clear of the wall as you go down.”

But Rhisiart suddenly knew that nothing could make him trust himself to that rope. And with this knowledge there came upon him the worst moment he had known in his whole life. The wildest, maddest ideas rushed through his mind. “For his sake,” he thought, “I could jump down there! But swing over that blackness on that—”

“Who goes there?” And the blaze of a lantern, whose shade had suddenly been removed, flashed upon all four of them.

Luckily it wasn’t a trooper. It was one of Denis’s regular watchmen. And the worthy man, an elderly ex-forester from Chirk, was more startled than the men he’d stumbled on. This sudden uncovering of his lantern upon such a group, one of them with an arrow through his arm, was such a shock to him that Master Brut who was nearest had no difficulty in pinioning his arms to his sides and throwing him to the ground, There was a brief struggle, during which the fellow kept crying out, “Help! Murder!”

But it ended with the Lollard getting his light away from him and kneeling on his prostrate form, while the lantern, lying on its side, threw weird horizontal rays upon the monk’s sandals.

All this while Rhisiart kept saying to himself, “I can jump and I can die, but I can’t—”

A black dizziness was attacking him now. He felt as if he had already jumped, and was lying dead beneath the wall. As he fought against this blackness he was aware of the monk deliberately untwisting the girdle of his habit and binding it round the prostrate man, while the Lollard did what he could to stifle his piercing cries.

But what was that? Oh, Hail Mary! Hail Mary! Hail Mary! Weren’t those shouts? And weren’t they answering the cries of the man on the ground?

“I can jump and die, but I can’t—” But the blackness was over him now, O the blackness....

Not dead? Hadn’t he jumped then? Where was he? What was that light in his eyes? Tree-trunks? There were no trees in Dinas Bran! “There, lad! A drop more of this, and you’ll be all right.”

It was from Owen’s own little silver phial that this choking fire-water was bringing him back. They were in the midst of a thick coppice of birch-trees, on whose white trunks the lantern was flickering.

He began at once babbling the most childish questions; and he saw it was Owen, his face twitching with pain, who was answering him with grave amusement.

“Did I jump?” he gasped.

“Jump, lad? You wouldn’t be alive if you had! You climbed down — like the rest of us!”

He shut his eyes. He began to feel that “blackness” again. No, no! He couldn’t have done that.

"You came down just as I told you to," threw in Master Brut. "You came down faster than my Lord, faster than the Father."

And then he remembered how he had ridden forward on Griffin that far-off Midsummer Eve, between the bows and the spears. He'd been in a trance then, a trance of "blackness", like this time! It must have been Owen who willed him to do what he couldn't do. "But—" he began.

"There are no 'buts,'" said the Lollard. "Down you came, like any ship-boy. Best not think about it any more, lad!"

But our friend seemed unable to stop thinking about it and asking questions about it. He was in that soft, melting tearful mood, with which young people return to consciousness after some crushing experience, and he couldn't help blurting out, with his eyes fixed on his hero: "How did you learn, sir, to climb down ropes so easily?"

Owen was on his feet now, passively submitting, though with many suppressed groans, to Father Rheinalt's blundering attempts to loosen the arrow.

"Much as — your friend did!" he cried; but the final word emerged from his mouth with something so like a scream that the Lollard could no longer contain himself.

"Excuse me, Father," he cried, thrusting the monk away. "I am more of a doctor than you. In these things we need to be pitiless. Please kneel down, Lord Owen, and cling to the tree as fast as you did to that rope. I must hurt you very sore so you'd better bite on this." And the calm blooded Wycliffite, while Owen obediently though with a wry face sank down and gripped the tree, searched about with the watchman's lantern till he found a fragment of not too rotten wood. Clenching his teeth upon this object the Lord of Glyndyfrdwy prepared to bear what was coming.

Our friend stumbled to his feet. He longed to share his master's suffering. He longed to press himself against that noble form and sob out his devotion.

The monk meanwhile was glaring at the self-constituted doctor as if he could have killed him.

"Stand back, Father!" cried Owen; and then to the Lollard: "Get birch-lichen if I bleed — birch-lichen — do you understand?"

The Lollard nodded. And Owen turned to Rhisiart. "Hold the light for him, cousin!"

After examining with the utmost care both the head of the arrow and its feathers, which latter were now clinging close to the shaft owing to the hot hands of the nervous monk, the first thing the Lollard did was to take out his knife and sever this feathered end of the dart, as close as possible to the wound. The next thing he did was to cut away every strip of clothing from the man's shoulder.

"Hold it steady, lad!" And Rhisiart, clenching his own teeth, did at last succeed in preventing the light from skipping about like a will-o'-the-wisp, anywhere but on the hurt arm.

"Now, my Lord!" And Owen's teeth sank into the block of wood, while the Lollard, bending low over the man's shoulder, and gripping the arrow-head and the few inches of shaft that had followed it through the flesh threw all his spirit into one clean, straight, unshrinking pull, till — while the lantern suddenly flung its rays at the sky — he lifted up the whole weapon, bloody, but unbroken, safe in his hands!

Owen uttered a long, gurgling sigh, like the release of water from under a lifted weir, and loosening his grip of the birch-trunk sank down beneath it, while from his mouth the piece of wood, bitten clean through, fell with a just perceptible sound upon the wet moss.

The Lollard promptly snatched the lantern from our friend, and its rays instead of tremblingly searching the zenith fell upon the dark stream of red blood now issuing from Owen's flesh.

"Birch-lichen!" whispered the wounded man. "Press it against the place and bind it tight! And give me my phial."

But our friend Rhisiart, to use the expressive Homeric phrase, "took other counsel."

Within the narrow but astute cranium of his Norman skull there had just repeated itself that ominous word uttered by Master Hardy—"adder-'nointed". He waited till the Father had held the phial to Owen's lips; but he refused to wait till Master Brut returned with the lichen.

"Cousin Owen," and it was only the intensity of his feeling that made him use that word, "I heard the man's friend speak of adder's poison. I want to suck your hurt before he binds it up!"

The chieftain's eyes opened wide, and a very strange look flickered up into them. "If you will, child," he murmured faintly, "but my blood is dangerous."

Rhisiart didn't wait for further permission. Kneeling down by his hero's side in the darkness he had no difficulty in finding the wound in his arm and pressing his lips to it. Then he sucked and swallowed and sucked and swallowed.

"Spit it out, coz! Spit it out! A man's blood's a man's soul. Do'ee want to share—"

But in spite of this protest, our young friend knew well that the unhurt arm had been lifted, and that his master's fingers were stroking his head.

The Lollard had nothing but praise for his fellow-hostage's behaviour when he returned with the lantern and the lichen; but Father Rheinalt, from that moment till they reached Glyndyfrdwy, uttered not one single word.

“I oughtn’t to have let him do it,” thought Glyndyfrdwy’s lord. “I know those Wessex men-at-arms! They’re the same today as they were in King Alfred’s time. Adder-’nointed! They all talk like that; but they’d no more poison one of their weapons than they’d trust a Welshman with one of their daughters. Why did I let him do it then? Why didn’t I make him know how it commits him? Ha! old conjurer, at your tricks again! Well, if it has been, it was to be, and if it is to be, it will be! You don’t know what you’ve done; and I don’t know what I’ve let you do, Rhisiart ab Owen. But I know this well enough. I’ve got what I wanted!”

XII. MATHRAFAL

IT WAS ABOUT dawn on September the sixteenth, in the first year of the fifteenth century, that Owen Glendower threw off the heavy wolf's skin beneath which he had slept, and looked about him in that familiar room at Glyndyfrdwy, the room that his jesting family had long nicknamed "the magician's chamber."

The coals on the open hearth were still red, and in the grey light that seemed pressing like a sorrowful face against the narrow window he could see lying still open upon his desk the old parchment-covered folio — the most precious of all his books — which he had been championing the night before. It contained poems and prophecies reputed to have been uttered by Taliesin, Llywarch Hen, and others — one or two claiming to be from the actual mouth of Merlin himself!

Even his friend Iolo had confessed himself unable to interpret more than a line here and there of these ogyrvens as he had called them. The old Bard had done much better with Taliesin. But that great pilgrim of incarnations, whose special genius for imaginative metempsychosis made the human soul seem like an unwearied traveller down the ages, was still as much of a riddle to him as was the obscurer Merlin.

Before he slept last night he had summoned his impassioned harp-player, Griffith Llwyd ab Einion, and had spread out the mystic pages before him; but Griffith had explained at such length, and with so many technicalities, how the whole art of poetry had been revolutionized by Dafydd ap Gwilym, that Owen had been seized with an unscholarly rage; and had, he now remorsefully remembered, seriously hurt his faithful Bard's feelings by declaring roundly that these fashionable modern cywyddau, lovely as they were, totally lacked the terrible grandeur of the earlier inspiration.

Justly irritated by this outburst, the worthy man had grown vehement in his defence of modern poetry, maintaining that it dealt with living realities, in place of parables and symbols and mythic fables; and had finally so warmed to his subject as to challenge his lord and master to prove by some actual quotations from the book before them the superiority — in anything but oracular obscurity — of the old over the new.

This challenge — and Owen smiled in that grey light as he recalled how it had confounded him — he had unworthily dodged in a manner more proper to a touchy baron than a patient scholar, merely muttering something about its being better for a great bard to write of magic cauldrons and mystic castles and the Lords of the Under-World than of the arching of ladies' eyebrows and the curves of their breasts.

Standing there staring at that narrow window and thinking of the ceremony before him and of the dragon-beflagged pavilion that had been erected for it in the field by the river, an anger against his fate greater than he had ever known before, though something akin to it was a recurrent mood with him, swept over his soul. He glanced at the red coals of his fire. He glanced at the couch from which he'd risen, and he gave vent to a sigh that seemed to come from depths below his consciousness.

He suddenly felt like someone who has been dragged back from levels of life far more satisfying than any outward events, levels where he could lose himself in the unlabouring flow of the tides of Being.

He loosened one or two of the galling hooks of his mail-shirt, and kicking off the fur slippers in which he'd been sleeping began hurriedly pulling on his silken hose and his new-fashioned deer-skin garters. Then he struggled into his upward-twisted boots with their fantastical curve. Thus accoutred but still unwashed and uncombed he went to the iron-barred door and listened. Tramp — tramp — tramp, up and down the whole length of the corridor. Yes, his faithful door-man was on guard as usual.

He hesitated for a moment, contemplating in the grey light a couple of curious marks that had been cut in the wood-work of the door. They were clearly meant for some sort of lettering — the initial letters of some child's name — but it was a calligraphy so different from the kind used now that neither his father nor his father had known whose initials they were. Lost, lost, the hand that made those marks.

And so would this day be lost — at least as it was to him; though no doubt in the chronicles kept at Valle Crucis future pupils would have to learn by rote for their tedious novitiate, "On the sixteenth of September, in this aforesaid year of grace, Owen, son of Griffith the younger, was unanimously proclaimed Prince of Wales by a gathering of the men of Gwynedd and Powys." He stood listening to the lad's marching steps.

"Shall I call him in," he thought, "to make up the fire? No, better not!" and turning to the heap of logs he proceeded to do it himself.

He had certainly awaked in a mood wherein the least encounter with any mortal person was something from which he shrank. Watching the leaping flames throw flickering rays on his ridiculously up-curved shoes he thoughtfully stroked his beard.

And then, as he crossed the room to his chamber-latrine to relieve himself, "Did Bolingbroke feel like this when he first got them to cry 'God save the King!'?"

Stepping gingerly now to an arras-hung aperture in the wall he extracted a silver tray of toilet-articles whose dainty appearance would certainly have pleased the heart of Mad Huw's Richard. Conveying these objects to the window, along with a mirror of polished steel, he discovered that the dawn was still too dim for his purpose.

“I suppose it’s nothing to you,” he thought, apostrophizing the grey slit in the eastern wall, “whether a Prince anoints himself or doesn’t anoint himself!” and he impatiently lit one of the great sweet-scented flambeaux that stood above the oracular crystal globe. Then he set himself to comb his beard and arrange with the utmost nicety one of his ancestor’s tarnished circlets of gold about his forehead. If he didn’t take as much trouble over all this as Hywel Sele had told Hotspur he did, he certainly took a good deal of pains to enhance his princely appearance; making use of various courtly devices to this end that would have reminded his new Secretary of the fantastical fol-de-rols of Richard’s entourage, when that unhappy King kept his Easter Jousts at Hereford.

From his childhood he had had this mania for a meticulous care of his person. How well he knew every curve, every contour, every mark, every hair on his face! It was always a puzzle to him how essentially careless about their appearance all his children were. “They must,” he thought, “have got this peculiarity from the Arglwyddes, who — noble and loving creature! — leaves her gown, her head-dress, the fashion of her hair, entirely to her tire-women.”

He had often thought, “I don’t know why I’m so fussy about my appearance. My father wasn’t, nor his father.” But at this moment, as he went on combing his beard and trimming it across his fingers, he was in a mood to carry his self-analysis further.

“I’ve never been ashamed,” he thought, “of anything I find I am. I wish to Blessed Mary I hadn’t hurt old Griffith’s feelings by attacking this clever modern poetry in comparison with the old great bards; but I’m not ashamed of it — because that’s how I am! I shan’t be ashamed of getting a vicious joy in beating down every enemy I have, especially Grey and Sele and Gam and that sly wolf, Fitz-Alan! I'm not ashamed of using one brave man's love, and another brave man's conscience, another's ambition, another's patriotism, I'm not ashamed of using Saint Derfel his holy self!

"No, old cloven-beard" — and he regarded his soft, yet rugged countenance with grave satisfaction— "I'm not even ashamed of my whoremongerings or of lying to the Arglwyddes! And yet, old conjurer" — and he stared long and deeply into his curious-coloured eyes— "you are ashamed, really and ultimately ashamed, of something that you habitually do. And 'tis the custom, my tricky cloven-beard" — and the man distorted his face out of all recognition— "for a sovereign prince before his coronation to confess himself to the uttermost!"

Relaxing his visage to its normal form he dipped his fingers in an ointment-pot and managed without removing the bandage to anoint the wound in his arm. "The Arglwyddes," he thought, "will want to dress it, but it'll be too late. The Prince of Wales provides his own holy oil! But is there anything to confess? Owen confessing to Owen!"

And then he drew a deep and bitter sigh. And as if fishing for his own self-treachery in his fluctuating eyes he spiked with his spirit a terribly glittering fish, and as he caught it he thought, "That's my reward for knowing you so well, old cloven-beard. I can detach myself from you till my soul isn't in you at all, till my soul is there, or there, or there" — and he made motions with his head— "till my soul's so independent of you that it can make you do anything — perhaps even live after you're dead!

"Yes, old conjurer, there's a soul watching you that by petting you and cossetting you and humouring you has got all your secrets out of you, and has caught now, on your declaration day, the most slippery one of all. Listen, forked-beard! Listen, treacherous eyes! You want to do it — all you're going to do — not as the elements do things, not as the Spirit of the elements does things, but as priests and druids and magicians and fortune-tellers go to work, by meddling with the future!"

Had the gargoylish head that the monkish scribe had caused to emerge from the letter "M", with which the unintelligible prophecy in the open folio began, been endowed as some have fancied such entities are with the power of vision, it would have been startled at that moment to see the prospective Prince of Wales grimly and with some physical distress hook up his mail-shirt and when this was done fall on his knees.

Had this angel-demon head been also — as a child might pretend — possessed of thought-reading powers, it would have been further startled by hearing the following voiceless prayer:

"Oh Unknown Spirit of the Universe, build up before me, before the soul of Owen ap Griffith Fychan, like the rampart of an unassailable fortress, the unbroken, the undisturbed, the absolute darkness of your impenetrable purpose!"

Rising to his feet after this, Owen replaced his mirror, put away the various utensils of his toilet, and going to the door listened to the marching steps of his sentry. Then, as soon as he knew that the man was at the remotest end of the corridor, he rushed to the wall where his ancestral weapons hung and took down a mighty battle-axe of antique design. The next thing he did was to fling over the magic globe, which now reflected the first real light of the rising sun, the wolfskin from his head. Then after a moment's pause he raised the great axe in both hands and brought it crashing down upon the hidden crystal. Three times he raised the axe and struck. At the first blow the thing cracked, but with such a strange sound that it came near to relaxing his nerve. At the second blow the crack sank deeper into the darkened object. At the third the crystal fell into fragments!

He stood listening intently, leaning on the handle of the weapon and surveying the wolfskin.

Tramp...tramp...tramp! His sentry's steps drew near. No! thank the mother of God — they receded again. The fellow was surly and faithful; but, even so, he felt at that moment as if he would shriek like a woman at the shock of facing another, any other, human soul.

There, the sun had risen! A thin spear-head of golden rays flickered upon the crumpled skin that now lay almost flat upon the massive oak support. He stared at the ruffled pall, as if he expected to see bloodstains of some sort — bloodstains of the eidola of the future — staining that grey pelt.

Making a painful effort, he switched off the covering; and the golden light, now no longer a mere spear-head, bathed the illuminated fragments. He counted them mechanically. There were seven of them. Half mechanically he cast his mind forward. "Fourteen hundred and—" but he brusquely curbed that thought, and carrying back the old war-axe to its place hung it up as it was before. Then he gathered the seven fragments together and conveyed them to a chest over against his books, removing and replacing all that the chest contained till the fragments were concealed. This done, he pushed the oaken stand, still intact but badly dented, to the same spot, and lifting it up in his arms, not without consciousness that his shoulder was giving him some vicious pangs, placed it on top of the chest. Then he went to the window, and facing the sunlight, all grandly accoutred and anointed as he was, became — had there been eyes peeping through that arrow-slit to see — a figure of gleaming gold.

His countenance, however, had suddenly grown strangely stupid and dull, like the drugged and helpless countenance of a sacrificial animal. And thus he lapsed, even as he stood, into one of those singular trances that had caught Rhisiart's attention when they first met.

Had the continuation of this queer coma, like the sleep of a beast who sleeps as it stands, been threatened by the familiar knock of his surly sentry he might not have been roused; but a lighter, though hardly less familiar, tap took him to the door, and it was against the girlish breast of his youngest child, warm from her bed, that his soul came back from its fathom-deep recession.

It was much later on that eventful morning — that morning in the middle of the first September of the new century — when the self-anointed Prince of Wales — for this was a declaration not a coronation — the long fantastic ceremony over, stood alone on his high platform in the pavilion by the river to listen to the voices of his subjects. Old Griffith, the family Bard, had already recited, to his own accompaniment on the harp, a carefully prepared poem in the manner he had defended so vigorously, and he had just begun what struck the new Prince as a far more inspired performance, an improvised chant in the older style, when the irrepressible Scab, clearly determined that prophecy on this occasion should supersede poetry, burst into a Derfel-celebrating series of dithyrambic howls.

As was always the case, the extraordinary waves of magnetism that vibrated in the voice of this singular person soon began to release emotions which the solemnity of the ceremony had hitherto held in check. Glendower himself, however, as he watched that crowd of upturned faces extending far beyond the entrance of the tent grew sadder at heart.

“Long live Owen, Prince of Powys!”

“Blood,” he said to himself, “blood and ashes! That’s what this means!”

“Long live Owen, Prince of Gwynedd!”

“I’ll do it,” he thought. “Nothing can stop me now. But to what end? There won’t be a castle in Wales in Harry’s hands when I’ve finished with him. But to what end?”

"Long live Owen, Prince of Deheubarth!"

He raised his hands to his forehead and adjusted more comfortably the old coronet of his race, made of heavy gold, that Hywel ap Madoc, Dean of St. Asaph, had unearthed from his cathedral's crypt.

"Will they stop shouting," he thought, "when I sit down?" And the grotesque idea rushed into his head: "Suppose that old oak throne from Meifod breaks down under my weight? What did William the Norman say when he fell on his knees at Senlac? But I shouldn't fall on my knees!"

"Long live Owen, Prince of Wales!"

He let his eyes move slowly from face to face among the figures in front of him.

How proud and happy the Arglwyddes looked! She at any rate wasn't thinking of blood and ashes! He turned from his wife to his brother Tudor, who was standing between her and her brothers, Griffith and Philip Hanmer; and there shot into his brain the memory that this kind-hearted man, younger than himself by a year and a half, had once carried him up the last lap of Snowdon on his back. He looked exultant and happy too. He wasn't thinking of blood and ashes. And then he caught the eye of his new Secretary, as the lad stood by Meredith's side holding in his hands the new standard, a golden dragon on a white ground, about which he was weary of hearing his women talk. It was the Arglwyddes' choice. He knew it was all wrong. It ought to have been a red dragon, not a yellow one. But what matter? It, would soon be red enough! But that boy was his; body and soul he was his. That's what he'd wanted, and that's what he now had.

"Only I wish," he thought, "that little Catharine wouldn't stare at him so!"

He lowered himself cautiously into his ricketty "throne." It creaked but didn't collapse. "Meredith must have had it tinkered up," he thought. "He remembers everything. How sulky Griffith looks! But the rest of the boys" — and his eyes swept hurriedly along the line of tall lads, come at his call across the mountain from Sycharth and now grouped behind their mother's chair— "Mother of God! they look as if this were in Westminster Hall! What do they think, the brave children? That their sisters have only to embroider golden dragons, and their dad only to put a gilded bit of iron round his head, and Bolingbroke will send heralds of peace? How many of you, my bright-eyed lads, will live to see the real crowning of Owen? Blood and ashes — but I shall do it. But oh! how sad Meredith looks!"

Crach Ffinnant had fallen into a monotonous chant now; and Owen, settling himself in his ancestral chair, had plenty of time to let his thoughts wander where they would. It was even unnecessary for him to keep a responsive eye on the prophet of Derfel, for the sole concern of that magnetizer of souls seemed to be to make an impression on the Arglwyddes and the ladies who surrounded him!

And it was, as he turned his own eyes upon the mother of his children, touching enough to him — for he knew her so well! — to see the attempt she was making to look sympathetic towards the Scab, when in reality she was both puzzled and horrified. But there was a pair of bright eyes near the great lady that showed no such weakness. Twice already during that interminable ceremonial had he caught the lively and wanton gaze of young Efa from Dinas Bran.

He knew Efa well. He had seen her when she first came to these regions; he had seen her as a maiden when he visited the Lady Ffraid; and he had heard rumours of the shameless, or was it the miraculous, notion that had obsessed her since she'd grown up of being chosen as Derfel's bride.

What completely puzzled him was how the girl had got out of the old lady's keeping. Had the Scab kidnapped her? No — impossible! Even he wouldn’t dare to presume as far as that. Besides — oh, the whole thing was unthinkable. One of the least fatal aspects of it would be a blood-feud to the death with the Tudors of Môn.

But what an amorous little wench she looked! Owen gravely raised his left hand — for the right one held the golden-hilted sword of Madoc ap Meredith, his family’s best substitute for the prehistoric treasure in the hands of Adam of Dinas Bran — and tugged, as was his habit when exercised in his nerves, first at one and then at the other of the points of his forked beard. He couldn’t keep out of his mind another shameless girl’s face — and yet it was a shamelessness different from this — that had looked up at him once, when before going to Richard’s wars he had let the Scab twist to a lecherous purpose his mystical interest in Derfel Gadarn.

“No, I won’t smile at you, you tormenting minx!” he thought. And then he became aware that the Scab’s madness was spreading rapidly through the whole host of spearmen who crowded round that richly decorated pavilion on the southern bank of the Dee.

He knew their habits of thought so well and he knew their local dialects so well that, though many of them used the slang of Ardudwy and of the regions round about Mur-y-Castell and Penllyn, he could catch from their excited comments upon the prophet’s oration that they were beginning to indulge in the hope that the wild scene of three years ago, when under the “holy madness” they had forced him into the mound-chamber, as if he’d been Derfel himself, and the wantonest maid of the cantref with him, was going to be repeated.

He ceased tugging at his forked beard. He was suffering a curious physical pain just then, the cause of which he alone of living men knew.

It was old Iolo who had set him upon this trick. The old man had sworn not to die, had sworn to linger on in a half-death like a corpse-god, if he weren't obeyed. He could hear him now assuring him with oracular earnestness that he would never free Wales if he didn't wear day and night, as monks do their hair-shirts, a coat of chain-armour under his clothes.

In these last months — and he couldn't have kept the secret from the Arglwyddes if they hadn't ceased sleeping together after Catharine's birth — he had only taken the thing off when his door was barred and not always even then.

But to-day when he had to wear Eliseg's belt in addition, he couldn't relax when the mail-coat, separated only by a silk shirt from his ribs, began to chafe and bruise him. His arrow-wound troubled him much less; but it too was a discomfort, because in the natural process of healing and under the weight of all these ceremonious robes it had set up a lively tickling.

One of the few things he had overheard of his enemy's talk to Hotspur and Fitz-Alan was Sele's statement that he had no sense of humour. His malicious relative had bawled this out in a tune that was meant to emulate the coarse camp-jesting of Norman barons. But it alone, of all the fellow had said, had pierced Owen's chain-armour.

"Am I," he said to himself, as he fidgetted on his princely chair under this combination of pain and tickling, "am I devoid of a sense of humour? I'm certainly not devoid of something resembling it. But I just notice such things and let them go. I suppose humour's a thing that bubbles up, like loving-kindness, out of a person's soul. No, cousin, you're right. My soul can't send up bubbles like that, any more than yours can, sweet coz — even when it's drunk!"

And as Owen sat on there, growing less and less at ease both in mind and body, and even while a portion of his brain had begun to devise methods and schemes to side-track this mounting mob excitement, there came over him a vision of the one man he had met whose English humour — and

English it certainly was; and yet what profound wisdom lay behind it! — had impressed him as a thing of genius. How well he could see it now, that portly form of the famous Lollard, Sir Thomas Oldcastle! Instinctively he looked about him for the evangelical countenance of his new Librarian. Yes, there he was, evidently more aware than his friend with the Norman nose of the sinister electricity that the prophet was conjuring up.

But Owen looked in vain for any Oldcastle humour in those gently worried lineaments. Master Brut evidently was, as he perpetually claimed with somewhat pedantic emphasis, a Welsh heretic, not an English one! No, there was nothing in him of that deep fountain of philosophy which in "the old man of the castle" took the form of humour.

"There's something formidable in the fellow," Owen concluded, "and I must find out what. But it isn't what Sir Thomas had!" And then it came to him with what a quizzical eye the great Oldcastle would regard the present scene, and himself seated in this ricketty old chair, aching under the pressure of Eliseg's belt! But he mustn't think of these things; he mustn't think of the monstrous grotesquerie of human affairs. Action — any action — hadn't he learnt that? — meant evil as well as good. Save a man's life? And what will he do with it? Starve his serfs; murder his friend; drive his woman into despair, and then die a death far worse than the one you've saved him from!

"Yes, what I'm doing now, and what nothing can stop me from doing, won't only mean ashes and blood. It'll mean mumming and miming and play-acting and masquerading, till a man's heart turns sick! Well — well"; and he shifted his fingers from his ancestral sword and pressed them — he hadn't let himself do even that before — against his bandaged arm, "I've got to save those shining eyes and that baby mouth somehow. How the devil did she get here? What these children can do, when the life-lust gets into their little—"

"Long live Owen, Prince of Wales!"

The Scab had now collapsed in complete exhaustion; but matters were looking unpleasant. The Arglwyddes had risen; and the gentlemen were all crowding round, to protect her and the other women. How madly they were pushing forward, that wild host he had called up from nothing. Well, from the caves and camps and homesteads and forests of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy.

He rose to his feet and straightened his shoulders. Both these movements were so painful that they made his mouth twist a little under his beard.

"We want Derfel's bride! We want Derfel's bride!"

Owen raised his left arm with a gesture of authority. "Let Rhys Gethin come to me," he shouted. "Let no man of you move a step till I've talked with Rhys Gethin."

He saw that his brother and his wife's two brothers and his eldest son and Rhisiart and Brut and half-a-dozen more of the gentlemen there had formed a circle round the women; and he saw that Meredith had forced his way out of the pavilion. He let his arm sink down; but raised his voice again.

"I, Owen ap Griffith Fychan," he cried in a clear voice, "swear before you all, and before Derfel Gadarn and his prophet, that I will not sheathe my sword, or cease from battle, till there's not a castle in Wales under any flag but the dragon!"

But the vivats for "Owen, Prince of Wales" came fainter now, till the hideous howls, "We want Derfel's bride!" began to drown them completely.

"How do they know that silly child's here?" he thought. "But Griffith's getting angry. That won't do. God! if he isn't flinging them back already!"

And then an inspiration came to him. Thrusting his unbandaged arm beneath his robes, he drew forth a parchment-scroll to which was attached a formidable red seal that swung in the air as he raised and straightened the document.

"A moment, my men — a moment!" he cried; and then raising his powerful voice to its fullest pitch so that his words might be heard outside the entrance to the tent, "I have here," he began, "the last will and testament of Iolo Goch, the illustrious Bard of our ancient Princedom! Iolo Goch leaves to me, and through me to you, the greatest host raised in this land since Llewelyn, all the gold which in his long life he stored up! Iolo foresaw by the celestial signs and the sacred constellations just what was to happen on this historic day. I propose, therefore, after talking with Rhys Gethin, to open my old friend's iron chest, referred to here, under his hand and seal, and now in my possession; and although the gold he speaks of in this will and testament" — his word rose to its fullest compass at the word "will" and the word "gold"— "may be in the ancient coinage and therefore of uncertain value in the Usurper's realm, it were only in accordance" — here he made as if he were reading from the parchment he held— "with Iolo's bequest to me, and to you through my hands, that we delay our march upon the Red Castle until this gold, spoken of in Iolo's will—"

But Rhys the Fierce was now at his side; and it soon became clear to Owen, when the man began explaining a new plan of campaign that had come into his head, that it was a hundred times more likely to succeed than the one they had all agreed upon and worked out in such careful detail in their recent council of state.

"Saint Matthew's Fair;" Owen kept repeating to himself; and the words called up many enchanted memories. Saint Matthew's Fair wasn't on the morrow for which their march on Ruthin had been planned; it was on the day after that, but the delay gave them time to gather round the doomed town in such strength that resistance would be out of the question.

"I've been thinking," Rhys Gethin said, "that Grey when he sees our numbers will be scared to show his nose out of doors. We haven't the engines and we haven't the time for a siege, and we'd only blacken his ruddy walls and then decamp, with no real blow struck at all. If we burnt the town on market-day 'twould be something; but to burn it on Saint Matthew's Day — why 'twould be remembered forever! And that's — oh, damn those men and their blasted Saint! — what I suggest. And you see, dear my Lord, 'twould hurt Grey more than anything we could do except take him prisoner. That would hurt him most — more than to kill him! I heard his own son, the one who loves the wench I sold for a groat to Master Brut, say that his father'd sooner be dead than in Glendourdy's hands. But to burn Grey's great Fair — think of it, my Prince! Why the news'll travel all over England; and the big merchants of Winchester and Gloucester and Sarum and Exeter will send their pedlars to Chirk or to Castell Goch at Welshpool instead of Ruthin! Why 'tis one of the old devil's chief sources of revenue, this Saint Matthew's Day. He'll howl like a black dog when he smells the smoke going up! I'll see that my people bring plenty of oil. Mother of God! but we'll have a bonfire! The burghers of Chester'll shiver like novice-nuns when the herdsmen of Moel Fammau light their beacon. I know the houses at Ruthin well, my Lord; and I tell you — oh damn you, you brainless, lecherous Derfel swine! I'll Derfel you! I'll bridle you! Frighten the ladies, will you, you mountain-hogs? You wait, my squealers, till Rhys Gethin takes you where you'll get something to squeal for! — I tell you, my Prince, apart from the booths of the Fair half the roofs of the Ruthin houses are reed-thatched. We'll light them their candles for sweet Saint Matthew! We'll sell them Hereford saddles for silver bells! We'll make maidenheads cheap at Ruthin Fair! We'll give them red flames for their red gold!"

" We want Derfel's bride!"

"Oh, for Mary's sake, hold your peace, you Tegid thieves! I'll give ye a bride, you bare-foot scavengers! I'll give you gold, you rogues!"

And then, while Rhys explained other advantages of not making the attack till the day after tomorrow, Owen thought, "If I don't do something with this fellow, now that I've got him here, I shall deserve—"

And beyond the spear-points, and beyond the ladies' head-dresses, and beyond the fluttering of the pennons, and beyond the cries for the Saint's bride, Owen saw the glittering baubles of Saint Matthew as they were when he and his brother Tudor as little boys came across the Berwyns on sumpter-mules to the great Fair. He saw the embossed trappings, the shining shields, the wax figures, the nodding hobbyhorses; and all the enchantment of that early vision came over him with such force that these crazy shouts about gold and Derfel seemed like voices in a madhouse.

In a flash he began identifying himself with one particular harness-merchant of those old times whose glittering wares had fascinated his imagination. There'd be salesmen there in a couple of days just like Master Peter of St. Albans. There'd be quaint old travelling pedlars from Shropshire and Hereford — and then — whirling down upon them in a moment — shouts and screams and rape and murder and blood and ashes — and the sly, white face of that fox, Grey, peering out, as the smoke rose, from some arrow-slit in those inaccessible red walls!

"We want Derfel's bride!" But there were now — thanks be to the Blessed Mother! — other and equally excited shouts: "The will! The gold! Iolo's will! Iolo's gold!"

Ah! Meredith had brought in with him now his own special troop of spearmen from Sycharth, picked men, well-disciplined and well-armed, old retainers of their house, who would perish, there in the tent, rather than yield an inch to this mutinous crowd from the mountains.

He took the opportunity of explaining to Rhys in as blunt and clear a manner as was possible in that tumult what insanity it would be to allow the Lady Ffraid's ward to suffer any hurt. "The girl's a Tudor of Môn," he kept repeating, "and you know, man, what they are. They'd go over to Harry tomorrow if a hair of her head was touched! As it is — but they won't believe that — it's too wild a tale."

The chieftain from the Conway nodded. Then he listened to the hubbub outside the tent and smiled grimly. "Your gold nearly did it, my Lord," he remarked laconically, "but not quite. Can't you think of something else? Can't you take the wench away yourself, as if you were — The old Red Head used always to be talking of Mathrafal. Couldn't you tell them—"

Owen stared at him. Then his face cleared. "Right, as usual, Gethin!" he muttered. "My wits seem dull this fine noon. Owen of Glyndyfrdwy's a cleverer man than Owen, Prince of Cymru! Well, go out to them, my friend, and tell 'em I'm going to give Derfel his bride. But tell 'em Iolo said it must be done at Mathrafal this time — and done alone! Tell Meredith I'll want his troop with me and only his! Don't be afraid. I'll send them back and be back myself in plenty of time."

It was one of the rarest and most perfect September afternoons when Owen and Rhisiart, the former on a powerful grey horse, with little Efa, almost invisible in a big mantle, perched behind him, and the latter on his old piebald, rode up the bridle-track that led across the solitary uplands of the Berwyn Range. Owen rode slowly, partly so as not to out-distance his troop, and partly that he might not tire the horses at the beginning of so long a ride. Whether the small creature behind him kept her head turned towards Griffin and his rider Owen had no notion. It certainly wasn't necessary for her to cling tightly to him, for if there was one craft in which his river-side adherents excelled it was in saddle-making, and he had had this particular saddle especially designed so that he could take little Catharine with him from Sycharth and back without incommoding her.

He was indeed so little aware of the childish arms that encircled his steel-clad waist that, as he pondered on the events of that momentous morning and on their dubious issue, he caught himself more than once forgetting that there were two living souls mounted on that grey steed.

For more than an hour the cavalcade moved forward in silence. What a comfort it was to have a boy like this! Whenever he turned his head to make sure their followers were in sight he caught nothing but a quaint mixture of grim resolution and exultant happiness on his squire's face. The young people certainly weren't chattering to each other! In fact, as mile after mile of fading heather, red whin-patches, and masses of bracken, still green, but sombrely and heavily green, fell behind them, the new Prince might have been riding completely alone so little was there to interrupt his thoughts.

"I must keep those men with me," he thought, "till we get across the mountain. But once across I'll let them wait our return. I'll get to Mathrafal by that path through the forest, where there'll be absolutely no chance of meeting any large body of men; and armed and mounted as we are" — again he forgot the feather-weight at his back— "we needn't worry about ordinary encounters."

He had long since decided that at all costs he must get this ticklish little encumbrance, butterfly-light though she was, back safe to the Lady Ffraid, with all her fragile Tudor "honour" — as hard to preserve, it seemed, as a lily's gold-dust! — intact as when she came.

"I shall take her," he thought, "to Broch-o'-Meifod. Nobody, not all the English in Shropshire, would dare to meddle with her in his mill under his protection! She can sleep in his mill to-night. That'll be an adventure for her to talk about to her friends on the hill — and Cousin Ffraid will know it's been all right."

"Do you like riding over a mountain like this, child?" he asked gently at last, fearing that his absorbed silence might be troubling her. "Oh yes, my Prince," came the answer. "I've never been so happy." Her voice rang out so firm and strong that it quite startled him. It was like the sudden ringing of a clear little bell just behind his head. "I suppose I ought to say something," he thought, "now that the ice is broken, to get this 'bride of Derfel' business out of her head." But he was puzzled how to begin. In the elaborate and fantastical code of courtesy in which he had been brought up, and for which the late King's dissolute but punctilious court had been famous, it was one of the basic principles of chivalry to assume that a maid's thoughts were as chaste as those of the Blessed Virgin.

But it had given him an unexpected thrill of pleasure when she said "my Prince" in the tone she did. The Arglwyddes had called him so, and so had all his tall sons when they kissed his hand in the accredited feudal fashion; but these formal ceremonies had been for so long a family jest between them all that when he was about to kiss little Catharine on his departure, and was interrupted by Rhys Gethin's addressing him as "Prince," he heard the child eagerly clap her hands and cry out, "It's begun! It's begun!"

Heaven help him! It had indeed "begun"; and it was in part to blot out the picture of Ruthin market in flames that he plunged into this unchivalrous discourse to Efa.

"I ought to tell you, Demoiselle," he began with unprincely hesitation, "that the great Iolo, whose memory I so revere, directed me — by his occult knowledge of the stars — if I wished to make my revolt a success, to find — to find a bride for Derfel."

Clear and firm, without the least trace of the shyness he was displaying, rang out that little silver bell behind his half-turned head. "I know — I know! I want to be Derfel's bride!'

"But Iolo also said" — may the Saints forgive me for all my lies this morning!— "that it was to be—"

"Yes, my Prince?"

"That lad is perfect," thought Owen. "Bless my soul, if he hasn't pulled up that old horse of his, so as to be out of ear-shot!"

" — to be a spiritual union... like that of Saint Ursula with Our Lord."

Had he announced to this little Tudor that she must have her feet cut off, she couldn't have been more upset. "I don't — want — to — be a nun!"

And Owen again blessed the tact of his new squire; for he became conscious that from the butterfly-weight behind him there was proceeding a series of bitter sobs. He flung down the reins and half turned in his saddle.

"I — don't — want — to be — a nun! I want to go back to Luned and Sibli!"

With some discomfort to his bandaged arm he turned far enough round to catch sight of that outraged and miserable little face. It struck him like the face of a wax image he'd seen once, half-melted by the heat of a torch! He patted with his gauntleted hand the only portion of her small person he could reach, which must have been one of her knees.

"Then you shall not be a nun," he whispered, with all the emphasis he could throw into the words. "And I promise you on my word of honour I'll send you back to Dinas Bran tomorrow night!"

"On — your — word — as — as a Prince?"

"On my word as a Prince!" and he crossed himself with the utmost gravity.

"May I tell Rhisiart?"

He swung round and picked up his reins. "Rhisiart!" he shouted.

The old piebald came cantering to their side.

"I've promised the Demoiselle Efa that she shall be back in Dinas Bran by tomorrow night; and back, too, without being anybody's bride."

"Yes, my Prince." And Owen noted how careful the lad was to keep his eyes on his.

"Am I to escort her there, my Prince?"

"No, no, lad! We're going to get Broch-o'-Meifod's blessing on our business. We'll stay with him to-night and he'll be her escort to-morrow. You and I will have our hands full." He could see the boy suck in his lips and frown doubtfully.

"You don't know, either of you children, who Broch-o'-Meifod is. He's the safest man to trust a lady with between the Orkneys and Land's End. Can you hear what we're saying, Efa?"

"I — wanted — to see — a battle — my Prince." There was still a hint of tears in her voice.

"You'll see what you want then — won't she, Rhisiart? — if the stars fight for us. You'll see the red dragon — I mean the golden dragon — flying from your tower, before we've finished with these English! She will, won't she, Rhisiart?"

Rhisiart bowed in silence over Griffin's neck, drew rein, and fell back once more, so that the big grey horse could have the track to himself. Comforted, but feeling obscurely in some portion of her consciousness that she had been cheated of the dramatic role she had planned for herself as she lay night by night telling herself stories in the tower bed, Efa resigned herself to destiny.

The motion of the grey horse, in her present mood of relaxed submission, caused her to nod; and very soon a new sound from behind his back reached the Prince's ears, the soft and even breathing of a butterfly-maid asleep!

The September afternoon as they rode on grew more and more golden. Here and there even the foliage of the bracken bore faint traces, like the shadow of the passing of years over the locks of a proud queen, of the mountain's response to the sinking of the vernal sap; while so far had the rich tints of the bell-heather already yielded to the paler hue of the ling that in place of the imperial purple of the high summer the tender lavender of this latest of the mountain children bloomed amid a bleached and rusty obscuring.

And yet the bracken was green still, and the autumnal gorse had an even yellower glow than its vernal predecessor. It was only that, over the whole mass and roll of the Berwyns, the year's decline was beginning to be revealed in what might have been a sprinkling of scarce-visible cosmic ashes, ashes imponderable in any earthly balance, and thinned out by their descent through space, and yet perceptible, as they reached the earth, through the diffused sun-rays.

It was one of those days, peculiar to September, when the whole landscape seems resting; resting and waiting in spell-bound patience for the passing across the earth of powers and presences beyond the normal, powers that could only present themselves when the forces of life and death, of growth and dissolution, were held in motionless equilibrium.

To the faithful troop of retainers who followed them the riders on the grey and the piebald horses must have appeared at that hour, if not quite the unearthly beings the season demanded, at least separated from the common run of men and things, heightened, consecrated, dedicated to some unusual quest, as that golden haze floated round them and moved with them as they moved!

Owen wore round his helmet, as was the custom of a hundred years earlier, the golden circlet of a ruling Prince in Cymru. Slung in front of his saddle was his two-edged Roman sword, a deadly weapon when handled with skill, and one of which he'd already proved the value in the Scottish wars.

But what gave his faithful Sycharth men the greatest satisfaction as they watched it moving before them in that golden haze was their Prince's great lance, bearing on a long streamer, now scarcely fluttering in that still air, the single lion rampant sable of the ancient realm of north-eastern Wales. This lance, heavy though it was, he could support with a careless touch, for its handle rested in a deep leather groove in the front part of his saddle.

Over his breast-plate, upon which this same black lion ramped, he wore a flowing moss-green mantle, richly embroidered with silver.

As for his new squire, that resolute young man — not it must be allowed without some embarrassment and difficulty — had put on his ancient coat of chain-armour and had refused to leave behind either his great crusader's sword or the handsome Toledo dagger that had drawn blood from the wrist of the Usurper's heir. If it had not been for these menacing antiquities Rhisiart's attire was more adapted to the council-chamber than the camp, but he had consented, under pressure from the ladies of Glyndyfrdwy, to place a red feather in his student's cap, and this, against his black locks, had an appearance of no little distinction.

According to his pre-arranged plan Owen dismissed his troop as soon as they descended into the valley. Here our three riders were confronted by a dense forest of oak and sycamore; the young woman — now fully awake and with eyes shining eagerly for adventure — couldn't help exchanging with the young man behind her several exclamations of delight. She had allowed her cloak to fall back from her head, and her bright curls, loosed from control, caught so magically the slanting sunrays that fell between the branches that to Rhisiart's eyes she resembled some little fabulous princess from one of Modry's stories.

There was so little wind stirring that the warm fragrance of this mass of tresses, thus loosened just behind him, reached Owen's consciousness like the floating essence of its owner's reckless youth; and if the flickering sun-motes that had turned themselves in those tangles were an enchantment to the boy, the sense that he was riding in a moving cloud of fragrant hair was not without its power to relax the strung-up nerves of the man.

How far little Efa in her childish excitement had an inkling of the spell she had so lightly cast upon that mossy track it would be hard to say; but all manner of wayward fancies, airy and wanton, fluttered like butterflies in and out of her small head.

Griffin alone, as he followed step by step the movements of the other horse, seemed to be thinking rather of bodily refreshment than of romantic vistas. But the spell the girl had thrown upon them was entirely impersonal. Man and boy would have been immune at that high moment to the most perilous temptation.

But it was as if a mute wax image of a little maid, carried along behind an armoured figure, had suddenly come alive, and the leafy path itself with all its ferny tendrils had begun to respond to a kindred presence.

The two young people soon began to exchange low-voiced murmurs of wonder and admiration at the manner in which their leader — who from his boyhood had known every path and track of this umbrageous region — urged the grey horse forward.

Turn after turn he took. Mossy glade after mossy glade he followed. Often had little Efa to press her forehead against his broad back lest her curls should be caught in the switching branches.

At last they came to a rushing stream, and Owen guided his grey horse along the southern bank of this obstacle, a course which presented more difficulties than they had yet experienced. In the first place the stream's bank was strewn with the dead branches of old trees, trees that had flourished and drooped and sunk into lifelessness years before the new prince was born. In the second place the branches of the living trees on that little river's side had a tendency to grow nearer the earth, as well as to sprout more vigorously than the rest, owing to the watering of their roots.

But the grey horse was thoroughly accustomed to such uneven going and old Griffin, though reared in a city and inured to social pageants, had always been one to relish a woodland track; so that it was really — for Rhisiart soon removed his cap with its red feather — only a matter of dealing with Owen's great lance, which he was forced to hold horizontally, as if in readiness for an attack, and with Efa's curls, which she was driven to cover once more with her cloak. There came at last a moment when their guide drew rein.

"Slip down, both of you children," he said gently, "and stretch your legs. But keep an eye, each of you, on some kind of wood-marks to bring you safe back here, in case you want to wander alone. But you needn't be frightened," and he smiled at Efa who was already on her feet, "even if you do get lost, for I could find you in five minutes anywhere round here!"

"Shall I tie up Griffin, my Prince?" asked Rhisiart.

“God! no, lad,” and Owen, jumping down from his horse, planted his spear in a bed of water-mint, “I’ll look after both of them. They’ll be quieter together. Off you go, children! I’ll give you as long as you like. But if I whistle don’t come back till I whistle like this,” and he imitated the thin shrill cry of the water-ouzel.

“That boy’ll have the sense to leave her to herself for a minute,” he thought, as with his wounded arm through both bridles he proceeded to ease himself. “Between me and God that boy’s perfect! Oh, I hope I shan’t drag him to his death. I’ll keep him busy with pen and parchment — and then—” And leading the horses to a spot where they could crop the lush-growing grass, he fell into one of his prolonged reveries.

He would have been puzzled to explain in intelligible words — indeed he had never attempted it, save once to old Iolo, and even he had only stared at him in silence and shaken his head — what happened to his conscious soul when these fits took him. He knew one thing about them, however. They always left him with a feeling of power and confidence and serenity. His own vague notion was that his soul “went somewhere” at these times. But where could it go in a world like this, to come back refreshed, strengthened, fortified? Where could it go, for instance, to come back with such absolute assurance as to the success of his revolt?

On this occasion he found himself dallying with some nameless clue that he had caught as he stared with unseeing eyes at the flow of the little stream. It was a clue — he felt sure of that, though he had long given up any attempt to force his soul to remember what happened to it or where it “went” at these times — that concerned what he would do for Wales when the English were driven out. He had always known vaguely what he would do, but on this particular return to consciousness he retained an obscure intimation that his soul had come back from an interview with none other than the Holy Father! The odd thing was that he was convinced he hadn't been thinking of Rome.

"Can it be," he said to himself, "and didn't that man Griffith Young hint at something of that kind — that I'm destined to grow enough of a Lollard to follow the sly French King and have a Pope, or at least a half-Pope, of my own?"

A pair of late wood-butterflies, linked together in love, came fluttering past; and in a mood of languid superstition, giving the fancy no more weight than the insects themselves possessed, as they drifted awkwardly by on their double set of wings, he told himself that if they settled on a patch of ragwort near the path it would be to Avignon he would go, and if on the loosestrife by the water it would be to Rome; whereas if they drifted away without settling at all it would mean a church of Wales independent of them both.

The pair of airy lovers, however, did none of these things. Naturally enough they fluttered down to the ground. But the Prince's reverie, whatever its nature may have been, must have lasted longer than he supposed, for with the subsidence of the butterflies, the last golden rays of the sun sank also; and he was aware of a premonitory chill in the air, rising, like the breath of some great hidden water-beast, from amid the roots of the mint and the burdocks.

He pulled his green mantle closer round him. "Strange," he thought, "if these fits I get should one day leave me as dead-cold as a corpse! I wish I'd told those children not to be away too long."

But he'd scarcely breathed this wish than there they were; Efa looking flushed and radiantly happy, while Rhisiart struck him as sulky and embarrassed.

"She's been teasing him," he said to himself. "She's been making him treat her in her way — not in his!"

Mounted as before, they rode on awhile, still following the little stream.

Suddenly Owen brought his horse to a stand-still, and the lad's piebald stopped too without need of a word or the least pull on his bit.

Their leader called their attention to an extremely aged oak-tree, still green, but reduced to little more than a gigantic torso save for one outstretched arm.

"The old north-way to Mathrafal," he told them, "begins here. It runs for a mile along the stream. You'll see a lot of these old stumps presently."

Rhisiart and Efa exchanged awed and bewildered glances. The boy had recovered his spirits. The girl looked grave and slightly pale.

Moving forward again, the young people were soon staring in wonder at what they saw; for the brushwood had quite disappeared, and parallel with the course of the little brook, which now ran smoothly between mossy banks, a broad avenue of immemorial turf stretched before them, flanked on either side by these gnarled and misshapen relics of what a thousand years ago must have been majestic oak-trees.

In place of the striking of hooves upon stones, the snapping of fallen twigs, and the swishing of the under-growth, the feet of the two horses now fell in a strange awe-inspiring silence upon that soft turf; while in place of exchanging any youth-and-maiden signals, whether of war or peace, Rhisiart and Efa gazed about them as if they had crossed the leafy threshold of an enchantment older than the forest itself.

But Owen drew rein again. "I think," he said, turning round in his saddle, "just in case some of the Sheriff's people should have taken it into their heads to encamp round here, 'twould be a good idea if you slipped down now" — he addressed himself to Efa— "and rode with Master Rhisiart. I'd be freer then to use my lance."

"Shall I take her in front of me, my Prince, or—"

But the agile little maid was already on the greensward and, pulling herself up by the help of Griffin's saddle and the quick pressure of a light toe on the rider's instep, she soon had her arm round the boy's waist and her body adjusted to the old horse's rump.

"Well done, child!" cried the chieftain in a relief that his chivalry couldn't altogether conceal. "I can account for a troop of them now!"

But the first use the Prince made of being the sole burden upon that grey back was to bring the two horses neck to neck, and as they rode on to begin an impassioned discourse to his two listeners concerning the place they were approaching. Something about that verdurous and mossy track between perishing relics of an antiquity that staggered comprehension seemed to shake off from the man's mind every pressure of modern transactions.

But there was another cause for Owen's excited, low-voiced murmur to those two. Save when, under rare conditions, he had got Meredith and Catharine together by the log-fire in his "magician's chamber" he had rarely enjoyed the heavenly liberation of a perfect audience. With old Iolo he had always been the one to listen, and with the Bard Griffith it was not hard to grow restless and argumentative. The strain of the morning's interminable ceremony had driven his soul inwards till everything on earth had seemed of little moment. But the place, the hour, these grave and eager listeners, set free elements in his nature such as he had only vaguely realized were there at all.

"I tell you," he was saying now — and his voice took on a solemn intonation that seemed to his hearers as if it came from far away; from over the ruins of these ancient trees, from beyond this long green twilight-vista, from across the dim grey stones that they now began to distinguish in the distance— "I tell you, children, there's no name in this land of mystical names, no! not Caer-Dathyl, or Caerleon, or Narberth, or Dynefor, or Harlech, that can compare with Mathrafal. Those of our fathers' fathers who before both Christ and Caesar journeyed towards the setting sun and paused in this place must have mingled with the Caer-builders and the Mound-builders and the Circle builders who possessed this land from the beginning.

"And, in the process of this mingling, the souls of the people who were here from the beginning conquered our fathers' souls even while our fathers' swords smote them down! And these first people must have known secrets beyond the understanding of our fathers. But our fathers were bards as well as warriors, and though they understood not the hidden meaning of the words, and though the words seemed to them like the motions of winds and motions of waters, they gathered up their ignorance into the most magical names ever invented by man. Who can tell, my little ones, what hidden power over life, over nature, over the ways of men, lies bound up, as with a living scroll, in the syllables of this name? Our fathers flung into this name all their beating against the gates of the mystery that bowed them down, as it bows us down!

"What high and fatal secret, lost — and yet perhaps not quite lost — awaits, in this destiny-charged name, its final revelation?

"Do you see those stones, children?" And he held back his grey horse and laid his hand upon his squire's hand to slacken the piebald's stride. "Whenever I pass those stones at an hour like this, do ye know what I feel? I feel as though in the dust of Mathrafal there lives forever, indestructible I tell you, children, indestructible, all the pilgrim prayers, all the journeying longings, all the voyaging desires, all the cravings and the cryings, older than the wind, deeper than the sea, of the people of this land. Let them burn Mathrafal into cinders; let them grind Mathrafal into dust; I tell you, Cousin Rhisiart, I tell you, Cousin Efa, as long as this name lasts on the lips of the people of this land there will be one beat, one pulse, one motion left in our blood that neither the good nor the bad nor the worst nor the best of our crafty conquerors can ever blot out or destroy!"

His hand by this time was pressing so heavily upon Rhisiart's hand that old Griffin was growing uneasy, though the grey horse, more accustomed to his rider's peculiarities, seemed prepared to accept any unusual gesture without surprise.

"Ought I to stop while I can stop," he said to himself, "or dare I say everything to them?" For there was now pressing upon him, like a wave mounting up from some unknown chasm in the soul, a wild torrent of suppressed feeling.

"I must yield to it," he thought. "It's only fair to them!" And pulling back the grey horse till it almost fell on its haunches he swung his great lance into the air till the black rampant lion fluttered against the rose-coloured sky.

His face was blurred to his hearers in that dim light, but he felt as if its features were melting, and as if his whole torso were melting and turning into a dissolving tower of mist. He felt as if he had sat on that spot on his grey horse for a thousand years, while the rains and the dews and the days and the nights passed over him, telling to all who came what was the secret of the place. He couldn't really utter it — he knew that well enough — for the meaning of it belonged to the ancient people, not to his own proud race but he felt as if he'd been appointed — had a tynghed or a "fate" put on him — to sit on his horse forever at the gate of Mathrafal!

Strange that even at that moment his self-consciousness should be so active, feeling itself so vividly into the consciousness of that boy and that maid. But, as his brain moved now like summer lightning from point to point, he noted in a flash how powerful the spell upon him must be, if he could so calmly envisage himself in those eyes — his forked beard, his lion rampant, the golden circlet round his helm — and yet submit, like an inanimate mask, to the wild stream of words that the spirit of the place poured through him!

"Sometimes, children," he went on, "I've felt as if in the early days, in the days when merchants from Tyre and Sidon and the mouths of the Nile visited these Isles, there was a great city with granite walls and marble towers here. Iolo once revealed to me that in that book of mine — you know the one, Rhisiart? — it says that the people before the mound-dwellers worshipped the Great Serpent, and built their cities to the Great Serpent, and were wiser even than the mound-dwellers! I can't speak of these things myself. I'm sure of one thing, though — that in Eliseg's time, or before Eliseg, there were great ways leading to this place from the four quarters of the horizon. The remains of the oaks are all covered up now, save only here; but wasn't it once between stones and not between trees that pilgrims approached Mathrafal? Approached kneeling, it may be, when the Great Serpent gave his peace to—"

His voice died away and a long, shivering convulsion seized him. Rhisiart urged Griffin forward. The girl uttered a cry like an injured squirrel. The heavy lance fell from the man's grasp and lay on the ground, with the rim of a red toad-stool, like a broken fairy shield, lying beside it.

But Owen's soul returned to him almost at once, and returned to strange effect. He let his reins go as his lance had gone, and he even shook his mantle away from him. But he lifted up both his hands above his head, and not looking towards his companions, not looking even towards the entrance to Mathrafal, but looking no doubt, as he felt in his coldly self-conscious brain he was actually doing, into another dimension of life, he gasped out the words: “The Past is the Eternal!” and then, as he lurched, toppled, crouched, huddled, and almost fell from the saddle, across the grey mane of his steed, he tried to mutter, and thought he had muttered; but he never knew whether they heard him:

“The Past...is...the...is the...for which we...and I give you a... a new... a new war-cry — Mathrafal!”

Efa was on her feet and at his side even before Rhisiart; but it was the lad’s arms that raised him and propped him up in his seat and obeyed his murmured instructions to give him the little silver phial from the pocket of his saddle.

Whatever the contents of that phial were, a few drops seemed enough to send back the blood to his brain and heart as the two young people watched him. “Shall I carry your spear, my Prince?” the boy asked him then; but the look of infatuated sympathy with which both the youthful creatures were regarding him was as restorative as what he’d drunk.

“No, no, cousin!” he said in his normal tone. “You’ve got the lady. I must have the spear.”

Moving on now at a slow walking-pace and keeping their horses neck to neck they were soon actually passing between the ruined pillars of the western gate of Mathrafal, that very heap of broken and scattered stones — some of them of megalithic size — which they had seen afar-off, awaiting them at the end of the mossy avenue. It was clear to Owen that Rhisiart and Efa would have much more enjoyed the spectacle if they hadn’t been nervous of his losing control of himself again.

"Aye, the darlings!" he thought. "How can I reassure them? How can I make them understand that I never lose control of myself; that everything I did just now, even to hugging my horse's neck, even to letting myself collapse, was deliberate? Efa ought to understand; for it's only what Nature teaches all women." He pondered for a while in silence leading them between such a chaotic mingling of old rocks and old masonry and old mounds and perhaps yet older subterranean passages, marked still, or the roofing of them marked, by undulant elevations in the grassy turf, that the imagination was at once excited and baffled.

"I must go on talking about it," he thought, "or they'll get into their heads that I can't speak of the place without getting hysterical." So he drew rein and turned; and at once little Efa hid herself so completely behind the boy's back that all he could see of her was one terrified wide-open eye and a single wisp of bright hair, objects that normally would have had an endearing effect, but that had an irritating effect just then as he contemplated them between the crusader's sword and the coat of chain-armour.

But the young descendant of two generations of sheriff's clerks in the aristocratic City of Hereford was once more a match for a delicate predicament.

"You're a perfect wonder, lad," thought the Prince, as he looked in vain for the faintest trace of apprehension or embarrassment in the narrow features of his new squire. "I only wanted," he began, in the most practical and matter-of-fact tone, "to show you two how that little stream follows every wall and buttress and angle of the ruins. There, if I'm not mistaken" — and he pointed down to the water from the edge of a steep bank, the surface of which was still faced with massive stonework— "was the north entrance. Think of it, my cousins! Five hundred years ago there must have been a postern here; and I suspect there's a secret passage here still, only King Eliseg, or King Brockwell, or King Cyngen must have blocked it for safety against the English.

"It's getting dark, Rhisiart, and we mustn't tire our little maid; but I must just tell you one thing more, and it's something I've never — careful, Seisyll! careful, old horse! — told any living soul. Sometimes, cousin, when I've stood here on this rock above this stream, I'm certain I've felt the rush of the souls of the dead, whirling past me like leaves on the air! I call them the dead; but what do we know? In the ancient times, long before Eliseg, long before the coming of our people, the souls of the living must have thronged these ancient ways. I mean that from their mounds and their camps and their caves living men and women, as they poured out their mead and broke their bread, must have felt over miles of forest and moor the call of Mathrafal, felt it until in their longing and craving their souls came crowding to these gates, jostling, as they rushed through a twilight like this; the souls of the free dead! I would like — if you're not too exhausted, Cousin Efa — just to show you—"

But his words were cut short by the sound of a horn and several sharp words of command reaching them over the darkened meadows. There wasn't enough light to see the nature or the number of these intruders; but though they were still too far-off for it to be possible to distinguish the words, both Owen and his companions recognized at once that they were uttered in an English voice.

"Come," whispered Owen. "It's not the moment to take risks. We'll be as safe in Broch-o'-Meifod's as in Valle Crucis. Most likely they're only Chirk foresters, and I'm behaving like a fool. But I'd be unworthy of today if I didn't show some caution. Turn your horse, lad, and follow me close. It's all right, Efa — only for Christ's sake hang on to him with both arms!"

Owen’s tall Seisyll — and it was the first time Rhisiart had heard that historic name — set off at so fast a gallop that Griffin, with his double burden, was hard put to it to keep up with him. As it was, the old pageant-horse stumbled once or twice in the darkness; and it was a lively comfort to his young rider when, passing through a clump of beeches, a warm red, glowing light could be discerned shining from the open door of a substantial wooden building.

Owen himself breathed no small sigh of relief when, extricating himself and his great lance from Seisyll’s complicated harness, he heard the clatter of the piebald and saw his distended nostrils and panting sides.

“This is my cousin, Master Broch, the Demoiselle Efa ferch Tudor of Môn. And this is my cousin too — Rhisiart ab Owen, from the University of Oxford. This is Master Broch-o’-Meifod, cousins; and here is Mistress Morg ferch Lug, his good lady, and these are Morgie, Orlie and Mair, the prettiest girls in the Paradise of Wales!”

By the time the horses had been fed, watered and stabled, and Efa had been brought back from the women’s quarters, refreshed and radiant, it was certainly around a noble supper-board and over against a noble fire that the party assembled. Loud, gay and unrestrained was the chatter that broke out as soon as the collation began.

Neither the gigantic Miller nor his sprightly lady showed the faintest sign of embarrassment in the presence of the newly-proclaimed Prince. The little Mistress even rallied him and made jokes at his expense, to which Morgie, Orlie and Mair listened with round-eyed bewilderment.

The three girls certainly were strikingly pretty, but not one of them as pretty as their mother; and it was clearly this astonishing little being who made the deepest impression on Efa. Not only did she look as young as any one of her three daughters; but it was the blending of such authority and decisive despotism, with such fairy-like grace, that Efa found so fascinating.

Mistress Broch looked quite as young as Morgie, her eldest daughter, not to speak of being more vivacious and sprightly than any of her daughters; but what so intrigued little Efa was the extraordinary combination; in this frail creature, of aggression with delicate beauty. It was as if the three girls who were the most soft-hearted maidens in Meifod had been doomed to pay for their pretty faces and good-natured hearts by heavy and unwieldy figures, whereas the mother was as light as a feather on her feet.

Little Efa, who from her life at Dinas Bran was more interested in other women than in anything except imaginary seductions, was fascinated by watching the queer relations between this elfin mother and these heavily-built nymphs. They didn't seem at all afraid of her, which was a surprise to Efa, who missed nothing of the deadly sarcasms shot here and there from between those beautifully curved lips. Perhaps they were too simple-minded to catch these jeering jibes, or perhaps having been, by reason of their enormous stature, spared the usual corrections of children, they had grown by custom and habit completely immune to this darting tongue.

As he sat enjoying the honey-hearted mead, and swallowing the well-cooked morsel of meat garnished with spicy herbs from the mill-garden, Owen fell by degrees, though he responded friendly enough to the elfin lady's airy teasing, into a train of thought that soon made his retorts a little perfunctory.

"It's no good going back on this business," he said to himself, "even in my thoughts. There was a time for that — but that time is over. To drive out the English — well! and what then? Iolo used to say that he found in the old books hints that the way of life of the first people was far wiser, far freer, than anything suggested in good King Hywel's Laws. It seemed, Iolo said, that there were no princes, no rulers then, but only the men of the land, living at peace together and worshipping peaceful gods without sacrifices and without blood. Prince? Prince of Powys? Prince of Gwynedd and Deheubarth? What is Prince? A word! And what does that word mean? Blood and ashes! What does it mean in this house and in all the other houses in Wales? It means the strong men, the brave men, it means the men I love best as Owen Glyn Dŵr, dragged after me to God knows what fate, for Owen the Prince! What do the spirits of Mathrafal care that Owen should be — But no more of that. There was a time for that. But now the hour, the flood of the tide, the stars in their courses — these are Owen, Prince of Wales! These are what I am; and like the tide, like the stars, I must take the men I must take, though the event is not theirs or—"

His thoughts became confused at that point, and in an obscure and even blasphemous desperation he began to think of himself as if he were a blind portion of the life-force itself, and as if his struggle with Grey and Fitz-Alan and Bolingbroke and the English found its justification as part of the resistless process of the cosmos.

But while the new Prince pondered in this way and while little Efa watched intently the girls and their mother, the youthful Rhisiart found himself unable to remove his eyes from the Master of Maen-y-Meifod. This was the first time he had met any human being with a personality of equal weight to that of his hero, and to see and hear these two great men at close quarters and on such natural terms was an absorbing experience. The Master of Maen-y-Meifod was a person of Herculean proportions — indeed physically speaking he was the most powerful human being Rhisiart had ever seen — but his rugged countenance was rendered more striking, if not more grotesque, by the fact that his great head was completely devoid of hair.

If he was the biggest and strongest man Rhisiart had ever seen, he was also the most comical-looking. He was in fact like a combination of the Show-Giant and the Show-Dwarf in Hereford Great Fair.

Rhisiart hadn't failed to notice how his Prince had said that no one on either side of the border would dare to meddle with Broch-o'-Meifod or with anyone under his protection; and as he listened to the Miller now at the head of his board, by that spacious and blazing hearth, he was able to realise the full truth of these words.

It wasn't only the man's enormous size. There was something even more awe-inspiring about his colossal bald head and about the cavernous pits out of which his eyes peered forth — and so deeply set in his skull were these same eyes that it was hard, if not impossible, to distinguish their colour.

It was only by asking him a series of point-blank questions that Owen succeeded in drawing him out at all; and he was baffled by the despotic little fairy at the head of the table long before he was able to make him talk in the way he hoped for; that is to say, in a manner that would really satisfy his young squire's curiosity.

"Between me and God," said the Prince to himself, "if I can't do better than this as a diplomatist I'll never be a match for Bolingbroke."

But it was in vain that he tried to imagine even the King of England outfacing Morg ferch Lug at her own table. The little lady had indeed got the look now that Owen especially dreaded. It was a look so bright, so sparkling, so scintillating with domination, that it always gave him the feeling that he himself was some inanimate object in the process of being cut by a diamond!

"She doesn't like me," he thought, "and she's prejudiced against Rhisiart. But Efa dotes on her already." Up went his hand to his beard as he heard her begin rattling off one of her liveliest most vividly-told tales about the Miller, the only point of which seemed to be the big man's lack of the most human intelligence.

There were sitting "below the salt" at that commodious board three stalwart labourers and as many robust house-girls, and it was to these, quite as pointedly as to her guests, that this imperious little woman directed her sallies. Roars of laughter from the three men and more restrained gigglings from the three wenches made up the politic response from that end of the table, but the heavier-witted daughters turned their beautiful heads in puzzled protest towards their gigantic begetter.

"You know how he always wears his axes, my Lord, stuck in his old leather belt? He's only got three of 'em on now; but I've seen him come down to his morning ale with half-a-dozen of 'em round his waist. Well what must he do when Fitz-Alan's archers came here a hundred strong to take that old robber Griffith, who was hidden all the time in Broch's corn-bin, our Orlie sitting on the lid, but forget to put his belt on! And there was his belt, with all his axes in it, hanging on a peg by the hearth, and he with nothing but his naked hands. And do 'ee think, my Lord, he made any bones about what he said to 'em — and they, with their bows and spears and clubs, all crowding in at our door?

"If I hadn't told him what I thought of him before them all, so's to make a booby of him, and sent our lads for the mead-barrel, he'd have been a real 'badger in the bag,' as the saying is, and the lasses and me, what about us, with hot devils like them let loose?"

"Tut, tut, Pretty," responded the bald-headed giant. "'Twas to give harvest-home kisses and thy cider-press cuddlings that I took off the belt that warm day; and wondrous it were, Owen ap Griffith Fychan, to see how bashful the Pretty was because our girls were only a loft's steps away! How could I know, Owen ap Griffith, that the slipperiest thief on the border and the smartest troop in the province would choose the same afternoon to visit Maen-y-Meifod?"

In vain did Owen follow up this protest from his friend by putting some hurried question about the harvest to one of the labourers at the foot of the table, a man whom Rhisiart had already recognized as none other than that same surly Philip Sparrow who had played ferry-man for the Tassel's landlord on Midsummer Eve.

Master Sparrow was evidently quite prepared to respond to this question at some length; but Morg ferch Lug seemed to have the power of carving pasties, filling goblets, handing round sweet-meats, without any intermission in her brilliant talk.

"What a sly elf she is!" thought Owen. "Morgan le Fay couldn't be slyer. She's going to keep this up till Broch and I are too heavy with food and drink to think of anything but sleep. Can there be anything in the tales about this creature that her father had traffic with a water sprite? I mustn't forget to tell Rhisiart the whole story." And as he bowed his head before this silvery stream as it eddied round the table it struck him how extraordinary it was that this woman should have realized what he'd come for, before he'd realized it himself!

He'd told those two, and he'd believed it when he told them, that it was simply to ask Broch to take Efa back to Dinas Bran that he'd come to Meifod; but he now saw that he had really come with the hope of persuading the Miller to join him in his dangerous adventure.

It was a relief to Owen — and at first it looked as if he'd been totally unfair in all his suspicions — when Morgie and Orlie and Mair came gravely up to their father and held up their heads to be kissed prior to their retirement for the night. The Prince lifted each particular hand of these young giantesses to his lips, and it was touching to him to see how moved their lovely faces became under this perfunctory courtesy.

They carried off Efa with them; and Owen was interested to see how eagerly she went. “She’s really a girl’s girl, that little thing!” he thought. “And that’s why she worked up all this Derfel business. No normal child would get pleasure from imagining herself ravished by a goblin. She’s about as queer for a girl as Rhisiart is for a boy.”

While the handmaidens were clearing the table Master Broch requested his friend’s permission for Philip Sparrow to join them round the fire.

“And tell Llewelyn and Rhys, Philip, that they can broach a fresh cask in the kitchen in honour of Owen, Prince of Cymru.”

Glendower liked the way his friend brought this in. The words came so easily that they gave him, more than all the ceremonies of the morning, that sweet shock of romantic realization that his own thoughts seemed set upon spoiling.

He was pleased, too, by the spontaneous grace of those unlettered men; for each of them before retiring to the kitchen dropped on one knee and uttered in Welsh in a goodly and clear voice, “May our Lord the Prince overcome his enemies!”

Morg ferch Lug had led the way when her daughters took Efa from the room; but Owen kept expecting her re-appearance every moment. She had bidden him a formal good-night; and it would be an unusual proceeding, and one quite contrary to Welsh custom in these things, for her to come back later.

But, for all that, it was so much too good to be true that he and his friend were destined to have this deep fire and this deeper barrel of mead entirely to themselves that Owen could not believe it.

“No, no!” he thought, “she’ll come back.” And indeed as he went on asking Master Sparrow various social questions and getting from that sturdy enemy of the gentry some extremely uncompromising replies he had a disagreeable sensation of the surprisingly near presence of the darting and glancing daughter of Lug.

Perhaps it was this discomfort that made his defence of the regiment of princes a little feeble and querulous as he brought down on his head the clear-cut revolutionary notions of Master Sparrow. The hired harvester from the Tassel had for so long been accustomed to alternate between sardonic silence — when his mouth fell at the corners and a savage sneer distorted his features — and a dogmatic brow-beating of any interlocutor that to be listened to as Owen listened to him was disturbing and exciting.

The Prince himself felt it incumbent upon him in his new role to make various mental sorties into regions from whose austere landmarks he had hitherto shied away; but it was entirely, against his idea of himself as a magnanimous ruler to show stiffness and prejudice in the presence of startling modern ideas. His acquaintance with the great Oldcastle had done more than shake his orthodoxy; it had destroyed at the root that unquestioning acceptance of the existing class system which makes every innovator a criminal.

But he was, as we have seen, hardly what could be described as an altruist. And it is one thing to be free from prejudice, and quite another thing to have the spirit of a revolutionary!

Master Sparrow was an egoist too, deriving, it is to be feared, quite as much satisfaction in the logical defeat of an opponent as in any feeble effort such an one might be persuaded to make to grope his way towards the light.

Broch-o’-Meifod looked on with an expression of absent-minded wonder as the dispute proceeded; whereas Rhisiart didn’t know whether to admire the more the good-humour of his Prince under Master Sparrow's sarcastic dogmatism, or the actor's skill, for such he took it to be, and a thing quite in his own vein, with which Broch summoned into his face a look of childish simplicity.

"You Lords and Gentles," Master Sparrow was now saying, "will do everything else for the people except the one thing that alone would change all."

"What is that, Master?" enquired Glendower, while the baldheaded giant's innocent stare met the knitted eyebrows of the observant Oxonian.

"Get off their backs!"

The harvester flung this word forth with such vehemence that Owen's hand went up to his beard.

"But what method would you use," he said, trying to keep all irritation out of his voice, for he felt sure his sagacious squire was observing him carefully to see whether he would escape from this with his dignity intact, "use, I mean, as a substitute for the system that gives us our present rulers?"

"Gives us yourself, that is, my Lord," commented the free-spoken fellow.

"Myself — perhaps," said Owen, "but many others, too."

"Grey of Ruthin?" interjected the harvester with a sneer.

Owen forced himself to smile. "We needn't quarrel over the nature of the status quo, my man," he said. "The custom is a common one, and I admit an imperfect one. But what do you propose to substitute for it?"

"Whose hands till the soil, my Lord? Whose hands sow the grain and gather the harvest? Who herd the sheep and shear them in their season? Who feed and water the cattle?"

"Damn that mischievous elf!" thought the harassed Prince irrelevantly. "She's here somewhere — I feel her — glancing and dancing!" And he inserted a finger between his bandage and his wound, as if the daughter of Lug were the cause of the tickling that now began to trouble him.

"Who weave the cloth for your garments, my Lord," went on the triumphant harvester. "Who build your castles, and are slaughtered by the hundreds in your private wars? Who are hanged by your Manor Courts if they kill one of your deer?"

But Owen was staring at the unshuttered window. He was sure he had seen a small white hand emerge from the darkness and point derisively at him with out-stretched fingers. "I must come to business," he thought, "before this gets worse."

"I admit the injustice of our system, Master," he said. "And I would willingly talk further with you on how to remedy it. But just now I have only this to say — you are a powerful man of your hands, Master Sparrow; and I am sure you deserve the silver you've earned by gathering in our friend's harvest. What I would like to know now is, whether you would consent to come with Master Broch as his body-servant if he consented," he gave his friend a steady, shameless, penetrating glance, "to leave his mill for a time and help me drive the English out of Wales?"

This point-blank question did alter for a moment the habitual scowl on Master Sparrow's visage; but it made a much more perceptible disturbance in the corrugated countenance of the bald giant, and not only in his countenance.

Broch-o'-Meifod gravely and heavily rose to his feet from the stool on which he was sitting and, unhooking his leather surcoat, began brushing with his hands, or rather beating with his hands, the rough woollen garment he was wearing beneath it. This garment, girded up at the waist under his belt, was what he'd had on all that day at the mill; and as he struck it now with his fists, clearly without the least consciousness of what he was doing, a cloud of flour-dust drifted away from it, and floated off with the log-smoke.

"I believe," thought Owen, "he did that in an automatic impulse of obedience to Morg!"

It must have been at the very instant when the man was thus, without knowing what he did, dusting his miller's garment, that he made the supreme decision of his life; for by the time he sat down again on his oak stool his face had resumed its normal composure.

On Master Sparrow's face, too, habit reigned again; but it did strike Owen as if that familiar sneer of contempt at the blindness of human valuations had been lightened a little by a natural lust for adventure.

Owen exchanged a quick glance with Rhisiart, and it struck the Prince as strange that the hardly perceptible nod the young diplomatist gave him — as much as to say, "You've got them both, my Lord!" — should have so greatly re-assured him. He himself gave a deep sigh of relief. He found he'd been counting much more than he'd known upon the aid of his indomitable friend, and he felt profoundly comforted when he stole a glance at his face.

But now, lest the man should think he was pressing him too hard, he deliberately let his eyes wander over that spacious chamber. How clean it was! The Maen-y-Meifod house-girls must use better mops than his maids used at Glyndyfrdwy.

And could all those boards and panellings and rafters, black as night, and yet glowing, gleaming in the firelight, be just ordinary oak? And what a clever device that was — Broch must have thought of that himself to let the smoke out through a wide hole above the door, instead of by these tricky smoke-vents behind the —

But all of a sudden, tug at his beard as he might, sharpen the points of it as he might, till they resembled the beard of a prince of Nineveh, he found that an ice-cold shiver was running up and down his spine, and that his legs were growing cold. Mother of God! he couldn't even feel his feet any more. They were numb; they were as dead as if they had been amputated!

Turning his head to the window he now felt sure that he saw a slender wrist and a white finger pointing directly at him. It had vanished in a second; but this new vision of it, more definite than the first, was a deadly shock to his nerves. He tried to recall an incantation that Iolo had given him as a sure protection against Ellyllesau or female demons, but not a word of it could he remember!

He began to feel as if his blood were turning to ice. Instinctively he had recourse to his old mental trick; and never had he used it with such a desperate effort! Instead of trying to move hand or foot he threw every ounce of will he possessed into an imaginative exteriorizing of his soul. He forced himself to visualize himself, sitting there, exactly as he was, facing the Miller and the harvester, but he struggled and strained with every fibre of his being to imagine — just to imagine — that It, the inmost Self of Owen, was watching the whole scene like one of the Birds of Rhiannon from the top of a conventionalized picture of Tysilio, the patron saint of Meifod.

In imagining the exteriorization of his soul he was forced to concentrate on Tysilio's face — and what an ugly face it was! — and Tysilio saved him. His blood began to circulate again and he forced himself to meet his squire's anxious and puzzled gaze.

"I think, cousin," he said quietly, relaxing the tenseness of his will as he might have unstrung a bow, "we might leave Broch and Master Sparrow for a minute to talk over my suggestion. I'd like to show you those old shields over there, of my friend's ancestors. They were barons in Meifod before John burnt Mathrafal; but all their lands, except the mill-farm, were forfeited to the English."

He rose as he spoke, breathing a sigh of unspeakable relief to find that his limbs obeyed his intention; and resting his hand on Rhisiart's shoulder moved across the hall. They were approaching the entrance, on both sides of which hung the ancient shields, when the dark, polished doors flew open, and Mair ferch Broch, the youngest of the three girls, stumbled awkwardly into their presence. The girl was in her night-gown; and her agitation was so great that she hadn't even waited to throw a cloak over her shoulders.

"Father! Father!" she was crying; and then, finding herself confronted at such close quarters by Glyn Dŵr and Rhisiart, she staggered backwards and nearly fell.

But Broch was at her side in a moment. "Mair, child? Mair, Mair, what is it?" And lifting her up in his arms as if she were a creaking stiff-jointed doll he carried her to the fire.

Owen made a sign to Master Sparrow to leave them together, a sign which the sarcastic champion of the people obeyed with tactful discretion.

"It's about her," the fellow whispered as soon as he reached them. "I heard what the damsel told the master. It's about her going out to the millpond to set the mill-wheel working."

"Mill-pond, mill-wheel? I can't understand you," protested the Prince. "She meant, Owen ap Griffith," replied the other, "that Morg ferch Lug has gone to turn the wheel."

"I still don't understand," said Glendower gravely.

"Twice already," explained the other, "since Broch brought her to Maen-y-Meifod has the Mistress run wild like this. When she runs wild, the wheel goes round of itself! The first time she did it 'twas to bedevil her own mother anent the poor lady making a stir over her marrying a man old enough to be her grand-dad. That were sixteen years agone, afore the Mistress had cuddled her first-born."

"Well, Sparrow — for Heaven's sake tell us, good Master Sparrow—"

But the fellow sneered like a devil. "Punctual Sparrow!" he sneered. "Serviceable and useful Sparrow! Convenient and appropriate Sparrow!" and he mimicked the Prince's accent with a savage unction.

Owen bit his lip. He had never been treated like this before. But something was "upon" him to make him act according to the most fantastical code of magnanimity. "Richard's father, the Black Prince," he thought, "let himself be insulted by the rudest of his French prisoners; and between me and God, old conjurer, you've got to make this fellow a test of your self-control."

"Pardon my impatience, Master," he enquired, "but what was the second time she turned the wheel?"

"You'd be wiser, Owen ap Griffith, and 'twould be more to the point, to ask me what the result'll be of her turning it the third time! But — let that go — her mother died the day after she'd turned it on her, and the second time she turned it was when King Richard laughed at her complaint about the Chirk foresters killing her pet deer. So she turned it on him; and a year later, just about the time when she'd run wild, he was a dead man."

"What do you mean by running wild, Master Sparrow?"

"Just what I say. Broch and the young ladies dursn't move from their beds nor from wherever else they may be when she be out at mill-wheel. If'ee was to peep into kitchen now, ye'd see Jock Efan and Dick Lloyd hugging themselves over fire, just as the Master and Mistress Mair be doing yonder, and if ye went upstairs — though God forbid your noble lordship should see such sights! — ye'd find Mistress Morgie and Mistress Orlie twisted together like silver eels; that is, if ye saw them at all; for ’tis like enough they’d have the blankets over their heads!”

Owen fixed upon him an unhearing, unseeing look that brought down the corners of Master Sparrow’s mouth into his taciturnity. Then the Prince glanced at his friend by the fire, who was still rocking his daughter on his knee; and finally he met the untroubled gaze of Rhisiart, who boldly inquired if he should take his sword from the porch and go down to the mill-pool.

But it was to Master Sparrow the Prince turned. “She’s the mistress of the house,” he said, “and we mustn’t meddle with her; but if you could stop her from rushing in on those two without warning it would be a good thing, and if you could persuade him,” he lowered his voice, “to carry the child back to bed before her mother sees her it would be wise. I leave it to you. Only I do hope, Sparrow,” and he deliberately gave the man a particular smile of intimate confidence such as he had found seldom failed of its purpose, “that you will decide to accompany us tomorrow. You’re not likely, Sparrow” — here he spoke very earnestly— “to find such a chance of seeing some of your ideas put into practice, as you are with me.”

Then he turned to his impatient squire. “And now, cousin,” he said. “We’ll have a look at the mill-pool together!” The bald-headed giant at the fire turned towards them at that moment; for Owen had deliberately uttered his last words in a penetrating tone. But all the man did was to lay his finger on his lip.

“He’s getting her to sleep, Sparrow,” Owen whispered. “Make him take her to bed fore she comes in. And if you do go with us tomorrow, remember your only job will be to look after him — to see he doesn’t leave his belt behind him when he goes into battle. And remember too that I know what belongs to my men — before I take them to be slaughtered!”

"I believe," he said to himself, as he and Rhisiart left the hall, "that the man will come. And it's just what we need among us, a few all-or-nothing champions of the people. If my dragon-standard — whether it be yellow or red — isn't a rallying of the people, what is Owen?"

"May I take my sword, my Prince?" enquired Rhisiart, watching eagerly to see whether his chief would touch his great lance with its leonine streamer.

"Surely, lad, surely. No, no — not your chain-armour! And you can lend me your dagger if any pinch comes; but how chilly it is with all this water about!" Saying this he wrapped himself round in his green mantle.

"It's other weapons than spears I'll need to-night," he thought. Rhisiart too remained bare-beaded; but the rush of autumn air that blew in through the great doors when he unbarred them induced him to snatch up a coat of sheep's wool that hung against the wall. Thus attired, with the crusader's sword bare of its sheath, the Prince and his companion set forth to meet whatever awaited them.

They found a different sky, a different atmosphere, a different feeling in the air, from what they had been experiencing all that warm September day. It was partly the mill-pond and the mill-stream that accounted for the death-like chill they felt; it was partly the warmth of the great fire they'd left; but to the Prince's mind at any rate there was something else abroad, something that made him shiver as they moved, even under his heavy mantle.

Did Cousin Rhisiart feel what he felt? He'd have given a good deal to know. But a certain shame, and a desire not to put ideas into the boy's head, made him keep his feelings to himself.

What he liked least of all about the look of things in those obscure purlieus of Meifod mill was the appearance of the waning moon. Rack after rack of yellow-tinted unwholesome clouds kept voyaging across it, not so much borrowing its radiance, for it had little radiance, as borrowing its illness, its sick desolation, its malady, its maniacal unease.

What a shapeless thing of leprous whiteness it was, this journeying deformity, on the distorted surface of which could still just be detected the floating ends of the tumbled hair of the moon-maiden!

And there it was again, as they approached the mill-pool, swaying and tossing, rising and sinking, in those reedy depths! Their own figures, as they moved, threw dim, misshapen inhuman projections upon those livid ripples, more like the motions of monstrous fish beneath the surface than of shadows passing across it.

Save the tall reeds nothing but a few ancient willow-stumps, most of them dead, were to be seen by the water’s edge, and those that were not dead were even less auspicious, so ghastly were the twigs, in that sick light, that protruded from them!

At last, as they went tramping side by side through the moist grass, across which every now and then came fungus-odours from half-submerged and time-blackened roots, they could see before them, where the out-flow of the water narrowed and deepened, the vast form of the mill-wheel. They had to cross a couple of half-open weirs before they reached the wheel, weirs that opposed or released the rush of subsidiary channels into the mill-pool, and it was as they were crossing the second of these, listening, as they clutched the wooden rail, to the hollow gurgling beneath the dam, that they realized that the towering form of the great wheel before them had slowly begun to turn.

It turned silently at first; but as soon as they were both on firm ground again, and quite close to it, there arose from beneath its vast rondure a strange, multitudinous sound, a sound not loud enough to be called a roar, but too loud to be described as a murmur.

Beside the wheel, and above the wheel, extended the dim shape of the mill itself, along the outer wall of which, high up from the ground, higher even than the topmost curve of the wheel, ran a narrow, balustraded platform, and standing upon this platform, with all the wild-tossed intermittent light of that ghastly shapelessness in the sky falling full upon her elfish figure, hovered the form of Morg ferch Lug.

She was evidently expecting them; and the moment she realized they'd seen her she waved to them to stay where they were and disappeared into the mill.

"She's going to stop the wheel," whispered Owen to his companion, "and then she'll come back and curse us!"

Rhisiart nodded but seemed not the least disturbed by this prospect. Catching the lad, a moment later, observing with calm and untroubled interest the way the water dripped and lingered and fell with diminishing force from the wheel's subsidiary revolution, Owen thought to himself, "God! he's got the nerve of a Norman!"

But there she was again, poised above their heads, above the now motionless wheel, and drawing to herself the full ghastliness of that phantom sickness in the sky.

Owen's mind was working fast now, and noting all manner of irrelevant details. What in Christ's name had the woman got round her? A robe of white foxes' skins? No, her form shimmered in that fevered light too much for that.

But the moon and she were cousins-german; and it was as if she couldn't toss forth the hectic sparkles of her marsh-fire hate quickly enough, before the next onrush of rolling clouds covered her confederate!

Her voice, when it did come, was hardly human. It wasn't easy to catch all her words, so wrought up was she. And yet it wasn't a wail, or a scream, or even a series of marsh-bird's cries. It was like the voice of a creature that has leapt out of one element into another and was using ordinary human words with a difference. They were Welsh words; but they were old Welsh words, many of them words that Owen had only met in that ancient folio of his.

"Take him away!" shrilled this voice, wherein seemed to shiver all the gurglings of the weirs and all the drifting sobs of the moon-wane, "take him away and murder him, my man, my marrow, my life! You shall have him, Owen the Accurst, Owen, the Bane of Cymru! But take this with you. As long as you destroy you will succeed. But try to build up again what you've torn, what you've burnt, what you've ravaged — and then will be the end! New-comer you are to this land, Brython the Accurst, with your spear of iron and your sword of brass; and I tell you to-night that the wheel has turned against you. You conquered us by your force and your cunning and your talk of the good and the evil; and so shall the English conquer you!

"Evil is the King in London, evil and cunning; and he talks of the good while he burns and tortures. And as you fight against him, Owen ap Griffith, you will grow like him! As long as you destroy you'll succeed; but try building up again, Owen ap Griffith, try building up these homes and these lives you've laid waste, and you'll see what you've done! For this land, Owen the Accurst, Owen the pure-blooded Brython, belongs not to you, to your evil strength and your weapons of steel, belongs not to your talk of the good and the evil. It belongs to us, to us who have been here from the beginning, to us the old people!

"Out of the old rivers, out of the old hills, out of the moons who know us and the deep night which is our beginning and our end, I lay upon you, Owen the Destroyer, the curse of the turning of the wheel! Take him away, my life, my marrow. Take him away, the prop of my children. I lay upon you the oldest curse in the world, the curse that is stronger than iron or brass; the curse of the water and the wind!”

Her out-stretched hands which had been pointing at the motionless figures beneath her now sank down; while she herself, like one of the last drops of water, sliding from the wheel she’d turned, vanished as suddenly as she had appeared!

Owen shivered, pulled his green mantle round him and became as motionless as any of the dying willow-trunks that leant over the pool’s brink. What his wandering soul was doing during these moments was curious enough when the nature of the place and of the occasion be considered. It had gone labouring back through the heavy years like an underground mole till it came to a critical day in his boyhood when his younger brother Tudor had jumped over a sandy stream by the edge of the sea, and not all the encouragement of their father nor all the repeated rushes Owen himself made to the brink of this obstacle were strong enough to conquer his fear of jumping. He could see now, as he tugged at his beard, just what he saw then, an old massive spar of ship’s timber, with barnacles and sea-weed clinging to it, that was stopped from getting back to the sea by a bank of sand, and yet was forced to ride on the tide and ride on the stream and forced to push before it and drag after it masses of sea-wrack and river-drift.

For no reason, to no purpose, for no intelligible motive, this piece of timber endured the rush upon it from one side of the salt streams and from the other side of the fresh streams; and it was with this object that Owen had identified himself.

In his boyish shame at not daring to jump, and at hearing his father say, “If you can’t jump, Owen my boy, you’d better give it up,” he had, rather in the way he did still, tried to fling his soul into that ancient fragment. “It just follows the tide,” he had said to himself. “For it has to float. It can’t jump.”

“I think,” he now remarked quietly to his companion, “we’d better start at dawn tomorrow; and you and I had better wait as near to Dinas Bran as we dare, till Broch gets that child safe back. I promised her she should go. We’ll let him have Seisyll. He won’t take long. And then we’ll have to decide whether to go straight to Ruthin and meet our people, or go home first. But if we go straight to Ruthin we must warn Rhys not to wait for us. Aye! aye! aye.” He sighed, but not too heavily, a little weary physical sigh, like that of a man who picks up a burden; a burden he knows he can carry, but a burden that’ll give him small ease or comfort.

But he felt that the boy was staring at him, puzzled and anxious in that dim light, and he turned his face away. It was then that he noticed a piece of rotten wood, with what looked like a living plant growing on it, gliding towards the pool of darkness under the wheel.

“Lend me your sword, cousin!” he said; and bending over the pool, without much difficulty he steered the floating derelict to their feet.

He gave no reason to the boy for this proceeding, as he thrust the bit of wood with its wisp of plant-life among the roots of a willow-stump. “You can never tell with these Normans,” he said to himself, as he returned Rhisiart his sword; but he couldn’t help a quickening of his pulse as they crossed the weirs.

“That anyway,” he thought, “won’t go under the wheel of Morg ferch Lug!”

XIII. THE COMET

SOMETHING LIKE A year and a half had passed over Wales, and the excitement among its people created by the hoisting of their old dragon standard had increased to an extent that was stirring up the wildest rumours on both sides of the border.

Following no advice but that of his friend Broch-o'-Meifod and his chief captain Rhys Gethin, Owen had decided to do what so many of the wisest patriots of his race had done before him, namely to leave his patrimony — in his case both Glyndyfrdwy and Sycharth — and retreat to an inaccessible and unapproachable citadel among the rocks and mountain-lakes at the foot of Snowdon.

He had therefore taken possession of a half-ruined fortress of unknown antiquity; and with the aid of stone-cutters and craftsmen from Gethin's domain in Conway had converted it during the summer and autumn of 1401 into a quite spacious stronghold with halls and chambers capable of sheltering not only a large household but a considerable bodyguard of devoted and well-armed adherents.

These latter kept increasing all through the winter of 1401; neither the snow-choked passes of that wild district nor the dangers and difficulties of leaving the England of Henry of Lancaster being able to deter thousands of patriotic Welshmen from deserting their studies in the universities and their avocations in the great merchant-cities and plunging into this desperate struggle to drive the stranger from their land.

Owen had gathered all his own family and all his closest personal friends round him in his mountain retreat. Important changes had taken place both at Valle Crucis and Dinas Bran which further enlarged the circle of what had now become quite a princely court in that inaccessible region.

The one event which those starry revolutions upon which she was always brooding had not predicted had befallen Ffraid ferch Gloyw, for she had died in her sleep; with the result that Lowri had fled with Simon to Owen, bringing not only Luned and Sibli and the two pageboys, but her daughter Tegolin, still accompanied by Alice of Ruthin and Friar Huw. As for little Efa, she had long since returned to her home in Anglesea.

Fate had chosen to delay the death of the Abbot of Valle Crucis until, when this event did occur, there was no question as to his successor; and the pro-English Prior, now the new Abbot, made it so uncomfortable for Father Pascentius, who had long intrigued against him, that the sly theologian, one dark providential night, brought not only his own casuistical intelligence to the Prince's mountain-court, but, packed securely on a sure-stepping Welsh pony, his famous unfinished Commentary upon the Summa Theologica.

It had been left, amid all these alarums and excursions, to the common-sense of the Arglwyddes — for the excellent lady steadily refused to use any other title — to suggest to the Prince to get Father Rheinalt out of the way before the arrival of the dangerous Lowri and her chastened Hog of Chirk. The patriotic monk had been therefore despatched with a letter to the warlike Abbot of Caerleon begging him not to send to the Snowdonian fastness any more long-bows from the Usk; but in place of this to get together as much gold from his monastery's treasury as he could lay his hands on!

The outlawed Prince wrote to him that it was gold to pay the troopers he had that he wanted, not more hungry mouths to feed; and it was the reply to this communication that he was now impatiently awaiting, while his Lady hoped and prayed that it would be by another hand than that of their passionate messenger that the response would come.

It was a clear evening in early February of the year 1402 when Owen, having returned from a fortnight's raid into Lord Grey's now far-off Vale of Clwyd, found himself, the great meal of the day well over, alone with his Secretary Rhisiart in his own private chamber.

Rhisiart was engaged just then in making fresh drafts of two important. communications that the Prince had despatched during the winter, one a letter in Latin to the native chieftains of Ireland, and the other a letter in French to King Robert the Third of Scotland.

News had reached the little court during its Christmas celebrations that the messengers entrusted with these epistles had fallen into the hands of the Usurper; and it was with a view to making another attempt to get them to Ireland and Scotland that the young Oxonian was copying his original rough drafts.

The room was a low square chamber with a spacious enclosure in its centre to serve as a fire-place and a wide vent above the iron-barred door to create a sufficient draught of air to carry away the heaviest portion of the smoke. Three deep lancet windows pierced the thick outer walls, and at one of these Owen now stood, contemplating the twilit expanse before him with more satisfaction than he had felt for some months; for it had needed as many as two score of sturdy ponies to convey to their overcrowded stronghold all the plunder his raid had carried off.

There had been a persistent thaw during the last couple of weeks and though the snow still lay on the ledges and ridges along the higher slopes, in many quite considerable open spaces and level terraces lovely stretches of fresh emerald-coloured grass were now apparent.

But just because the fatal law of contrariety can play more devilish tricks with an introspective soul than with one of a simpler kind, no sooner did he feel this surge of spring-sap mounting up in his veins than almost automatically, by reason of his unremitting self-consciousness, a certain recent occurrence, consorting ill with any kind of self-complacent well-being, presented itself in all its revolting and shameful details, and called upon him to watch the unrolling before him of a Hell-scorched scroll of memory.

The diplomatic Dean of St. Asaph, prompted he now suspected by that fanatic for peaceful settlements, the old Seneschal of Dinas Bran, had induced him to cross the frozen hills on the Feast of Stephen to try and patch up some sort of family truce with his cousin of Nannau.

The Arglwyddes had been fiercely opposed to the whole proceeding. “I shall never trust that man,” she kept repeating; and when he had argued that with such high dignitaries from the cathedral present at their encounter Hywel Sele’s hands would be tied, she had only shaken her head and given expression to one of those teasing feminine retorts that offer nothing to lay hold of, but carry about them all the same an atmosphere of imponderable truth which can penetrate the joints of the most rationalistic armour.

It was the Arglwyddes who had insisted on his taking Rhisiart with him, and it was to this precaution combined with old Iolo’s chain-armour that he owed his life. His treacherous cousin had indeed so skilfully arranged matters that in a little excursion round the Nannau deer-run the peace-making ecclesiastics were left in the lurch, and Owen and his squire found themselves alone with their host and a couple of his gamekeepers.

As he now listened to the scratching of Rhisiart’s pen behind him, and the tinkle of goat-bells and the murmur of spring-floods in the valley before him, the whole foul business came back. Whether there had appeared some wild creature of the forest that gave the assassin his excuse he never knew. Rhisiart averred he saw nothing of the kind. But it wasn't till he caught the swing-round of that calmly-aiming figure, and felt the shock against his heart of the man's arrow, that he realized what had happened. He himself had been totally unarmed, but he could now see the red fires that danced before his eyes as he leapt on his assailant and grappled with him before he could draw his sword.

But oh, how clearly he could recall the way his first burst of fury, giving him super-human strength, changed, as he felt the man's bulk yield under his attack, to an ice-cold cruelty of vengeance.

What had he said to him as he bent his body backwards across a fallen tree and watched his contorted face grow whiter and whiter, while he heard the keepers break away, first one and then the other, from before Rhisiart's flashing dagger? What had he said to him? 'Twas queer he'd forgotten just that; but he knew well what he felt as he drew back from the dying man and straightened himself and wiped his forehead and panted like a beast.

He had felt a cold anger against God, against Fate, against Death, for taking his enemy out of his hands before — Before what? Before he had made him lick the dregs, before he had made him eat the mandrake, before he'd made him say: "My master, my master!"

He left him lying there with his back broken, and stood for a moment watching Rhisiart chase the keepers down the hill. How the lad ran! And how those terrified men, who evidently thought the magician's familiar spirit was after them, ran faster than their pursuer!

And then he caught sight — and it was only a few furlongs away — of a vast upstanding oak-trunk, hollow as a gigantic reed, though its diameter must have been at least a yard wide, and raising its great jagged mouth like a dragon's maw towards the sky.

He walked up to it. Yes, its mouth was about a man’s height from the ground; and it was hollow, clear down to the root, for there were several large holes in its lower surface through which the light showed. It was then, as he realized what he was going to do, that he began trembling with an unholy excitement. His desire that the man should know before death snatched him away that he was mastered, his desire that there should be the exchange of realization, “You have lost” and “I have won,” was now replaced by a totally different feeling, a darker, more inhuman, and much more agitating feeling.

But curiously enough the agitation of this new feeling came near to destroying his hatred of his dying enemy! He was going to do something now that he might have done to someone he didn’t hate at all, someone who only happened —

He looked into the valley. Rhisiart and the keepers were out of sight. He looked towards Nannau. Not a living soul visible! He returned to the man whose back he had broken. The man’s eyes were open and they were watching his enemy intently; but he was unable to speak, and there was a queer pulse beating beneath one of his staring eyes, a pulse that caused the skin to move up and down, as though there were a miniature mole at work below it.

The dying man’s sword was still half-way out of its sheath, and when he lifted him up it fell completely out, clattering down. That was the most curious and shocking thing of all, the look the man gave him, as with infernal care he replaced the weapon in its sheath. But he lifted him’ up again and carried him to the tree. It was only then that he realized that to hoist this living corpse in his raised arms and plunge it into that gaping mouth was beyond even the unholy strength which the devil at that moment was pouring through his muscles.

Ah! there was Rhisiart! “Here, lad,” he gasped. “We must bury him in this tree!”

Not a sound, not even another look; and the body was so limp in their hands that he said to himself, when it was done, that it was a corpse, as Rhisiart supposed. But the two of them at last, panting and sweating, were free to leave him behind, alive or dead, in his upright grave. “The shock must have killed him, broken as he was,” he kept repeating to himself, as they hurried back for their horses.

It wasn’t easy to get Seisyll and Griffin out of the stable without word reaching the hall, but they managed it somehow; and Owen could now see, as he watched the soft spring-darkness descend on Snowdon, the geir-falcon profile of his adherent as they spurred their steeds over the frozen passes and up the slippery ascents.

“The... shock... must... have... killed... him” was the tune to which those eight hooves thudded over the sunlit ridges and clanged against the blocks of ice in the glittering streams.

But he listened to Rhisiart’s legal advice all the way home — for the young Oxonian enlarged on several astute alternatives — as to what they should write to St. Asaph to explain Sele’s disappearance and their own precipitate departure.

But the worst of having a soul like his which could exteriorize itself, or at least could imagine it could, was that ever since that Feast of Stephen this wandering soul of his kept sending him messages from its perch on the hollow tree.

The one thing that he wanted to know — whether the man was killed by the shock of being flung into the tree — his wandering soul couldn’t reveal. In place of which it kept sending him back all sorts of ghastly details of what was happening to the corpse.

Not a single piece of news that was of practical importance did his soul report, save one only; namely, that though they themselves had escaped it by riding northward, a flurry of snow had come up that night from the sea, obliterating every trace of their encounter. Was the upturned face in the mouth of the tree covered by the snow that night? If he lived, his breath would have melted it, but if he was dead, what better catafalque?

One effect of this curious commerce between himself and what he thought of as his errant soul was that he began to feel that to have taken a revenge like that was a proof that what the English said of him was true and that he had sold himself to the Powers of Evil.

During the first month of the New Year, however, this feeling had in its turn been transformed into an arbitrary desire to prove to Christendom that a spirit accused of such a monstrous deed and accusing itself of such a monstrous deed could yet be the liberator of a nation. Enforced, save for his recent raid, into an idle winter, Owen had used his monstrous revenge as a spur to goad himself into more definite schemes for the benefit of his country than he had as yet formulated.

In this task he found a ready supporter in his new adherent, Master Brut; and night after night, in this room with the three lancet windows opening upon the peaks of Snowdon, rebel Prince and rebel Evangelist worked out elaborate systems for the Reformation of Welsh Religion and the Revival of Welsh Learning.

Rhisiart would get sleepy as soon as these discussions began; but there were some occasions during these long winter evenings when the Prince would take it into his head to summon Philip Sparrow to join their consultation; and these were occasions when Rhisiart’s sleepiness vanished and a pile of legal folios in the jargon of the Norman-French courts and of commentaries upon the Laws of Hywel the Good in ecclesiastical Latin forced Owen's books of magic to huddle together in dismay and aversion. Those indeed were gala-nights for the youthful admirer of Master Young; and it was all the Prince could do to prevent Broch's sarcastic attendant from leaving the chamber in a fury when his revolutionary dogmas were brought before the bar of so many Doctors of Jurisprudence.

The one point — and Owen made a mental note of this — where the Oxonian and Philip Sparrow seemed always to agree was in regard to the necessity, the moment the King of England's Writ no longer ran in the Principality, of summoning a Welsh Parliament. Master Sparrow, however, invariably became sardonic when the number of lawyers in Rhisiart's Public Assembly was found to outweigh every other type of representative.

Broch himself, with or without his belt of axes, seldom uttered a word till he and the Prince were alone; but as Owen insisted on his friend's sharing his chamber, the laconic giant had plenty of opportunities for expressing himself at length when he so desired.

As the winter went on Owen found the most difficult part of playing Prince was this business of keeping the peace between high-spirited advisers, each with his own conflicting notion as to what ought to be done. Where he found he had to call to his aid the roving black eye and casuistical discrimination of Father Pascentius was when — and it was the Lollard who always started this ticklish topic — the discussion between them ran upon the delicate matter of the founding and endowing of Welsh Universities.

The Lollard wanted Owen, in creating these important adjuncts to his Sovereign-State, to make them self-governing; but Rhisiart pointed out from the legal, and the learned Father from the theological, point of view, that such Free Debating Societies would soon become even more turbulent and unruly than the notorious University of Paris, whose teachers and students, as everyone knew, were always in revolt against King and Church.

"But it'll be you, dear my Lord," Master Brut would protest, "who'll be the King in this case; and enlightened and tolerant philosophers, like our good Father here, who'll be the Church! It is tyranny, it is oppression that leads to disturbance. The teachers and students of our Welsh Universities will be too free to feel the necessity for asserting themselves against authority. That was the whole trouble at Oxford over Master Wycliffe. If you, my learned Father, were the Archbishop of St. David's—"

But it generally happened at this point that Owen would hurriedly change the subject, for he hadn't forgotten his prophetic trance in the forest of Mathrafal and his imaginary interview with the anti-Pope; and it was clear to him that the best commentator in the world upon the Summa Theologica wasn't necessarily the person he would select as the head of his Welsh church.

But he turned from the window now at the sound of a reiterated knocking at the door that partook of the character of a signal. Rhisiart hurriedly left his work and went to investigate. They had found by experience in this over-crowded citadel that young Madoc ab Evan — more reconciled to Rhisiart's presence since the latter had exchanged sword for pen — was alone incapable of deciding who among the stream of people that kept seeking an audience with the Prince should be admitted and who should be refused; so it had been arranged between them that, at a particular knock from Madoc, Rhisiart should rush to the door.

On this occasion it was the shaven poll and gleaming half-shut eyes of Father Pascentius that were the problem.

"I must see the Prince, my son. I bring a word for his ear alone."

"One moment, Father, I'll tell him, Father. But you may have to give your message to me. The Prince is writing to King Robert and I expect he's too busy to see you to-night."

Father Pascentius bowed. “Go and ask him, my son, if you please.”

Rhisiart closed the door and found Owen standing in the middle of the room. The latter raised his eyebrows “It’s the Father, my Prince!”

“Not Rheinalt?”

“Oh no, my Prince; Father Pascentius.”

Owen sighed. He had begun to find the insatiable aplomb of the theologian’s gaze irritating and exhausting. “Between me and God,” he muttered now, “the man’s a vampire! But let him in. When I can’t stand it a moment longer I’ll throw a log on the fire and you must get him away. A blood-sucking vampire! One day, when he makes me angry, I’ll have those gloating little eyeballs burnt out!”

While the door was opened for the entrance of the monk, Rhisiart and Madoc exchanged glances. The former had felt malicious joy in hearing his ruler’s savage outburst. The substitution of this subtle casuist, who seemed to miss nothing that went on in that mountain court, for the simple-hearted father of Tegolin was as unpleasant to the younger element in the place as it was to their elders.

The Lollard alone, remembering with gratitude all the twists that this serpent of orthodoxy had made on his behalf round the English barons, felt no objection at having a subtle thinker as their palace confessor in place of one in whom patriotism had killed piety, and passion logic.

“Sit down, Father,” said the Prince, clasping his hands tightly behind his back, so as not to yield to his trick of stroking his beard.

But Father Pascentius refused to sit down; and though Rhisiart resumed his former position, and even ostensibly took up his pen, and though the Prince sank into the big chair by the fire, the man insisted in shuffling in his sandals up and down the bare flagstones and across the clumsily-woven rush-mat which little Catharine had made for her father. Thus and thus only, it seemed, could he reveal his news.

Owen unclasped his fingers from behind his back and proceeded to clasp them resolutely together below the crossing of his knees. He struggled against an uncivil inclination to shut his eyes so as not to meet the other's gloating pupils as they dilated.

How queer it was to be looked at, and looked through too, for the theologian was no fool, by eyeballs that were so totally devoid of human feeling!

"What a relief it must have been," he thought, "not only to your enemy the Abbot but to every monk in the place, when you put Saint Thomas on your pony and left for the mountains!"

"So you couldn't help catching the drift of their conversation as you walked up and down, Father?"

"As if in our cloisters, my son."

"And you heard something of importance to some of us?"

"To you, my son."

"And what was it you heard, Father?"

"It concerned Master Broch-o'-Meifod, my son," and the discreet theologian gave a quick glance in the direction of Rhisiart.

Owen made an attempt to convey by his expression that he had no secrets from his Secretary, but he was so shocked by this unexpected mention of his friend's name that little else but this shock had room to appear on his disturbed face.

"I gathered, my son," the Father continued, "that Master Broch and his servant went to catch a few trout in the lake, and found down there a messenger from Meifod who's been hanging about, they say for some while, in the hope of coming upon his master alone."

“Well, Father?” But it was easy enough to say, “Well, Father?” What wasn’t easy was to keep his mind from the absurd problem as to whether the shuffle of the man’s sandals would sound the same on Catharine’s mat as it did on the bare floor.

“And Master Broch and his servant, my son, were seen in the stables after that; and the stable-boys thought—”

“By my confession, Father!” cried the Prince leaping to his feet, “Tell me the worst, and have done with it! Has Master Broch gone back to Meifod?”

The theologian stood still, one sandal on Catharine’s mat, the other on the stone floor. He took in the yellow gleam from the fire, he took in the way the chilly breath of that spring thaw added something that was at once balmy and acrid to the log smoke, something that made the botanist in him think of the pink protrusions of that curious swamp plant called butter-burr which shoots up so satyrishly through the chaste mould!

He met without the least perturbation Owen’s angry stare. All he did was to allow his eyelids to narrow a little, so that what the indignant Prince was now questioning were a pair of shiny blacknesses peering out with indestructible vivacity from a thatched porch.

It was evident that to the brain behind those orbs, the Prince’s agitation was no displeasing portion of what they were enjoying; and they were enjoying so many things! Such things, for instance, as the shadow of the Secretary’s Norman nose thrown by the firelight on the back of a white vellum quarto; such things as the voice of a bullfrog from the edge of the lake outside; such things as the charmingly-painted initial letter at the beginning of the very paragraph over which Rhisiart was pondering.

The young man’s own ill-concealed concern over the Prince’s mounting indignation too fell into its place among all there was for those eyes to savour as the beautiful spring darkness, that tasted so different from anything else in the world, contended with the yellow firelight!

“Speak man, for Mary’s sake, unless you want me to whistle you back to your Prior!” Certain drops of sweat which were running down Owen’s cheek, and had reached his chin, and now seemed undecided whether to trickle to the left or the right, must have struck Father Pascentius as even more significant of the nature of the Absolute than the spring darkness that poured through the windows, for he contemplated them with quiet joy.

“The stable men told me,” he concluded calmly, “that only one horse had been taken, but that Master Broch and his servant had not yet—”

Another knock and Rhisiart was at the door again. This time there was no questioning or delay, and the gigantic figure of Broch-o’-Meifod himself entered the room.

“Pardon me, Owen ap Griffith,” he said, “but I’ve got Philip out there, on one of the black mares, waiting your leave of absence for a week. Morg ferch Lug has sent Llewelyn over to say that half-a-dozen Chirk foresters have encamped on the other side of the pond and have begun making themselves a nuisance, stealing sacks of corn and killing chickens. He says they haven’t meddled with the maids yet, and that our girls are all right. But the Pretty would never have sent Llewelyn all this distance if the look of things wasn’t—”

“Six of ’em did he say?” cried Owen. “Let him take a dozen of our best Sycharth troop! But I’m not going to spare Sparrow. He knows your ways, my friend, just as Cousin Rhisiart knows mine! ’Twould be no kindness to your wife to let Sparrow go. Is Meredith at hand, Rhisiart? Go and find him — there’s a dear lad! Tell him I want a dozen of our best men from home, and let Tom Evan lead them. Tell Meredith I can’t help it, but Tom and his dozen must stay at Maen-y-Meifod till further notice. Tell Meredith they must all have ponies and must take meat and drink to last ’em till May. And tell him Tom Evan’s responsible with his life for their good behaviour. No, better leave that out! Just tell Meredith about the demoiselles and the maids. He’ll know the men to pick.”

Rhisiart bowed without a word. But as he moved away he lightly twitched the monk’s habit, whispering to him as he did so that he had a confession of mortal sin for his private ear.

As soon as the two friends were alone Owen earnestly enquired of the laconic giant what instructions he’d better give Tom Evan as to the future. “Suppose the English decide to do to Maen-y-Meifod as they’ve done to Glyndyfrdwy and Sycharth? Tom’ll manage the foresters. But what if the Sheriff comes on the scene with his Shropshire levies? Could you bring yourself, Broch, to let the place go, and have your family up here?”

The bald Hercules blinked. Then he made several guttural sounds in his throat and gave his belt such a jerk that the blades of the axes tinkled.

“The Pretty — won’t — like — it,” he remarked slowly. “She’s put her heart into that wheel. But I think I’ll send her a word by your good Tom.”

So saying he moved over to Rhisiart’s desk and possessed himself both of the boy’s seat, which creaked under his weight, and of a loose fragment of parchment.

Thus prepared, he covered his great visage with his hands, leaning his elbows on the desk and pondering. The Prince walked to the door and opened it.

“Don’t let anybody in, lad,” he directed Madoc, the sentry, “until Meredith comes.” Then he discreetly returned to his seat by the fire and stared into its red depths.

The big man at the desk, meanwhile, was slowly and not without difficulty forming the following syllables:

Pretty of my heart, Owen ap Griffith is always ready and the Arglwyddes is always ready to welcome you and our girls to where they are now. He himself will soon be away, so you needn't think of the wheel. You can trust Tom Evan. He will bring you here as soon as it seems best. They may leave you in peace or they may not. If not, I bid you come before too late. Your old Badger — not yet "in the bag" — Broch-o'-Meifod.

The giant was so long composing this document — for the crucial word "bid," was only inserted after "beg," "entreat," "wish," "ask," "advise," "suggest," had each in turn been substituted for the one before it — that Owen had plenty of time to envisage in the red heart of his fire a surprise attack upon Maen-y-Meifod by an overwhelming English force.

He passed his hands up and down his shins, while through his black hose the heat penetrated his whole being. What a thing fire was! And how curious to think of that upright corpse — a corpse now anyway — with its face buried in snow and the foxes barking round it. If he did turn the English out, would he have the power to do for his people what Charles the Great did for his, or Alfred the Great for his? "I doubt it," he thought. "We pure-blooded Brythons, as that woman said, are good at a pinch, but we can't keep it up."

The warmth of the fire and the fragrance of that sweet alder-wood smoke seemed to make it possible for him to contemplate in calm detachment — he noticed this even as it was happening — the most outrageous and shocking things. "I shall turn them out," he thought. "Ffraid ferch Gloyw said that; and I've never doubted it. But when it comes to the Universities — and this Lollard says there must be two of 'em, a southern one and a northern — I don't know what to think! English Alfred had the genius of a commander and the learning of a monk; but who am I, who get so elated with triumph when I come back from a raid with fifty ponies' load of plunder! — Good Lord, Universities! There's a vein in you, Owen the Irresponsible, that's better adapted to burning markets and storming castles and making princes' courts on the slopes of Snowdon than to the founding of Universities! If only I had that man Young back again."

For a moment he gave himself up to the pure sensation of warmth. "How many rebel princes," he thought, "with their spearmen gathering, and their prophets prophesying, and their stars pointing the way, have let it all go in the warmth of a fire. It's a reversion with me, that's what it is, to the old cave-dwellers! A human skeleton, squatting on its buttocks, feeling nice and warm, how can Universities spring out of that? And one won't content you, you learned rascal, eh? You must have two of them!"

And the evangelical lineaments of Master Brut took shape in the heart of the fire. "What a man! He cares nothing about the Percies or the anti-Pope! All he cares for are class-rooms of heresy, with a dozen Master Wycliffes to every Seraphic Doctor. But that fellow Young's the man. I must get him back. And yet Wales could be — only my bards don't harp to that tune — the centre of a new epoch for the whole of Christendom!"

And there came to him as he sat there — while the giant behind him erased with Rhisiart's green ink the word "advise" and substituted the word "bid" in a blood-coloured red — an indescribable feeling of power. "I'm a medium of the gods for something," he thought. "I wish to the devil they'd make it clearer to me for what!"

It wasn't till towards eight of the clock that night that Owen, leaning upon the arm of his friend Broch and followed by Rhisiart and Madoc, entered, with a certain amount of feudal ceremony, the central hall of his motley court.

This was where the afternoon's banquet had been held, and well replenished it had been with fresh meats and viands pillaged from the rich

Vale of Clwyd; but the tables had all been removed now, and the various members of the rebel headquarters, men and women intermingled, were seated in relaxed positions, as taste and etiquette dictated, passing the long spring evening as agreeably as circumstances allowed.

The Arglwyddes, portly lady though she was, and Owen was always sighing over her carelessness about her appearance and her reluctance to submit to any tire-woman who was an artist, was now walking up and down before a great loom, busily engaged in weaving, while, like a flock of starlings around a stately ewe, her maids chattered in high-pitched excitement. Quite often they fell into uncontrollable laughing fits and even exchanged ribald jests, for the mother of all those tall sons was the most indulgent of matriarchs, and there were many young pages to amuse them. Rhisiart's old acquaintances at Glyndyfrdwy had been recently increased by the addition of his friends from Dinas Bran as well as by several newcomers, so that that court in Snowdon was a paradise of love and mischief.

On this occasion the Prince's numerous sons left what they were doing and gathered ceremoniously round their father as he took his seat, each one in turn making the customary genuflexion. Owen looked round the hall while he listened sympathetically to the young men's stories, which were mostly about hunting and fishing, and he noticed that not only was Meredith absent, which had clearly to do with the provisioning of Tom Evan's little troop, but his eldest son Griffith was nowhere to be seen.

"Where's your brother Griffith?" he enquired of one of the boys grouped round him.

The lad looked quickly at the others and hesitated. One of the pages broke in, "Griffith ab Owen has gone, my Prince, instead of Rhys Gethin to light the beacon on Carnedd Llewelyn."

The form of the Prince's visage changed and his eyes flashed. "But I told Rhys Gethin at dinner to get that done. Where has he gone then?"

"Rhys Gethin is over there, my Prince," said the page eagerly, while Owen's sons avoided their father's eyes. While the boy spoke he pointed to a secluded corner of the hall where the figure of a man and a woman could dimly be seen crouched over a fire of their own in deep and close conversation.

"Oh, I'm glad he's here," said Owen hurriedly. "I remember now it was Griffith I sent."

"He's been talking to Mistress Lowri ever since the sun went down," the page added, "and Master Simon's behind those soldiers. He always mends their armour when the torches burn well; and the torches are burning better than usual to-night."

"Mad Huw says, sir," broke in another page, "that the torches wouldn't be burning as they are if something weren't going to happen!"

One of Owen's sons, in order to dissipate their embarrassment over the matter of their elder brother, began to rebuke these officious pages, and even to push them away. "If the torches are burning extra bright to-night," he announced dogmatically as the pages sulkily went off, "it's only because Mother told the maids to put in some of the new oil."

The Prince rose to his feet at that, and crossing the room embraced his lady and complimented her on the brightness of the torches and on the progress of her weaving.

"No, that kiss wasn't meant for you, Mistress Sibli," he said lightly; but catching the look on the dwarf's face he hurriedly snatched at the little creature's hand. "What a dainty little hand!" he observed.

And while the small being flushed with pleasure and made a face at the giggling maids, "By my confession," he added, "the prettiest hand in the hall!”

Mad Huw now took the opportunity of coming up to him, dragging the Maid of Edeyrnion by the sleeve.

“She said I wasn’t to bother you, my Lord,” he cried earnestly, “but it’s right for you to know, since you’ve given Him shelter, that He Himself told me just now that there’s a sign on its way that when he sees it will drive the tyrant to despair. He said all the land would know of it, because — No! I must tell him, sister!”

“I know,” said Owen, smiling at Tegolin who was looking especially lovely that night, “who it is who’d make Harry of Lancaster envy us, poor barbarians! No, but seriously, Mistress,” he added, “I’m convinced the King of France himself hasn’t such an ornament to his court!”

The Grey Friar’s face lit up with pleasure. “He’s told her, too “he whispered, coming close to Owen. “That’s why she looks like an angel!”

The Prince surveyed him gravely, not humouring him but treating him like an obscure oracle. “What kind of sign is it that’s coming, little Brother?”

But while Mad Huw was explaining that it was probably a fiery sign Owen noticed that Broch-o’-Meifod, whose movements couldn’t very well be concealed from anyone, had seated himself among the troopers whose weapons the ex-Hog of Chirk was so industriously sharpening.

Simultaneously with this the Prince realized that Master Brut had been there all along, and was now turning from the amateur armourer to engage in a lively argument with the bald-headed giant.

A faint prick of jealousy assailed Owen when he took this in. But he upbraided himself for it. “I suppose you think, you dandified egoist, that because Broch’s your friend he’s not to be allowed to talk to anybody with a grain of intelligence! But oh, I’d like to know what those two are talking about!” He was still listening with half an ear to Mad Huw and still watching Tegolin as she now seated herself by Luned and took a corner of the latter’s embroidery on her lap, when, amid the general murmur of voices, he became aware of the rich girlish laughter of his favourite child.

“Between me and God!” he said to himself, “the little one’s talking to Rhisiart!” A vivid memory came over him, as he saw Catharine and Rhisiart standing together, of how when he’d first set eyes on the boy the lad had been standing side by side with the Maid of Edeyrnion. He glanced quickly at Tegolin. Yes, the red-haired girl was only half-interested in Luned’s work. Her grave, steady eyes, whenever they were lifted from her lap, turned invariably towards Rhisiart and Catharine. He did his best to assume the expression of one too deeply absorbed in the Friar’s words to see with intelligence what was going on before him.

But as he watched, with what he hoped resembled an unthinking stare, the look which Tegolin cast upon Rhisiart, “There’s something — though God only knows what it is—” he thought, “between these two. Tegolin may not be in love with him — but she certainly is involved with him. Who can tell what goes on in her mind as she fixes that look upon him? But whatever the feelings are that betray her, her soul is absolutely calm. Even if she’s caught that particular note in Catharine’s laugh she’s not going to let it torment her.”

What Catharine and Rhisiart were doing while they were thus watched by Owen and Tegolin was innocent enough, for they were listening to the Nurse. The old woman was seated near the fire, with her feet on a foot-stool, engaged in winding a skein of purple wool with the help of Alice of Ruthin. And as she wound she sang in her faint, high, cracked voice; and Owen well knew what she was singing — one of those plaintive, mournful dirges attributed to Heledd, daughter of Cynddylan. He could see just what had happened. The English maid holding that purple skein round her white wrists had asked some stupid question of the Nurse, and the aged woman, teased by the girl's ignorance, had made an old wife's sly retort, at which the young people's eyes had met, and Catharine had laughed aloud.

"Thank you, Brother," he said as courteously as he could, "I will remember your words and watch well to-night. God be with you, Brother." But though Mad Huw moved away then, quite content, the Prince remained standing where he was, lost in thought.

Knowing his tendency to these fits of abstraction, none cared to approach him, though the Arglwyddes glanced at him anxiously more than once as she moved up and down in front of her loom.

Meanwhile the old woman's quavering voice rose and fell; some of the household turning to look at her, some murmuring the well-known words, others indifferent and heedless, continuing their conversation.

Stafell Cynddylan ys tywyll heno,
Heb dan, heb gannwyll,
Namyn Duw, pwy a'm dyry pwyll!
The hall of Cynddylan is dark to-night,
Without fire, without candle,
And there is none but God to comfort me!

To Owen both words and tune were so familiar that they were like the sound of the Paternoster at Mass, no more than a gentle February wind, moving among branches and twigs that were already feeling the stir of the sap within them.

But though in his crafty self-consciousness he didn't scruple just then, as he stood at gaze in the centre of his ystafell, to feign the approach of one of his trances, his thoughts had never been more cynical or more shameless.

"They're both mine," he said to himself. "She's mine and he's mine. I mustn't, I won't spare them to each other. They're the best weapons I have. Shall I throw away my best weapons? That's what it would be if I let them melt together. It wouldn't be only one I'd lose."

There was rarely anything in the motion of his feelings, in the drift of his intentions, that Owen missed in himself. "You're a mirror-man — drych dyn," old Iolo had often told him; and Broch himself had once said, and he remembered the very spot where he said it, that his was the only soul he knew that actually and without pretence obeyed the oracle "Know thyself." "But all you do," Broch had added, "is to push the unknown further in; and that only makes it darker than it was before. In fact," Broch had gone on, "your lantern of self-knowledge only creates more darkness. 'Light the candle, and you'll see how dark it is,' as the old Powys proverb says."

He always thought of these words of "the Badger of Meifod" when there obtruded into his decisions motives so abominable that he would never have dared to reveal them to a living creature.

"I must have that boy body and soul," he thought, "and I must have a Catherine virginal and intact, to use as my grand tribute to destiny!"

These thoughts were expressed in unspoken words, but they were clear and definite. Nevertheless, behind these thoughts, just where the darkness seemed thickest, there hovered the will-o'-the-wisp of a suggestion that it wasn't because he wanted to use Catharine as a "castle" in his chess-game with Bolingbroke, but because the thought of her marriage was a torture to him, that he shuddered to catch that love-note in her laugh. It was one of his shameless concessions to his unholier instinct that in any raid upon a town or village he never interfered with his men's behaviour to the girls of the place; but no suffering any demon could ever inflict on him was worse than what he endured when, taking him suddenly by surprise, his imagination conjured up a realistic vision of Catharine in the arms of a ravisher.

He had once been betrayed into supposing that the Arglwyddes would feel as he did; but when some reference to such a horror came he was confounded by the coolness of her tone. He shrugged his shoulders now and forced himself to look calmly and steadily about him.

The sweet wood-smoke, rising in undulating curves and wavering wisps above the heads of that crowded assembly, mingled its wholesome scent with a new fragrance that night, the fragrance of the brightly-burning oil.

"Yes," the Prince thought, "that boy of mine's right. It's the oil we got from that rich rogue at Bryn Saith Marchog! I suppose his hall's as dark as Cynddylan's to-night — but he'd be alive now, the fool, if he hadn't resisted. To know when to strike, and when to refrain from striking — I shan't get the English out of Wales till I learn that."

Well! In the case of Rhisiart and Catharine his instinct told him that he must "refrain"; yes, and that was the word too in the case of Lowri and Rhys Gethin "Time and chance and the envy of Heaven," he told himself, "are the powers that deal best with the attractions and repulsions of men. Lift a finger to intervene, and all's in a blaze."

Thus sobered, and cautioned too by something in his nature that his self-analysis couldn't altogether fathom, Owen disregarded the old Nurse and her young listeners, disregarded Lowri and Gethin, and sat down on a comfortable horse-block that somebody had brought in from the entrance-yard. Here he was near enough to the Lollard and his bald-headed friend to be able to join in their discussion; and here he could let the bitterness of his jealousy find a vent in harmless argument.

They were talking about Hell and Heaven; and it was no surprise to our Prince when he perceived that his own gravitation to a spot made somewhat noisy by the murmur of the troopers lying about on the floor while Simon worked was countered by the shuffling to the scene on his silent sandals of the ubiquitous Father Pascentius.

“I was saying, my Prince, that what our theologians call ‘the Fall’ was in reality simply a wrong turn taken by our remote ancestors. They weren’t altogether to blame; for it was only the continuance on this earth of a crack in creation that had begun much earlier, had begun in fact in Heaven. It’s because it goes so far back that we feel, as Saint Paul says, that all Nature shares it. Coming down the mountain this very day, spring-like though it is, I felt as I saw a mass of broken rocks and an old twisted thorn that they too were waiting and enduring. Enduring what?” He paused; then deepening his voice with intense conviction, “Enduring Hell!” he brought out.

There came at that moment such a curious expression into the countenance of Broch-o’-Meifod that both the Prince and the Lollard stared at him in wonder. The big man’s face under the torch-light was transformed and his heavy lips twitched as if about to speak. But what startled and even shocked the men about him was the nature of the change that had come over him. Perhaps the best description of it would be to say that the natural human light in the man’s eyes had gone out and a look had taken its place that resembled the endurance of rocks and stones and stumps.

“What’s happened to your eyes?” Owen longed to interject, while Master Brut’s words concerning the Fall, as they still hovered in the air, seemed to grow thin and brittle. They hung in that heavy-sweet smoke like the pitiful echoes of an oracle who had long ago been doomed.

But from Broch’s expressionless face there now came a series of slowly-uttered but quite intelligible words.

“No... they don’t... endure Hell, brother,” he murmured. “You felt like that today because of the warm, loving glow in your own heart. I have no such glow. I have no such heart. The Pretty often says, ‘I don’t believe you’re any more human than my wheel, Broch! And sometimes she says, and laughs and laughs as she says it, ‘I believe you’re a corpse, Broch, a corpse that’s been dead a thousand years, and some great lumbering, lubberly devil’s got into you and talks to me out of you — not a fire-devil, Broch, but a frozen mud-devil.’ So that’s what she thinks; and she’s not jesting either. What was I going to say? Oh yes — that you’re mistaken, Master, about that ‘enduring.’ And you’re mistaken too about that ‘crack in creation’ and about that ‘wrong turn.’

“You say things like that out of your warm, loving, human heart. You look at those rocks and you look at those stumps, Brut, and a chill goes through you! I know what you do. Sometimes you think to yourself, ‘At this very moment there’s a dead log in a frozen murky pool, where no one ever comes, or ever will come!’ And your loving soul shivers to think of what that log feels, with no one, not even a worm, ever coming near it.”

But the Lollard had recovered himself now. He had got more used to those deep eye-sockets in which the light had gone out. He could hardly keep his seat. “That’s it!” he cried. “That’s just what Saint Paul means! It’s for the manifestation of the Sons of God that your log’s waiting. And that means the Resurrection of Jesus and the Blessed Blood of Jesus. There is a crack in creation. We have taken the wrong turn; and it’s only—”

But the face under that enormous bald head had now become so shockingly inhuman that his words died away before it. “Not even a worm,” repeated Broch-o’-Meifod. “And the heart of Jesus is so full of love that it can’t feel what that log feels. Jesus is like you, Master Brut. His loving heart calls all night and all day to that loneliness out there. ‘Love me! Love me!’ it calls. And like you it thinks — that warm, human heart — that nothing but a ‘crack in creation,’ nothing but a ‘wrong turn’ taken long ago, is holding back that loneliness. But shall I tell you”, his voice sounded now more like the dropping of icicles into black water than a human tongue—“the Spirit is moving already to another and a different Revelation. None of us will live to see it. But those lonelinesses that trouble your human heart, Brut, are its messengers; they may be ‘enduring’; but as for Hell—”

The voice of Father Pascentius now became audible from where he stood leaning against a dark oak pillar. “If you’ll pardon a poor monk, gentlemen,” he said, and his words seemed to come from his” burning eyes rather than from his mouth, “I would like to make one small animadversion upon what we’ve just heard. May I speak, my Prince?”

Owen bit his lip under his beard, but he bowed politely; and as for Broch-o’-Meifod everybody could see how humbly and patiently he swung his great head round towards the Cistercian till his lightless eye-sockets confronted the burning orbs of the other.

“I’m a theologian, not a politician,” Father Pascentius went on, “but I must remind you, my sons, that King Harry and his archbishop are burning many sincere men — and I fear Oldcastle himself will be the next — for holding views far milder and less subversive of our Holy Catholic Faith than what we have just heard. I humbly submit, my Prince — though ’tis no more than the view of a poor scholar — that when the heresies we have been listening to begin to be bruited over the land, many patriotic Welshmen who are also good Catholics will say to themselves, ‘What will become of our souls if Owen ap Griffith keeps such persons about him?’ And for the King and his bigoted Archbishop this will be a supreme advantage! They already call our Prince a black magician. Now they’ll be able to say he has people about him who are advocates of anti-Christ.”

There was a frightened murmur of protest at this from among such of the troopers as had managed to keep their wits unfuddled; but Broch only bowed his head a little and made a groping gesture with one of his great hands towards the quarter of the horizon from which this spring-time thaw had apparently come.

“I have seen a letter to our Prior, now our Lord Abbot — may the holy saints long preserve him!—” went on the voice behind the eyes, “in which the sufferings of a recent heretic at the stake were described by an eyewitness; and I think, my Prince, and all of you, my Masters, it were well to remember that if, in the decrees of Providence, our cause was not successful—” He was interrupted by outcries from the men gathered about the industrious Simon. It was clear that he was troubling their minds for there was fear as well as anger in their protests.

But the monk continued as obstinately as if he were in his own vaulted chapter-house in Valle Crucis, “Master Brut spoke of the desolation he noted in certain generated things, from which the creator had withdrawn his creative energy. But Saint Thomas clearly proves that the incorporeal agent by whom all things, both corporeal and incorporeal, are created is God, from whom all things derive not only their form but also their matter; therefore, what Master Brut saw, when he gave way to the sin of desolation, was simply an illusion of the Devil, an illusion representing corporeal things as they would be supposing that, with the cessation of the divine operation, they fell into nothingness.”

Father Pascentius’s Phorkyad eyes now turned from the Lollard to the Master of Maen-y-Meifod. “As to the words that you” — there was no need for him to name the bald-headed giant— “have just uttered, Saint Thomas refutes them in a logic before which every Catholic must bow. No new Revelation, Saint Thomas declares, even if it were possible for it to be known, can be known, because it is impossible that the end of the present Revelation should be revealed except to him who has received the Revelation of the whole of divine predestination, that is, to Christ as man, through whom the whole predestination of the human race is fulfilled; even as it is clearly said in the Holy Gospel: ‘The Father loveth the Son and showeth him all things which—’”

He was interrupted by three shrill blasts of a horn from outside the main entrance, an entrance which opened straight into the banquet hall where they were now assembled. Everyone’s gaze turned instantly to the high folding doors, doors which in their massive portentousness nearly reached the beams of the ceiling. These great doors in their hand-wrought iron-work and blackened antiquity suggested that they had been brought from some old Snowdonian castle whose foundations existed before the departure of the Romans; but they also suggested by their surprising height that they had once defended a gateway through which riders could enter on horseback.

There is something about the concentration of a crowd of human beings upon some inanimate obstacle that dissolves the aforesaid obstacle into porous vapour, vapour through which the imagination draws forth out of the darkness monstrous images of the unknown event.

But the high doors were now being unbarred as if in response to a pre-arranged signal; and every soul in the hall strained forward to welcome the issue, some with dread, some with panic, some with dramatic exultation.

Half-a-dozen spearmen entered, led by Owen’s eldest son, and as the Prince, without rising from his seat, straightened himself to receive bad news — for it had become a lodged impression, or if you prefer a settled superstition, with him that his eldest son always brought him bad luck — Griffith hurried to his father’s side, carrying a large and carefully sealed letter.

Sinking down on one knee, though with anything but a courtier-like expression on his lowering and anxious face, he placed this document in the Prince's hands, and then with the words, "I expect you'll want to retire to your room with this," turned away from his father and crossed the hall to where the Arglwyddes was now seated by the side of her loom.

Such was the perpetual fretting discord and jarring contrariety between Owen and his first-born that it was quite enough, as very likely Griffith realized it would be, for the son to suggest that this ticklish document should be carried out of the hall, to make the father decide that there was every reason why he should open it at once before them all. So while Broch-o'-Meifod resumed his conversation with the Lollard, and while the monk turned his devouring gaze upon what Master Simon was doing, Owen managed to catch Rhisiart's eye and made a sign to him to approach.

The boy obeyed at once; while the old Nurse, who, just as if the girl were still a small child, ordered Catharine, in some drastic nursery fashion, to go and kiss her mother before she retired for the night.

Lowering his head above the big document, so as not to see his daughter bid his Secretary good-night, the Prince broke the seals one by one with a vicious and malicious pleasure in the mere destruction of sealing-wax.

There was an outer cover of plain parchment wrapped round the contents of the document upon which the address, "To Owen ap Griffith, commonly called Glendourdy, and now in his Castle in the Mountains of Snowdon, these," was written in French. Then there appeared a brief letter, also in French, signed "Henry Don of Kidwelly," which the Prince proceeded to read to himself, while both Rhisiart — now standing with grave attention at his side — and Father Pascentius, leaning against his wooden pillar, surveyed him intently. "My gracious Lord and most honoured friend," Henry Don wrote, "I received by word of mouth from your trusty servant, from whose hands your letter had been stolen, but to whom, in case of such an accident, you had communicated its contents, that by the will of God you had risen to liberate the Welsh People from the bondage of their English enemies. I write to inform you, my gracious Lord and most dear friend, that I am making my way by such stages as these troubled times allow with certain moneys and a considerable following, to put myself at your honoured service. One of my party, a Welshman from London, cognizant of affairs in that city, brings me his account of certain oppressive and unrighteous measures voted by the King's Commons in Westminster for the destruction of Our People. These insolent proclamations I am enclosing herewith for your gracious consideration and that of your Council of Worthy and Faithful men. May the God of our fathers be your Support in adversity and your Guide to victory. Your devoted and humble servant, Henry Don."

Still seated on his horse-block by the central fire of the hall, and watched in silence now not only by the Lollard and the monk but by the majority of that vast household, Owen handed to Rhisiart the new Acts of Parliament, referred to by his friend, and commanded him to read them aloud.

"Do you wish me, my Prince," enquired the young man when he had examined the legal phraseology of the document, "to translate it into our Welsh tongue, so that all here present can follow these monstrous and unheard-of edicts?"

"If you can manage such a thing, my dear boy," replied Owen smiling.

Put on his mettle by this, and using the resonant and official tone that he had acquired in his Sheriff's Court at home, Rhisiart proceeded, though with some natural hesitation here and there, to make that crowded hall echo to the following words:

Hear and obey, all good liege subjects, the will and pleasure of your Sovereign Lord King Henry: No Englishman may be convicted in Wales by any Welshman, but only by other Englishmen of good fame. No waster, rhymer, minstrel, or vagabond may maintain himself by making gatherings upon the common people. No congregations, divinations, lies, and excitations may be held in Wales, save in the presence of English officers. No Welshman, not loyal to our Royal Allegiance, may bear arms or armour in any town, market, or church or in any highway. No victuals or arms may be imported into Wales except for the use of English Castles and English towns.

No Welshman, other than Bishops, may have castles or houses capable of defence beyond such as existed in the days of our gracious and sovereign Prince Edward, first of that name. No Englishman married to any Welshwoman of the amity or alliance of Owen ap Glendourdy, traitor to our Sovereign Lord, or to any other Welshwoman after the rebellion of the said Owen, or that in time to come marrieth himself to any Welshwoman, may be put into any office in Wales or in the Marches of the same.

Owen rose slowly to his feet. “Well, men of Gwynedd and Powys,” he cried in a ringing voice, “what is your answer to that?”

A terrific excitement ensued. The men-at-arms clashed their weapons upon their shields and raised them aloft. Many of the women tossed their arms above their heads and loosened the bands of their hair. Some of the more excitable among the younger girls, not contented with setting free their flowing locks, bared their breasts in their emotion, a gesture of feminine feeling which the Prince had never witnessed before, though he had often heard stories of such a thing being done when the women of Môn flung themselves upon the Roman legions.

Curiously enough he himself felt a little puzzled by this display of passion in the presence of a few mean and vindictive measures passed by the perturbed commonalty of Bolingbroke's business-like kingdom.

"And what a dramatic hurry these English are in!" he thought as he stood in silence listening to the wild acclamations about him. "They might at least have taken the trouble to have a Welsh clerk look over their vicious statute. Owen 'ap' Glendourdy! What? Do they take me for a river-sprite, and the actual child of my Glen of Divine Water? But a good friend, a good friend, that Don is! Though I wish he'd brought only money, and not more of these curst mouths to feed!"

Never had he felt colder, never less stirred of any sort of racial emotion than at that moment. There! Catharine was only just going to bed now. "How young girls do hate to go to bed! I suppose it's different when they're married — but not for long; no, no, not for long." And he began to tell himself a story about keeping Rhisiart up copying legal documents half the night so that he shouldn't disturb the sleep of a still beautiful wife whose heart had reverted to her father!

But he mustn't have her; never, never! She was his grand weapon, his "white queen" in his chess-game with Bolingbroke.

The clamour had died down now. But what was that? The old Bard playing on his harp? No! It was the sound of a pipe. And then he remembered that Lowri ferch Ffraid had been, ever since she arrived, anxious that the Arglwyddes should introduce the Dinas Bran custom, which had been dropped or perhaps had never existed in his more easy-going domains, with regard to the departure of the ladies from the hall. Yes, that was it! They were taking down the loom and collecting their things. But 'twas a silly custom! Much better were the homely border habits of the honest Hanmers. What put it into Lowri's head? Oh, no doubt a desire — he had noted this sort of thing in other cases — to make the Arglwyddes feel ashamed of her English blood — to trouble that simple lady's mind with the feeling that she ought to be grander in her ways, more ceremonious, more careful of the old Celtic traditions, now that her man was Prince of Wales.

A wave of vibrant tenderness for the mother of his children swept over him, and he cast a dangerous look towards the small fire at the extremity of the hall, which, when he had last seen it, had been monopolized by Lowri and Rhys Gethin. But they had disappeared. They must have taken advantage of that warm spring thaw to go out together.

He glanced quickly at Simon. The man was still hard at work, though the recent outburst of national feeling had deprived him of all spectators. Doggedly and obstinately he went on, polishing and hammering; using for his purpose the great central hearth of the hall when in his amateur labours as an armourer the heat of fire was necessary.

What had happened to the Hog of Chirk? Well, if it was Lollardry that had done this— "But she'd better not go too far! These convertites — I've known several in my time — if they're not mad, like poor Huw, are apt to burst out and risk Hell-fire! Rhys Gethin were wise to keep a weather-eye on you, my industrious Simon."

He couldn't resist a pang of jealousy when he saw how deep Master Broch and the Lollard had sunk out of hearing of all the world in their spiritual argument.

But the women were leaving the hall now, and though there was none but the family Bard to murmur in his quavering voice the traditional "In Exitu Mulieres" the old gentleman chanted the obscure words to the end.

Impatiently Owen strode across to the torch-lit stairway and was just in time to catch his wife in his arms as she was taking the first step.

The Arglwyddes was surprised, was even a little disturbed, by this unexpected demonstration; but she responded to it with an affectionate embrace, and as he watched her sturdy figure disappear leaning on Tegolin's arm, and with Mad Huw stumbling after them, he wondered if it were because she wished to conceal an unusual emotion that she didn't turn her head as she went up. Everything that this woman meant to him came over him now with a blind rush, and standing in the entrance to the stairs so that the maids couldn't easily pass, he fell into one of his queer reveries.

By the time he had shaken this off and was exchanging ribald jests with little Sibli he was astonished to see that pale English maid they called Alice struggling against the restraining arms of both Rhisiart and the Lollard, lost to everything in a violent fit of hysterics.

"Let me go to her — my mother, my dear mother!" the unhappy girl kept crying. "Let me go, I tell you! I will go; though I go through water and fire!"

"What is it? What's the matter with her? Tell me, child! Where do you want to go? Where's your mother?"

But the competent Luned came running up now with a jug of spring water, from which she mercilessly sprinkled the girl's face till the young woman slipped down from the men's arms and sank in a heap on the floor. There she lay piteously moaning, but no longer insane with grief.

Owen turned to Rhisiart, while Luned remained on her knees drying the girl's drenched hair and neck.

"A messenger has come to her, my Prince, with terrible news. He was only a lad, and was too frightened to stay; but it appears that Grey got it into his head that this girl's mother — she's a Welshwoman, my Prince, though the father's English — had thrown witchcraft over the young Lord, and that the said young Lord was wasting away. In reality, my Prince, it is for love of Alice that the young man is pining. But Grey sent his people to seize the girl's mother and have her condemned in his Manor-Court as a witch taken in the act. Alice's father resisted these men and was killed in his own house; but no one knows what's become of her mother. And it's this not knowing, my Prince, that has set the girl beside herself. I watched her while the lad told her — it was just now, when you were standing at the foot of the stairs, or you'd have seen what was going on — and it was this uncertainty, this not knowing what was happening to her mother, that broke the maid down."

Owen's interest and his wrath too were fully roused by this recital, roused as it had not been by the vindictive Acts of Parliament.

Rhisiart saw what his master was feeling and he went on boldly. "Had he a legal right to arrest her and take her life, my Prince? For I seem to have read that to punish the sin of witchcraft is a privilege of the ecclesiastical, not of the civil, courts. Has Grey's Manor-Court, my Prince, the right to try a person accused of witchcraft? Has it the right to usurp the Bishop's jurisdiction?"

"It has no such right!" cried Owen fiercely. "This is the sort of thing that's been going on for the last two hundred years! They build their castles; they fill them with devils; they do what they like with our people. Oh, great God in Heaven!" — and his voice resounding through the hall made every man present leap to his feet— "if you'll strengthen my hand now, only for twelve months, so that I can clear the land of them, just clear the land of them, from Bangor to St. David's, you can do what you will with me afterwards, and with all I love!"

Something seemed to crack within him, something that hitherto, like the bite of a black frost, had made an ice-barrier between his soul and such wrongs. But now he felt pouring through him, as if from the outraged heart of every victim of every castle in Wales, a torrential strength that nothing could resist!

Rhisiart looked at him in amazement. The boy was awed, but puzzled as well as awed. What had happened to excite his hero so? The girl was an English girl; and he'd seen with his own eyes how she treated that feckless young Lord. From the way she'd hypnotized Master Brut, too, he could well believe that her mother was a witch!

The lad wasn't old enough to realize how it can happen in life that a volcanic force that has been mounting and mounting for years, unseen and unknown, bursts forth at last under the impact of some minor shock with an explosion that shakes everything. And if he was astonished at Owen's unexpected emotion, his Norman intelligence was no less bewildered by the response it met with among all these men.

Even the girl herself ceased moaning as Luned lifted her to her feet. She caught at once — ah! she was a witch's daughter right enough! — the mood the Prince was in, and she rushed up to him and falling on her knees before him clutched at his hand, pressing it to her wet face.

"O save her, save her, Lord Owen!" she wept.

And the Prince raised her up before them all, and swore before them all on the handle of his sword that if her mother was still alive not a hair of her head should be harmed.

But what Rhisiart couldn't see or know was how, as the man stood there with his fingers meeting the English girl's fingers on the handle of his weapon, his curiously detached soul became suddenly icily remote from the whole scene. "Mortal men, mortal men all, whether Welsh or English!" he seemed to hear the voice of the great Oldcastle saying. "No more real difference between them than between your fingers and this woman's fingers!"

But it certainly seemed as if the absence of the Arglwyddes and her ladies had increased the nervous restlessness of the four-score armed warriors that filled the hall.

As Luned led Alice away — and the girl seemed greatly comforted, though it was hard for Rhisiart to see exactly why — Owen went back to his seat by the central fire where the Lollard and Broch-o'-Meifod had already resumed their blasphemous conversation.

Rhisiart settled himself upon a heap of dried ferns at his Lord's feet. Neither he nor Owen felt much inclination just then to listen to the daring and disturbing speculations of the two philosophers. Rhisiart had so much to think about that he found himself praying that his master would leave him in peace; and Owen was in the same case. But neither Prince nor Squire realized that in both the broad and the narrow skull the same image tyrannized.

It was therefore only with the surface of their minds that either of them became aware of the long series of enigmatic oracles that first one and then the other of these two sages uttered, between intervals of intense pondering.

But Father Pascentius was by no means content with such superficial attention. He had found a seat for himself now, at the end of a long bench occupied by the soldiery, and with his head propped on his two fists and his elbows resting on the angle of the bench, he had become one single exultant life-devouring eye. The countenance out of which this vision functioned was as negligible and commonplace as the Father's figure was unwieldy and shapeless. But just as Nature sometimes endows a blind man with senses of hearing and smelling far beyond the average, so, in Pascentius's case, his sight seemed to feel and smell and hear!

"Go on, go on! on Masters!" his look seemed to say. "How full of sweet odours is devilish heresy on a warm spring night!" Nor was the Father's portentous sense of sight devoid of its own special imagination. He saw — and saw with the reverse of displeasure — Lowri and Rhys Gethin amusing themselves under the conspiring heavens while Master Simon played the armourer. He saw — and saw without any pain — that Welsh witch, the mother of Alice, stealing through the furze bushes and wading across the rivers, with Grey's men after her!

But Father Pascentius had other interests than the madness of human beings; and as he listened to what Broch was now saying, he thrust his plump hand — the hand of a born commentator on Angelic Doctors — into a little pouch under his habit, and brought out a tiny withered stalk. This he held towards the fire-light, examining it closely; and the curious thing was that if that small wisp of vegetation had possessed consciousness it would have noted that over the pair of black orbs regarding it so fixedly there crept a film of tenderness, a suffusion of feeling, as the man stared. But since the stalk of a little rock-plant divorced from its root can hardly be supposed to possess such an endowment, it seems as if no one would ever know how different was the gaze the man now fixed upon the realm of vegetation from the one with which he regarded the realm of humanity.

Had the Father been damned for "botanizing on his mother's grave" the only defence that could have reached his Creator would have had to come from the sub-humanity of entities so minute and negligible that even the Philosopher, as Saint Thomas calls Aristotle, could not include them in his Summa.

But Master Broch was now revealing to the startled Lollard things that no monk — not even such an inebriate of the madness of life as this one was — could endure to hear.

"Saint Thomas," he interjected in a voice of such commanding authority that both Owen and Rhisiart were disturbed in their thoughts, "Saint

Thomas, quoting Saint Augustine, says that when a man thinks his false opinions to be the teaching of godliness, and dares obstinately to dogmatize about matters of which he is ignorant, he becomes a stumbling-block to others.” Then seeing that Broch was silent and that the Lollard was beginning to smile, he added, for the benefit of the troopers who were listening and of the Hog of Chirk who had paused in his work, “If anyone here had read that account of a death by burning that came to our Prior he would keep guard over his wandering thoughts. None — not even our noble Prince — can be sure of the future.

“One thing is certain. Henry of Lancaster and his Archbishop, whatever else we may think of them, have resolved to stamp out heresy with pains unspeakable. Therefore it were wise — even while we support our brave Prince in defending our ancient liberties — to beware lest we confuse civil and national freedom with that dangerous revolt against the Holy Catholic Faith which not only imperils our immortal souls but gives an opportunity to cruel and ambitious tyrants—” He paused for a moment to gauge the effect of his words; but a stony and inscrutable mask had fallen upon Owen’s face, while on Rhisiart’s all he could detect was the familiar expression of an impatient young novice listening to a tedious sermon.

He began afresh, turning his eyes this time towards the troopers, who in their respect for the power of the Church were looking not a little disturbed. “Why should we,” he went on, “lend our ears to what our two greatest minds call the dogmatic obstinacy of wilful men? The moment, my brave warriors, you turn from that rightful liberty for which it is your glory to fight, and wander in these dangerous paths of heresy and schism, you strengthen the hands of our oppressors, you give them what they desire most, you—”

But Owen was on his feet. His mask had fallen. His whole form was trembling. He looked wildly round him; and it could even be seen that his fingers were clutching his sword. All the suppressed emotions which had just now flickered up over the Ruthin girl seemed towering into a fiery cloud of smoke and flame!

"Listen, monk!" he cried, "and listen all of you. When we have driven every Englishman in Wales back whence they came, who will decide what Pope we recognize and what rule we observe? We shall decide for ourselves! Wasn't there a Church in Wales before we bowed to Rome? Mend your words, good Father, mend your words, lest there be a Church in Wales again that acknowledges neither Rome nor Canterbury; no! nor Avignon either!"

He drew a long breath; and Rhisiart, casting a quick glance about them, saw that the soldiers were really disturbed and troubled. In the lad's practical Norman mind rose a feeling of angry contempt for all these doctrinal discussions. And here was the Prince himself taking a part in them! "It's Master Young he needs," he said to himself, "to stop this mystical jargon!" He felt more indignant than ever when he heard Owen suddenly gasp out: "Is there no power in Heaven or earth that can give me a clear sign?"

But at that moment everyone swung round, for a kind of a sign, though it could hardly be called a clear one, did present itself. A half-clothed figure was seen rushing down the women's staircase, flinging himself through the midst of the men, and laying a desperate hand upon the Prince's wrist. Rhisiart knew him at once as Mad Huw; but it was clear that Owen was bewildered at first about his identity from the fact that he wasn't wearing the grey habit of his order.

But “It’s the Friar! It’s the Friar!” rose from all sides; and there occurred an instinctive movement to cut off the theologian’s escape. His recent words had frightened them not a little; and they longed to see him confronted by another spiritual authority, even by one crazed in his wits.

Everybody but Rhisiart, who was so new to Wales, knew that there was no love lost between the Franciscans and Cistercians; and all of them, as they crowded round, expected a fierce spiritual duel.

For a moment the man was too agitated and too much out of breath to speak. But as he clung panting to Owen’s wrist it began to dawn on the Prince that this unusual night-attire covered the hairy chest and bony legs of the champion of King Richard.

“I’ve been telling them, Brother,” murmured Father Pascentius before the man could speak, how different civil liberty is from religious liberty. I’ve been telling them that it’s only playing into King Harry’s hands to defy the Archbishop. The Archbishop is the representative of Christ in these Islands; and though our Prince is liberating our bodies from an earthly King, no man can liberate our souls from their heavenly King.

“One minute, good Brother! I’m sure no follower of Saint Francis could have been silent under the monstrous heresies I’ve been listening to-night; heresies that even” — he glanced at Master Broch whose head was sunk on his breast— “suggest aspersions upon the eternal procession of the Son of God!

“One more word, Brother; for you are under vows of obedience like myself! God, as Saint Thomas says, would not be perfect unless He were alive; and if He is alive we must attribute procession to Him, a procession of word and of love. And this — one minute I beg you, Brother! — this is the procession of the Son from the Father, for He is God’s word, and of the Holy Ghost, for He is God’s love. Brother, Brother, let me finish! Saint Thomas says that Athanasius most wonderfully declared at the Council of Nicea that what the Arians really implied was — since the Son and the Holy Ghost aren't consubstantial with him — that God is not a living and intelligent being, but dead and unintelligent!"

In his desire to stop the panting Friar from uttering a word till he himself had finished, Father Pascentius had pushed so close to Owen's side that it seemed to Rhisiart as if his Prince were being rumpled and tumbled by a pair of frantic jackdaws.

But in the monk's appreciation of the beauty of Athanasian rhetoric his voice was raised to such a pitch, as he uttered the passage about God being "dead and unintelligent," that Owen's nerves revolted.

The Prince straightened himself, shaking off, with an obvious physical repulsion, his too close contact with both the excited men of God.

But, as the Cistercian drew back, Mad Huw poured forth in a torrent of confused words the great news he had come to bring. "I knew it, Prince," he cried. And then he turned in rapturous triumph to the whole company. "I told him," he shouted, "I told him it was going to happen. I felt it. I knew it. And it has happened. Quick! Come and see, all of you, what God has done. It's in the sky over the sea! It's in the sky over Mona! The army of the angels of the Lord is marching against the Tyrant. Like the Assyrians from the walls of Sion the enemies of God's chosen will be scattered! They will be broken like potsherds. They will be driven from Wales like a pestilence. They will flee when no man pursueth. I see their carcasses on the slopes of the mountains. I see the smoke of their burning rising to heaven. Open those doors, Owen ap Griffith. Come forth, you men of war, with your spears and with your bows. Over the forests of Mona, over the waters of the salt sea, it has come! It has come from the west. It has come from between the north and the west; the fiery army of the angels of the Lord!

"Open those doors, Owen ap Griffith. Come out, come out from here, all you people! For the Lord has heard His servant. The power of the Lord has justified His people. The angels of the Lord are moving through the firmament. The host of the Lord is marching through the sky to succour the sheep of His flock. My hero, my saint, my rose of Britain, Richard my King, was the one who showed me. He woke me from my sleep. He led me by the hand. He showed me the bright host, moving, marching across the sky! He bade me call you forth, Owen ap Griffith. Come then, come quick, and delay not; for the Lord has sent his angels to help us; and the oppressors of his people are as the snows that melt before the spring!"

So intense was the Friar's conviction, so prophet-like were his words, that the whole company rose as one man. The Prince, the Lollard, Broch-o'-Meifod, the Hog of Chirk, the commentator upon Saint Thomas, even Owen's sluggish and sceptical eldest son, rushed towards the door.

Here Rhisiart, who was the first to lay his hand on the great bolts, was aware of familiar voices outside; and when the doors were opened, there, grouped together on the hill-side and staring wildly towards the north-west, were Meredith and Master Sparrow and Mistress Lowri and Rhys Gethin!

Rhisiart's first thought when he turned his head towards the quarter of the sky at which they were all gazing was of Catharine. "Is she awake?" he said to himself. And then he thought, "But her window looks to the East."

As for Owen he had become praeternaturally calm. All excitement had left him, all anger, all passion, all ambition; all motive for living. He looked quietly and coldly, without a pulse of emotion, at the astounding spectacle before him. So calm, so collected had he suddenly grown that he was even able to turn his head aside, after the first glance, and deliberately note the effect of this stellar phenomenon upon his companions. He noted one curious thing, a thing that came back to his mind several times later that night, the fact that Lowri no sooner caught sight of her husband than she left Rhys Gethin and moved quickly to his side. Not only so — and he couldn't be deceived, for Simon was quite close to him and the realistic Master Sparrow had seen fit to bring a great blazing torch into the miraculously-lit night — those ill-assorted partners had snatched blindly at each others' hands; and — so it seemed to him — the amateur armourer was making the woman's white face wince and twist with pain as he crushed her fingers in his hot fist.

But what a spectacle! A vast meteoric body of burning flame was actually — Mad Huw hadn't exaggerated its sublime appearance — shivering and quivering in a blue-black gulf of space just above the north-western horizon. And not only so, but it was trailing behind it a huge fiery train of lesser meteoric lights, lights that seemed to be bound together, like a swarm of fire-atoms, in some vast nebulous gonfalon of the awakened ether.

Owen turned quickly to observe Rhisiart's profile and to see how such a celestial apparition affected that hatchet-shaped projectile of Norman insouciance; and he smiled under his beard to mark, in the light of Master Sparrow's torch, the manner in which his young secretary sucked in his lips, narrowed his eyelids, and glared at the comet as if he were putting to it a sequence of searching interrogations.

But he left Rhisiart now and walked over to where the Lollard and Master Broch were standing together. "Well?" he murmured, "so the Friar was right, eh? But, between me and God, what do you two mean by stirring up that monk to such a tune? He's no fool and we don't want — as he says — to give King Hal every point in the game."

The Lollard was silent. He had long recognized that there was a vein of unscrupulous secularity, and even of shameless cynicism, in Owen; but in face of that celestial portent sent by Heaven to the man's support he felt it an inappropriate moment to contradict him.

But Broch-o'-Meifod was less conciliatory. "Shall I tell you something, Owen ap Griffith?" he said. "For I've got my belt on to-night, and I feel as if I could make even the Pretty listen!"

Owen scrutinized him closely in the darkness. He began to suspect that his formidable ally had been drinking too much. But he bade him say what he had to say. "But make it short, my Master; make it short."

"That great luminary," said Broch, "at which we're all gazing has nothing to do with you, nothing to do with the King of England. It has nothing to do with the Pope, or with the anti-Pope either; nor with what the good Father just now called the 'procession' of God. That trailing messenger has come from beyond all the Nine Heavens; yes, from outside both the Primum Mobile and the Empyrean. Do'ee know whence it is, Owen ap Griffith? From a new-born Spirit in unknown spheres it is pushing upon our old degenerate world; and foolish Broch, clumsy Broch, cowardly Broch, runaway Broch, is its voice to-night!"

In the darkness, for the precious oil from Bryn Saith Marchog had burnt out in Master Sparrow's torch and the Prince could see a whitish glimmer upon his friend's bald skull, the man's startling words sounded to his strung-up nerves like music played behind secure battlements to a man fighting for his life in a blood-stained mist. Yes, he must get off alone somewhere! When fiery dragons rush out of infinity to a person's aid, a person wants to think.

That great naked skull before him — didn't the man ever cover it? — seemed always able to think, and to think aloud too! And to-night, as that blaze in the west dimmed the stars and diminished the torches, the immobility of the face beneath the skull became monstrous. The face became a featureless part of the skull! It was the skull that had uttered those startling words about a dispensation that was to replace the Christian one. Broch spoke to-night like the corpse-god of those old mound-people, like the Head of Bran when it made years seem like seconds to those under its spell.

"I must get away by myself; get away by myself!" He remembered how he had uttered those words thirty years ago when he and his brother had been welcomed as boys by his mother's princely family in South Wales.

He did begin moving away from Broch and Master Brut; but he hadn't gone far before he was brought to a standstill by the appearance of his old minstrel Griffith, whose heavy harp his own son Griffith was carrying behind the aged poet.

Owen's first feeling on encountering these two figures was that they might well have been strolling actors in some English morality play entitled Passionate Age and Dispassionate Youth. But he was touched, in spite of his troubled thoughts, by his eldest son's consideration for the old man. He did catch himself thinking, "But the Arglwyddes must have sent him!" But he dismissed that thought as ungenerous and unworthy.

"He's a kind fellow at bottom, and a brave one — but I shall never understand him as I do Meredith."

Greeting the old and the young Griffith with almost effusive gratitude Owen despatched a trooper to bring a stool from the hall for the Bard. "And a torch, too!" he added, not realising that a harpist of Griffith's experience could feel those precious strings in pitch-black darkness.

"What do you think of this comet, lad?" he enquired of his son, using the profane word deliberately, though he saw the old Bard wince at the sacrilege.

"Do you care what I think, sir?" the man replied at once, grave and sad.

But Owen refused to be abashed. “Tell me, boy! On your allegiance tell me!”

“I think,” said Griffith slowly, “that it’s no more wondrous than fire, and no more miraculous than an ordinary sunset. I think a time will come when astronomers will predict these things.”

“But they do, Griffith! They have!”

The man was silent.

“Haven’t they, Griffith?”

“Astrologers have, my Prince, not astronomers!”

Owen was glad to welcome the arrival of the stool and the torch. Griffith was so fond of tripping him up like that. But hadn’t astrologers always been the best astronomers?

Then the old Bard began to play and to improvise as he played. But a twinge of new vexation seized upon Owen as he listened. God in Heaven! if the man wasn’t actually improvising in the tricky modern style! That was a thing he’d never done before. And it was too much. The troopers had begun to crowd round them. On those gleaming harp-strings the dragon in the sky seemed laying the flickering point of its prophetic tongue.

The clue to everything might have come to-night; the secret of his race’s past, the mystery of Mathrafal, the sobbing cry full of a despair that wasn’t quite the despair of the dirge for Cyndylan — all these quivered on the verge of a new meaning between that light in the sky and those flickering strings! His own dim craving for something beyond battle and blood, and hearths made desolate — this might have been its voice, its solution!

But the Bard must needs let it all go; must needs balance his rhythms in this new tricky way and fill them with pious allusions to the star at the birth of Christ and the star at the birth of Uther Pendragon! He could have wept at a chance so lost. Huge, mystical, antique words, from the Songs of Aneirin in that sacred book of his, rolled like bruised and baffled thunder at the back of his mind. Yes, it was too much. He must get away by himself. Craftily he pretended to be overcome by emotion. He was overcome by emotion, but not by this damned modern cleverness. But with his hands clapped to his face and his head bowed he made his way out of the press. Oh, how well he knew the triumphant hopes which that fiery creature — it really did resemble a dragon now, all burning head and burning tail — would stir up from one end of Wales to the other, and the terror it would rouse among the simple English!

Why then did it only make him sad, him for whom all men would suppose that its beauty and its terror had drawn earth-ward out of the angelic spheres?

"It must be," he thought, "that at the bottom of my heart I was hugging a hope that some way of peace would be found, even at the last, between Harry and me. But if the very firmament is going to breed Pendragons, war to the end it is; war and a plunge through a world on fire into utter darkness!"

And then, still aware, behind everything else, of a smouldering envy of his friend Broch's detachment, he began to feel a longing for Rhisiait's narrow face.

"Where is the lad?" he thought. He turned from the sky-dragon and began moving among his excited followers, looking for his squire. Nobody dared to speak to him, hardly to approach him. With that symbol of his destiny before their eyes he had become a consecrated figure — unearthly, hardly human. "He can't have gone back into the hall," he said to himself. "He must have wandered up the hill to get a better view."

He moved further into the darkness, following the upward slope of the ground where the older portion of this rambling mountain-fortress lifted its confused bulk to the eastern quarter of the sky. Suddenly he saw a light, not the light of a torch, but the dusky reddish flame of a small fire of dead ferns and twigs.

Four human figures were bending over this fire, a man of dwarfish but powerful stature and three young boys, one of whom was laboriously writing something on a fragment of parchment with a burnt stick.

Owen instantly dropped the prince and became in a second a hunted outlaw, a native of caves and forests! He became younger, too. A delicious sense of adventure, full of vague memories of old boyish escapades with his brother Tudor took possession of him. Clapping his hand to his sword and pressing it against his side, so that no metallic clink or jingle should betray his presence, he set himself to crawl forward on hands and knees towards the man, the three boys, and the fire.

No old mound-dweller could have squirmed on his belly through the primeval forest more silently! It is doubtful whether any other crowned prince in that civilized age could have played the cave-man as he did then. And the odd thing was that he felt happier and more himself as he did it than he had felt for years. Morg ferch Lug would have been surprised if she'd seen that forked beard thrusting itself between the dead stalks of the bracken! Had her pure Brython then, even he, a drop of the blood of the "older people"?

He was soon near enough to hear and see everything. He was so close to them that by stretching out his sword-arm he could have touched with the weapon's point the red flames of their small fire.

He knew now who the dwarfish man was — none other than David Gam! And it was clear to him that the fellow was terrorizing the boys; and he knew them, too. His own little page, Elphin, the prettiest child who'd ever served him, was the one whom Gam was compelling — the brute had reduced them all to a state of paralysed terror — to scrawl those letters with the burnt stick. The others — and he knew their names too — were Rawlff and Iago from Dinas Bran.

"You're safe from me to-night," he thought, contemplating his enemy. "I'm not going to shed blood to-night." But he set himself to listen.

"Have you finished, you devil's imp?" growled the little monster, and snatching the fragment of parchment from the boy he surveyed the black scrawls that covered it.

"What does it say? Read it, you whimpering baby, or I'll—"

And Elphin read in a high-pitched tremulous voice, like the voice of a helpless girl, the following ungentle words:

To Owen ap Griffith Fychan:

Nothing in heaven or earth will save you from David's knife.

It is in every bush, in every tree, in every room, in every closet. If I have to sharpen it for twenty years it'll be between your ribs. Live therefore in fear.

From one who has never missed his mark.

There was a moment's silence, broken only by the low sobs of Elphin. Then the man's voice was raised again. "What will happen to you if he doesn't get what you've written? Stop that noise, and say the words!"

In a low gasping voice the wretched Elphin repeated his lesson. "If...Owen...doesn't...get...what...I've...written... my...my..."

"Go on!" growled David Gam.

"My...my tongue will be cut out!"

"Well, do it then!" said the man fiercely, "and do it at once. If it weren't for that thing in the sky he'd have had it to-night: But no matter — he'll have it; and so will you — and so will all of you, if you don't do what I've said!"

Thus speaking he jumped to his feet, stamped out the fire, and was gone.

It was lucky for him that he departed up the slope instead of down, for had he actually stumbled upon Owen it is doubtful if the latter's resolution could have been kept. But as it was, Owen waited motionless for a minute or two, while the three boys, too frightened to move, murmured to each other in whispers.

Then, still on hands and knees, he slid away, keeping his fingers tight round the sheath of his sword. But once arrived at the southeastern angle of the dark mass of buildings he leaped to his feet. There was the fiery apparition still flaming in the quarter of the sky under which lay the Isle of Môn or Anglesea; and there were the dusky figures of his followers, still staring and wondering in scattered groups, while a hoarse susurration of low-voiced excitement rose up towards the comet-dimmed stars.

Humming audibly and casually a stave of that sorrowful dirge about the ruin of Pengwern he strolled back to where the pages were huddled.

Their aggressor hadn't succeeded in altogether quenching that small fire, and as its flames shot up again he could see by their helpless passivity, though they rose to their feet at his approach, how shaken the boys were.

"It's I, your Prince," he said in his calmest tone. "Something's frightened you children. Come tell me what's the matter. I'd forgive you, whatever it is! Only tell me everything."

They stood in a pitiful row before him with the revived flames between him and them; but he walked round the fire and laid his hand on the shoulder of the agitated Elphin.

"He rushed out on us," said Rawlff.

"We were up there," said Iago, pointing to a rocky crag above them where patches of snow still showed white in the starlight. Elphin, who still clutched the parchment, was too upset to utter a word.

“Please, sir, he made Elphin write a letter to you,” said Rawlff.

‘“Twas a burnt stick, weren’t it, Elphin, what he made you write with?” threw in Iago; and he nudged the effeminate boy’s ribs on the side opposite from Owen.

“Oh yes! I thought you were holding something, child,” Owen broke in, in his most matter-of-fact voice. “Here! let’s see it!” And taking the scrap of vellum, upon which Gam had made his vow, from Elphin’s numb fingers, he read it aloud as lightly as if he were engaged in a game of forfeits with the three boys.

“Well!” he said when he’d done, “I don’t think I’m destined to live in fear of that little red man.”

“Though his arms, sir, are like bars of Spanish steel,” threw in the diplomatic Rawlff, evidently on the way to recover his usual poise.

“Shall I say our Dinas Bran motto to Elphin, sir?” added Iago in a superior tone.

A little piqued by the fact that Dinas Bran seemed carrying things off with more of an air than Glyndyfrdwy, the Prince forgot himself so far as to remind these alien refugees that upon neither of them had the intruder laid a finger.

Elphin brightened up at this, while the bolder ones stared at each other in dismay. What a magician the chief was. He knew everything.

“He pinched me cruel, sir,” murmured Elphin. “Like hot irons his fingers were!”

But this was the first time the audacious Rawlff had ever been privileged to talk face to face with their leader. Obscure thoughts about becoming a belted knight swept through his ambitious brain, while like other youthful courtiers he suspected that the shortest path to distinction lay through flattering the great..

“I suppose, sir,” he said, with his brightest and most engaging air, “you aren’t afraid of the fire-dragon in the sky?”

“I tell you what I am afraid of,” said Owen curtly, “and that is that three boys I know will get into trouble with Madoc if they don’t hurry back into the hall. Take care of Elphin, you two,” he added, “and let him show that bruise to Nurse if she’s not asleep.”

But as the pages somewhat reluctantly proceeded to obey him, he patted Elphin on the head. “Your Prince is a wizard, my boy. Remember that! He sees everyone you talk to and hears everything you say. But I can tell you this, child, between me and God: if you repeat your Angelus properly every night no little red man will ever touch you again!”

They went off; and Owen, standing where they’d left him, watching the flames of the bonfire, felt a sudden weariness of the whole game of life. Struggling against it, however, he threw the piece of parchment into the fire and let his eyes wander along the ancient walls of the castellated building above his head.

“I wonder,” he thought, “if Catharine has seen the comet?” With his daughter in his mind he advanced a furlong or so up the rocky slope, still keeping an eye on the dark mass of buildings.

“This must be about where her chamber is,” he said to himself. He stood still, letting his gaze wander over the half-ruined ramparts and broken buttresses of this most ancient part of the fortress.

And then he clapped his hand to his sword; while against all his self-control a trembling fury of rage tugged at his vitals.

For he saw at the same moment two things: things in an unmistakeable and devastating relation to each other. And what neither the blazing comet nor the curse of Gam could do these two things did. They made him pray.

And he prayed as passionately as he had recommended Elphin to pray if he wished to be saved from dwarfs with fingers like Spanish steel.

“Mary, Joseph! Mary, Joseph! Mary, Joseph!”, he gasped in his beard, and thus he got the strength to turn sharply on his heel and stride back the way he had come.

He had seen a candle burning in a narrow arrow-slit high up in the dark wall; and he had seen the well-known figure of Rhisiart, gazing up at it, as if it were something more miraculous than any comet.

XIV. LOVE AND SHAME

THE MATERIAL DISAPPEARANCE of the comet by the end of March could hardly be called a complete departure. Unusual magnetic disturbances among the members of that Snowdonian court seemed to indicate that though the thing's visible presence had passed out of sight upon its spheric voyage, it had not altogether gone. Something of itself remained, a weight upon the atmosphere, a pressure upon human souls, a quickening of human pulses, queer criss-cross currents in the psychic air.

Coincident with an early and an exceptionally warm spring, after the cruel winter, there was a curious stir in that high retreat, that retreat which was at once a castle, a palace, an assembly-hall, and a camp.

And what made this stir in people's minds, this growing tension in their powers of will, a rather exceptional phenomenon, was the fact — and it is here that a meticulous observer might be forgiven if he detected the invisible wash of that meteoric vessel's wake — that the tension of purpose referred to divided the men from the women.

The pleasant relaxation brought by the balmy spring-airs, when that early April set in, in place of segregating the company into mutually attracted couples, had the surprising effect of drawing together most of the women into one isolated gathering; and most of the men into another.

What the patient Arglwyddes felt in her heart when the whole feminine group — all except Tegolin, who with Brother Huw seldom left her side — fell into the habit of congregating, immediately the afternoon meal was over, in the agreeable little apartment facing the south which had been made the bed-chamber of Mistress Lowri and her husband, nobody knew, except possibly Owen himself.

The impetuous Catharine, who had grown attached to Tegolin, scrupled not to express to the red-haired maid her suspicions of Mistress Lowri. “Your mother hates mine!” she would declare, as in the now frequent absences of Alice of Ruthin the two young people combed each other’s hair in Catharine’s turret-room, “and though it’s wrong to say it to you, I hate her!”

But Tegolin always sturdily maintained that these gatherings in the south chamber had nothing to do with her mother’s attitude to the Arglwyddes. “I think,” she would reply, “that she is lacking in proper respect; but in this case I don’t believe she’s responsible.”

“Who is responsible, then? For except for you and me and Myfanwy and Gwen, mother’s left alone with her weaving day after day!” But it was generally at this point the elder girl changed the conversation.

A week of the loveliest April weather had indeed passed over them before Tegolin was driven to defend her parent with evidence and circumstance and proof against her friend’s suspicions.

“And she a witch?” cried Owen’s daughter, opening her eyes wide.

“Sit down, Catrin, and listen to me,” said the Maid of Edeyrnion.

And pushing back the excited young girl upon the edge of the couch-bed she lifted her hands to her own hair and proceeded to coil her already-braided locks carefully round her head. “We have no right,” she continued gravely, “to call Mistress Dilys a witch. She’s a fortune-teller, but so was my granny; and from what Luned says she and my mother have devised a most important plot, a plot upon which all your father's success may depend. Now listen to me, Catrin dearest," and she took her seat on the couch by the younger girl's side and tenderly stroked her flaxen hair, while she fixed her gaze on the other's eyes, which in their nervous excitement changed colour as often as Owen's did.

"This is between you and me and the Blessed Saints, dearest; and you mustn't breathe a word of it to the Arglwyddes, or to anyone else. Do you understand? Swear to me you won't."

Owen's daughter solemnly crossed herself and gave the required promise. The breath of that April afternoon crept in through the unglazed window and lightly stirred the listener's fair hair. The misty sun-shafts of the declining day had long since moved away to the westward; but their ruddy light, falling in a warm rich diffusion on the hill-side opposite, was countered, as that narrow window received its reflection, by a cavernous and mossy greenness, as if belonging to the interior of a cave, which hung about the heavily-pictured arras and about a clumsy wooden image of Saint Clare.

This austere piece of carving, which was of life-size, had followed the girl from her nursery at Sycharth to her bower at Glyndyfrdwy; and it now stared forth with its cold virginal eyes towards the yet colder peaks of Snowdon. The arras behind the wooden Saint Clare had also come from Sycharth, and as it caught a sudden glimmer from the fire, which all the year round the old Nurse had kept alight in that turret-room, its cave-like chilliness took on a motion of faint life. It became indeed the swaying branches of a green forest out of whose recesses the semblance of the antlers of a horned stag came forth.

That this beast was of no common lineage was proved by the fact that some faraway ancestress of Catharine had woven a rude cross between its antlers.

"You haven't forgotten," Tegolin was saying now, "how thrilled we all were when your father's men found Mistress Dilys half-dead in those Dyffryn woods, and brought her up here?"

"And you made Alice leave you," Catharine interjected, "though she didn't want to, and look after her mother."

Tegolin nodded. "Well, my precious, you know how we all love to hear our fortunes told, and poor mother" — Tegolin always spoke of the formidable Lowri since her return to her husband in this pitying tone— "has a passion for that sort of thing. But by degrees — I don't know who thought of it first, all of them together I suppose, but it's Luned who's told me — they worked out the most daring plot you ever heard, a plot to take both Grey and his son — the one who loves Alice." Catharine's lips opened so wide and her eyes grew so big that the red-haired girl kissed her anxiously; but after that, with one of her hands held tight in her own, she went on quickly.

"It's got quite far now, this plot of theirs; but they're waiting to tell your father till it's all absolutely ready. Mistress Dilys has lots of friends of her murdered husband — Englishmen they are, but men who hate Grey — and she's got an Irishman too who's the — what do they call it? — the messenger between them, and Luned told me last night that their plot is to tell Grey how he can surprise your father when he's raiding the Vale of Clwyd; but instead of your father being taken — you see, my precious? — it'll be Grey and his son who'll be taken! Isn't that a good plot? I think it's the best I ever heard of!" And Tegolin gave a queer little laugh.

Not for nothing was Catharine Owen's daughter. In some things she was hopelessly absent-minded, indeed her brother Griffith often called her stupid; but where nervous emotions were concerned she was morbidly quick-witted. She rose to her feet now, so that it was her turn to contemplate her companion from a superior height.

"Tegolin ferch Lowri," she began gravely. "I'm glad you've told me this, and of course I'll keep my vow; but you're holding back something. You're not happy about this plot, and you must trust me and tell me why."

The Maid of Edeyrnion stretched out her hand, and possessing herself of some silver-headed bodkins, which had been removed when her hair was combed, thoughtfully thrust them into her braided locks. With her arms raised to her head, her bosom looked as breathing-warm in that April air as that of the huntress Artemis. Very different did it look from the wooden infantile angles of the saintly form behind her!

But Catharine could see she was strongly moved; and with a quick glance, not at Saint Clare but at that horned head in the tapestry which she could remember from her cradle, she pleaded with her again.

"Aren't we friends enough," she said, "for you to tell me everything that's in your mind? I know Nurse treats me, and Mother too as if I was a child, but I'm not a child. I'm a grown-up girl, Tegolin ferch Rheinalt."

Down came the elder girl's hands at this, and Catharine was quite satisfied with the startled look she received, but she went on firmly.

"No, I'm grown-up, Tegolin dear. I think of a lot of things. I think, for instance, how odd it is that we two should be such friends, when we're both fond of the same person."

A rose-petal flush mounted up from the Maid's soft neck till it suffused both her cheeks. She had that particular kind of ivory-white skin that so often accompanies red hair; and it was in vain she covered her throat with one hand and smoothed out the creases from Catharine's pillow with the other.

"Brother Huw—" she began; but Owen's grown-up daughter looked so tall and dominant that she couldn't help meeting her eyes, eyes that kept changing in colour like the shifting lights in a rock-pool.

"No, not your Friar, Tegolin. I know about that too though it's been different with me. It's Rhisiart ab Owen I'm thinking of."

Tegolin escaped the eyes above her for a moment by bowing her head over her hands, which were now clasped tight in her lap. They were large, strong, almost boyish hands, but she pressed them together in no boyish way. She longed to press them against her ears, against her heart.

But the clear young voice above her went on remorselessly. "You're older, you're better than I am, Tegolin, and you're cleverer too; but when anyone grows up thinking only of one thing, they see a great deal, they see everything!"

Slowly and calmly, though not without an interior struggle, the Maid lifted her head; and the two young people stared gravely at each other, not exchanging thoughts, but each using the other's eyes as an open gate to a long perspective of troubled speculation.

"Yes, that's what's so wonderful," Catharine murmured at last, "that we should stay friends in spite of him; and we shall, shan't we?"

"Does anyone else think," the Maid couldn't help enquiring of this terrifying young oracle, "what you think about — all this?"

"No, no, no! Not a soul; except Father of course, and he doesn't count."

The Maid sighed, aware of a strange rush of conflicting feelings, one of which was a pang of blind prophetic pity. "Why doesn't he count?"

"Because, while he knows everything," cried the other eagerly, "he never interferes. If I were to go to him this very night and say, 'I want to marry Rhisiart,' he wouldn't scold or get angry; and if I knew we didn't have his blessing, I should know too we'd never have his curse!"

Once more the Maid of Edeyrnion sighed, and this time more heavily still. As she looked into those sea-coloured reckless eyes she got no comfort, no reassurance, no premonition of peace or happiness for any of them — least of all for Rhisiart.

Catharine was the first to remove her gaze; for the steady direction of her friend's look, now that it was touched with sadness rather than with confusion, made her uneasy.

Was there more between Tegolin and Rhisiart than she had realized? Was the boy acting like an unscrupulous profligate, and playing with both their hearts? The daughter of Owen shook out the heavy folds of her brocaded gown, and catching them up with a sweep of her bare arm began crossing and recrossing the little room; a proceeding which was more ominous to Tegolin than anything else she could have done.

"He'd better not play with me!" the child was saying to herself, while her teeth pressed down upon her lower lip and her forehead grew distorted.

The only flaw to Catharine's beauty was the scantiness of her fair eyebrows; and this defect increased the youthful ferocity of the scowl she now assumed, as, forgetting Tegolin's presence altogether, she visualized an exposed and convicted Rhisiart cringing and shivering before the lash of her tongue.

By degrees, as the reflection of the sunset on the eastern slopes faded, Catharine's imaginary vengeance faded too; and pausing in her march, she relaxed her grasp of her heavy gown and, letting it fall over her shoes, gave it a few quiet kicks from inside to smoothe it out and keep it in order.

Then with a quick glance at Tegolin as the girl sat pondering, elbows on knees and chin on knuckles, she sank to the floor at her feet, and with extended arms, and Catharine's long arms always suggested the shape of her body, felt for her friend's fingers.

"Won't you tell me, now we understand each other, and don't hate each other as we might, considering" — all this was gasped out in one quick breath— "why you don't like this plot of Alice's mother and your mother to take Grey prisoner. It sounds to me is if it were a very good plot and couldn't fail; and I'm sure the men'll be delighted with it."

"Get up from the floor then. It's cold down there. And put some wood on the fire. And sit quietly by me here."

Catharine patiently obeyed her in all these details. "What a noise those crows are making," she said, as she sank down by the elder girl's side. "I expect they're young ones."

"What's troubling me is this," said Tegolin, disregarding the crows, and disregarding too, for neither of them could see it, the complete disappearance — into a moss-green enchanted forest that extended through the wall, through the fortress, through the mountain passes, through Conway and Carnarvon and Aber-Menai and all the Isle of Mona — the horned beast with the cross between its antlers. Yes, deep into this mystic forest of Catharine's first imaginings did that horned head recede. It receded where Merlin long ago receded. It receded where the spirit of the old Iolo receded; and where the figure of a youthful Rhisiart, taller than human, braver than human, more single-hearted than human, was forever receding.

"What's troubling me is this," said Tegolin. "We both have known well enough, though we haven't talked about it, that while the women have been plotting in my mother's room, the men have been plotting in the great hall. I expect mother knows what they're plotting through that man."

Catharine tightened her grasp upon the strong, cool fingers of her friend, so that the latter should be aware with what grown-up perception this reluctance to mention the Hog of Chirk was understood.

"But how do you know about it, Tegolin dear?

The Maid hesitated, and there was once more the danger of her tell-tale complexion indicating the fact that they were on dangerous ground. On no point in the world are deep-natured people more touchy than with regard to their relations with the man or with the woman who until now has been their ideal, when the irrepressible compass-needle of their heart shows that a different constellation is moving towards the north.

"The Friar goes in and out of the hall," she murmured gently, "and though on the subject of poor King Richard his mind does sometimes wander, in everything else he is wise. I've never known a wiser man!"

Catharine hastened to agree with this judgment. And indeed she did most heartily agree; for Mad Huw had endeared himself by purity and courtesy to every woman in that little court.

"Go on," she said, after a sad pause between them, in which the spring air, as it breathed upon their tense faces, seemed to both of them like the breath of destiny.

"Well, it appears that some of the men who have lately brought their ponies and spears to your father's allegiance say that in the mountains of Maelienydd to the north-east of Radnor, or Maesyfed as we call it, there's a strong, though secret movement in our favour; a movement that would give us, if a few good leaders went down there, the best chance we've had yet for striking a real blow at the cruel King."

Catharine pulled her hand away and jumped to her feet. "But this is grand news!" she cried. "Why can't I rush to Father's room now, and tell him what a good idea this is!"

Tegolin looked so horror-struck that the eager girl grew grave at once, and remembered her vow. But she didn't sit down. A violent restlessness seized her. She went to the fire and piled it up with wood, till the whole little chamber glowed in the twilight and her own impatient shadow — distorted so much that it actually did look like that Queen on his chessboard to which the Prince had compared her — bowed mockingly before the immovable Saint Clare and raced up and down the verge of that mystic forest.

But Catharine was the last person in the world to take any interest in the antics of a shadow, even if such a shadow possessed the power of locomotion without the aid of fins or wings or arms or legs. She turned to her motionless visitor who had bent forward again, her chin propped once more against the knuckles of her boyish hands.

"I can't understand you, Tegolin," she said earnestly. "No, I can't! Here are two perfect plots, either of which would help our cause better than anything yet thought of in that 'magician's room,' and instead of being thrilled by such news you're sad about it, and—"

But she clapped her hands to her mouth in the old dramatic gesture of catching oneself in some outrageous lapse. "Is it because he is with my father in that room," she brought out, "and you think their plans will be disturbed by this Ruthin idea, or this Maelienydd idea?"

Tegolin rose to her feet at this, a frank smile on her full lips. "It's you who're the magician, Catrin, not the Prince! On my life, child, you must be a thought-reader, like Mistress Dilys. But if I was thinking just what you said, it isn't only that. Oh, I don't know. It's so hard to explain." She stretched herself and yawned, covering her mouth with one hand while she extended the other into the air with her fingers clenched.

"I think it's like this," she said, after a second's concentrated thought. "I feel odd and queer with these consultations going on and they not hearing anything about them. How do those Maelienydd men know, how do these Ruthin women know what your father and Rhisiart ab Owen have been planning for the cause, now that the warm weather's come? And Broch-o'-Meifod and Master Brut; they're in the Prince's counsels too; and I can't believe that thinkers and scholars like them aren't better advisers to your father than my poor mother and Mistress Dilys and Rhys Gethin and that man! And another thing too my dear. I know your father comes up every day to your mother's room and turns us all out while they talk. Well! don't you think your father's and mother's brains together are worth more than a conclave of ladies round a fortune-teller, or a group of troopers drinking mead while that man polishes their spears?"

Catharine looked at her sharply. They were facing each other now in the fading light of the window and the growing light of the fire. "Isn't a woman's instinct," Owen's daughter protested, "a better guide than a man's reason? And when women are gathered together—"

"The devil enters into them! No, I don't quite mean that, Catrin; though I've heard the Friar say it. But — oh, I can't explain the feeling I have; perhaps it's Mistress Dilys and my poor mother — but of the two plots I'd sooner trust the other one, for all the drinking, and that man!"

"Who's the Sheriff of Maesyfed?" asked Catharine, feeling a delicious thrill of excitement to be discussing affairs of state, like the daughter of a real ruler.

Tegolin frowned as she pondered. "The Friar did say his name. I'll tell you in a minute! He's a famous English Bard, the Friar said."

"Does he compose to the harp like old Griffith?"

Tegolin didn't smile at her friend's simplicity. She was in no smiling mood; but she hastened to assure her that in England poets only wrote down in books what they made up. "I heard Iolo tell about it once. They write for scholars and gentlemen over there. They don't play the harp for the common people. Oh, I remember the name now — Thomas Clanvow — and Iolo said he wrote about cuckoos and nightingales!”

“He can’t be much of a Sheriff,” commented the younger girl. “Rhys Gethin would soon settle him!”

But there fell a silence between them then; while the air through the window, blowing now, as darkness began to descend, with a gathering force, made the flames of the fire flicker, and caused a faint ripple, more like a movement upon deep water than the stir of leaves, to run shivering over the green forest on the wall.

Catharine broke the silence, but something about that sudden stir in the dim world of her childhood’s imaginings made her speak in a low grave voice.

Instead of replying, Tegolin moved to an alcove in the room overhung with embroidered curtains and returned with a cloak which she wrapped tenderly round the other’s shoulders.

“Who is the Lord—” the young girl repeated, still in the same low voice, and quite oblivious of the fact that this rising gust might be chilling her friend too.

“Mortimer,” said Tegolin.

“Mortimer,” repeated Catharine.

There was another silence between them, during which the Maid of Edeyrnion went to the window and drew a heavy piece of tapestry across it. As she did so she felt as if she were shutting out the word “Mortimer” along with the night-wind.

“The Earl of March,” she said more cheerfully when this was done, “is only a little boy. But he has a claim to the throne; so Bolingbroke keeps him with his own children. Some say the Mortimers are as restless as the Percies under this cruel tyrant. If that's true I don't know whether 'twould be good policy or bad policy to attack their domain. Hotspur himself's in Denbigh now; and I know your father was careful to leave Denbigh alone when he raided the Vale of Clwyd. So it may be he won't hear of attacking Maelienydd."

She paused for a moment, watching the wind make that little piece of tapestry flap like a diminutive sail. "It's cold up here, Catrin," she said, "let's sit close to the fire."

The two girls began pulling along the floor a cushioned bench and settling it in front of the blaze; but the rising wind, causing their little curtain to bulge inwards, whirled a cloud of smoke into their faces.

"It's always like that," cried Catharine impatiently, pulling back her friend. "I just go to bed when it begins. Let's go down to Mother. She's still got some of that Turkish sweetmeat — unless Sibli's eaten it. Are there any others except the little Earl?"

"I believe there's an uncle," said Tegolin indifferently, "who's another Edmund," and she concluded with a yawn.

"Edmund who?" murmured Catharine peevishly, while with a shiver she clung to her friend, flinging a portion of her mantle over Tegolin.

"Mortimer," said the other. "And I expect he'll be more of a danger to us than the nightingale man."

"Lord Edmund?" whispered the child, still shivering.

"Lord, Count, Sir — I don't know! Plain 'Sir,' I expect. Catrin, I believe you've taken cold! Where's that iron guard? We oughtn't to leave the fire like this. Why did you put on so much?"

She found the protection required, and leaving that gusty and smoky turret, the two girls descended the stairs together. They were not destined, however, to reach the Arglwyddes' room as quickly as they hoped. They had to cross the big hall to reach it and ascend a different flight of stairs, but what they found in the hall completely paralysed all further intention.

There was an awestruck group of men, some holding torches, others pushing hastily forward between the torch-bearers, and then either drawing back in superstitious fear, or standing petrified and staring. The appearance of the two young women produced no little agitation on the outskirts of the group; though those in front were too awestruck to notice them.

"They've sent for the Prince," explained the officious Rawlff. "It's the Old Crow from Dinas Bran."

But the nervous Elphin, white and trembling, and too panic-stricken to realize what he did, actually clutched at Catharine's mantle. "Don't go near!" he whimpered. "They daren't touch him. He's got a sword through him. He's all blood!"

"Catharine!" And Owen himself, with Rhisiart behind him, was at their side. "Away with you, child! Away with you! How could—" and he turned angrily to reproach Tegolin; but the Maid had already pushed herself between the torch-bearers. "Take her to her mother, boy!" And leaving his daughter with his squire, he followed the Maid into the centre of the group.

If Catharine hadn't been already unnerved by the mortmain of that ominous wind in her green forest, it is doubtful whether she would have yielded to Rhisiart's pressure. But her flesh was weaker than her spirit, and she let him carry her, "he willing and she unwilling," as Homer would say, up the stairs to the Arglwyddes' chamber.

For a moment the Prince himself felt his stomach turn sick at what he saw. Face upwards on the ground with a trickle of blood oozing from his back and forming a little pool at some distance from him, for the floor was uneven, lay the Seneschal of Dinas Bran. His face beneath the torch-light was of a death-pallor but his eyes were wide open and Owen could see he knew him at once. Indeed his lips murmured his name. But what was so ghastly about it, what was causing even those indurated warriors to feel sick as they gazed, was the fact that the man's hind-quarters were actually transfixed by that monstrous relic of the Bronze Age which he had insisted on preserving as the sword of Eliseg.

The Prince saw at once that this abominable weapon had been deliberately thrust through the old gentleman's rump; and as he lay there, not mortally wounded but dying from pain and shame, his thin form in its grey clothes made with the sword that pierced him the shocking image of a bleeding cross.

Over him knelt the figures of Father Pascentius and Broch-o'-Meifod, while the Maid, crouching on the ground, had succeeded in clasping her hands beneath his head.

Owen knelt down too bending low over the dying man; and no sooner had he done so than the old gentleman in a very low but perfectly clear voice told him all that had happened. It seemed a comfort to him to talk: indeed it had always been a comfort to him to talk; but what troubled all his listeners now was that in every interval of his entirely coherent narrative his face took on an expression of unredeemed despair. It was like a mask speaking, speaking firmly and clearly; but at each moment when the voice paused the mask faded, and the image of a human soul damned by shame substituted itself for that voluble medium.

"I wanted to — make peace — make a lasting peace, Owen ap Griffith," he said, "and I talked to the Constable and I found that he also wanted peace between the two races. And so I took the sword of Eliseg out of its chest, for I durst not leave it, and I rode to Denbigh to talk to Hotspur. And I found that Hotspur also wanted peace between our races. So I rode on, carrying the sword. I had no other arms, and I had no one with me, but I rode on to come to you; for I wanted to talk to you about peace between the two races. I got as far as the foot of the mountains. My horse was strong and my heart was strong. But his spies must have told Lord Grey" — here something like a faint smile flickered for a second across the mask under which he covered the despair of his shame— "and the young Lord, he whose wits are turned, followed me with a band. They knew the mountains better than I and they waited till I was near you — your watchmen didn't see them — and then —"

A terrible ruffling of the mask of his despair took place at this point, like the ruffling by a crisscross wind of the surface of a dark stream. But he fixed his eyes on Owen's eyes, which were now close to his own, and, after a few convulsive spasms of pain which hardly seemed to reach his consciousness, he went on steadily. "He's out of his wits, the young Lord, from love or witchcraft, and 'twas he alone who thought of what to do. There was little light left, but enough for his purpose, enough to serve, enough to make the name of Adda ap Leurig a jest in men's mouths forever. His men wouldn't do it at first, but he threatened them with his father, and they — did it — at last."

Tegolin's hands were already pressed into her ears; while the Lollard, his eyes tight shut was muttering, "Jesus, Jesus, Jesus."

Broch-o'-Meifod, his head wagging from side to side like the pendulum of a clock, had completely lost all human expression. Into the sockets of his lost eyeballs there had descended from the peaks of Snowdon the endurance of primordial matter, matter that had not stirred in its vigil since the last Ice Age.

But Owen, his thoughts racing through his skull like the men described by Aneirin who rode drunk to Cattraeth, allowed his soul to exteriorize itself, till it crouched like a small white bird upon the handle of the bronze sword, where it surveyed, with an unlidded stare, the blood and the excrement.

“They ran the sword sideways,” went on that supine mask, “so that — it should — it should only pierce the flesh — and then they left me alone — and went away. And I walked like that — till your people found me.”

“Yes he did!” interposed Rawlff, “for I saw him! He walked with the sword through his backside. He looked like—”

“Be quiet, boy!” cried the Prince fiercely. But the old man seemed glad to have this corroboration of his words. “I did — didn’t I, lad?” he repeated. “I walked — a long way — putting all — my life — to shame!” He paused and the men about him, and that one girl whose hands were tending him, drew the long relieved sigh that human beings draw when they know the worst.

But the worst was yet to be spoken as far as the proud old antiquary of Dinas Bran was concerned. “I couldn’t hold back,” he muttered in a low terrible voice. “And my dirt’s on the sword of Eliseg.”

This said, his mask fell away, and what those onlookers beheld were the features of a man who has desecrated his own idol.

“I wouldn’t let them pull out his sword,” this unmasked face now whispered, “till I saw you, Owen ap Griffith, with his belt.”

At that the man closed his eyes and gave himself up to the thought that as long as the Welsh language lasted — which would be as long as Snowdon lasted — his name would be a by-word and a jest. His name would be Adda y Gwman, “Adam the Rump.”

“Well,” he said to himself coldly, “Adam the Rump’s thoughts will end when they pull it out; it’s right that the sword of Eliseg should lie in the belt of Eliseg.”

And then with the calmness of someone whose life-illusion has been destroyed and before whose despair all is equal, the old peace-maker told himself that he ought to have gone straight to Bolingbroke with his peace-pact, and not merely to Hotspur.

Young Rhisiart meanwhile, who had been spared what the rest had endured, now re-appeared upon the scene, his face shining like a man who returns to earth after a vision of heaven; and indeed it had seemed more than heaven to him to carry Catharine in his arms, willing or unwilling, up all those stairs.

But Owen no sooner set eyes on him — the Prince was on his feet again now — than he despatched him to the "magician's chamber" to fetch the belt of the old king.

When the boy had gone the Prince turned impatiently to the three men who were still on their knees. "Shrive him, for Christ's sake, Father!" he cried earnestly to the monk. "He'll die when it's pulled out!"

Father Pascentius commenced automatically a deeply-intoned Latin psalm, to which the prostrate man paid no more attention than if it had been the tolling of a bell. But the monk interrupted himself and rose to his feet. "I must fetch the Last Sacraments," he muttered, rubbing at the blood upon him with the corner of his habit.

The result of this gesture was that not only one little rock-plant but several botanical specimens, along with a sprinkling of earth-mould, fell upon the body of the Seneschal.

But the Lollard — the monk once gone — snatched at this providential opportunity. "Jesus," he groaned, while the guileless earnestness of his imploring countenance held the old man's attention. "Jesus was humiliated worse than you! O think of it, my father, think of it, my dear lord! Think of His humiliation!"

But nothing save an infinite despair was in the flickering smile with which the old man responded. “Jesus was God,” he muttered. “What’s that to me?”

And Master Brut, choking in his helpless pity, for he had uttered his all, bowed his head and was silent.

Then it was the turn of Broch-o’-Meifod. Making a sweeping gesture with his hand which even the Prince obeyed, he made them all rise up and move back. “Listen, man,” he whispered, so that Adam alone could hear. “I’m going to pull out that bit of rusty iron; and then you’ll be dead before they come.”

So startling were these words that for a second the ice of despair round the old man’s soul cracked. Into this crack, before the ice could freeze again, Broch plunged his second bolt; aiming with Satanic insight, not at the man’s despair, but at the life-illusion whose death-pangs were causing that despair. He appealed from Adam the Antiquary to Adam the Pacifist; and as he beat down the one fixed idea he lifted the other from beneath its corpse.

“Bronze and rust, that’s all it is. A man’s dirt and a man’s blood are more precious than rusty bronze! And the belt — an old piece of saddle leather! And Eliseg — rest his bones under his pillar — foxes and crows have vented on him time out of mind! Men in after ages, Master Adam, will think less of swords and belts than of blood and dirt. Is Edward of Carnarvon a laughing-stock because they killed him with a red-hot clyster? No! No! He died for Gaveston, his darling, and that’s their tavern jest, if there is any!

“And shall I tell you—” It cannot have been his words, for the Badger of Meifod was a blundering and obscure speaker. It must have been that those deep eye-sockets into which the dying man was staring seemed full of the blood and excrement of the whole world suddenly become holy!

At any rate Master Adam's expression had now assumed the look of a man who has disgorged a snake's head and can breathe again. There was hardly any need to go on; but Broch-o'-Meifod went on. "And what will you die for? That's what'll live as long as Snowdon! You'll die for believing that a Welshman's bones are the same as an Englishman's. You'll die for believing that men are men first, and Welshmen and Englishmen afterwards. You'll die, Master Adam, for a future ten times further removed than Eliseg's past. You'll die—"

But the old man stopped him. "Pull it out; and let me die," he whispered, "while you look like that."

And then, lifting his hand feebly towards his face, where Tegolin's hair was brushing his cheek, "Who's that? The Maid? Kiss me, Maid — and say good-night — and then off with you!"

His voice had the old tone of authority of the Seneschal of Dinas Bran, and for the next second nobody could see his face, so covered was it by Tegolin's hair; but from where he stood in the torch-light it seemed to Owen that from the head of that living cross on the floor there had blossomed a great fiery flower.

When the girl was gone, Broch-o'-Meifod and the Prince exchanged a quick look. Owen hadn't caught what they'd whispered; but he now heard the voice of Father Pascentius, as the monk re-entered the hall, and that decided him. He nodded to his friend. Even the most hardened of the troopers turned away their heads, and the Lollard shut his eyes.

When it was done it was clear to all that the man was dying. The pageboy Rawlff, who alone hadn't turned away, whispered to his neighbour, "Who'd have thought that the Crow had so much blood in him?"

There was indeed only a little space left, close to the man's head, that was free from blood, and when at last Father Pascentius had finished his rites it was there he knelt. Broch-o'-Meifod, still on his knees, looked as he leant on the handle of the bronze sword like a Neolithic giant after some life-and-death struggle.

"Jesus, Joseph, and Mary, in peace with you I give up my ghost," murmured the monk, calling upon the Seneschal to repeat the words after him, but at that moment there was a disturbing movement among the onlookers, for Rhisiart had returned with the belt.

Supposing in his logical mind that nothing would make the old man give up the ghost more happily than to see these sacred objects re-united, the brave lad forgot for once to glance at his master. Advancing straight to Broch's side he held out what he had brought to the kneeling giant.

But Broch-o'-Meifod seemed completely oblivious of everything but the prostrate figure before him. It was old Adam himself who took in what was happening, and a most curious smile lit up his face. "Put them away, boy," he commanded faintly, "I — must go — I must go now — to the King."

Thus speaking this treacherous custodian of the sword of Eliseg closed his eyes, and a minute later set forth unattended on his final peace mission.

It was not much more than a week after the death of the Seneschal that the Prince actually departed to make trial of the bold stroke that those feminine conclaves had planned.

Rhys Gethin was unwilling to go. The less tricky and more purely military campaign against the Radnorshire lands of the Mortimers had by this time become an obsession with him. Owen did, however, swear on the hilt of Eliseg's sword, now safe in Eliseg's belt, that if he came back alive — with or without Lord Grey — his next move should be the one projected in the smoke of the hall-fire and under the inspiration of Nant Clwyd mead.

As for Rhisiart, his spirits had risen higher, and his confidence in himself had grown deeper, during these last months, than ever before in his life.

This was not merely due to the spring, or even to the sharp, sweet, springtime pangs of his feeling for Catharine. It was largely due to the fact that he found himself progressing fast — more to his own astonishment than might have been supposed — in those astute arts of statecraft and diplomacy which of all things he admired most in the world.

Owen's ways in these difficult paths exactly suited him. The master's imagination would go skimming between wind and tide, like a river ouzel, while the servant's more practical intelligence would work out with the shrewdness of a water-rat the details of the scheme.

Where the lad had been a real statesman, and had every reason to be surprised at his success, was in the case of Father Pascentius. The monk knew everything that went on in that mountain-court, as much among the women as among the men, nor had he missed one psychic current of the queer disturbance left in all their nerves by the passing of the comet. Rhisiart, therefore, following some inspired hint from his Prince, had resolved after their return from Nannau that he would stop at nothing to gain the confidence of the enigmatic person behind those all-devouring eyes.

It first occurred to him to play upon the theologian's vanity as a confessor; but he quickly found that his most secret vices — even to that dark quiver he derived from certain forms of cruelty — were sins so trifling and childish to a confessor from a monastery that he was driven to invention; and it soon became evident that not only had Providence deprived him of the more labyrinthine forms of evil, but it hadn't even endowed him with the power of inventing them.

His next idea was to feign an interest in theological metaphysic; but he couldn't carry this design very far for the simple reason that when he began to study the Father's Commentary upon Saint Thomas he came bolt up against his old Oxford difficulties with Aristotle.

"The philosopher isn't logical," he would groan as he went to sleep. "He may have invented logic; but it isn't the logic of Roman Law."

But his chance came at last. Quite by accident he encountered the Father one day upon one of his botanical excursions. Anything more removed from the study of Nature than our young friend's interests could hardly be imagined; but by good luck, among her other girlish caprices, Catharine ferch Owen had welcomed that warm spring weather by instituting a little secret garden of her own in a secluded spot among the mountain-birches. Here she would resort, and here Rhisiart soon acquired the habit of finding her; so that when he stumbled on this one weak spot in his learned man's armour he joyfully exploited it, not only for diplomatic reasons, but inspired by the glamour of Catharine's vernal retreat.

And here was one occasion where the subtle confessor of men cared nothing for hidden motives. It was so wonderful to him to find at last another human mind with which he could share his passion that in his excitement he forgot his normal discretion; and the pupil of Snowdonian flora began to tap little by little other secrets than those connected with the waywardness of rock-plants.

Thus it came about that Owen's secretary was not only acquainted with the double conclave going on, but was even able, through the medium of Luned in the one case, and of the officious Rawlff in the other, to inject various timely modifications into both the schemes, modifications that sprang from no lower source than the imagination of Owen himself.

And all this, running parallel with certain paradisic moments in Catharine's "garden," animated our friend's narrow features with such a triumphant gleam that poor little Sibli was driven to show that she too had her claim on him by sarcasms so lively that the laughter they caused among the Arglwyddes' maids made him shy of going near her.

With Father Pascentius propitiated, and the Prince away on his wild-goose chase, there was little to dread, during these warm mid-April days, when the lad paid his visits to Catharine's hillside refuge.

It is true that since old Adda's death the Arglwyddes felt a little nervous of letting her daughter leave the enclosure alone; but she contented herself with insisting that when the girl went up the hill the old Porter, Glew the Gryd, should go with her. But as Glew the Gryd was on duty at night he generally found for himself a sheltered spot under the birches; and though by his side lay the sharpest war-axe in the fortress, his head would soon sink forward upon his leather jerkin in profound unconsciousness.

Those were without doubt the happiest days in Catharine's life; and with that self-protective instinct that great creative Nature has given to girls in love she allowed herself to take the days as they passed without looking forward or backward. She went to sleep thinking of Rhisiart, and if her carved image of Saint Clare, as the fire-light flickered upon it, stared coldly into the gulf of darkness revealed through the arrow-slit window, she cared not.

Nor did she even care when the horned stag, with the cross between its antlers, began gliding like a pale ghost in and out of the branches of its green forest.

Rhisiart's presence was about her, his voice was in her ears, his arms were round her. The one tangible object in her room upon which she would fix her eyes as she knelt to tell her beads was neither her green forest nor her childhood's saint; it was a silver bowl full of celandines. She had come to associate Rhisiart with these hard, bright, metallic flowers. Their glittering bodiless comet-heads with shining spatulate leaves were more independent and more defiant than other plants. It only pleased Catharine that their stalks should be so chilly and that they had no scent! They resembled young warriors, she told herself, and young chancellors too, with their piercing starry eyes held so straight, and their smooth, cool, dark, queer-shaped foliage — just like Rhisiart's inscrutable and far-reaching thoughts!

It troubled her a little, when he talked to her of all the things that must be done, when the last Englishman had been driven out of the country, to make Wales the pride of Christendom, that she had been so remiss in her lessons. She had begged him to bring up to their hiding-place a specimen of his work in the magician's chamber; but when he brought her a copy of his Latin letter to the Irish chieftains with its illuminated capitals and all its curlicues and flourishes, and when he showed her her Father's name as Owynus Princeps and translated some of his most eloquent appeals, in the style, he told her, of the best letter-writers in Rome, the shame of her ignorance made a little teasing cloud upon her exultant pride in his powers.

"Shall I ever dare to tell him," she thought, "that I can hardly write 'Catharine ferch Owen' without making a mistake; and that I've only read the first page of the Consolations of Boethius which Iolo gave me before he died?"

The Prince had been away now for nearly a fortnight, and all manner of wild rumours about him kept rising up and dying down in hall and bower.

But Rhisiart remained cheerful and calm, always assuring her that Owen bore a charmed life, and that even if he didn't capture Lord Grey there was more danger of Henry invading Snowdon than of the Prince falling into the hands of his enemies.

One especially warm and windless day, about two o'clock in the afternoon, the boy and the girl were seated on their favourite log, overlooking the little natural spring that rippled from its grey basin like a real fountain among the mosses and fronds and nameless rock-plants of this happy retreat.

Catharine had so arranged her garden that this stream wandered between her stitchworts and primroses and cuckoo-flowers before it reached her favourite bed of celandines. On this occasion they were aware of an intrusive wood-pigeon, who rustling down upon a mountain-ash behind them began its melodious moan.

They were both so happy in their love that day that they were fearful lest even a kiss should ruffle the smooth deep tide on whose wave they floated. One hand was in her lap now, held tight in Rhisiart's fingers, the other was hanging loose at her side, twisting and untwisting a spray of ivy that had strayed from their log among the bracken-fronds.

"Rhisiart!" He turned his head towards her. How flaxen her hair was; more, he told himself, like the daughter of a Norseman than of a British Prince!

"This bird's too happy," she whispered. "Do you like it, Rhisiart, going on like that — over and over — and those last two notes always left behind, as if it were hiding them before it flies away so that they'll be all hoarded and safe when it gets back? How can it be so happy, and yet so hiding and hoarding? It's too happy! Oh, they're greedy things! They eat and eat!"

With a rustling so heavy that it was almost a clatter the wood-pigeon flapped off.

"It heard you," said the lad. "I don't see why it shouldn't eat all it can get, and I don't see why it shouldn't drag out its song if it wants to."

"Rhisiart!"

He knew that he was going to receive some disturbing shock from the way her fingers tightened on his own; and he knew it too from another little sign, from the way she lifted her free arm and mechanically brushed from her brow, where it must have been tickling her, a long-stalked primrose that with no little trouble and pains he had twisted into her flaxen hair.

The rejected flower, its brittle pink stem broken, fluttered down on the black sleeve of Rhisiart's scholarly tunic where it rested under his eye; but he dare not make the least movement towards it, because the girl's mood frightened him, and he'd already discovered that, like the Prince, Catharine ferch Owen had to be handled with considerable tact.

Neither the wise Luned nor the sharp-witted Sibli would have believed it possible that two young people could love each other with such an absence of ordinary amorousness. But they were both very young, and they were both fanatical idealists; and if now and then Catharine's mind was disturbed by natural girlish longings, the fact that any sensuality to be an overpowering temptation to Rhisiart had to be associated with domination, if not with cruelty, kept his feelings with regard to his little Princess on such a level of pure romance that she had no inducement to give way to this yielding vein.

But she thought of him day and night. She would wake early and watch the indescribable greyness of the hour before dawn as it touched the cold mouldings of her narrow window and poured itself like a presence round her sleep-warmed limbs. And always diffused in their grey light were the looks and ways and tones of the boy she loved. The cry of a hoot-owl at night was a menace to their love; the chattering of the starlings, when the sun rose in the eastern sky, was an omen of its prosperous issue.

During all this perfect day — the happiest of her whole life — they had only kissed twice, and these kisses had been quick and hurried and fleeting, free from all clinging passion. And yet there hadn't been a morsel of food that the girl had tasted, or a single voyaging fragrance that had come to her out of the earth, or one petal-ful of yellow sunshine caught on her bare arm that hadn't melted her in a floating ecstasy of happiness.

And just as Owen had prayed on his knees before he was declared Prince that thick darkness might cover his future, so day after day, and today most of all, did his daughter hide her joy under an iridescent mist.

A spell was upon her that every motion in her being guarded from the peril of thought. In a warm, dark, oblivion, oblivion to yesterday, oblivion to tomorrow, she hid her happiness and nourished her love, keeping them back, holding them down, so that like daffodil bulbs under the sheltering mould their green shoot might expand unseen.

And Rhisiart, as he gazed anxiously at her now, struggling to read the mystery of her mood, trembling, fearing lest some unguessed-at quiver in the air should threaten the towers of his new Dinas Bran, kept thinking to himself how strange it was that he should be content to touch her — he who had had such wicked and sinister relations with other women!

"I shall tell her, of course, when we're married," he said to himself, "everything about Luned and Sibli and Mistress Lowri; but no need to do it yet! Girls are different from men." For some reason he felt it was no more incumbent upon him to tell her about Tegolin than about Modry or his mother. The Maid seemed a part of that natural background of a person's life that was outside Love's Confessional.

"Why do you think it is, Rhisiart," she burst out almost fiercely, "that I'm so afraid for our happiness? I didn't mean to tell you; but that greedy pigeon—"

The experienced profligate by her side drew an infinite sigh of relief. So after all it was only a girl's nonsense! He boldly replaced the broken flower in her hair and lifted her hand to his lips.

"I'm not afraid, Catharine. Your Father likes me. He depends on me. When we've driven the English out I'm going to see the great Master Young, and get him to be Chancellor to Owynus Princeps. Master Brut will be the head of our new Universities. But your Father will depend on me to revise the Laws of Hywel the Good. Hywel the Good was — what is it, Catharine? Don't you believe me? Why did you smile like that?"

But Owen's daughter had ceased smiling. "Just go and see — will you? — if Glew the Gryd is still asleep. I wouldn't like—" and she gave him one of those confederate glances out of her Glendower eyes that always enchanted him and reduced him to proud obedience. The minute he was lost in the tender green of the birches she jumped up from the log, tossed back her long straight hair, stretched herself, and uttered a queer whistling sound between her teeth that was neither a sigh nor a laugh nor a groan. What it really was was the body of a young girl lamenting to the birches and the stalks of the stitchworts and the spores of the mosses that the Laws of Hywel Dda couldn't beget children! But the mind of Catharine ferch Owen was too occupied in holding back the unknown future, against which she pressed her white arms as if against the scaly front of a dragon, to bother very much what her body was feeling. She did stoop down, however, and picked up the flower about which her lover had been so meticulous, hesitating whether or not to place it in her bosom.

As she held it between her finger and thumb she noticed that not only was its stalk broken but its petals were drooping. And it seemed to her as if that pale yellow flower, while it wilted between her fingers, began answering a complaint she had never uttered.

"Yes, boys are shy and difficult when they love," the yellow flower said. "When they don't love it's different. Then they don't care what blossoms they break."

Having delivered itself of this cold comfort, and comfort for a trouble of which Catharine, floating on the waves of her happiness, had been unaware, the selfish flower turned the conversation to its own affairs.

"I know," it said, "'tis a custom in stories for maidens to thrust us into their bosoms; and it's indeed a pure, soft, and fragrant death wherewith you're threatening me, Catharine; but I would far rather you threw me into the stream where I could enjoy the light of the blessed sun for a day or two longer!"

"But I'd have put you into the third page of Boethius," protested Catharine, "where's there's an illuminated 'R' in three colours."

But the primrose was silent. The tiny hairs on its pink stalk leaned sideways. Over its beautiful eye there crept a misty film. Its calices changed their hue. One of its petals began to curl inwards at the edge.

"I'll put you in a glass by yourself — not with the celandines. No, I can't do that; for Tegolin'll see you and know exactly why you're there. Very well then! I'll put you into my fountain; and when Rhisiart comes tomorrow I'll show him how fresh you are!"

She did in fact hurry to her fountain's brink and there search about till she found a little miniature bay in its stone margin. Here she arranged the wilted blossom, with its head against the stone and its long stalk, twisted now by reflection as well as by accident, deep in the water. Her hair swept the water as she bent down, but this did not prevent a tiny but fierce stickleback from biting at that bruised stalk, which it doubtless suspected of biological kinship with the patient tribe of worms.

The violent movement of the stickleback disturbed a water-beetle from its afternoon sleep by shaking off a little group of vegetation-parasites which still clung to the primrose-stalk. These unarmed miniscules of the land now drifted, clinging to each other in shivering apprehension, into the watery gulfs of unknown regions, regions which to their simple minds must have been full of all the hungry monarchs and all the torture-loving archbishops of the aquatic world.

But having arranged the wilted blossom to what she felt to be the flower’s complete satisfaction — and further than that how could the responsibility of the most beneficent goddess go? — she proceeded, still on her knees by her fountain, to remove various fragments of slaty stone that struck her as impeding rather than assisting the exploring tendrils of certain small rock-plants of which none but Father Pascentius could have named even the species.

Suddenly the ghastly thought struck her: “Suppose Lord Grey’s men have been prowling about here ever since they murdered old Adda!” She scrambled to her feet and with difficulty restrained herself from running wildly down the hill in the direction where the young man had vanished.

“Suppose David Gam” — for that lurid tale, told with savage exaggerations, had reached every girl in the fortress— “armed with his dedicated knife, were lying in wait?”

But she must stay where she was. If she set off to look for him they might miss. Probably Glew the Gryd had changed the place of his afternoon siesta. But oh, how completely all obscure fears of the future had vanished at the touch of this immediate terror!

She saw him lying on the ground like that Englishman she’d seen Rhys Gethin kill,’ and like that glimpse she’d had of old Adda in his pool of blood. ’Twas a pity Rhisiart couldn’t have stolen upon her at that moment as the prince had stolen upon Gam and the pages! He certainly would have seen her under an aspect completely new to him. Each particular hair of her flaxen weight of tresses seemed stirred by an electric wind; and her eyes were as big and her cheeks as white and pinched as if she were gazing at a scaffold.

It kept growing upon her more and more vividly that she saw Rhisiart lying in his blood. He was calling to her for help. Oh, she must fly to him! But no; she must stay where she was. Suddenly her whole body stiffened. It wasn’t Catharine, it was the statue of a paralysed wood-nymph that stood there. Yes! — again and again — distinct and clear through the misty sunshine — the sound of a horn!

Then, just as her rebellious blood was rushing to take her, whatever her reason might do, flying on the wind to her love, the birch-branches were moved aside. She leapt forward with a gasping cry — only to encounter the unwieldy form of Glew the Gryd, carrying his axe on his shoulder. How the sunlight made that bright weapon gleam!

“Don’t be frightened, Missy,” said the old man kindly, though Catharine could see he was trembling with excitement. ‘“Twas Master Rhisiart what sent me to ‘ee. ‘A told me to say to ‘ee that thee’d best get home-along, for the Prince be come back, and have brought with him, in good clanking chains, Lord Grey and young Grey, captives of his mighty spear!”

Nothing but the deep-instilled precepts of the wise Arglwyddes kept Catharine then from leaving Glew the Gryd in the lurch and running at top-speed to the castle-gate. As it was she reduced the Porter to breathlessness by the pace she set him. But it was with the panting old gentleman close at her side, bright-glittering axe and all, that she finally came upon the scene — and what a scene! Never to her dying day did she forget it.

The whole population of that mountain-court seemed to be assembled on the grassy slope in front of those great gates; and the cries of triumphant welcome that went up drowned all the eager questions and answers that kept passing from mouth to mouth.

There was her father; and oh! how magnificent he looked, mounted on old Seisyll, the long pennon of his tall lance fluttering in the sunshine, with the lion rampant of Mathrafal! And there was her Rhisiart — how glorious it was to meet his flashing eyes! — walking by Seisyll's side and waiting to help the Prince alight.

There was no sign of Broch-o'-Meifod; and there darted through Catharine's mind the thought, "He's Father's best friend; and yet he never comes on the scene unless there's trouble. I don't understand that man. He frightens me." She was surprised, too, not to see the familiar Cistercian habit of Father Pascentius. "I suppose he's off botanizing or writing his book; but I'm glad he's busy. He spoils everything with his staring eyes. Oh, there's Master Brut!" But in her eagerness to get a smile from the Prince she dodged asking herself the reason — perhaps her suspicion of "that witch's daughter," perhaps jealousy of his friendship with Rhisiart — why she was always so glad when Master Brut was not there!

"Room for the Princess Catharine!"

Who was it who had shouted that? It made her cheeks hot with excitement, and yet it gave her an uneasy feeling, too. It was the first time anyone had called her "Princess"; and she saw Lord Grey raise his head for a second in evident surprise. "Oh it's only that ridiculous Rawlff!" And she blushed again; this time for shame at her pleasure.

But the Prince had seen her now; he had dismounted, had given Rhisiart his lance, and was coming to meet her. Oh how proud she was as she embraced him before them all and helped him to unlace his helmet. And Rhisiart was only a few steps behind. Yes, she had them both to herself.

Such, however, is the tangled skein of mortal events that it's rare for one person's good moment not to be paid for by a bad moment for someone else. This absorption of the Prince in his daughter, for Griffith had gone, as he always did, straight into the hall to greet the Arglwyddes, and Meredith and Rhys Gethin were busy with the ponies and the plunder, made it possible for the captives' worst enemies to get close up to them.

Both the prisoners had their hands heavily manacled, but each of them was on horseback, the elder with his head sunk on his breast, the younger staring wildly about him. Lord Grey was a dark, gaunt-boned man of over middle age. He had a pale desolate face that this disaster had frozen into a mask of sullen hopelessness. Master Brut, as he looked at him, wondered what it had been in this gloomy unhappy man that had made him such a close intimate of the King's. When, however, the Earl lifted his head at Rawlff's unexpected cry of "Princess!" the Lollard got more light on the tyrant of Ruthin. Yes, he had the kind of merciless gaze into the blood-and-iron heart of things from which a usurper with his back to the wall might draw strength and support. But how different was this crazy youth!

Master Brut sighed, and told himself that it was the weakness of the heir to those unscalable red walls, more than any quarrel with any neighbour, that had embittered this proud man's heart. But what was the wretched boy so excited about now? He swung round and found himself at once face to face with the cause.

Alice and her mother! The two women were beside themselves with triumph and hate. They pushed past him without seeing him, without knowing him, and the elder one poured forth on Lord Grey such a torrent of imprecations as made the Lollard's blood run cold. The object of this savage vituperation seemed to disregard it completely as far as himself was concerned; but the Lollard could see from the troubled protective glance he threw on his son that what worried him wasn't the screams of the mother, but the deadlier whispers of the daughter, as she pressed herself against the young man's horse and toyed with the iron that bound his wrists.

The sounds that the youth himself emitted as he swayed about in his saddle and allowed his under-lip to hang down and his lower jaw to chatter. made the Lollard think of those words that he knew so well on the lips of Jesus: “And there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth.”

“We know all about what you did to Master Adam, what you did to Master Adam,” he heard the girl repeat in what resembled a low-voiced chant. “And they’ll do the same to you; and they’ll do the same to you!”

There had gathered by this time a most threatening crowd about the two prisoners, a crowd composed not so much of troopers as of menservants and maidservants from the fortress. Reckless and ungracious individuals among these latter began urging on the mother and daughter, and even adding to their maledictions appalling details of the manner in which — so they assured the men in chains — it had been decided they should perish.

But, as we know, it was not in the nature of the owner of Lyde Manor to see two fellow-creatures tormented without interfering. Had that “great gulf’ divided him from them, to which Jesus refers in the story of Lazarus, it is probable that neither God nor Devil would have stopped him from attempting to jump across.

“Woman! Woman!” he cried, seizing Mistress Dilys by the arm and pulling her back. “He’s an old man; he’s suffered much. Can’t you see how much he’s suffered?”

But the crowd’s blood was up, and one of the cooks of the castle, a lusty fellow from Rhys Gethin’s Conway, struck the heretic’s arm with a skewer, compelling him to release the woman, who promptly returned to her post at the prisoner’s side.

Master Brut then seized upon Alice, and, evidently supposing that his pupil in the doctrines of Wycliffe would be more amenable than her parent, proceeded to drag away the struggling girl; explaining to her, as he dragged, that it was the Prince alone who would decide the fate of his prisoners.

This was the first time in their acquaintance that her instructor in the Gospels had ever laid hands on her; and such was the response of her voluptuous body to his virile grasp — for she was a big girl and struggled vigorously against his compulsion, forcing him to take her in his arms — that when an indignant scullion began assailing him with coarse abuse it was she and not Master Brut who retorted to the meddling fellow.

In his simplicity the Lollard hadn't the least idea that to be treated by him in this rough manner and to struggle helplessly against his strength had been the very image that night after night, since her mother had separated her from Tegolin, had made this excitable girl toss about in a fever of desire before she could relax in sleep. He could indeed only attribute it to the miraculous influence of Master Wycliffe when she consented with complete docility to return with him and drag her mother away.

But the Prince himself broke through the crowd now, and gave authoritative orders as to where the prisoners were to be taken. To the surprise of both the surly young Madoc and old Glew the Gryd, who were the officials selected as warders to the two captives, it appeared they were only to be chained to the wall of a chamber not far from Owen's own.

For the purpose of rivetting these chains, however, it was necessary for Master Simon to be called on the scene; but Rhisiart, to whom the Prince delegated the task of supervising this sinister process, was unable to resist the panic-stricken appeals of the younger prisoner, and did his best, in spite of the scowls of Madoc, to re-assure the youth, and make him understand that no physical torture was to be his fate.

As long, however, as Master Simon, with Lowri's evil-looking servant Lawnslot to help him, was at work over them with his burning brazier and his hammer and pincers, it was clear to Rhisiart that it wasn't only the son who was uneasy as to the fate in store for them.

But when the Hog and his assistant had done their work and meat and wine had been brought, and the captives had come to realize that not only was there a fire in their prison but that a channel of running water, to serve them for a latrine, flowed within reach of their chains, the countenance of the younger prisoner perceptibly brightened.

Lord Grey, however, though he remained seated on a wooden stool, with his back to the wall to which their manacles were attached, refused all refreshment save a sip of wine, and kept asking impatiently to see the "Baron Glendourdy."

Rhisiart, who couldn't help recalling how elated his Norman mother had been merely to offer refreshment to a "belted earl," felt that life was indeed an ironic procession of events. Here was he — but he broke off this thought to whisper to Glew the Gryd that it would be advisable if he took turns with Madoc to remain in the room, while the one not so engaged stood on guard outside the door.

It was curious how he himself kept making every excuse he could to stay longer in this room with the captives. He knew perfectly well that it was high time for him to dress for the banquet; and he knew that nothing annoyed the Prince more than lack of ceremony and formality in these old Welsh customs, especially in an adherent whose Norman blood might tend to make him supercilious towards them. And yet he couldn't tear himself away. Nor, down at the bottom of his consciousness, did he deceive himself about the cause of his attraction. It wasn't pity. It wasn't policy. It wasn't his dislike of "those Ruthin women." It was the sight of the chains! Yes, there was something about the idea of proud, well-bred men like Grey and his son being chained to the wall like dogs and having to manage with regard to the necessities of life like dogs that made that old dark nerve, which Lowri had discovered and played upon, quiver once again like the strings of a devil's fiddle.

How passionately he had poured out, in his informal confessions to Father Pascentius, his worst feelings in this kind! But never would he do this again. He had discovered that it is impossible to confess the particular evil with which our peculiar devil maddens us unless our confessor suffers from the same obsession. Short of that, it is as if we are uttering childish and ridiculous absurdities!

And all this while, as he made one silly excuse after another to postpone his departure, talking in English to the younger captive and in Welsh to the Porter, he knew well that the formidable intelligence of the Lord of Ruthin was weighing him up, wondering no doubt if this young Oxford fool couldn't be bribed. And there rushed through his own brain the thought that if only the great Master Young were here, what a chance this was to get such a ransom from this friend of the King that —

He felt so impatient to convey this statesman-like inspiration to Owen that he could hardly endure the thought of the triumphant banquet that he knew must be got through ere he had a chance to be alone with his hero.

"Was I lying to this terrified idiot," he thought, "when I said he was safe from death?" And an uncomfortable memory of how he had helped his master to dispose of one enemy in an extremely disturbing manner, and of the expression on the Prince's face as he went about this, caused a doubt to pass through him. "They'll all want him to put them to death," he thought. He now pretended to be taking from Glew the Gryd a few lessons in torch-making; but in reality he gave the old man a stern command, which he uttered as if it came straight from the Prince, that on no account must any woman be permitted to see the prisoners.

"That'll stop those two witches if they try their games!" he said to himself. "But I must talk to the cooks and scullions. Any real statesman like Master Young would take us for absolute madmen, if he heard we were thinking of killing these men. I wonder how much the Prince could ask? We'd keep the son as hostage, of course, while the father collected it. I suppose it would never do to ask a thousand marks? But why not? — for the King's friend — why not five, why not ten thousand?"

While he bent over the old Porter who had settled himself in a corner of the apartment with his materials for torch-making, Rhisiart couldn't help noticing the way the sallow-cheeked Earl, whose lips bore a clipped moustache as black as a raven's feather, and whose well-shaped teeth were as white as a wolf's, began at once arranging that part of their couch which was within reach of his son, so that as soon as the boy was so minded he could stretch himself out in comparative ease.

Our friend knew that it would be necessary for him to change his clothes before this triumphal banquet, when, as he sighed to think, he would certainly have to endure a prolonged improvisation by Griffith the Bard; and he decided, in order to do honour to his Prince, and incidentally to his own scheme on the Prince's behalf, to attire himself in a new suit of black velvet trimmed with silver, for the designing of which little Sibli, who scoffed at him on all such points, had made herself responsible.

How the small creature's eyes would shine when she saw him enter the hall! By reason of some quirk in his nature he cared nothing for pleasing Catharine in what he wore. It was by what he planned and dared that he wished to impress her! As to Tegolin — for the personality of his women always seemed to follow another in Rhisiart's thoughts, just as in his secretarial work one great legal name inevitably evoked another — he thought no more of how to please her, either by dress or achievement or daring, than he thought of pleasing the earth and the sky.

He couldn't imagine existence without being able to see Tegolin every day and receive her reassuring smile. He left the prison-chamber at last, and the first thing that struck him, when, attired in his court dress but too late to join the ceremonious entry, he made his way down the hall, was the fact that there were two new faces that afternoon.

One of these new-comers had been given the place of honour on the Arglwyddes's right, but it was a shock to him to see that the other was calmly seated in his own unalterable place by the Prince's side!

Owen, who wore what struck the Hereford boy as almost fantastically gorgeous attire, sat there like a golden image. But he had his eye on his belated squire; and Rhisiart, who knew his ways so well and with his Welsh-Norman blood knew so well how to handle him, had need to assume his must injured expression of woefully hurt feelings to induce the Prince to make room for him on his other side!

The guest of honour he saw at once was his old friend the Abbot of Caerleon; but who this spare, high-cheek-boned, hollow-cheeked, dark little man, with a neatly-trimmed pointed beard, might be, he had no notion.

He hadn't long to wait, however, for the Prince hastened to introduce them; and the syllables "Henry Don of Kidwelly" sank happily into the young statesman's mind.

"That means more money as well as more men," he thought, "and the fellow looks a scholar as well as a soldier. I shouldn't be surprised if Rhys Gethin's plan of campaign isn't changed a good deal now! I've always thought it a mistake to antagonize the Mortimers."

He determined to postpone his communication to Broch-o'-Meifod, who had moved to let him sit down, until the drinking began and the ladies were gone; but he couldn't resist — for Rhys Gethin was sitting opposite him and he greatly desired to convey to this fiery warrior, who so nearly had murdered the finest intellect in Wales, the innate superiority of the brain over the sword — the temptation of delicately sounding Henry Don upon this nice strategic point.

It was clear that Owen treated Don with the utmost respect; nor was this a surprise to our astute youth, for he recalled the letter they had received from him and how pleased the Prince had been. "He comes from as far South as the Abbot," he thought. "I hope he suggests a raid upon that quarter."

"Some of us, my Lord of Kidwelly," he began, "have been speculating as to whether it wouldn't be advisable to make a hurried descent upon South Wales. Some of us feel it's important not to annoy either the Percies or the Mortimers" — yes, Rhys Gethin had caught the word 'Mortimer'— "but in the South where you, my Lord of Kidwelly, have so much influence—"

"Master Henry Don is my name, sir," replied that gentleman curtly; and Rhisiart became aware — for he was addressing the new-comer across the golden bifurcation of the Prince's beard — that his master was smiling that particularly disconcerting smile which he knew by experience indicated disapproval. Oh, and worse still — what had he done? — he was certain he caught an exchange of looks between Rhys Gethin and the Prince.

This blow, a blow that was all the more bitter because it was so completely beyond his comprehension — had the Prince secrets, then, with that headstrong soldier that had never been revealed? oh, for Master Young, for Master Young! — threw Rhisiart into such gloom that when the ladies did depart, and the drinking did begin, he felt too deeply sunk in shame to carry out his plan of talking to Broch-o'-Meifod about the ransom.

He was so hurt in his self-esteem that he scarcely knew how long that monotonous chanting and harp-playing of old Griffith went on.

Why didn't the Prince come to his rescue? A few, friendly, intimate words would have been enough; would have soon shown both to Master Don and to Captain Rhys that there were brains, as well as men and money, in Owen's camp. To forget his bitterness he began drinking more than was his wont; so much more in fact that he hardly knew what to answer when in the height of the revelry he found his sleeve pulled by the pretty page Elphin.

"Who wants me?" he murmured crossly. "I can't come now."

"Mistress Tegolin sent Luned and me, Master Rhisiart, to fetch you," whispered the frightened boy in his ear. And then he added almost piteously, "You're not to talk loud. You're not to say anything. You're only to come!"

Rhisiart glanced about him. Broch-o'-Meifod, who was always the first to leave such revels, had already gone. The Prince was totally absorbed in what his friend from Kidwelly was telling him. Rhys Gethin was regarding Elphin with grim amusement.

Our friend pulled himself together, rose like a slim phantom in black and silver, and proceeded, though with steps rather stumbling than gliding, to follow the page out of the hall and up the staircase.

"I know perfectly well what's happening," he said to himself. "I'm not in the least drunk; but I'm very unhappy. I'm too unhappy to think."

They came at last to a small landing where one of the two torches that usually hung there had burnt itself out, and the other was rapidly following it. Dim as the light was he had no difficulty in recognizing the beguiling form of Luned who greeted him with a tender smile.

"Well done, Elphin!" she cried. "But you'd better run up and bring us a light." Then she whispered in the boy's ear that the young gentleman would stumble in the darkness.

"Get a candle from Mistress Tegolin, child, and say he's just coming. She knows what these banquets are!"

It was partly the mead he'd drunk and partly the fact that to be alone with Luned upon a staircase leading to a Ladies' tower brought back that night in Dinas Bran, but there was a yet simpler cause of his extraordinary behaviour, and that was shame. He had made a complete fool of himself before Rhys Gethin and before that fellow from South Wales. The Prince had discarded him from his secret counsels. He had shown himself, once for all, no more like Griffith Young than he was like Archbishop Becket! He had better give up statesmanship and practise the long-bow. It had been in his wanton revolt against Bran the Blessed and Ffraid ferch Gloyw that he had formerly seized on this yielding cinnamon-scented body as the best means of asserting his independence. "Well!" the Devil whispered to him now: "Try squeezing a salve for your disgrace out of the same soft sweet fruit, ready to yield at a touch!"

Taking advantage of the dying gleam that revealed only a blur of filmy whiteness — whiteness that made him think of that summer night — he now seized upon the girl without a word; and without a word they swayed together there under the spitting and spluttering torch.

He pressed her so closely to him that it was as if his shame had been some diabolic essence that he was eager to transfer from his veins to hers. But Luned was still the wise one; and though she gave herself up with the old languid abandonment to this recurrence of l'amour d'escalier she listened intently for any descending steps.

But there come occasions when the wisest are fooled by the impulses of the reckless. What she couldn't hear she couldn't guard against. And the quick impatient feet of Catharine in their soft shoes fell like the feathers of a swan's neck upon those treacherous stones.

The "light" which Luned had asked Elphin to bring was not far away; for now the clearly-sounding footsteps of the page became audible; and also, though only Luned caught that, the shuffle of Tegolin's sandals behind him.

But though Rhisiart's arms fell to his sides and Luned uttered a rich, panting, unashamed laugh, they both knew that Catharine had seen them. It was with the final blazing up of its loyal flame that the enduring torch, as hostile to vice as it was protective of virtue, revealed to them the expression on Catharine's face, her wide-open eyes, her distorted mouth. But it was out of a darkness not yet broken by the candle that was descending the stairs that her voice came.

"Rhisart!"

And it seemed to our hapless friend — from whose muddled wits the fumes of that fatal metheglin dissolved like smoke — that his protest was like the protest of a crushed worm, endowed in its destruction with superhuman lucidity that now filled the darkness.

"Catharine, it's all a mistake! I was — I have — I am—"

But her voice came calm and cold, while the first flicker from Elphin's candle lit the staircase above her head.

"Will you tell Tegolin, Rhisiart, that I've gone to my father. I can feel my way down. I've done it before. I don't want any of you."

Her final words rang out with all the pride and all the authority of the "Princess" Rawlff had called her; and they were clearly heard by both the young candle-bearer and the Maid; for when these two emerged upon the landing neither of them made any attempt to follow her.

Tegolin realized at once that the lovers had quarrelled; but she supposed it was only the renewal of some difference between them that had occurred earlier in the day. Luned greeted her with an innocence that had a touch of insolence' in it, but Tegolin was too occupied with Rhisiart to give her any close attention.

She had never seen such a Rhisiart as she saw now! A lock of the lad's black hair had fallen across his forehead in his struggle with Luned, and his lips, in place of being sucked-in showed all loose in the candle-light, showed even bloody against his ghastly face, as if he had received a blow in the mouth.

The Maid gave him one long look, swallowing her saliva as she did so with a faint clicking sound like the turning of a tiny key in a silver lock. Then she told Elphin to follow them with the light; and taking Rhisiart by the hand led him without a word up the staircase into Mad Huw's Chamber.

Here there were the dying embers of a wood-fire, a lancet window open to the west, a couch of straw, with a crucifix on the wall above it, and an alcove, concealed by a heavy curtain, where the Maid herself slept. Squatting cross-legged on the floor by the dying fire, with nothing on but a garment of coarse unbleached wool, sat the Apostle of King Richard. He leapt to his feet the moment they entered, and with the curious penetration he invariably showed where his obsession didn't arise he at once grasped the situation in its essentials.

He knew nothing of course of the part played by Luned, who with Elphin had now discreetly withdrawn, but he divined that this mute, stricken lad, who now sank down on a stool by the embers and hid his face in his hands, had disgraced himself with both the Prince and his daughter.

Tegolin cautiously closed the door of the room, drew the curtains yet closer across her alcove, and, carrying some wood to the smouldering ashes, knelt down by Rhisiart's side and fell to re-kindling the fire.

She was still in her blue banquet-dress, but she had taken off her ornamental slippers with their turquoise-coloured calch, or enamel work, and she had already braided her hair for the night. “He is unhappy,” she murmured, lifting her head from her task and glancing at the Friar, who towered above them both with his thin legs gleaming white in the flames she was conjuring up, “so I brought him to you.” “You did well, daughter; you did well.”

“How shall we make him understand, Father, that all of us — men and women alike — have to endure bitter shame, and yet go on living, go on struggling?”

Mad Huw shut his eyes and pondered; then he started pacing up and down the room. Then he stood still and stared at Rhisiart’s bowed head.

“Well, Father,” the girl repeated. “He’s very unhappy, and I’ve brought him to you.”

Mad Huw moved close to that crouching figure in its velvet and silver. The Friar’s white legs with their black hairs brushed again the Maid’s gown and were scraped by the silver tassels that Sibli had stitched to the lad’s tunic.

“My dear son,” he said, “do you realize that we two haven’t been alone with the Maid since you saved me from that poor madman of Chirk?”

Rhisiart did raise his head at this. But he covered it again after one despairing glance at his comforter.

“I didn’t save you,” he mumbled into his hands. “And she knows I didn’t.” And then in a scarcely audible voice, “I’m good for nothing but to be a drunken bowman under Rhys Gethin.”

Tegolin rose to her feet and gazed intently at the Friar. “Do you think, Father” — her lips formed the words slowly and gravely and her forehead wrinkled itself into a deep frown— "that if you were to — to pray to Our Lady—"

To her astonishment Mad Huw shook his head. "There is someone who could help him," he said, "but he isn't—"

"Do you mean his friend Master Brut?" An angry light gleamed at once in the man's eyes, not a mad light, but the obstinate sane light of implacable orthodoxy.

"That perverter of our Holy Faith!" he cried hoarsely, "that taker of our Blessed Lord's name in vain! Daughter, daughter, have you forgotten all my teaching?"

"Who could help him, Father? Tell me, oh tell me, for the love of Mary!"

His flash of anger died down at once in the presence of her emotion. But what he had to say didn't seem quite easy to him; and it was clear to her, who knew him so well, that the difficulty lay in his conscience rather than his wits. He began in a long roundabout manner that made the girl sigh. "Alack! alack! It's King Richard he's leading up to!"

But Mad Huw, as sometimes happened at a pinch, was not leading up to King Richard.

The Maid hadn't the remotest idea what he was hinting at, for he was now explaining that ever since Saint Joseph of Arimathea brought the Sangreal to Glastonbury, and Saint David built a wattle-chapel for its worship, there were particular persons in Wales, not necessarily priests, who had been given by the Holy Spirit certain miraculous powers — powers that were neither condemned by Holy Church, nor officially acknowledged — and it was his own secret thought that one of such persons was none other — Tegolin's eyes opened in amazement — than Master Broch-o'-Meifod. "Have you heard," he went on, "how that insolent Cistercian, who hates us poor Brothers of Saint Francis, goes about denouncing Master Broch? That alone proves him a man of worth. Whenever you hear a cloistered monk, who knows nothing of perils by land or of perils by water, or of taking the Lady Poverty as his bride, abuse any man or any King either—"

"Blessed Virgin keep one king away a little longer!" prayed Tegolin.

"You may be sure that that man is inspired by the Most High. Do you realize, my children," and the Friar began to stride up and down the room with the tails of his woollen shirt flapping about his legs, "that the old Welsh saints — such as Saint Collen, and such as Saint Tysilio of Broch's own cantref — were much more like the little Brothers of Saint Francis than these rich and learned cloistered monks! They were soldiers, too, like our brave Abbot who arrived to-night — he refuses to stay in the cloister — and many of them were quite unknown to Rome and the Holy Father. Well, children, that's the sort of man this Broch-o'-Meifod is! He doesn't quote the Gospel. He doesn't pervert the Faith of our Fathers with human learning, like that son of perdition, Brut. He leaves those matters to their proper custodians. But I tell you the man's a holy man. I know it. I have seen it. And you can't deceive a little Grey Brother in things of this kind! Holy Francis! If I weren't in my shirt I'd go and fetch him myself. Yes, my unhappy son," for the man's earnestness had made Rhisiart look up, "there are moments — and I've known them myself — when God works better through a layman than even through a begging friar, though begging friars are in a sense the laymen of Our Lady. Well! compared with cloistered monks they are!"

"I did have something," murmured Rhisiart — and perhaps it was as well that Mad Huw didn't notice Tegolin's radiance when she heard the boy's voice— "that I wanted to say to Master Broch. But I'd rather say it here than in the Prince's chamber."

"But you'll find Broch alone there if you go now," cried Tegolin eagerly. "All the men'll be at the banquet. Her father will be holding Catharine on his knee and letting her taste the loving-cup. He did that when she welcomed him a year ago, after his victory in Ceredigion."

Rhisiart turned his forlorn gaze from the Friar to the Maid. How her eyes were shining, and how her blue robe suited her! A tiny sprig of comfort began to lift its head, like the spear of a crocus, from the bottom of his bruised heart.

"Yes," he muttered, "that was when I composed — for a pilgrim to St. David's it was — my account of our rush down Hyddgant Mountain."

"That was before we came here," said Tegolin, "and I'm glad you wrote it down, for you and the Prince usually keep such things so dark."

Rhisiart could not help assuming the expression of one whose achievements rest in oblivion; and the little sprig of comfort waxed bigger.

"I think I will go and see Broch-o'-Meifod," he cried, jumping to his feet and pushing the lock of dark hair from his forehead. "May I come back for a minute before I go to bed?"

When he was gone, Mad Huw looked at the Maid with some uneasiness. "I wonder if I did right?" he whispered solemnly. "Do you think He would think I did right?"

"I know what He would think you ought to do now," said Edeyrnion's Maid with a smile. "And that is get to bed at once! You remember the Abbot wants to see you early tomorrow; and early with John ap Hywel means early."

Mad Huw's eyes shone. "He wants to ask me about the King. I saw it in his face. Did I say my office, daughter, before that sad young gentleman came in?"

The Maid lied to him like a mother, and kneeling for a second as she always did, to receive his blessing, withdrew into her alcove. Sunk deep in that unbreakable slumber that Nature grants only to her most favoured innocents was Richard's champion when the luckless monarch's namesake returned.

He knocked lightly and entered cautiously, carrying a lantern. The room was sweet with the mingling of cool night-air and fragrant woodsmoke. He found the Maid seated by the fire reading a French version of the adventures of Sir Percival in the Castle Perilous.

"Well?" she murmured, as he took his place by her side, stretching out his thin wrists and long fingers over the blaze, while his embroidered sleeves fell across her lap.

"I told him everything, Tegolin, as I would tell you, but you never have to be told; and he said I must begin again from the very bottom. He said I mustn't think of anything but improving my hand-writing and improving my style. He said everything in the world, including fish and birds and rocks and stones, were only happy when they were all the time being what they were. He said I must think of nothing but doing what I liked doing, and doing it better and better. He said I mustn't care what Owen thought of me, or Catharine, or anybody. He said God was beginning to reveal Himself in a new way that wasn't the Church's way and wasn't the Lollard's way. He said a lot about that, but it all went out of my head, because the way he said it got rid of my shame and made me feel — you know — so, to tell you the truth, I can't tell you what he said! But I know he made me feel I must think more about my hand-writing and less about Master Young."

"Did he — say — anything, Gwion Bach, about Catharine?"

He drew away from her a little and clasped his fingers tightly together. "Who was it," he enquired, watching her face intently, "who sent Luned and Elphin to fetch me?"

She returned his gaze frankly; "I did, Gwion Bach, for I saw how things were; and I sent for Catharine, too. I didn't know she'd rush down the stairs like that. But I thought — I thought—"

Like a great salt wave that has drawn back only to advance again, the whole memory of that fatal moment on the landing swept over him.

"Catharine—" he gasped; and then, just as if his proud young head had been severed at the neck, he let it fall hard and heavy against her knees and began to shake with deep-drawn sobs.

XV. BRYN GLAS

THE GRAND INVASION of the rich territory of the Mortimers, inaugurated, as we have seen, as much over the mead-cups as was Aneirin's famous descent upon Cattraeth, threatened the ripening "bud of love" between Catharine and Rhisiart as if by a flash of David Gam's own knife.

Owen's mountain "Llys" was left under the care of his eldest son Griffith and his brother Tudor, aided by the imposing presence of the Abbot of Caerleon.

Against the Prince's wishes — but Rhys Gethin was obdurate; and in a sense this was his special adventure — Mistress Lowri, together with her husband, for none dared to meddle with the weird relations between those two, accompanied the expedition to Maelienydd; as did Broch-o'-Meifod, Master Brut, and our friend Rhisiart.

Henry Don of Kidwelly was to take a leading part in this campaign; but since he had a considerable body of horsemen with him he advanced separately from their main force, sometimes on one flank, sometimes on the other, and sometimes serving as a vanguard.

Rhys Gethin moved to and fro continually from one portion of their little army to another. The Prince himself walked by Broch's side, for he had left Seisyll behind; so that Rhisiart and the Lollard were once more thrown together, just as they had been at their first appearance in Wales. Both the young men were in low spirits; and both were in a mood to confide freely in each other.

It wasn't long, therefore, before Master Brut knew all about his friend's feeling for Catharine, while Rhisiart, not altogether to his surprise but to his no little dismay, learnt from the enamoured Wycliffite that he was already secretly affianced to the girl whom our friend in his heart styled "the witch-daughter of a witch-mother."

Round their bivouac fires in the long June twilights this small army of spearmen and archers and light-armed troopers found itself more inclined to sleep than to revel. Henry Don's horsemen, riding in loose formation till darkness set in, accounted for such a wide tract of country that they removed from every man's consciousness that disturbing sense of an unexpected encounter which tends to occupy the mind even if it doesn't upset the nerves. They had generally marched some twenty miles when evening fell, for everybody agreed with Rhys Gethin that the faster they moved the more contradictory would be the rumours that preceded them, and the more panic-stricken the King's subjects would grow.

Owen himself was for many reasons in a happier mood than he had been for many a month. He had taken his young Secretary's advice about the amount of ransom to be given before the two captives were released; and to his amazement he had already received half of this enormous sum; Grey himself being at large now, to collect the other half, while his son remained a hostage for its payment.

Everybody who had approached the two prisoners had been struck by the exceptional devotion of the father to his neurotic offspring; so that the Prince hadn't the least doubt that the remaining sum would be safe in his hands before the summer was over. He was thus relieved for the first time since he'd raised his standard of the most worrying of all his anxieties, the lack of money to pay his men; and though he still struggled to keep his vow not to consult "the spirits" about the future, he couldn't help being aware, as they advanced by these forced marches towards the Radnor mountains, that every omen they encountered was a favourable one.

The Prince never forgot this sequence of long warm summer days blessed by happy presentiments. Both he and Rhys Gethin were so sleepy with marching that when they encamped for the night there was little planning of any strategic moves for the campaign. Owen could see that his formidable Captain was in favour of taking things as they occurred, and trusting to luck; and this was the method after all that came most naturally to himself.

So all day long he and Broch-o'-Meifod philosophized together. Up hill and down dale they discussed the mystery of life; and so happily tired-out was Owen, both in mind and body, that every sunset after he had pledged his Captain in the best of the French wines the Arglwyddes had provided, he removed all his armour, save Iolo's mail-shirt, and sank at once into profound unconsciousness.

It was in the late afternoon of June the twenty-first, the Eve of Saint Alban, that Owen's adventurous force reached the village of Pilleth. Here the Prince was informed by Henry Don, whose horsemen had been scouting far and wide most of the day, that a great muster of English troops, led by Sir Edmund Mortimer himself, and accompanied by such knightly magnates of the border as Robert Whitney and Kinard de la Bere and Walter Devereux, not to speak of the Sheriff of the County, Thomas Clanvow, were on the march from Ludlow.

"There's a big force of Welsh archers with them, my Prince," Don's report concluded, "but I have a man here from the mountains — my people came on him and brought him in — who swears that if I release him and let him return to his fellows, he'll be able to swing them over to us at the first sign of success."

"Let him go, in the name of the Virgin, let him go!" cried the Prince at once, looking from Broch-o'-Meifod to Rhys Gethin The former nodded, but the latter shook his head.

“He’s a spy, caught in the act. Swing him over, I say; over a stout branch of ash-wood!”

Owen surveyed his impetuous subordinate with that slow sad smile that always made Rhisiart think of his friend Meredith. That disillusioned young chieftain was absent at the moment, being occupied, as he so often was, with some of the less picturesque aspects of a campaign; but it was impossible for Rhisiart to hold his tongue. He felt that he had already incurred the hostility of Rhys Gethin, simply by being what he was, a scholar and a statesman, one whose intelligence inevitably kept hot-headed militarists in their place; but he couldn’t listen to such brutal folly without protesting.

“My Prince, my Prince!” he broke in; “Master Brut and I were only saying last night that if every Welshman who’s a tenant of the Mortimers were loyal to Wales, the King would have to go to Salop and Hereford and Gloucester for his men. Suppose this person is a spy, what matter? Any chance, however remote, of the archers of an army turning their bows on their own leaders ought to be snatched at! That the fellow suggests such a thing at all shows that there is, among all Welshmen, a feeling spreading fast. It’s a matter of, a matter of—” The lad wanted to say it was a matter of mental seduction as against physical violence, but nothing save legal Latin terms came into his head; and to crush the Conway warrior with Latinity could serve no purpose.

But Owen had given him a sympathetic and understanding glance and Rhys Gethin had moved off with a shrug of his shoulders; so perhaps there was, after all, a place in the Wales that was dawning for intelligences who studied Aristotle and the civilized codes of Rome.

It was a triumphant moment for Rhisiart as he contemplated the haughty back of the retreating Captain; but the cup of his pride overflowed when their trimly-accoutred cavalry leader stepped up to him and congratulated him in a low emphatic voice upon his wise words.

It was indeed crowded with events memorable in the young man's life, that afternoon in the village of Pilleth; and on. subsequent occasions he would call up in his mind every detail of its happenings. There was only one house of any pretensions in the place, a semi-fortified mansion from which the owner had fled at their approach; and it was here that the Prince had established Mistress Lowri and her husband, while the grassy slopes before its gates, leading down to the banks of the river Lugg, lent themselves to the repose and refreshment of the rank-and-file.

It wasn't till nearly six o'clock, much later than their usual hour, that the patient Meredith, always with the same disenchanted look in his eyes and the same life-weary smile on his lips, announced to his father that the meal was ready.

Between the little manor-house where Lowri, the only high-born lady in their camp, was quartered and the softly-murmuring Lugg there stretched nearly a quarter of a mile of grassy sward; so that from the hearths of the village-hovels and from the kitchen of the mansion, it was easy to supply the whole body of men with better food than any bivouac fire had offered them since they left their northern fastness.

Meredith's picked band of old family retainers from Sycharth, reduced in numbers though they were by the expedition to Meifod, served, under the young chieftain's direction, as the ministrants of this open-air feast.

In the matter of drinks there occurred a little friction that evening between the young chief and Mistress Lowri; for she, as the only court lady in their camp, showed a natural feminine desire to humour the men by serving out from the stores so carefully prepared by the Arglwyddes headier and less diluted beverages than the cautious young man considered safe.

Rhisiart and his friend Master Brut were therefore given the privilege, when the gentlemen finally sat down to their meal at rough wooden tables under the walled terrace of the house, of watching at close quarters a fierce struggle to win the Prince over to one or other of these respective points of view.

As Meredith’s opinion prevailed, and the pouring out of the headier drink was forbidden, our friend received a double impression; first that the mother of Tegolin was in a most reckless and dangerous mood, and secondly that the Prince was so wrought-upon and excited that it was all he could do to treat the woman with his usual courtesy.

Everybody’s nerves that warm June evening seemed growing more and more tense. The loveliness of the hour as the sun descended, and as the sweet fragrances from the waving grasses and the white elder blossoms arose, increased rather than diminished this tension; and when at last, as if with some demonic intention of making trouble, a great white owl came flapping over their heads, it was necessary for Owen himself to leap to his feet and forbid, under threats of dire punishment, anyone to draw a bow at the intruder.

It almost seemed as if the ungracious bird, disturbed and distracted by the confused assembly, understood the meaning of this command, for no sooner had it flapped away in its heavy unwieldy motion down to the banks of the Lugg than it saw fit to return, and sometimes to the left, sometimes to the right of the men, grouped in their crowded companies on that sloping greensward, it went flapping, hovering now and then within a few feet of their heads, and producing the disturbing impression that with the great moon-daisy blinking eyes in its fluffy head it was surveying them all, and searching among them all for some particular person.

And though the Prince's command was obeyed there were many sullen mutterings, and even — so Rhisiart fancied — some uncivil suggestions that the ghostly visitor had a rendezvous with Father Pascentius! That ubiquitous confessor had ostensibly followed the expedition on the grounds of professional duty; but it seemed to both Rhisiart and Master Brut, between whom he was now discreetly seated, that his real motive in coming was to watch at close quarters the gathering dramatic crisis between Rhys Gethin and Master Simon in their electric relations with Mistress Lowri.

The Lollard kept assuring his friend that the converted Hog of Chirk was too steeped in the pure doctrines of Master Wycliffe to betray his feelings in any violent outburst; but Rhisiart, as he followed the botanist's Phorkyad eyes and contemplated Master Simon's expression as the fiery Captain flirted with his lady, was by no means convinced. The lad himself was aware, before the long meal was over, of a new and quite personal misgiving. His mind began reverting so vividly to Catharine that, as he sat there whispering to the Lollard and watching the owl, he began to feel that at any moment the girl herself might appear.

For some while, undeterred by any fear of attracting Master Brut's attention, for the Lollard was not very observant when Master Wycliffe's name was on his lips, he had been watching the curve of a white dusty foot-track along the side of one of the nearest mountains. It was along this track that he had already imagined Catharine riding. He had imagined her mounted on Seisyll and followed by the Abbot of Caerleon.

But it was danger, not love, that worried him now in connection with that track. Yes, he was convinced that his preoccupation with this faraway path had something to do with an imminent peril — not a peril to the Prince and his men; for there was no fear of the Ludlow army coming on them from that quarter — but a peril to himself. It could hardly have been the effect of the sunset that was now displaying itself in the west; for the great luminary had rejected any transformation into what is usually called "a ball of red fire" and was disappearing from the world in its normal splendour; but, whatever, its cause, that faraway track had begun to outline itself on the green hill-side in a manner so emphatic as to suggest that the path itself were a serpentine creature advancing with a fatal intention!

Quite rudely therefore — indeed for some reason Rhisiart was always being ungentlemanly in his behaviour to his friend — he turned from Master Brut and enquired of Father Pascentius whether that particular path were the way any ordinary traveller would naturally approach the village of Pilleth, coming from the north.

The pair of fabulous eyes moved at once whither they were directed. "There's a horse and a rider coming now down your path," he said, "but to save the beast's feet they're using the grass by the edge."

What madness leaps up in a lover's heart! No sooner had Rhisiart heard these words than he felt sure he saw Catharine mounted on Seisyll "using the grass by the edge"; but he beseeched the eyes again, and the eyes, by means of the heavy jowl that was their only mouthpiece, informed him that the rider was very young and was holding something very carefully as he rode.

Rhisiart couldn't restrain himself. "You're sure it's not a girl?" The Father didn't smile; and the eyes only screwed themselves up tighter. It was just as if the infatuated young man had been consulting some Chinese invention rather than a living theologian.

"It's a boy!" came the announcement at last, "and he's on a horse — not on a pony."

“Do you think it’s a message from Snowdon, Father?”

The theologian lifted one of his plump hands from his wine-cup and made his accustomed gesture of devastating nescience. The movement was slight; but as the man made it the sun went down, and a dark wave of dejection flowed over Rhisiart’s heart.

“What,” he thought, “if this great host from Ludlow led by such a man as Mortimer cuts us all to pieces? Or takes the Prince and me and Walter Brut prisoners? Where would we be, then? In the Tower of London we’d be; or with spikes through our heads on London Bridge!”

Though the sun was gone, the twilight of that Eve of Saint Alban seemed interminable. A natural restlessness kept the men awake beyond their accustomed hour; while at the same time Meredith’s stern resolve to limit their drinking on a night so charged with fate deprived them of the distraction of their usual carousal.

A crippled harp-player whose age and infirmity had kept him in the house when his patron, fearful of the advent of war, had fled, was persuaded to display his skill; but it seemed to Rhisiart as if the wistful jauntiness of the blackbirds, whose notes came from nowhere, and went floating down long avenues of feeling, drew the heart out of those inanimate strings.

And the owl continued to be an ominous trouble. It was all very well for the ribald troopers to jest about its seeking the monk. To Rhisiart’s mind it was behaving like a lost soul among a company of threatened ones, and it was an indescribable relief to him when Broch-o’-Meifod rose from his place with the evident intention of relieving them from this flapping demon. “How on earth will he do it?” the boy thought, as he watched the giant stroll down to the bank of the river, while the phantom light of that strange evening made the axe-blades about his waist gleam like the water-drops of his wife’s mill-wheel.

A pale mist was now rising from the surface of the stream; and it wasn't long before the figure of the man grew indistinct among the reeds and willows; and indeed after a while, as they watched, it vanished completely.

But the owl seemed disturbed. Rhisiart noticed he was flying higher and in wider circles. It was no longer possible to see that queer-shaped head, like the head of a minute air-whale, butting with its soft feathery weight against the air-waves.

Suddenly from the river-mists there came a low prolonged owl-cry, a sound so startling after the silent flappings of their visitor that the spellbound warriors stared at each other and some of them rose to their feet.

Again came this unearthly sound, and after its third repetition, lo! the great bird above their heads wheeled round with evident intention, and in an impetuous flight quite at variance with its former movements flung itself down the slope and was lost in the mist. Once more, but from higher up the valley and with a perceptibly different accent, came the cry; but that was the end. None of the little army saw the bird again; and when the giant returned from the river-bank even Mistress Lowri, who had been shivering a little, and wrapping her cloak round her, and falling into fits of silence, looked at the man with an added respect, much as the sun-witch must have looked at Odysseus, when he returned from conversing with "the weary heads of the dead."

Broch-o'-Meifod's return and their feathery persecutor's departure broke up that troubled session; and each man began making what preparations seemed proper in his own eyes, either to sleep or to await the dawn in the best comfort of soul he could muster.

Rhisiart was following the others into the house, the lower portion of which had been reserved for the Prince and his advisers; Mistress Lowri and Master Simon had already retired into their upper chamber, while the crippled harper had been led back to his hearth, when Madoc came up to inform Owen that a rider with no password had been detained for hours by a group of his sentries.

The Prince at once despatched Rhisiart to discover what had happened and why Madoc seemed so furtive and taciturn about it. “They tell me,” the Prince said to Rhys Gethin when Rhisiart was gone, “that your spy was a native of this place. So he may simply have been a deserter finding his way home! In which case it’s possible that we may benefit by releasing him.”

“I’ve never heard of any benefit, my Prince, coming from a serf of the Mortimers. All the men around here are cowardly time-servers. To get a stout and loyal Welshman you have to go to—”

“To Cwm Llanerch I’ve no doubt,” interjected Owen; and he grasped his cantankerous follower’s hand.

Rhisiart hadn’t far to go, but he made that short way shorter by his eagerness; and he was rewarded by arriving at the very nick of time. He soon discovered that Owen’s army was distinctly better adapted to rapid marching than to professional precautions when the march was over.

“Blessed Virgin!” cried the young lawyer in his heart, “if this is the way we prepare for the night before the battle there’ll not be a castle in the country without the Royal Standard; and as for our heads—” and he experienced an uncomfortable sensation in the nape of his neck. He now found himself explaining with some warmth to a drunken group of Cadair Idris spearmen that he had authority from the Prince to see this boy and his horse, neither of whom had given the password. His position was less secure than it might have been, since he himself hadn’t the remotest notion what the password was. It had been “Carrog” at their last bivouac; but Rhys Gethin changed it every night, and Rhisiart had been absent-minded when this had been done on their arrival at Pilleth.

There was a toll-gate and a high-walled enclosure where these unprofessional sentries were gambling with their half-groats; and it was peculiarly teasing to the anxious mind of an impatient scholar to hear the gross cry: “Who’ll cover her? Who’ll uncover her?” repeated with monotonous iteration. He gathered that both the boy and the horse must have been thrust into this enclosure; and all he demanded now was permission to enter and talk with them. “This ill-tongued young man has run away without the password and Crach Ffinnant says he must be tied up till morning. Tame enough I reckon ‘a’ll be if ‘a be alive then. *Who’ll cover her? Who’ll un*cover her?”

Rhisiart lost his temper completely. “If you don’t open that gate this moment I’ll get the Prince to hang you in a row on Pilleth churchtower with your whoreson groats between your damned teeth!”

Rhisiart’s own teeth gleamed so fierce in the twilight and his hooked nose looked so menacing that one of his hearers was reminded of how John Charlton of Castell Goch had that identical expression when he hanged fifty robbers on five oak-trees.

“Very well, Master, I’ll let’ee see ‘un. But remember ’tis Crach’s done it if ill-tongued young man be past talking wi’.”

“Where is that cowardly scum?”

“Drunk-asleep in pound, Master. ‘A watched till ill-tongued young man ceased hollerin’ and then he lay down snug and easy.”

The fellow got up, took an iron key from a hook on the wall and opened the gate of the enclosure.

The first thing Rhisiart saw was his old piebald Griffin, who at once manifested vigorous signs of both recognition and indignation. But he hadn’t time even to approach his old friend; for there, suspended in such an abominable manner that he would certainly have been dead before next morning, was his young acquaintance Rawlff.

With the aid of the now sobered gambler Rhisiart unloosed the boy’s bonds and lifted him to the ground.

“Get some water, for Our Lady’s sake,” he commanded, “and some eau de vie, if any of you have a drop,”

Whatever it may have been that the fellow produced, it had the desired effect. The boy opened his eyes, stretched his limbs with infinite relief, and smiled gratefully when his gaze met that of Rhisiart. Unluckily as his eyes wandered they lit on the hunched-up form of the Scab, who was lost to the world in a drunken coma. The mere sight of the disfigured prophet reminded the poor lad in a sickening spasm of what he’d endured at his hands and with a convulsion of his whole frame his consciousness was once more blackened out.

Rhisiart told his subdued companion to pour more of his liquor down the boy’s throat and going up to the unconscious Scab kicked him furiously and repeatedly. This treatment having but small effect, he seized the prophet unceremoniously by the heels, dragged him to the gate and deposited him on a dung-heap outside.

On returning he found the boy’s eyes open again.

“How could you people let that brute do such a thing to a servant of the Prince?” he whispered angrily, as they watched the lad’s recovery.

The man looked extremely uncomfortable. “Don’t’ee ask, Master, don’t’ee ask! If us don’t do what’a tells us, he puts the curse of Derfel on’s. Our cattle die, our girls have bastards, our crops fail! ’Tis when he’s drunk he does things like this. ’Tis the spirit of Derfel taking him, I reckon.”

“Well,” said Rhisiart, “I’ll do what I can for you anyway with the Prince. But I shall tell him the whole story.”

The fellow pulled him aside by the arm. “If I were you, Master,” he whispered, “I wouldn’t say naught to Owen ab Griffith till to-morrow night. There be too many of we from old ‘Cadair’; and Derfel’s a mighty one for putting strength in our arms against the English.”

Rhisiart gave him a long searching look. “What’s your name?” he enquired. “You seem to have more sense than some.”

“Ifan ap David, at your service, Master. Do’ee think, Master, us’ll be all dead men by tomorrow night?”

“You’ll be a dead man if you have anything more to do with that brute out there! Say your prayers, Ifan ap David; say your prayers to the Mother of God, and your women and your cattle need fear no Derfel, nor Devil either!”

Ifan crossed himself. “I’ve a-said that very thing many a time, Master; but ’tis hard to go contrary to them conjurers. There’s a conjurer now up our way who do—”

But Rhisiart left him abruptly. Rawlff had risen to his feet and had managed to shuffle stiffly, though with several groans of pain, to the side of the old piebald.

“Master Rhisiart,” the boy whispered. “Send that man away. I’ve got something for you.”

Our friend signed to Ifan to leave them alone; and as soon as the fellow was gone the two youths faced each other, each leaning against Griffin’s mottled back.

“Mistress Catharine sends you a letter,” murmured Rawlff hurriedly; “and Mistress Tegolin sends you your sword.” He paused, while our friend clutched eagerly at the familiar weapon laid along-side of Griffin’s saddle; and then the boy added in the conspiring and significant tone of one whose life might have been spent carrying messages between high-born ladies and their lovers, “I’ve hid the letter inside the sheath.”

Thus speaking he made a pathetic effort to unloose the withy-bands with which he had secured the sword to the saddle, but his fingers were so weak and his arms so bruised that he soon left this attempt to his excited companion.

Meanwhile old Griffin kept turning his head, twitching his ears, expanding his nostrils, evidently puzzled by his recovered master’s lack of attention.

Rhisiart responded mechanically to these overtures, but the expression in the old horse’s eyes said with unmistakeable plainness, “I’ve come all this way. I’ve brought you your sword. But you’ll never be the same to me till that girl is gone.”

But Rhisiart was hard at work pulling the blade from its sheath. Yes! there was a strip of the thinnest parchment he’d ever seen wrapped round the steel! It was no easy job to get the blade out, with that letter twisted round it, and once or twice he mentally cursed Rawlff’s romantic device.

The parchment was torn clean across when he did separate it from the steel; but there it was! He held in his hand the first love-letter he had ever received! Hurriedly, hardly glancing at it, he concealed it in the inside pocket of his tunic; but before sheathing the blade he couldn’t resist brandishing it in the air and making slashes with it over Griffin’s back at an imaginary Mortimer.

He insisted, however, on the boy’s getting up on the horse again; and as he helped him to mount he enquired for whom he had picked the two huge bundles of bluebells that dangled head-downwards from the saddle, their stalks death-white and oozing with vegetable sap, just as when he’d first pulled them up in some shady recess of mountain hazels.

Rawlff smiled a grown-up courtier's smile. This was the question to which he had been longing to reply, even since he'd picked those purple-headed blooms. "I brought them for Lowri ferch Ffraid," he whispered proudly. "Mistress Tegolin said her mother would be pleased if I picked something for her on the way."

Rhisiart stared at the boy in astonishment. Had that devilish enchantress begun to play her games with this lad, no sooner than she'd finished with himself?

He felt certain the boy was lying when he said that Tegolin had told him to pick flowers for her mother. Tegolin knew the woman too well to throw any youth in her way. Bluebells for Lowri on the Eve of Saint Alban! Would she strew them on Master Simon's pillow or hang them from Rhys Gethin's helmet?

With Rawlff on the piebald's back and himself at his head they emerged from the Pilleth pound. "Cover her! Uncover her! Uncover her! Cover her!" And by some providential interposition the young rider became at once so fascinated by the gambling that this crazy repetition distracted him from a sound and a sight that Rhisiart, tugging at Griffin's bridle, prayed to the Virgin he wouldn't notice.

The gamblers had lit a torch; and this torch, creating little islands of glowings and flickerings in the falling night, made an outlying island of the dung-heap. Here, squatting on his haunches and relieving his bladder so shamelessly that he resembled the image of a beast-god in prehistoric art, sat the unholy Scab; and as he sat he swayed, and as he swayed he uttered sounds, and by degrees these sounds became articulate words.

"Cover her! Uncover her! Uncover her! Cover her!" cried the gamblers.

Seeing Rawlff's intense desire to watch the game Rhisiart gave up his tugs at Griffin's bridle and lent an ear to the Scab's obscure chantings. He was past being shocked by the fellow. He had come to regard him as quite as sub-human as Derfel's phantom Horse neighing for virginities; but he was outraged all the same by the burden of this prophetic howl uttered just as the night was falling that could so easily be their last on earth.

To what particular demon the Bard was referring under the name Gwyn ap Nudd our friend had no idea; but the images called up by this oracle from the dung-heap disturbed him not a little. Everybody — even the Prince — had a half-belief in the Scab's prophetic power.

"Cover her! Uncover her! Uncover her! Cover her!" cried the gamblers; but when at last he did drag Griffin away, it wasn't that refrain, it was what the Scab was chanting that rattled about his ears like a rattle of bones:

Who can strew whiteness in summer while rivers run red?
Can Gwyn ap Nudd counting his fishes and furling his sails?
No! They're for Derfel, for Derfel, these dainty dead;
Stripped of their armour, like mackerel stripped of their scales!

Long before silence had fallen upon that little army Rhisiart had learnt his letter from Catharine by heart. It was a very short letter and its spelling was infantile. It was written entirely in capitals. The word "love" was spelt "luf", and the words "never forget thee" were spelt "nef vorgat the."

The girl had evidently experienced especial difficulty with her own name; for the end of the parchment was covered with erased attempts at "Catharine ferch Owen"; and at the very last she had contented herself with "Cat-Rin" followed by the syllables "thy luf."

In the shock of his unexpected reception by the tipsy sentries Rawlff had forgotten his grand excuse for his daring ride, which was nothing less than a letter to Rhisiart from his mother in Hereford.

This letter the astute young lawyer held in his hand when he presented his messenger to the Prince; and he scrupled not to break its seal before them all.

It ran as follows:

By the mercy of God and the departure for Wales of a servant of the esteemed John of Mawddwy, a loyal gentleman of the Marches, I write to send you my blessing, my unhappy son. May Our Lady and all the Saints keep you in health and bring you to a right state of mind, and a speedy return to your allegiance to our gracious and merciful Lord, King Henry. I do you to wit, dear son, that by the blessed intervention of Our Lady I have recently taken to myself a second lord and husband, namely, the good Knight, Sir James Monfoison, a gentleman of French descent but as highly esteemed in our City as in his native Provence. It is as much a grief to my dear husband as to myself that nothing but our gracious King's pardon for your unhappy errors will enable us to see your face again; but may Almighty God and Saint Ann, my revered Patroness, keep you in their merciful protection. Written at Hereford on this fifteenth day of the month of May at the command of Laura, Lady Montfoison, by Walter Hogpen, Clerk in Holy Orders.

Our friend, in his cunning craftiness, allowed it to appear that his mother's marriage was a grievous shock to him. As a matter of fact it was an immense relief; for more than once his conscience had pricked him for leaving so lively and amorous a lady with no natural defender.

It was only to Master Brut that he read the whole of this document, but he hesitated not to give the Prince an eloquent summary of its contents, and he nourished the hope that the pensive abstraction produced by Catharine's capital letters was put down to the clerkly penmanship of Father Hogpen.

Long after everybody else was asleep, at least trying to sleep, the Prince and his advisers were discussing their plans for the morrow. Bands of Henry Don's horsemen kept arriving with fresh news as the night wore on; but all their news pointed in the same direction, namely that the army from Ludlow was steadily pursuing the main highway across the Mortimer country, and using no cavalry to try out the preparations to meet them.

The impetuous Rhys Gethin was all for moving their force as rapidly as possible towards the enemy, trusting that pure luck, when they were near their foe, would provide them with some suitable ambuscade in the overhanging woods from which to make their attack.

Broch-o'-Meifod, however, to Rhisiart's great relief, insisted upon a strategy of a more concerted and calculated kind. The giant suggested that their wisest course would be to draw up their men on the summit of a long, slow-mounting hill to the west of Pilleth, a hill that bore the local name of Bryn Glas, and then, by a skilful use of their Kidwelly horsemen, to lure the Mortimer host to attempt the ascent of this eminence; thus making the encounter between them, while nothing was left to chance, an encounter between men above and men below.

"But surely, Broch," said Owen, who generally remained silent while these discussions went on, "surely Sir Edmund can't be such an absolute fool as to keep that great mass of heavy-armed men close together, following a track surrounded by hills? He must have some scouts abroad to keep their way clear?"

Henry Don broke in at this, somewhat piqued at his friend's distrust of his horsemen's news. "It's an army led by knights in armour, my Prince, I tell you! Heavy horses — heavy men. My people have watched them. They're riding so fast that their Welsh archers are running to keep up with them! It's a surprise attack. They hope to draw us down to meet them on their own level. They've no idea we have a cavalry arm in our force."

Broch-o'-Meifod wagged his great head. "There's never been an army led into Wales, Owen ap Griffith, since the days of Harold the Saxon, that wasn't too heavily armed. Harold chased us up the peaks of Snowdon with riders as fast as our own. But it's never been done since the Normans came. That's why the first Edward built castles. They trust in the thickness of their walls, these English, not in the nimbleness of their feet."

"What in the devil's name," cried Rhys Gethin, "are you fellows talking about? First you say they'll keep to the level, and then you say they'll begin climbing a great whoreson hill like Bryn Glas! Why should they climb it? What on earth would persuade them to climb it? How will they know we're waiting for them on the top? And if they do find out — by the beard of Dewi Sant, my good men, you're confusing Sir Edmund with his nephew, the baby Earl!"

"But doesn't the main highway go up Bryn Glas?" interposed Owen. "I took that for granted from the beginning. Is there any other track round here that heavily-armed knights could follow?"

Henry Don assured the Prince at once that the highway did ascend Bryn Glas and that unless the enemy had already taken a different route they had no alternative to climbing this hill.

"Well, gentlemen," said Owen, "what about dividing our men into three companies? Let one of them remain concealed at the top of the hill, let the two others wait in the woods to the left and the right; and wouldn't it be a good idea, Don, if your horsemen hid themselves in that thick fir-copse that we saw just now, on the other side of the Lugg, at the foot of Bryn Glas?"

"Does the Lugg cross the track they're following, Master Don?" threw in Meredith.

The cavalry leader looked blank. "God knows where the Lugg runs!" he groaned. "I know we had to follow its damned course for several miles before I'd trust a single rider among its rocks and pools!"

"If the highway crosses it," Rhisiart was moved to interject, "there must be a ford."

"Wise lad!" said Owen, while they all smiled. "But the point is, and it's the same whether Mortimer has to cross the Lugg or not, does that great fir-wood I saw down there border upon the track where it begins to ascend the hill?"

"It does! It does, my Prince!" cried the Lollard eagerly, "for Master Simon and I went for a little stroll at the foot of Bryn Glas after supper."

"To explore the country, Master Brut," threw in Father Pascentius, "or to refute Saint Thomas?"

"Yes, we'd all like to know," quoth Rhys Gethin, "what makes the Hog of Chirk swallow your God-damned heresies as if they were his native swill! I'm not as much for my beads as I should be," and the warrior crossed himself, "but if I don't confess myself to the Father to-night may the curse of Pelagius stick in my gullet!"

"Gentlemen! Gentlemen!" protested the Prince. "Master Brut has come all the way from his estate in England to fight for his country."

"A lot of fighting he'll do!" growled Rhys Gethin. "Why I know on good authority that his curst Lollardry won't let him carry arms. He said himself to Master Simon—"

"May I ask," interrupted Rhisiart, "who is your 'good authority', Captain?"

There was a general laugh at this; and the enamoured warrior flushed angrily but held his peace.

"Well! it's decided then," concluded Owen. "We'll bestir ourselves before dawn, feed our men and our horses, and hear Mass. Then a third of us to the top of Bryn Glas with me! Another third to the left under you, Captain, and another under Meredith to the right. You, Don, will conceal your horsemen in that wood down there — letting the Lugg run where it will — and whatever happens, and whatever accidents occur, don’t let a man stir till I make the signal. I’ll rush them down the hill, Rhys and Meredith’ll burst in on their flanks, Don’ll cut off their retreat at the bottom, and ‘Saint Derfel for Wales’ shall be our — What’s that you’re muttering, Broch?”

“Nothing, nothing, Owen ap Griffith! Let those cry ‘Derfel’ who fear Derfel. For myself I have no cry. But if I had, ’twould be some Gaer-and-Gorsedd cry of the ancient people, the people of Mynydd-y-Gaer-yng-Nghorwen, and of the Gorsedd at Mathrafal, and of the Dragon-Mound at Meifod.”

Rhisiart watched the Prince’s face with intense interest. “If I were he,” he thought, “I’d burst out at Broch for that. I’d cry, ‘Damn your ancient people! We’re all Welshmen here to-night, fighting for a real, living, modern Wales, a Wales with its own laws, its own clergy, its own—’”

But fancying he detected on Owen’s bearded lips that disconcerting smile — so like Meredith’s — he dismissed, for the time being, the thought of the two Universities, and contented himself with suggesting in an unassuming tone that “Saint David for Wales,” or simply “Dewi Sant!” would he a more suitable cry than “Derfel”.

It was on the tip of his tongue to describe to them the lurid rhyme of that ghoulish creature on the dung-heap; but he restrained himself.

Rhys Gethin, however, suppressed his whole suggestion in a moment. “The men’ll cry ‘Derfel’ tomorrow,” he announced bluntly, “whatever we decide for them!”

Owen called for a midnight “stirrup-cup” at this point, and gathering round the great bowl in a less controversial temper they all began discussing the personal arms they would use. A vague notion that had been hovering in our young friend’s mind of charging down the slope of Bryn Glas upon Griffin’s back was soon dispelled by the Prince’s declaration that he himself would fight on foot with no weapon but his two-edged sword. Rhisiart at once resolved to content himself with his own antique weapon, now securely buckled round his waist, and to offer his precious dagger to his friend, the Lollard.

“Why do you use nothing but those axes?” he permitted himself, in the glow of this more intimate moment, to enquire of Broch-o’-Meifod.

‘“Tis a long story, child,” replied the giant kindly. “But the gist of it is, I’ve practised with my axes so long — I throw them you know — that I never leave an enemy hurt or wounded.”

“How do you leave them?”

“I leave them dead; but so quickly dead that they feel nothing.”

The Lollard, who had been listening to this with the gravest attention, broke in eagerly. “You’ve no scruple, then, about killing — only about causing pain?”

The giant nodded. “You’ve got it exactly, my friend! I am partial to death. I don’t regard death as an evil. But I regard pain as a monstrous and unnecessary evil.”

“But aren’t pain and suffering the basis of our religion?”

“Not of mine,” said Broch-o’-Meifod. “Death is the basis of my religion.”

“But isn’t death the ultimate outrage, the ultimate defeat?” murmured Owen in a low voice.

Father Pascentius forgot himself so far as to lift the great bowl to his lips in place of dipping his flagon into it. “If death hadn’t been the worst,” he spluttered, replacing the bowl on the table while his eyes devoured, face by face, everybody in sight, “the Son of God wouldn’t have died.”

"It isn't the worst; it's the best," said Broch-o'-Meifod. "He took the best," he added after a pause, and with a very strange note in his voice.

A silence followed this. Owen thought of his secretly cherished faith in his power of externalizing his soul. Rhisiart told himself a story of his mother, on the arm of her French husband, crossing London Bridge on her way to see the Coronation of Henry the Fifth; and how she would shudder at the sight of "a mouldering head with a pike through it, not knowing that it was the head of her little monk'."

The Lollard thought of the Florentine ring he had given to Mistress Alice, so choicely worked, and of how much she could sell it for if he were killed tomorrow.

"The Devil fly away with you all!" cried Rhys Gethin, rising to his feet. "I'm off into the fresh air to get a good sound sleep. If I'm not at your Mass tomorrow, Father, it'll be because I've got further to go than the Prince or Meredith."

"Not a string loosed, remember," Owen called to him as he went out, "till you see us rush on them."

"Don't shoot over their heads, Meredith ab Owen, as I've seen you do before now!" and with this final jibe the warrior went out.

Henry Don of Kidwelly was the only leader among them who made no attempt to sleep that night. After seeing his horsemen safely ensconced for the night, their unconscious forms stretched on the fir needles close to their tethered beasts, he himself, upon his favourite white mare who had a touch of Arabia in her blood, rode silently down the valley in the direction of the expected enemy. There was a pallid half-moon visible now and again; but the warm west wind, driving great lowering banks of clouds before it, kept obscuring this troubled voyager, and Don rode slowly, pondering in his mind many anxious thoughts.

He felt thoroughly uneasy as to the result of all these preparations. That last bitter word of Gethin's about the shooting of Meredith's archers especially teased his mind. He knew, too, a good deal more about the fighting capacity of these tourney-trained knights in armour than did any of Owen's advisers or of Owen's men.

He knew how extremely difficult it was to induce men on foot, even if fighting with all the advantage of higher ground, to approach these steel-clad gentlemen with their shields and their mighty lances. A chance arrow — rarely a carefully aimed one — might sometimes bring down a horse or a rider. But these trained war-steeds were as well armoured as their masters, and in any sort of equal contest their mere weight, with the long spears and armorial shields of the men mounted upon them, was enough to put panic into the hearts of all but the steadiest bowmen.

If the archers stood firm, he knew what the long-bow could do. But how rarely they did stand firm when armed knights charged them with levelled lances and plumes! Pensively and slowly Henry Don rode down that leafy glade. The cool night-wind stirred the heron's feather on his steel cap and blew through his trim black beard.

He felt, for all his anxious thoughts, a delicious relief in escaping from that noisy council-table and the fumes of that midnight bowl. Indescribably refreshing were the wood-smells that the wind brought as it rustled through the fir-branches.

When for a moment the half-moon swept into view, obscure shadows, that were themselves like sad and formless thoughts, not unhappy thoughts but thoughts with long vistas of memory, appeared before him.

Save for the rustling of the branches and the slow foot-fall on the mossy path of his white steed there was not a sound between earth and heaven. The thought did enter that trim head under the heron's feather that it was a pity that all this deep natural peace should be invaded by armed men bent upon a murderous struggle, but Don of Kidwelly was a practical though a lonely and thoughtful man, and his mind soon swung back to the matter in hand.

"They don't know," he said to himself, "none of them know, what they're facing tomorrow. Owen must be fifty; and his air isn't the air of a dare-devil patriot or a ruthless statesman. That Hereford boy's a typical Oxford scholar. Old Broch's a crazy mystic. The monk's little better. Rhys Gethin's a brave soldier, but you" — and he watched his mare's white mane as it stirred in the wind— "have as much intelligence as he has! Not one word have I heard from Owen as to the sort of princedom, if the common people do rise and help him, he'll establish in Wales. Has he given a thought, have any of them given a thought, as to what'll happen after his death? Will his eldest son succeed him? Or will he fall back on our fatal Welsh custom and divide the princedom between Griffith and Meredith? It won't last a year if he does, hardly a—"

His meditations were broken by the sight of a figure in front of him, the solitary figure of a man on foot with a bow drawn and an arrow on the string. Automatically he reined in the white mare, and horse and rider became one, the motionless image of a man upon a horse.

"A fine night!" he said quietly. "I am Henry Don of Kidwelly. Are you for Wales or for England?"

The figure in front of him unstrung his bow, returned the arrow into its quiver, and advanced without fear. "I thought it was you, Master Don," he said when he reached him. "Don't you remember me?"

Yes, the rider did remember him! It was the spy from Mortimer's army that he'd released that very day.

"You'd better ride back faster than you came, Master," said the fellow calmly. "They're not more than a couple of miles behind me."

"In what order?"

"In close array, Master. The gentlemen in front, then the troopers; and my mates in the rear."

"It's a surprise attack, then?"

"They know Owen's in Pilleth. They know he's waiting for them; but they hope to catch the fox asleep."

"It'll be dawn before they get there. It must be past three already."

"Dawn, yes; but it won't be light," remarked the fellow.

"They won't budge from the highway, will they?"

"I believe not, Master. They don't know the country. They think the village is the other side of Bryn Glas."

"And that Owen and his people are asleep in the village?"

The man nodded.

"Well, I'll be getting back," said Henry Don.

The two men stared at each other as the half-moon appeared between the branches.

"If — I — can — persuade my mates," said the fellow cautiously, "I suppose we'd better not join you till—"

"You mean you won't play them false till you're sure we're the winners?"

"Something like that," murmured the spy sullenly.

"Well, well," said the other in a friendly tone, "I'll see you're well rewarded, if you do bring them over. And I'll leave the moment to you."

"Master Don?"

"Well?"

"I'd like you to understand one thing before you go."

"Well?"

"If I bring them over, it won't be for you, or for Owen, or for any other fine gentleman; it'll be for the common folk of Wales!"

The man on the phantom-white mare gravely inclined his steel-capped head, listened intently for a second, as if he could hear the march of the enemy, and then, lightly swinging round, rode off at top speed in the direction of Pilleth.

The peasant with the long-bow turned also, but more slowly. "Will it do us any good?" he said to himself. "Philip Sparrow swore to me — but they all hold together, these whoreson gentry. Welsh, Norman, English — they're all alike!"

Meanwhile, riding rapidly up the narrow valley, came the army from Ludlow. Hereford men, most of them were, but some came from Salop, and some from the broad Radnor lands of the Mortimers. Sir Edmund himself, with Thomas Clanvow at his side, rode in front. Both were heavily-armed, both carried mighty lances, both were tall, personable men.

Clanvow, a good deal the elder of the two, was less weary and very much the more voluble. His head was bare, revealing to his companion every time the moon appeared a massive brow covered with thick curls, laughing, carefree eyes, and a strong soft neck, surrounded, above his mail surcote, by a rich collar of beaten gold.

The lean, anxious profile of the young Sir Edmund, with the short Mortimer upper lip drawn back a little from his clean-shaved mouth, kept turning in polite but troubled attention towards the cheerful countenance at his side.

"Well, at any rate," Clanvow was saying, "there were no horses wading in blood when I was born. My stars are all in good aspect for this encounter — and since we're brothers-in-arms for the adventure, what happens to me must happen to you! You take life too hard, Edmund. You're tired out now with all the worry you've made for yourself. Why weren't you content with our good shire-lads, without dragging all these damned Welsh tenants of yours into it? That speech you made to them this morning — staying awake half the night, I warrant, to compose it! — why, my sweet lad, not half of them understood what you were driving at! And why the devil did you write all that stuff to Harry Hotspur? He knows as well as you what a stingy miser King Harry is!

"You think too much, Edmund, that's what's the matter with you; and your thoughts run too far ahead. I suppose you're fancying a time'll come when the Percies will turn against the King and put your little nephew on the throne. 'Hotspur the King-maker,' and all that sort of thing!

"I tell you, my dear lad, here and now, you'd better put that stuff out of your head! Two to one that precious letter of yours is in the King's hands already. Take things as they come, lad, that's the trick. Our affair now is to get hold of Glendourdy and pack him off in chains to London. Put out of your mind all these silly thoughts of getting a ransom for him. He's an outlaw, and must be treated as such. Who's going to ransom him, I should like to know? King Richard's friends, the Franciscans? His estates are gone already, or soon will be. The fellow's a mere bandit, I tell you, from the caves of Snowdon! The King's mad to have let Grey buy himself off to such a tune. That's why Glendourdy's got such a rabble with him. When Grey's money's gone, they'll be gone. They're only a mob of Welsh thieves. There's not a gentleman among them.

"You say you're in want of money, and a good ransom for Glendourdy would pay your debts. But who was it I heard the other night telling Devereux that he oughtn't to evict his tenants? That's where your money's gone! What's the good of being a Mortimer if you can't collect your dues?"

While the lively poet was thus combining his enjoyment of the night’s adventure with a little practical advice, a few paces behind them, the three robust knights, Robert Whitney, Kinard de la Bere, and Walter Devereux, were exchanging vehement hopes that their evasive enemy would show himself and give battle.

“The great thing,” said de la Bere, “is to draw Glendourdy down from his hills. If we only once get him on level ground he won’t have a chance. You should have seen the Shropshire levies under Hugh Burnell rush him into Vyrnwy two years ago. You should have seen John Charlton of the Red Castle hustle him when he came near Welshpool. The man’s never once met any decent English troops without having to run like a hare. What worries me,” and the lusty old knight disturbed the roosting-place of a flock of small birds by the brandishings of his long lance, “is that we’re about as likely to get a sight of him this day as we are to get a sight of the gold that they say pilgrims have piled before the miraculous picture of Our Lady of Pilleth.”

“How will you fight,” enquired the portly Robert Whitney, “on horseback as we are, or on foot?”

“A good question, Master Whitney, a good question,” threw in Walter Devereux. “I’ll soon tell you how we’ll fight. First call our people to us — each of us his own — and then wait their attack. Not too near each other though. Let ’em break themselves on us, like whoreson waves on goodly rocks. Keep to your saddles for Mary’s sake, and run the whoreson knaves through with your lances! If your lance sticks and you’ve no one to pluck it from the varlet’s ribs, let it go, and have at them with your sword!”

As he spoke, Devereux removed his helmet, and hanging it on his saddle-bow glared at his friends as if they were the enemy. He had the most grotesque features, this pure-blooded Norman. Nature had given him an enormous hooked nose, thin indrawn lips hidden by a straggly black moustache, and a pointed chin as sharp as a witch-wife's.

Old de la Bere just shrugged his powerful shoulders and smiled in the man's face; but Whitney looked uneasily round as if to make sure that his retainers were within call.

Whitney was a newcomer among the magnates of the border. From the distaff side he did indeed boast a few drops of old Saxon blood, but his closed and clamped face, his crafty little eyes, his ponderous frame, all of them smacked rather of the justice's bench than of the battlefield. He had indeed been a mighty one for "adding field to field and house to house"; nor would he have joined this expedition at all had it not been that he was certain in his own mind that the Welshmen would vanish into their caves and that the King would reward so devoted a servant with many forfeited estates. The words "law and order" were the words most frequently upon the lips of Robert Whitney, and he had already managed to get it to the King's ears that he cordially approved of the policy of retaining all ransoms, especially of Scotch prisoners, in the royal hands; and that his tenants were always at the royal disposal if the Percies proved restive under this businesslike treatment.

All this lively chit-chat by the way insensibly lessened the speed with which Mortimer's force progressed; and by the time they reached the place where the horsemen from South Wales were hidden there began to be recognized, at least by the leader himself and his poet-friend, certain faint but unmistakeable indications that dawn was at hand.

It was at this moment that one of Henry Don's younger followers, unable to sleep, and prepared to risk disobeying his Lord's command if he could only be the first to bring news of the enemy, caused a rustling in the fir-branches. He had seen what he wanted to see, and he got clear away; but the sound of his horse's hasty retreat reached the five knights simultaneously. The woods were thick around them. No better place for an ambush could have been found.

"Mortimer, a Mortimer!" cried their leader. "Clanvow for Clanvow!" cried the poet; and while the other two knights, for the judicious Whitney had no claim to a cry, echoed with "a Devereux for Saint Ouen!" and "a de la Bere for Saint Martin!" their retainers hurried forward in an excited pell-mell and rallied in groups round their respective lords.

The main body of the shire-troopers followed more leisurely, while the Mortimer Welsh tenants, among whom was the friend of the revolutionary, Philip Sparrow, stood still to await events.

"Saint Mary! But this is foolishness if ever there was!" laughed Thomas Clanvow. "All right, John o'Dale, all right Peter Purvey — you can fall back again! Come on, Edmund lad. Tell 'em to fall back. We're a parcel of silly women. There's no ambush here. I've got a sixth sense for Welsh thieves. 'Twas a stag we disturbed. Those were a big animal's movements, not the feet of a horde of bare-foot scrubs! It was a stag, I tell you, or maybe a forest-pony."

So saying the curly-haired poet broke into a bawdy ditty, waved back his retainers with the steel helmet he'd been on the point of placing on his head, and proceeded to spur on his horse so fast that Mortimer had to gallop to keep pace with him.

The three other gentlemen glanced at one another with a smile and followed their example, while the heavily-accoutred men-at-arms who formed the main body of their force cursed freely as they quickened their march to a jog-trot.

The five knights, if the business-like Master Whitney could be called a knight, did, however, have the wit, if not the grace, to pause to breathe their horses, and to allow their followers to rest, when they reached the foot of Bryn Glas. The grey light in the east had now spread over the whole sky; and as they all rested there, many of the troopers easing themselves by removing the heavier pieces of their armour and some of them even sinking down upon the grass, there seemed to take possession of them all an unspoken desire to postpone ascending the hill till the dawn really began.

Clanvow was still restless; but Mortimer, as he watched the relief with which the troopers took advantage of this pause, became obdurate at his friend's impatience.

"I know, I know," he replied when the poet urged the importance of their attack being a surprise. "But men with no breath in their bodies can't surprise anybody."

And as they all rested there it seemed as if the miracle of the dawn drew their general consciousness towards itself, so that their life-sense ceased to be an individual thing and became a common thing, a multiple entity that had grown spell-bound by what was happening in the firmament.

Irregular blood-red streaks appeared now in the eastern quarter. One second and there were none of these; another second and there they were! And with the coming of these blood-red streaks the air that cooled their faces suddenly lost a certain damp chill that characterized it before; and though it didn't grow warm it carried with it a perceptible quality of livingness, as if those red streaks in the sky, wild and sad as they were, like a reflection from battle-fields of long-ago, brought with them something familiar, something steeped in old earth-memories, that drove back the mortal death-chill of the empty night.

By degrees, as they watched, they perceived that these dark-red streaks had changed their character. They didn't see them in the process of changing, for it is forbidden to the human eye to catch the actual movement of celestial presences, but where they'd been contemplating dark blood-streaks they were now contemplating rose-coloured clouds! Nor was it long as they watched — and even the five horses seemed to be expanding their nostrils towards the east — before that rose-tinge had spread over the whole sky till it reached the zenith, while in the quarter where the blood-streaks had first appeared it was as if some vast magic gates had opened, leading into an infinity of glorified distance, into a receding perspective of golden space.

It was still some while before the moment came for the orb of the sun itself to appear when Mortimer gave the signal to advance. He gave it as soon as he perceived that his Welsh bowmen, tenants of the Mortimer lands in Wales, had begun to wind their way into the open out of the gloomy umbrageousness of the fir-woods. These men, he assumed, being more lightly armed and inured to these mountainous tracks, would need no rest before ascending the long slope before them; but when, half-way up the ascent of Bryn Glas, he turned to look back at his devoted array he was surprised, though not particularly disturbed, to note that the Welshmen were resting at the foot of the hill.

Anxious to keep his own and his friends' horses as fresh as possible for their assault upon the village, Mortimer continued to restrain the impatience of his poetical friend. All five gentlemen were now riding together; and they advanced so slowly that there was plenty of time for conversation.

"It's all the fault of Reginald Grey," announced Devereux, "that Glendourdy has made this stir. His own relatives are against him. All the most civilized of the Welsh aristocracy are against him. What the thing really is, is a peasants' revolt. It wants putting down with a firm hand, that's all! These bards are the worst. They're all for the common herd. What the King should do is to stamp out this curst gibberish they call their language.

Language forsooth! Chatter of kites and crows it sounds to me. I can't stomach the whoreson tongue."

"That's what I say," acquiesced Robert Whitney sententiously. "There'll never be real law and order in these mountains till all the bards are hung and all the peasants forbidden to leave the estates they cultivate. Welsh gentlemen are like other gentlemen. I know many of them and they're ashamed to be heard talking this lingo of the common herd. Hang every bard in Wales I say."

"Sir Edmund don't agree with you," threw in Kinard de la Bere. "He's lived too long with these bare-foot savages. He's come to love 'em, as a man comes to love his hounds. No, no, Mortimer, you needn't try to deny it. But I tell'ee this, my boy; if your plottings with your precious brother-in-law — now don't look so sour, for everyone on the border knows it — did put your nephew on the throne, you and your friend Hotspur would love to do exactly what old Hal and young Hal are doing now: burn these savages' huts till they know their masters! What do you say, Clanvow?"

"I say," replied the poet, "that a gentleman who treats his tenants like a gentleman and isn't ashamed to be on easy terms with a good simple man because he's a Welsh herdsman or a Welsh ploughman—"

Devereux interrupted him with a burst of rude laughter. "We know you, Master Clanvow! What about that 'good simple man' you caused to be flogged to death?" Here the outraged realism of this grotesque-looking aristocrat, more contemptuous of the poet's literary gentility than he was of Whitney's business gentility, caused his pendulous nose to droop over his moustache, his left ear to twitch under his helmet, and the inhuman tip of a saurian tongue to appear for a second between his toothless gums.

When his laughing-fit was over he winked so comically at Kinard de la Bere that the worthy knight had to clap his gauntleted hand over his mouth.

The truth was that it was well known in Radnorshire that Thomas Clanvow's wife, wearying, as women sometimes do, of her lusty braggart of a poet, had played the wanton with his taciturn Welsh groom.

To escape their ridicule, from which Mortimer, who was watching intently a certain hill-ridge where the infinity of gold was rapidly thickening into a floating island of dazzling metallic brightness, alone remained aloof, Clanvow, for the second time that morning, spurred his steed forward, a move that made it necessary for Mortimer to follow him.

Thus it was brought about that though not a man throughout that whole English army, now straggling up the long half-mile slope of Bryn Glas, had missed one stage in the sun's premonitory approachings, its actual appearance was unseen by a single soul.

With a resounding shout of "Owen for Wales!" Glyn Dŵr and his men bounded from their shelter in the green bracken and swept down upon their enemy. Had a pair of ravens that were hovering above the crowded slope of Bryn Glas felt impelled to turn their eyes from the blazing orb of the sun and contemplate this onslaught, it might have seemed to them as if Owen's little band was simply swallowed up as it charged down into the very centre of the Ludlow army.

To the Prince himself, who was tall enough to see what was happening beyond the immediate melée, it seemed like an hour, though it was only three minutes, before Meredith's division, though they scampered like demons along the side of the slope, joined battle on the enemy's left, while it seemed two hours before Rhys Gethin's band had time to reach the scene on the enemy's right.

Owen and Rhisiart were swept forward so fast by the rush of their own momentum and the momentum of the men following them that it wasn't till they were in the thick of the heavy-armed shire-levies that their primary impetus was stayed.

Here, however, it was stayed with a vengeance, for they had outstripped all but a score of their most eager friends, and this little circle of devoted Welshmen found themselves surrounded and hemmed in by the pick of the stout yeomen from the fertile plains round the Castle of Ludlow.

With shout upon shout these powerful troopers drove in upon them, shortening their spears and furiously stabbing at them, as if they were a small pack of encircled wolves in the jaws of the wolf-hounds.

The figure of Owen was unmistakeable. “Have at him! Have at him!” Rhisiart heard them cry out on all sides. ‘“Tis Glendourdy himself!” The voice of a young freckled leader among them was especially audible. “A thousand silver groats,” he shouted, “to the man who takes Glendourdy — alive or dead!” This freckled youth himself did nothing but obstinately, constantly, and steadily drive his spear at the Prince.

Rhisiart watched his movements like a hawk, and at one second their eyes met, and to the astonishment of our friend he found himself actually exchanging a smile with this unknown Ludlow boy, just as if they’d been playing ball, instead of a game of life and death!

At last the boy’s foot slipped where someone’s entrails had strewn the grass and Rhisiart was on him in a flash with the first death-stroke he’d ever given. Thrusting straight at the freckled face that had smiled at him, he drove his great sword into the lad’s panting mouth, drove it with so much vigour that the point of it came out at the back of his enemy’s skull.

It struck him afterwards that he must have been in a kind of blood-daze; for he could remember putting his foot on that dead lad’s chest without a flicker of hesitation, and remorselessly dragging out his weapon, while the Prince’s Roman sword flashed above his head.

"We can't win! We can't win!" something in him kept repeating; but when he saw how Owen had perpetually to swing round he began to do what he saw Master Sparrow doing for his master — that is to say, guard at all costs the Prince's back.

Nothing of what was happening outside their own miniature battlefield reached him. Grimly, desperately, he set himself to that one sole task; and the result justified him; for, spared the necessity of swinging round on his heel, Owen with his practised wrist soon made a clearance of the press of spears in front of him.

The curious thing was that our friend didn't think once of Catharine. His brain was stupefied. But several times he thought of Griffin; and in some obscure way he felt as if Owen's back were a piebald thing, but a thing he had to guard while breath was in him.

This business couldn't, Rhisiart thought, last much longer. As a matter of fact it lasted for about ten minutes, after which they heard reassuring Welsh cries from the bowmen at the foot of the hill and felt a certain "give" in the spirit of their opponents. Yes, the enemy below them were being assailed from their rear by flight after flight of stinging arrow-shafts! Ten minutes can, however, be a long time when death is at your throat; and thinking it over afterwards our friend acknowledged that if Broch-o'-Meifod hadn't been with them both Owen and himself, along with Master Brut and Master Sparrow, would certainly have perished.

Owen fought like a madman with his two-edged sword and Rhisiart tried to imitate him with his relic of the Crusades but there was such terrific pressure all round them and so many blows struck at them at once from so many directions that our friend, till he realized that Mortimer's bowmen had changed sides, hardened his heart to meet his end.

Master Brut, who apparently had only accepted Rhisiart's dagger out of courtesy, showed incredible agility as a pugilist, and by his quick movements managed for a while to dodge the most murderous spears. But for an unarmed man to be in the centre of that stabbing and cracking and smashing was what Homer calls hyper-moron or a wilful rushing beyond the circle of your natural fate.

In the end Broch-o'-Meifod saved the Lollard's life in a very primitive manner. He brought down his own fist on the man's head with such drastic effect that he lay at their feet as though stone dead.

But it was Broch's skill with his axes that really saved them all; for though the Prince's Roman sword turned its deadly point and swung its double edge faster than the Hereford boy had ever seen a sword move, there came moments, even in that short time, when he only just escaped a murderous thrust.

Two of these thrusts Rhisiart, at no small risk, beat off himself; but there came a moment when his arm ached so much with the weight of his great sword that if he hadn't tripped over the still unconscious form of Master Brut, one of these spears would have pierced his own throat.

It was Broch's axes that saved them. The giant went on flinging them as if he were an iron engine of death rather than a man, and Rhisiart saw only one of them sink into the earth without its victim. But Broch couldn't have achieved this if the revolutionary Philip hadn't been standing back to back against him.

Nor was Master Sparrow's method of fighting much less singular than his master's; for he kept whirling round his head in each hand, and both his arms seemed to have the strength of an ordinary man's right arm, a gleaming pole-axe; and under the slashing blows of this unusual weapon the heads of many vicious spears and the bodies of more than one spearman lay on the ground before him. Though his boyish muscles were growing so numb under the weight of his sword that each time he struck he felt that he could never strike again, Rhisiart was still not quite oblivious of the general nature of the life-and-death struggle round him.

He felt its primitive race-quality. He felt its primitive beast-quality. He felt it was body against body, though with iron in place of claw. Yes, he felt rising from these straining Welsh bodies one single blind, frantic, desperate obsession; an obsession to tear, to rend, to overmaster these massive, struggling English bodies that by their sheer weight and oppressive obstinacy were beating them down.

It must, however, be confessed that when he tripped and fell, Rhisiart did, in his complete exhaustion, take advantage of his collapse across his stunned friend to remain on the ground for a perceptible breathing-space.

While on the ground with his face against a tuft of white clover he found himself sucking these honey-weeds, and as he sucked his breath came in spluttered gasps, “Hail Mary! Hail Mary! Hail Mary!” but in his mind he said to himself, “We may win yet! We may win yet!”

Just then a heavy weight fell against him, knocking for an instant all the breath out of him, and when he scrambled to his feet he saw it was Owen himself with an arrow in his chest. Blood was coming out of the chieftain’s mouth and trickling down both forks of his beard; and to Rhisiart’s horror their eyes had hardly met when the man fainted away.

“That’s a Welsh arrow,” remarked Broch-o’-Meifod in the dazed and confused ears of the recovered Lollard.

“Is he dead? Have we won?” gasped Rhisiart.

“He’s not dead, little Master,” replied Philip Sparrow, “and we have won. Their Welsh archers turned against them, that’s what decided it! It’s the beginning of the end. It’s the people’s victory! The people’s victory!”

Rhisiart saw now that Master Sparrow was correct in both his statements. Piteous groans, wild cries for mercy, yells of pain rose up from Bryn Glas and occupied the gap in space and time filled twenty minutes ago by that proud army from Ludlow. He could hear, dying away into the woods below, the clatter and curses of Don's horsemen, cutting off the fugitives.

And Owen's eyes were open again and he could speak now. "It's — under — my — collar-bone," he murmured. "I'm all right. We'll leave it there till to-night. My shirt turned its point."

"It's a Welsh arrow," repeated Broch-o'-Meifod with foolish iteration.

But the Lollard, pale, shaky, and though entirely himself again, totally ignorant as to what he owed his life, was extricating a bleeding form from among the victims of Owen's sword and Broch's axes. It made Rhisiart's heart cold to recognize in this piteously gashed creature none other than his faithful messenger, Rawlff.

The dying boy knew him. "I — shall — never be — a dubbed — knight — now," he whispered, as our friend bent over him.

Rhisiart glanced at Owen whose eyes were also on the boy. "Lend me your sword," said the Prince calmly. Rhisiart obeyed. "Help me to get to him," he added. It needed more strength than Rhisiart's, however, to carry out this last mandate; but they moved him by degrees, one of his own hands nervously clutching the shaft of the arrow whose head was buried in his chest.

"I, Owen ap Griffith, Prince of Wales, Knight of the most Royal Order of Richard of England, Second of that Name, do in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost dub thee, Rawlff ap Daffydd, Knight Companion of my new Order of Dewi Sant.... Rise Sir Rawlff!"

What "rose" was a spurt of arterial blood from the mouth of the new Knight; but Rhisiart never forgot the look of radiance on the boy's face as, murmuring something about “telling Luned,” his soul left its body. It was through a blood-stained mist, for his eyes, his ears, his nostrils, his fingers seemed all sticky with blood, that Rhisiart helped Broch and the Lollard to carry their wounded chief across the dead and the dying till they got him to the summit of Bryn Glas.

The lad had to give up his place at one point to Philip Sparrow, whose own long legs were dripping with blood from disregarded spear-thrusts. What set him vomiting was the sight of Lawnslot and Gwalchmai — both born executioners — moving among the rank and file of the dying to give them their coup de grace.

He had re-taken his place, however, at Owen’s head when they passed a hillock, slippery with blood, on the top of which beside his dead horse the incorrigible Devereux was still fighting for his life.

Sick of the sight of blood, and unwitting who this fantastic gentleman might be who refused to give up his sword, our friend lowered his eyes; so that it was from the Lollard he learnt later how the astonishing knight, his pendulous nose and insolent mouth twisted in one final defiance of everything in heaven and earth, laughed aloud, as with his death-blow he came near to cleaving poor young Madoc’s head clean from his neck.

On arriving at their headquarters the little group was jubilantly informed, though the Prince’s critical state soon quelled all tumultuous congratulations, that Mortimer and Clanvow, who had been surrounded and disarmed at the first rush, were prisoners of war.

For the remainder of that day Rhisiart stayed by Owen’s side. Indeed it was with his famous Toledo dagger, sharper than any knife, that some Pilleth “conjurer”, aided by the sobered Bard of Ffinnant, succeeded at last in extracting the arrow-head from the Prince’s collarbone.

How the lad longed for darkness to descend, the revelry to die down, and Owen to fall asleep! He made up his mind that before he himself slept he would read Catharine's letter syllable by syllable; and with each syllable he would say seven "Hail Marys" for the Knight Companion of Dewi Sant. This vow he meticulously kept, but for all his exhaustion of mind and body, sleep refused to come to him.

Weary of tossing from side to side, while he kept seeing the blood spurt out from Rawlff's mouth, and kept hearing the groans of the anonymous victims of Lawnslot and Gwalchmai, he decided at last to put on his clothes and go out into the night. Once in the air he felt calmer, and for a while happier, as he thought of Catharine receiving the news of her father's victory.

But the shapeless moon, throwing a phantom light upon the aerial landscape, drew him on against his will in the direction of the battlefield. It didn't take him long to reach the summit of Bryn Glas; but once there, looking down upon that field of slaughter, he felt as if he had been turned to stone. The realization of what he saw and of what it meant was beyond mortal belief.

Only twenty hours had passed since the battle began, but what had been done in that short time! The women of Pilleth — and he knew at once who had roused them to it, for there she was still, like a werewolf bitch among the dead — had, all that long summer twilight, been stripping the English corpses — and not only stripping them. "Can such things be," thought the poor lad, "and the Mother of God above all?"

He had vomited at the proceedings of Lawnslot and Gwalchmai, but this, the work of women, was an outrage beyond all physical reaction. Fiercely, desperately, for what he saw before him made a crack in his deepest faith, he tried to think the thing away by calling up the injury done to Wales by English oppression.

But this was beyond all human retribution, all human revenge. This was a work of insanity, of obsession by Satan. And that creature — surely she couldn't be human! — was at it still.

White with a whiteness like the whiteness of leprosy, those hapless bodies, bodies that twenty-four hours ago were living Englishmen, lay now, under that shapeless moon, transformed into lewd mockeries of flesh and blood. Or were these white obscenities not corpses at all, but fiends from Hell, called up out of the pit by this ghoulish half-moon, to make monstrous sport of the mysteries of procreation?

The moon's power was upon Rhisiart. Do what he could to turn away from these silent parodies of man's nakedness, he couldn't turn away! Had the corpse-loving moon injected a drop of her perverse frenzy into his own veins? Would he, Rhisiart ab Owen, be soon leaping down among those snow-white images of life's obscene origin, adding a new bestiality here, a new monstrosity there, dancing in and out of that woman's work, as if he were an initiate at a witches' Sabbath?

No! No! Things hadn't come to that. He was fascinated; but he was also outraged to the bottom of his soul! What troubled him as much as anything was the shamelessness of the distorted moon. Why didn't she hide her face? Instead of that she seemed pouring her light down with an hysterical exultation.

Rhisiart's own nerves were so affected by what he saw that he began to regard the ghastly sight not so much as the reprisals of Welsh women upon English men as the reprisals of all women, led by this labouring moon, upon all men; women in their mad perversity working obscene and monstrous blasphemy upon the very secrets of creation!

It was as if that declivity of Bryn Glas had suddenly upheaved in a devilish parody of the Last Day, and a host of lost souls, white with the leprous scurf of sin, were mutely offering to the oldest witch in Nature their unspeakable transformations!

There must have been as many as twenty or thirty women down there with Lowri; and their were-wolf madness, as far as our friend could see, was increasing rather than diminishing. The men must have carried away all the Welsh bodies from the battle-field during the day; and none had felt it his duty to bury their enemies.

"It's because Meredith's wounded as well as his father," our friend thought, "that this bitch has got such a free hand. Rhys Gethin's probably dead-drunk by this time, and Henry Don thinks it's none of his business. Owen ought never to have let that woman come down here, but women have too many rights in Wales; and that's certain."

It struck his mind as a curious thing that the Scab wasn't serving his demon among these helpless English; but no doubt he was drunk too; "Besides, a man would have to be pretty bold," concluded our friend, "To go down there among those mad witches!"

He had no sooner decided that even living men, and Welshmen to boot, might hesitate to present themselves before Lowri and her Maenads in their present mood, when he was aware of two men running towards him. They ran so fast that they were soon near enough for him to distinguish their identities. The man in front was Master Simon and the man behind was Master Brut.

Rhisiart turned to meet them. His first emotion was a curious one. It was burning shame. He felt his face grow hot. Had a blush on a swarthy cheek, and by moonlight too, been a recognizable sight Master Simon would have wondered at him.

But the ex-Hog of Chirk was past wondering at anything. The good-natured Lollard, who had offered to take the place of the luckless young Madoc, whose decapitation at one stroke had caused his slayer to die laughing, had been disturbed in his vigil at Owen's door by the furtive appearance of Master Simon. The reformed Hog was stealing down the stairs from his wife's apartment without his shoes and with a stare in his eyes so wild, so guilty, and so dominated by the Devil that Master Brut jumped up in dismay. The fellow's explanations were obviously lies and when the Lollard saw his back as it left the building, it presented itself to his Pauline eye as a back unmistakeably ridden by Satan; in other words as the back of a man possessed.

Dragging therefore into the house an extremely sleepy and sulkily puzzled trooper to take his place, the Lollard, who hadn't removed any article of his ordinary attire, which certainly couldn't be called a heavy battle-array, started in pursuit of Master Simon, who, quickly aware that his conscience was after him, ran like a rabbit.

It was Rhisiart's presence that facilitated the poor wretch's capture; and it was our friend's destiny to be present now at one of the most remarkable scenes he would ever be allowed to witness.

"She's my own wife," panted the obsessed prisoner, staring with a devouring intensity almost worthy of Father Pascentius at the Satanic charade revealed to him by the gloating moon.

Our friend's legal mind found it hard to resist this plea. "I don't see, Brut," he commenced, "how you can very well meddle—" His words died away in his throat; for in addressing his friend he caught a glimpse of his face with the moonlight full upon it. The power, it appeared, which controlled that gibbous moon forced it to throw the good into relief equally with the evil; and Rhisiart, for the first time in his life, was terrified of Master Brut. An authority shone forth from this Hereford gentleman's face that was the flame of the Spirit. He must have seen what Lowri and her women were doing. He must have seen what they had done. But it was clear that his mind was so overpowered by the image of his suffering Man-God that the hysterical antics of these females were no more to him than if, gazing at his Redeemer, he had noted in the dulce lignum of His Cross the obscene proceedings of a few necrophiliac wood-lice.

Rhisiart now beheld an unseemly struggle between the two men, each of them powerfully built, each of them possessed by a force completely outside himself. Master Simon's face was convulsed with an emotion so great that its individual features in that pallid light seemed to merge into one another, seemed to become one single feature, a quivering, twitching, licking, straining tongue.

Suddenly Rhisiart saw his hand slide into his tunic and come out again with a glittering knife.

"Take—" the lad cried out sharply; but the heretic had seen his danger, and his method of "taking care" was as effective as it was startling. He brought down his fist with the weight of an iron hammer upon the head of his recalcitrant disciple.

Simon fell with a thud and lay as still as the Lollard himself had done under the fist of Broch-o'-Meifod.

"Let's get him to bed," remarked the Wycliffite quietly, "before he comes to himself. But his devil's left him. Didn't you hear it whizz past us?" And then a little later, "Have you noticed," he said, and this quaint remark was uttered in a perfectly calm and practical manner, while our friend helped him to convey his burden back to the house, as if the great victory of Bryn Glas had been no more than a riot in the street, "have you noticed how Our Lord never came face to face with a woman possessed by a devil?"

This was too much for Rhisiart, and he laughed aloud. “Do you mean,” he began; but neither then nor later, though as may be supposed his malicious mind often reverted to the Ruthin girl, did he dare to pursue that question with his friend.

His mind was feverishly active all the same. “I don’t believe I’ll ever sleep again!” he thought as they re-entered the building.

In examining his crusader’s sword he had noticed two or three minute dents in it, several inches from its point, and had remembered how a freckled, innocent-looking English boy had closed his teeth on that blade as he had driven it home, clean through the boy’s gullet.

“I must think of the two blows I’ve seen today different from that,” he said to himself, “the one when Broch saved Brut’s life, and the other when Brut saved—”

But though he tried hard to sleep it was always with the freckles on that boy’s face who had bitten his sword that Catharine’s letter kept spelling itself out on the darkness.

XVI. THE FORESTS OF TYWYN

THE NEWS OF the victory of Bryn Glas spread at incredible speed throughout Wales; and to Master Sparrow's revolutionary delight vast numbers of armed peasants, many of them travelling at their own charges, gathered to the Prince's standard from every quarter.

Before August of 1402, though both Glyndyfrdwy and Sycharth had long been blackened ruins, Owen had several separate armies, amounting in all to over ten thousand men, whose bivouac fires, moving as if by magic through all parts of Wales, caused desperate appeals to reach King Henry.

From Abergavenny and Usk, from Cardigan, from Caerleon, from Carmarthen, from Newport, from Cardiff, and even from Gwent, these cries for help came.

Owen's own hopes were as much increased as Master Sparrow's, and his purposes as much strengthened and hardened, by this accession to the cause of what was practically the whole mass of the common people of Wales. It was a peasants' revolt, as Robert Whitney had predicted it would be, and though no castle of any importance had yet fallen into their hands, the local peasants of Glamorgan and Gwent and even of Cardigan had avenged themselves with delicious joy for three centuries of contempt by pillaging and burning every single mansion where the landlord was an Englishman or a pro-English Welshman.

Outside the walls of the great castles, and outside the walls of the great commercial towns defended by castles, this general rising of the common people gave Owen the feeling that he really was Prince of Wales, and Prince of a Wales that hadn't been so united since the days of that other Owen who, as Owen Gwynedd, brought the whole country together against Henry the Second.

Analysing, as he did with everything that happened to him, all the causes that had led to the victory of Bryn Glas, he was only confirmed more strongly than ever in his monstrous fatalism. Totally out of proportion, it seemed to him, was the effect of this victory to the victory itself!

And such vast results following from so small an occasion gave him the feeling that there were forces on his side, obscure, unfathomable, tremendous, to which, if he only accepted the trivial and casual accidents by which they worked, he might resign himself with impunity.

Such a casual chance had now arisen again in the fact that Mortimer, whose nephew had a claim to Henry's crown, and who was Hotspur's brother-in-law, was a prisoner in his hands. What if he married him to Catharine? Such a move would have a double value, forging a link with the Percies, and giving him an intimate interest in the little Earl's claim to the throne.

To let such a chance pass would be a sacrilege against the high invisible Powers that were using him as a medium. And it wasn't as if he himself would escape suffering. The girl and Rhisiart would suffer cruelly enough, but they were young. They would console themselves. But he would never console himself! It may seem strange to some minds that a person like Owen, whose intelligence was so restless, and whose consciousness of everything that went on within him was so clear, should have allowed himself to come under the power of an obsession of this kind.

But it must be remembered that his habitual attitude to himself was of such detachment that it only needed an extension of this detachment, till it included all those connected with him, to create a temper essentially dangerous to human happiness.

It wasn't only Catharine and Rhisiart he was prepared to sacrifice. As the struggle went on, and one after another of his sons were slain, the Arglwyddes was shocked by the calm he displayed. This brave and simple-hearted woman never to the end of her days grasped the depths of abnormality that lay behind the courtly facade of her husband's nature. He alone knew what a transformation of his inner being had occurred that morning before his proclamation, when he destroyed his magic crystal!

He gave himself up then, trimmed and combed and anointed, into the hands of destiny; and his cherished faith in his power of exteriorizing his soul had only increased the appalling passivity with which upon the image of fate, as upon a dark on-rolling tidal wave, he let himself drift.

In that one supreme moment, when he prayed on his knees to be given the power to embrace the darkness, he had carried down with him, as in a doomed ship, every human creature he loved. Since that moment there had been a curious gulf between his feeling about what was happening and what actually was happening. His power, if it were a power, his fantasy, if it were a fantasy, in this matter of exteriorizing his soul, grew on him more than ever after the victory of Bryn Glas.

In what Rhisiart thought of as his "attacks," but which were more often, though not always, premeditated escapes of consciousness, he would sometimes fling his soul into what felt like a vast cool empty space, an ethereal twilight of being, altogether beyond the tumult of the world; but more often he would fling it into some quite definite exterior object — like that hollow tree into which he had cast the living body of his enemy!

In the pursuance of what in his obsession he regarded as an inescapable obedience to the event, instead of accompanying his now formidable armies in the movements directed by the strategic Abbot of Caerleon, the far-sighted Henry Don, and the impetuous Rhys Gethin, he arranged for the Arglwyddes and Catharine to travel down to where, meeting them with his prisoners of war, he made use of the generous hospitality of a remarkable character of those parts, a gentleman who, whenever he put his seal to a document, signed his name as “Rhys ap Griffith ap Llewelyn ab Ieuan,” but who was commonly known in South Wales as Rhys the Black.

Rhys the Black possessed in his daughter Elliw a child who was remarkable for two things: her extravagantly long hair and her disconcerting intelligence. Her father — for her mother was dead — had got into the habit of shortening her rather unusual name into the monosyllable “Lu”. Rhys Ddu’s dwelling, which was six miles from Cardigan-town, was no very spacious or commodious a mansion, much-less an embattled castle. It possessed, however, an air of romantic antiquity, carrying the mind back — at least it carried Rhisiart’s mind back — beyond the age of castle-building, to that remote epoch when few, even among well-to-do gentlemen, possessed moats or battlements. The outer walls, it is true, of the Rhys homestead of Tywyn were composed of a species of rubble into the composition of which plenty of small stones had entered, but it was the time-blackened ancient wood-work, almost entirely of oak, that gave the place its air of immemorial antiquity.

Glyndyfrdwy was modern compared with Tywyn, and even the castellated portion of Owen’s Snowdon-fortress could hardly have been more than three hundred years old. Nor had Glyndyfrdwy any advantage of Tywyn in its mound or “gorsedd.” Tywyn possessed a mound — though it was in the centre of the Forests — second only in mythical importance to the famous one at Narberth, and associated, like the Narberth one, with the unlucky Pryderi, the much-enduring tutelary genius of the whole district.

And while something about the modest dimensions of the buildings at Tywyn enriched and mellowed their appeal to the imagination it was the unending expanse of woodland, the vast and ancient Forests of Tywyn, that most enchanted Rhisiart and Catharine.

They had hitherto only seen woods on hill-sides and in narrow valleys where the gloomy magnificence was broken by hills and gorges and by rocks and rivers; but the Forests of Tywyn, since they extended over comparatively level ground, seemed, and perhaps were, the primeval woods of Wales, from which aboriginal herdsmen had had to flee for safety to the hills.

Strange and prehistoric were the legends that lingered among the woodmen of Tywyn. Wild tales had been handed down from the remote ancestors of the dwellers here, tales that told of ancient wrongs suffered by the mythical powers of this land, where there still lingered remnants of some great, long-lost, peaceful civilization that had been destroyed by force and enchantment.

Rain and mist and the wild winds of autumn were, it was said, the retort of these primeval Forests of Tywyn to their aggressors, to the cruel “magicians” of the Age of Bronze.

Such invasions of the ancient twilight of the Great Mother were assisted in their violence by the red glare of the sun and by the white glimmer of the stars. The invaders cut down the forest-people along with their peaceful groves; until at last, so much did the Forests of Tywyn come to dread the clear skies, that that great white glitter of infinite disillusion which the classic races called “the Milky Way” was regarded in this region as “Caer Gwydion,” the un-numbered hosts of the supreme enemy of the defeated race!

It was in this strange “Deheubarth” that Owen’s mother had lived. It was in this land he had first seen the two twilights, those grey mists that he, life-lover though he was, preferred to either sun or stars.

The population of these dark Ceredigion Forests retained so lively a fear of iron and steel that they habitually expressed this instinct in the spontaneous cry of “touch oak,” or “touch wood,” when something ominous was toward.

Rhisiart himself had never been in South Wales; and though Modry’s tales had been full of its glamour and of its peaceful twilight illusions, all his own romantic cravings had been for waving plumes and embattled castles, for banners and horsemen and flashing steel! This was natural enough. All that was Welsh in him belonged to the North, all that was Norman in him belonged to the North; and though his feeling for Catharine seemed strong enough to bring warm sunshine into this twilight land, he was aware from the start of a certain vague spiritual unease such as he had never experienced on the banks of the swift-flowing Dee.

But at first they were very happy. They had no idea how far the Arglwyddes realized the feeling they had for each other. They assumed that Owen knew; and they soon began to divine, with the quick instinct of lovers, this new devastating direction along which his imagination was travelling. But if he had really decided, why was he still so loth to meddle with their love? Well! They could only hope for some chance — perhaps Mortimer himself would reluct at such a ransom! — that might yet intervene on their behalf. One thing was clear to Rhisiart. Both the Prince and the Arglwyddes understood their high-spirited daughter far too well to tease her with any ill-timed restrictions.

She and Rhisiart went on meeting as usual. Indeed their encounters were made easier and less marked than in the Snowdon fortress by the friendship that quickly sprang up between Catharine and Elliw. The two young girls would stroll together down one of the Tywyn forest paths, followed at a discreet distance by Glew the Gryd and an equally aged serving-man of the Rhys household; and then on Rhisiart's appearance they would separate, Glew the Gryd following the lovers down any leafy alley their fancy chose, while the old Rhys retainer would remain with Elliw and her great wolfhound, Corbyn.

Inside the house it was less easy for them to snatch any moments alone; for the quarters were very limited, Rhys Ddu's hospitality being strained to the utmost to provide sleeping accommodation for so many guests.

But things went on happily enough through the warm summer months, which that year, even in those forests, were particularly free from wind and rain; nor had the love between the two changed at all from the high, romantic level of feeling that had characterized its first awakening.

It would have been natural enough had it been quite otherwise; but there was something in both these young people that predisposed them to the more romantic and less earthly levels of passion. How far Catharine would have yielded to her lover's emotion, had there been less of this ethereal quality in it, it is hard to say; but they were so intensely shy and proud that any sudden rush of ungovernable feeling, or even any emotional note in their tone towards each other different from the key in which their love had been originally pitched, seemed out of the question with both of them. All July and all August went by without any overt event disturbing the happiness of these daily encounters in the forest.

It did sometimes enter Rhisiart's head to wonder — for with all his courtesy to the proud girl and with all his romantic happiness in her company he had what might be called a "wicked imagination" — how he would feel and how Catharine would feel, if he gave Glew the Gryd the slip, and carrying her off into the depths of the trackless forest overcame — and sometimes his wayward mind conjured up scenes of disturbing violence — his true love's haughty shyness; but the curious thing is that it was always at night and when he was alone that these dangerous thoughts came to him. When actually in Catharine's presence — though of course it may be that the inescapable guardianship of Glew the Gryd played its part in this — there would descend such a magical mist of love upon him that he was more than content just to walk with her and to sit with her in the heavy red-gold flickerings and the mossy green-blue shadows, watching the deer and the squirrels and the rabbits and listening to the woodpeckers!

When September came, however, it was clear to him that Catharine had something on her mind beyond the usual far-off cloud on the horizon. The girl's cheeks, never very ruddy, grew whiter than their wont; her swinging step dragged a little, and there fell a lethargy on the movements of her young body. He would catch her, too, in queer fits of abstraction. One September afternoon he said something to her to which she made no reply at all; and when he looked at her he found her eyes fixed on a loosened ash-tree leaf among the Scotch firs and the spruce-firs, that having been the last to unclose its bud in the spring was the first to relax its hold in the autumn, and now was drifting in the air at some distance from its parent tree, drifting, indeed, where there were very few deciduous trees at all, and where it seemed reluctant to sink to the ground on an alien bed of pine-needles.

Rhisiart caught Catharine watching this leaf, which was only a portion of an ash-leaf, with a fixed gazed of such absorbed intensity that he was emboldened to ask her of what she was thinking.

They were seated together on a little mossy knoll at the end of one of these forest-paths, cut long ago by Rhys Ddu's ancestors for hunting purposes. Below them, several hundreds of yards away, they could see the reddish beams of the sinking September sun, turning the great axe of their venerable guardian into a flame of burning gold.

They could hear, not so far off, the deep-throated baying of Elliw's hound, and they could faintly catch, too, upon the sunset-air the poignant odour of peat-smoke from some woodman's hearth.

"Do you really want me to tell you, Rhisiart?" she said, turning towards him the same grave, intent look that she had fixed upon the drifting leaf.

A deep cold fear suddenly grew up like a chilly mushroom in the centre of his heart, draining as it rose the blood from his swarthy cheeks and causing his arm to tighten round her waist. He felt as if like that ash-leaf she might go floating away at any moment down the sunlit clearing. He nodded in silence.

"I'm sure now," she said, speaking slowly and in a very low voice. "I'm quite sure now."

"That the Prince wants you to marry Sir Edmund?"

"Worse than that, Rhisiart. We've known that a long time."

"That your mother wants it, too?"

"Worse than that! Oh, my dear, how can I tell you?"

Rhisiart drew his arm from her waist and leapt to his feet. "You don't mean," he cried fiercely and rudely, "that they've married you to him already?"

Catharine's sea-coloured eyes darkened with anger till they became almost as black as his own. "If you're going to say things like that," she retorted bitterly, "I shall feel that it's true, what Griffith says, that the old blood in you has worn thin."

"My mother's blood," cried the lad in a passion, "is the best Norman blood in all the—" But he couldn't go on. The sight of her there before him, with a wisp of her fair hair falling in unheeded disorder across one of her eyes and across her twisted mouth, melted his very soul. His knees loosened beneath him, and crouching there on the moss, not touching her, not looking at her, he began to utter those deep, dry, gasping sobs that in their men-children are, of all sounds, the most moving to women.

She bent forward and laid her hands on his head. “No, no, my only true love,” she whispered in a broken voice. “I’m not married to him yet.” Then, waiting for this, for this at least, to sink into his consciousness, she removed her hands, straightened herself as she sat a little above him on that green hillock, and repeated calmly, “Not yet, Rhisiart! The daughters of our race don’t marry in darkness and hugger-mugger, as they say Sir Edmund’s sister did, when Hotspur swung her on his saddle and dragged a priest from his prayers. No, no. Listen to me, Rhisiart, for Our Lady’s blessed sake! What I’m sure happened a week ago, on Saint Matthew’s day — for, remember, tomorrow’s the Feast of Saint Michael and All Angels — was Sir Edmund asking me of my parents. What they said to him I don’t know; but from the way my mother’s treated me since — like a sick girl who must have things broken to her gently — I’m sure, I’m certain, that that’s what happened.”

Rhisiart, who was now swaying to and fro, hugging his knees and staring at her with a lamentable face, now burst out with a wounded querulousness that softened her by its weakness much more than his anger had hardened her by its rudeness.

“Why, oh why, didn’t you tell me this at once? You’ve made a fool of me, Catharine, by letting me be happy — like I’ve been — all these days — and you knowing this all the time!”

In her pity for his childishness — and oh, how much older than this hurt boy she felt! — she set to work — shutting away, deep down in her breast, what her own heart felt — to restore, soothe, and quicken his devastated feelings.

She reminded him that between Sir Edmund’s asking for her hand and the final issue of such a request there must be, considering her parents’ doting fondness, a great gulf. They would never rush her or hurry her. With them there would never be any of those familiar threats — like the threat to put her into a convent — by which in the old uncivilized days girls were forced into marriages they loathed.

She reminded him of the troubled times in which they lived; and how in a moment the whole military and political situation might be changed. Plenty of things, she told him, might happen that would make such a marriage as hers to Mortimer totally impossible.

She called to his mind all that her father had said in respect of his Secretary's immense and irreplaceable value to him; and how it was still possible, if she and he refused to yield, that the Prince — if not the Arglwyddes and Griffith — would soften towards them.

While she went on in this hope-against-hope tone his countenance cleared perceptibly. Soon he began making his way on his hands and knees from where he'd been sitting till he was recumbent by her side; and then it was she who was invoked, sitting cross-legged like an image with a fixed stare, as in question after question he pressed her, in his naive, eager, pragmatic way, to suggest what actually they could do if they did defy her parents. Could they take refuge in the kingdom of France, he asked her, or would the Duke of Brittany perhaps give them a place in his court? The truth is, however — only our friend's insight into the heart of a girl was hardly deeper after two years of worldly experience than it was when Tegolin slept by his side at the Tassel farm — that though she had been forgiving to his manly rudeness and though her heart had melted at his childish weakness there was something in this eager chatter about taking refuge in Brittany that made her soul withdraw into itself and feel cold and alone.

She didn’t altogether understand why his present tone — and he wouldn’t stop; he even began to talk about that great continent beyond the seas that Prince Madoc had discovered — chilled her feelings so much and made her feel so lonely. She attributed it to her sense of outrage, to her pride of race, to his not realizing, as every Welshman did, that as the daughter of a princely house she belonged to her family; but what really chilled her about it was an instinct of which she was herself scarcely conscious, a feeling that all this cheerful talk of his didn’t spring from the depths of his nature at all.

She kept giving him long, sad, puzzled looks out of her Glyn Dŵr eyes; but it seemed as if the excited lad couldn’t bring to a close his airy projects for this happy future abroad, projects in which she got such cold comfort, and in which, deep in her heart, she doubted if he himself really believed.

Slowly up the glade towards them came Glew the Gryd, his axe-blade blue-black in the gathering twilight; and as in his quavering old voice he hummed a sad South-Welsh ditty he had learnt in Rhys Ddu’s halls, whose lilt of flight and disaster and desolate resignation seemed to reach them like a troop of invisible mourners come to carry away the lad’s false hopes, what must the old Welsh gentleman do but repeatedly pause in his track and turn about and lean on his axe as if his bones, or perhaps his breath, felt a need for rest.

“The dew is falling, Catharine ferch Owen,” he cried in his high-pitched voice as he came near, “and Mistress Elliw awaits us. From where I stood I could see them, and Corbyn was straining at his leash.”

The young people rose to meet him and no sooner were they on their feet than the great hound himself came bounding up the slope, trailing his leash behind him. He rushed at once to Rhisiart, as the person least familiar to him in the party, but having sniffed at him with several deep breaths as if he’d been a crack at the bottom of a closed door, he turned to Catharine and nearly upset her balance by his eager caresses.

The girl unfastened his leash and handed it to the old man, and as they moved towards his young mistress he kept rushing from one group to the other, as if they were two little herds of deer that it was his duty to round up and keep together.

As was their wont on these occasions the two girls advanced side by side towards the house, the dog bounding happily round them, while Rhisiart soon left the two retainers together and debouched by a rougher and shorter path to a small back entrance which connected with the particular portion of the old time-worn place where Master Brut and he had their private quarters.

“Lu”, as Rhys Ddu called her, was a timid, retiring little maid, whom not all her father’s doting care had been able to make striking in appearance or seductive in manner. She had lived a lonely life in Tywyn, for her mother had died in giving her birth and her foster-mother had run away with a Flemish pedlar, and none of the lively serving girls by whom she was surrounded took the trouble to understand her.

Rhys Ddu’s own aged foster-mother ruled the establishment; but as she had never really accepted his youthful bride it would have needed all those seductive charms that were so noticeably absent in poor “Lu” for that bride’s daughter to have won her heart.

Angharad was the old housekeeper’s real name, but this had been shortened by Rhys Ddu, who seemed from infancy to have regarded the nature of ladies as best expressed in single syllables, into “Rad”, and “Mistress Rad” she had become to everyone in the place.

Mistress Rad had always predicted that the frail bride her foster-child brought home would never have the spirit to give him a son, and it may have been her satisfaction at the truth of this prediction that made her kinder to Lu than might have been expected. But she was a competent and busy old lady, and what the shy little girl wanted was understanding rather than indulgence; and this she had never had, no not even from her devoted father, till Catharine came upon the scene.

How Catharine understood her and how Catharine, while understanding her, could yet like her, was a perpetual miracle to Lu ferch Rhys, but she responded with her whole heart; and Corbyn, who quickly grasped the happy situation, responded with his whole heart, too.

Towards Rhisiart the dog felt very differently; but he didn't always feel the same. There were occasions when he condescended to take the young man on long hunting excursions far up into the forest. But it was clear he wasn't sure of Rhisiart; and our friend certainly wasn't sure of him. Once the boy even told himself a story of how, caught by Corbyn in the act of stealing Catharine away from Lu, the great hound flew at his throat, and he was compelled to lay him low with his dagger.

With the beginning of October the weather changed; and gales of wind and rain, quite apart from more serious causes, made it increasingly difficult for Catharine and Rhisiart to meet on their old terms. They generally succeeded in snatching, between sunrise and sunset, for after all they were still under the same roof, some sort of hurried and agitated encounter; but fate, acting not only through the girl's parents but through an unpredictable concatenation of events, seemed to take a devilish delight in making these spasmodic meetings at once more brief and more disturbing as day followed day.

In the privacy of their thick-walled chamber Rhisiart and his friend, the Lollard, shared each other's troubles. This wet autumn in Rhys Ddu's domain drew them closer than they'd ever been drawn before. Their respect for each other increased with their deeper knowledge; and as time went on, even Master Brut's interpretations of Wycliffe ceased to get on his friend's nerves. Rhisiart's tendency to make daring and drastic plans, wherewith to cut the entangled knots of both their love-affairs, met with grave attention from Master Brut; and in the worthy man's speculations as to how Alice could be persuaded to leave her mother in the Snowdon fortress and join the light-hearted damsels who served Mistress Angharad, Rhisiart noted with amusement that the geography of this rambling old mansion was as obscure to the lover of maps as it was to himself.

There were constant goings and comings between Tywyn and the Snowdon retreat and hardly a week went by without one or other of the lovers receiving some sort of written communication from Tegolin. The Abbot of Caerleon, though beginning to grow restless in so inactive a life, had taken complete charge of the fortress; and when Owen decided to keep quite a large army there as well as in Rhys Gethin's great camp in Cardigan the old warrior-bishop took heart.

Rhisiart couldn't help noticing how as long as they were discussing the chances of Alice's appearance among them the soul of the Hog of Chirk would dwindle in importance; whereas when Alice seemed irrevocably and hopelessly caught, in her caring for "that old witch up there," the spiritual perils of Master Simon, who was still with Lowri in Rhys Gethin's headquarters, grew more serious.

Rhisiart's penmanship — and he hadn't failed to take Broch's advice as to becoming a clerkly expert — was in great request that autumn. Closeted with the Prince and the Meifod giant for hours every morning, he had to increase day by day the epistles that messengers kept taking to one or other part of Wales, not to speak of communications with the Percies and with France, and with both Rome and Avignon.

But in the long evenings, when the great meal was over, and Mortimer was playing chess with Owen and the ladies had retired, both the young friends would compose letters to be taken to Snowdon, the Lollard imploring Alice to be faithful to him and to trust him, and Rhisiart confiding in Tegolin all his wildest hopes and fears.

The heavy rains of that wild October not only brought down the leaves of the Forests of Tywyn but quelled any active movement of the Prince's various armies. Owen was in possession now of the whole enormous sum of Grey's ransom. He had also obtained no negligible sum for the liberation of Clanvow, whose departure was an immense relief to the little court at Tywyn.

Mortimer not only knew Welsh, but displayed a lively desire to be initiated into every form of Welsh tradition; whereas the author of The Cuckoo and the Nightingale behaved as did the famous poet Ovid among the Goths, treating Rhys Ddu's minstrels with ostentatious courtesy, but betraying in his handsome face such ironic condescension at all their harp-playing competitions, that to see the last of those bright curls and to hear the last of that boisterous laugh was as much of a comfort to the bardic fraternity as the gold by which his genteel admirers restored him to civilization was a boon to Owen's budget.

But though he had enough money on hand now to support his armies on the most liberal terms, certain fierce local quarrels between men from districts so widely divided were constantly demanding his presence. He would saddle Seisyll, whom he had sent for as soon as he got Rhys Ddu's invitation to Tywyn, and ride off alone, either to the force under Gethin, or to the stationary camp under the Abbot of Caerleon, or to Henry Don's troops in the further south. These lonely rides were the only happy times for the Prince during that rainy October.

As deeply set upon marrying Catharine to Mortimer as he was set upon retaining Rhisiart in his service, life at Tywyn had become a hair-shirt of such scraping jags and scratching tags that compared with it his harsh chain-armour vest was a silken luxury! Owen told himself bitterly again and again that until this fatal October he hadn't known what the pain of life was. He had known spasms and twinges and fits of suffering, both mental and physical; but he had never before awaked in the morning to find that his consciousness of life came near to containing a balance of pain over joy.

And there was no alternative. He had smashed his crystal. Iolo was lying in that stone sarcophagus in Valle Crucis. He had won the battle of Bryn Glas. He was committed to the event. Two of his younger sons had already been slain in his cause. Meredith himself remained in that house at Pilleth, still only slowly recovering from his wound. The young man was under the care of Crach Ffinnant the Derfelite, who allowed no other doctor or prophet or conjurer or priest anywhere near his patient; and the more the Prince thought of this the less he liked it.

In their hatred of the Scab, whom with some reason they regarded as second-cousin to the Devil, neither Father Rheinalt nor Father Pascentius would consent to beard him at Meredith's bedside.

"Little good it does me," thought Owen every time he sat down to dinner and watched the two Cistercians conversing so happily with Rhys Ddu, "to be Prince of Wales, if I can't even compel a couple of cropped heads to go to my son's assistance!"

The Arglwyddes was no help to him during this dark October. What he wanted to do was to be honest with Catharine. He wanted to implore her to let him thrust the sacrificial knife into her bosom as he had decided once and for all to thrust it into his own. "When you consented, child," he wanted to say to her, "that I should be proclaimed Prince of Wales you consented to lie down by my side before the altar of our gods; you consented to let them cover both of us with ‘the pall of death’.” He wanted to explain to her that since that day, though moments of exultation had reached him, the greater part of the hours of his life had been simple endurance, obstinate, uncomplaining un-selfpitying endurance. He would have liked to assure her that if she, held to his heart as she always was, would only consent to endure their sacrifice together, he could give her a love stronger, deeper, than that of — But always at that point his incurable honesty of analysis cut in two his self-justifications with an edge as sharp as Glew the Gryd’s axe.

What right had he to meddle with such a miracle as a girl’s first love? Was there, he asked himself morning by morning, as he combed his beard before his metal mirror and watched the dead leaves whirling in little eddies within the embrasure of his window, an evil jealousy in his heart that he should force her to marry a man she didn’t love rather than the one she did? And then, when he watched her abstracted eyes and cold, sad profile as she sat by his side at their daily banquet, pain took possession of him, pain worse than any pain he had ever known, the pain of one who can, but will not, give to the heart he loves its one and only desire!

There was a particular morning when he thrust his head as far as it would go through the narrow aperture that served as window in that ancient wall of blackened oak, so that the wind and rain undid in a moment the result of his elaborate toilet. It was one of Owen’s nervous peculiarities to poke his great fair head with its regal beard through the window of every chamber he used. And as he did so now and let the rain beat on his face he thought of the difference between his own philosophy and that of his friend from Meifod; and how strangely the giant’s feelings seemed to blend with these falling, whirling leaves, these groaning branches, these forests of death!

Life, not death, was what his own heart wanted, life that should survive — somehow, anyhow — these mortal struggles, these sad victories, this incurable pain!

And with the forks of his beard blowing in the wind, and wet now as the dead leaves themselves, he began to play his accustomed trick with his soul; letting it escape into the storm, through the storm, beyond the storm, till it rested like a ruffled starling by his son's bed in Pilleth! But he soon drew back both his head and his soul; for he remembered that Catharine hadn't learnt to play these tricks! A woman's soul was in her love; a woman's soul was in the very part of her which he had set himself to kill!

And the Arglwyddes didn't help him. How could a mother not be more affected by what they were doing to Catharine? The Arglwyddes always answered in the same way. "Marriage and children," she always said, "are the fulfilment of a girl's life. Love comes, love goes; but a husband and children remain." And then the wise lady would enlarge on Sir Edmund's good qualities, his gentleness, his courtesy, his patience. "And he is so sad," she would say. "I think he has had some love-affair that went wrong."

Certainly Sir Edmund was sad, at least he was sad for the accepted suitor of a girl as lovely as Catharine and the daughter of a reigning Prince — yes! he had noticed it himself. Had the young man detected that the girl's heart was already given? Was it that that saddened him?

But if this one particular morning was a purgatory to the Prince, there weren't many mornings of happiness for his daughter. Poor Catharine! She had another grief just then in addition to her love — too much, too much, coming together for a maid so young! — for her old Nurse, whom her mother had brought with her to Tywyn, was slowly dying.

The departure from Glyndyfrdwy had been more than the old woman could bear. She had hated that Snowdon place, and had shut herself up with her grief and her anger, seeing nobody but Mad Huw, letting all her interests and occupations fall away, and at last quite losing her old self and her busy spirit in helpless querulous complainings. The news that both Glyndyfrdwy and Sycharth had been burnt by the English was the final blow. They had tried to keep it from her, but the officious Rawlff, not yet a Knight of Dewi Sant, had blurted it out; and now in this mournful autumn, while those time-blackened buildings rocked under the wailing wind, she lay in her white bed, in her white coif and long white wimple like a marble figure in a church aisle. She knew well enough, the old Nurse, what was being done to her darling, and her wrath against the Arglwyddes, upon whom characteristically enough, for she regarded all men as children, she put the entire blame, was so bitter that she refused to allow her to enter her death-chamber.

Catharine would sit by her bed-side hour after hour, holding her bony hand, but rarely replying, except with silent tears, to her moans and her protests.

Several times she insisted on seeing Rhisiart, and these were the most distressing moments of all; for she would lie with one hand in his and one in Catharine’s, making at intervals feeble and pitiful movements to join their youthful fingers together.

“Where is that Grey Friar?” she would moan at such times. “He would end this nonsense by making you man and wife — and then, let them rage! They couldn’t undo what the man of God had done. Why doesn’t somebody go for the Grey Friar?”

Once, at a moment when the end seemed near, they brought Father Pascentius to her; but the old lady’s fury at the sight of him was so extreme that she even rose in her bed.

"Take your staring eyes into the Hell they came from!" she shrieked hoarsely. "My confessor is a saint, not a devil — a sweet Brother of Saint Francis he is, and a friend of King Richard; not a monking monk from a monkery of mummers!"

One early afternoon in this wild month, some hours before the great meal of the day, Rhisiart and Master Brut were sadly contemplating the thin rain and flying leaves from the window of their little chamber, when they were surprised by observing the unmistakeable figures of Catharine and Lu, accompanied by Corbyn, but unaccompanied by Glew the Gryd, leaving the house by the men's side-entrance and setting forth, with dark cloaks over their heads, down a vista in the forest where a long perspective of dripping beech-trunks lost itself in the distance.

"Blessed Mary!" cried our friend. "Where in the devil's name are those girls going? You don't think, Walter, that they've got an assignation with Sir Edmund?"

"No, no, lad, and I'll tell you why," replied the Lollard — yes! she does step out like a boy; and look how the other's clinging to her!— "because I saw Sir Edmund a minute ago when I was down there with Father Rheinalt at the fish-pond; and he was standing on the balcony in front of his window — he's up there you know, just above our room, and that's why — but you don't like my maps of places! — but at any rate if he's watching them now just as we are, he's not the object of their walk."

"Perhaps we'll see him in a minute or two going after them!"

The Lollard shook his head. "You must remember the man's still a prisoner-of-war. I've never seen him leave the house unattended. But I'm sure he's watching them, just as we are. You're not a perch-catcher like Father Rheinalt and me, or you'd know his ways. He stands for half the day on that balcony. It's roofed-over, but it faces the rain.

“I didn’t mean to refer to it, Rhisiart; but since you’ve brought it up yourself I may as well tell you. I think he’d be glad if he caught his death by exposing himself on that balcony! I don’t like seeing his black figure forever standing there, nor does Father Rheinalt. And you can see it from such a long way off! Down the pine-avenue you can see it. Down the linden-avenue you can see it. And you can see it from Merlin’s elm.”

“Have you spoken to him?” enquired Rhisiart, aware of his friend’s mania for talking to unhappy people. “Have you been up there to see him? I wish you’d told me this before, Walter — for there is — there are — certain things — which it is — behoveful to me — to say to him — sooner or later.”

“There are no such things, lad!” his friend asseverated with stern emphasis; “and if there were, you’d have to find another emissary than Walter Brut of Lyde to—”

Their colloquy was interrupted by the appearance of Father Rheinalt from among the pond-reeds. Anxious and perturbed he looked, and wild and ungainly too, considering that his black tonsured head was uncovered, his legs naked to his thighs, all smeared with mud and duck-weed, a great pole with a line attached to it flicking the air in his hand, and round his bare neck, dangling against his habit, the striped forms of half-a-dozen perch, each about a pound’s weight, strung together by their horny and tragic gills.

He evidently had caught sight of the young men’s heads peering out of their narrow window, and Rhisiart — his brain full of Mortimer — fancied he saw him respond to a greeting from the balcony above. But when he reached the path, instead of following it, he crossed it and walked straight through the drenched grass and the thorny blackberries till he stood on a level with them, only divided from their two eager faces by the thickness of that incredible wall of solid oak.

“I’ve just been summoned by the Arglwyddes,” he said. “Owen’s away and Griffith ab Owen’s away; and the Nurse is dying, and crying out for a priest.”

“I wouldn’t go, Father,” said Rhisiart eagerly. “I wouldn’t go! You’ve heard of the fury she got into with Father Pascentius, calling him a monking monk from a monkery of mummers? The Arglwyddes is mistaken; for I know — oh, dear Father, I swear to you I know! — she wants Mad Huw and no other!”

Father Rheinalt was silent. The puzzled bewilderment he turned on those two young heads was so touching that Rhisiart was hit to the heart. Something about the man’s guileless and incorruptible integrity made him think of Tegolin.

“What a good man he is!” he thought. “All of Tegolin comes from him — nothing from that she-devil!”

“But,” protested the strange figure before them, tapping the wood-work with his pole and entangling his line, “but, son, she’s dying and calling for a priest; and I — my vows — my duty to Holy Church, my—”

“But wouldn’t it be better,” interrupted the Lollard, and to our friend’s dismay he caught the familiar tone of controversy in his voice, “wouldn’t it be better for her soul to go to its Maker unshriven, than to go in a tempest of ungodly fury?”

Father Rheinalt’s swarthy face displayed such pure misery of indecision that Rhisiart felt inclined to advise him to go — even if the old woman did die cursing him. The young man was amazed afterwards to recall how some devil within him prompted him to repeat once more in the ears of this guileless fanatic those ribald words about “monking monkeries”. This was something the Lollard would never have done.

But Father Rheinalt was too involved in his conscientious dilemma to notice either this spurt of Hereford malice or the controversial tone of Master Brut. He tugged mechanically at his line till at last he broke it, so that only a few yards of it dangled from the end of his pole.

At that moment they became, all three of them, aware of the presence of Broch-o'-Meifod. The giant had shuffled out from the house to obey a pressing call of Nature; and there he was, hooking up his leather belt, and listening to their debate. "Listen, Father," he said gravely. "Listen, children! I think I can arrange this affair. Come with me all three of you! You're something of a physician, Master Brut, and the old lady loves Rhisiart. Come with me, Father. I think it's your duty to go."

The young men hurried out of their room and followed the two elder men up the winding staircases and down the intricate passages that led to the death-chamber. The door was ajar, and Broch-o'-Meifod, telling Father Rheinalt to wait on the threshold, went in, opening the door wide so that the torch above the old lady's head shone full on the extraordinary figure of the monk, still clutching the pole with the dangling line, and on the mud and the pond-weed still clinging to his bare legs.

"Have you brought him, Master Broch? Have you brought him?" quavered the dying woman, while two sturdy and not over-sympathetic damsels forced her back on her pillow.

Broch went straight up to the bed, his colossal form hiding the open door and figure on the threshold. "He has prayed to Saint Peter the Fisherman for you, Nurse — and the Saint has come himself!"

Something about Broch, as Rhisiart had noted long ago, was so native and endued to death that when the old woman met his inhuman gaze her confused brain accepted literally and without question what he told her.

"The Fisherman himself!" she murmured. "He's sent the Fisherman himself!"

Then Broch swung aside and beckoned to Father Rheinalt to approach.

The monk did make a fumbling movement with his hands, with a dim notion no doubt of propping his pole against some object. But there was no object except the bed, and on the bed struggled the departing soul. So to the bed he came, and standing there before her, began, without a second's hesitation, to call upon her to utter the words of confession so that he could absolve her from her sins.

Rhisiart was close behind him now and when he heard the familiar words— "In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost" — issuing from the lips of that passionate and simple man, with five mud-smelling fish hung round his neck and his legs slimy with pond-weed, he was more religiously stirred than he'd been since that Midsummer Day when he heard Mass with Tegolin and Mad Huw.

And in a way he couldn't explain, and never was able to explain, the authoritative apparition of this invoker of "Pater-Filius-Spiritus," bursting out through the slime of a fish-pond and surrounded by the blood-stained gills of five perch— "all of them," as the good man was certain to boast ere long, "weighing nearly a pound" — added a new and paradoxical force to the irritable and inconsequential reactions roused in him by the convincing arguments of Master Brut.

How much the dying old woman understood of these magical words is doubtful; but they evidently seemed to her the sort of words that the Keeper of the Keys would naturally use; and when with a spasmodic jerk of her old bones the rigor mortis set in, Rhisiart, who was by Broch's side now, was convinced that he would never again behold a dead face so imprinted with the certainty of redemption.

They left the Father on his muddy knees while the astonished damsels closed the eyes of the dead; but as soon as they had shut the door the two young men turned towards the giant, each with a puzzled protest.

"The lie wasn't mine," replied Broch-o'-Meifod calmly. "The lie was life's." What the man meant by this, and how he'd dared to do as he did, was the subject of many a long discussion between the two friends in the months that followed; but both the young men decided at that moment that they must get into the air as quickly as possible.

It was afterwards that the emotional effect of the old woman's death came upon Rhisiart; came upon him as though the half-plighted troth of Catharine's hands and his hands, held so tight in the beldame's clutch, was a covenant that had been ratified by the kingdom of death, ratified in fact by that innumerable company of the deceased whom a fragment of Homer in his college library called "the powerless heads of the dead."

Led — among other impulses — by a feeling at the bottom of Rhisiart's heart that he would like to be the first to tell Catharine of her Nurse's death, the two friends, wrapped in heavy cloaks, set out together down the avenue where the girls and their dog had vanished.

"Are the Prince and Griffith to return to-night?" asked the Lollard before they were a bow-shot from the house.

"God knows!" sighed his friend. And then laying his hand on the Lollard's arm he broke out, "Don't look round, Walter, for Christ's sake! I can't stand seeing that black figure on his balcony. Let's pretend he's not there! There's a couple of hours before dinner. We're bound to meet them. I hope Corbyn won't fly at me in this damned mist."

Meanwhile the two girls, whose professed purpose was to meet Rhys Ddu returning from the hunt, had already gone several miles down that long clearing in the forest. The rain had subsided, and had been followed by a wet mist that clung to their mantles, in that grey light, like a phantasmal suffusion of some sprinkling from the Milky Way.

"If we don't meet him before we reach the Pryderi Tree we'll have to turn," said Elliw. "He won't like it for us not to have taken anybody with us — and if we're late for dinner too, I'm afraid he'll be really angry!"

"All right, my sweet," responded Owen's daughter absent-mindedly. "We'll turn at the tree." And then after a pause, "What's this legend about Pryderi, Lu?"

The other gazed at her in surprise. "Don't you know?" she said. "Why, every old wife in these parts knows that! But of course you're from the North. Pryderi was the Lord of all this land before the Romans. His ghost rides on the rain in the Forests of Tywyn. But listen, Catharine—"

"Yes, dear?"

"You remember how you asked me just now what was the gossip about you among the girls of the house?"

"Not only the girls!" protested the other. "I wanted to know how your house-people and how all the peasants round here regard Rhisiart and me." She gave a little quick sigh. "It ought to help, to know that!"

"Help?" repeated Lu, puzzled.

"Father's always taught me," said Catharine gravely, "that none of us can afford to neglect the voice of the common people. Not long ago I heard that man Sparrow who looks after Broch — you know the person I mean? — telling one of your porters that the only reason why the common people are for Owen is that there's going to be no more gentry."

"When Adam delved and Eve span who was then the gentleman?" interjected Elliw.

But Catharine was in no mood that day to take anything lightly. "Certainly," she declared, swinging forward with long strides like a young

Artemis, while her soft rain-sprinkled mantle clung in classic folds about her limbs, “certainly it’s wicked to hold down the peasants and treat them like serfs. But when it comes to governing a country, and summoning councils, and planning campaigns, and sending embassies to foreign kings, the common people depend on the gentry.”

“Wouldn’t it,” panted Lu, who was now clinging to the edge of her friend’s cloak and almost running to keep up with her, “wouldn’t it be truer to say that we all depend on the Church for these things?”

“What do you mean, little one? I’m talking about high state-policies and armies and navies and treaties and government and the making of laws. I’m not talking of religion. No, no, dear, no, no, darling,” and the tall girl strode faster than ever.

“No country can get on without its gentry. The gentry have education; and it’s education that counts.”

Lu’s panting became a long-drawn sigh. She thought of the good knight, her father, who could hardly sign his name. She thought of Catharine’s brother, Griffith, who if he had education was certainly at wondrous pains to conceal it. She thought of Rhys Gethin whom she had watched in their private chapel, with the secret amusement with which she watched all men whether young or old, holding his prayer book upside down.

And then she said to herself, “She’s thinking of the Prince and she’s thinking of Rhisiart! She hasn’t lived, like I have, for ten years with hunters and bards” — and Lu panted out her weariness of both schools of experts— “who can’t say a single word about anything interesting. Educated gentry? Gracious me! Why haven’t I the spirit to tell her that when I want someone to talk to I go to the peasants’ huts and listen to stories of Rhiannon and Pwyll Pen Annwn?”

"I'm afraid I interrupted you, Lu darling," Catharine now remarked, drawing her breath as quietly and easily as if she were seated before a warm hearth rather than striding through a wet mist. "You were going to tell me what your father's people say about Rhisiart and me."

Lu plucked at her friend's cloak and as she did so leant for a second against the dripping trunk of a beech-tree. "I don't — think — we ought to go any further, Catharine," she gasped. "I'm afraid of the darkness catching us before we get back. Father must have gone straight home a different way. Pryderi's Tree is further than I thought."

All the while she was uttering these innocent words the crafty little Lu was thinking in her heart, "She may forget about it; she may forget about it."

But though Catharine let her rest there, with her light weight poised against the wet beech-trunk, and though she made no attempt to override the decision to return, she didn't forget about it, and as soon as they began to retrace their steps she put her question once more to her reluctant friend, remarking that it was easier to talk, now they'd turned their backs to the quarter from which the mist came.

Lu's troubled little face under her hood began to resemble a crumpled leaf that had turned its back to the mist, but to give herself strength she took a firm hold of the tall girl's mantle, and thus supported drifted along at her side with swift-gliding steps, like an oarless boat towed by a ship in full sail.

"They say that Sir Edmund," she began, and her voice to her own ears, as she watched the ghostly form of her white hound trotting in front of them, seemed like the squeak of a mouse in a great forest full of enchanted stags and fairy princesses, "may be King of England one day if anything happens to the little Earl, and that if he isn't King there's no grander title in all Britain than what you'd have as Lady Mortimer. You'd be a sister then, they say, to Lady Percy, and the only chance your father has of liberating Wales is to be allied with the Mortimers and the—"

"Lu!" The force of this interruption was accentuated by Catharine's suddenly standing stone-still.

"You told me to tell you," murmured the frightened heiress of Rhys the Black.

But Catharine's voice was quite calm and tender. "I know. I wanted to hear. I thought it might help. But listen, Lu," and the proud young face was bent down towards her in the growing darkness, "what would you do if you loved anyone and that person wanted you to go away with him, and be married to him, and" — she found these final words difficult to utter as she recalled her doubt as to the fullness of the heart from which they'd come— "and live somewhere — abroad?"

Lu met the beautiful eyes looking down into her own for one brief instant. Then she turned to her dog, and calling him to her side fastened the leash to his collar. It was a comfort to her to press her ungloved knuckles against his furry coat. She was so little that his head reached her small cold breasts and she hugged it against them.

"I have never loved," she murmured aloud; and then, "oh you fool, you fool!" she cried in her heart, when she realized by the salt taste in her mouth that self-pitying tears were running down her cheeks.

But oh! how old the childish directness of her friend's next words made her feel, as with the white hound between their black-cloaked figures they stood under the wet trees.

"What would you do if you were me, Lu?"

"Nobody's ever said that to me before," was the response to this; and unclasping her tight clutch on her friend's cloak the daughter of Rhys Ddu ran her fingers along her dog's rain-soaked spine.

"But what would you do?" reiterated Catharine mercilessly.

"I'd do — nothing" whispered the other with bowed head. "I couldn't marry anyone I didn't love; and I would never run away from my father!"

Since Lu's face in the access of her discomfort was almost buried in her hound's fur there was nothing to prevent Catharine from giving way to her feelings. Biting her lip and turning upon the soaked twigs and the dripping branches above her with a look of savage desperation — such a look as her father had cast round him when those Salopian yeomen hemmed him in — she tore both her arms free of her cloak and raising them in the air above her head shook her young fists at the hoary sky.

Temporarily relieved of her throbbing tension by this unmaidenly gesture, for she had begun to feel as if there were none left, among gods or men, who weren't making mouths at her and wagging their heads at her, she gathered her cloak about her and they continued on their way.

"I sometimes think of asking my father," Catharine remarked presently, "whether he wouldn't let us go together — with a good escort of our people of course — to cheer up my brother at Pilleth."

Now for some while "my brother at Pilleth" — for Lu had never met Meredith — had been an inexhaustible topic between them. Catharine was always reticent about Rhisiart himself, though not at all about her love for him, but upon Meredith's intellect, beauty, originality, and recklessness, she had enlarged so freely and so often that the lonely little Lu had begun to take an interest in this romantic figure. It didn't happen at once. It happened after a certain talk they had one hot August evening in Lu's room when Catharine had admitted that except for herself there was no girl in Meredith's life.

After that, though she was too shy to ask any direct questions, Lu would hover round the subject, and almost always got some degree of satisfaction. Catharine not only talked of Meredith as other girls would talk of a lover but he was obviously her favourite of all topics! She couldn't think or speak of her father now without bringing up her own dilemma, but the image of Meredith had nothing about it save what was winning and fair.

No man could possibly have given the thousand and one little touches — many of them throwing into relief certain endearing weaknesses that only a girl would notice — with which Catharine painted the figure of the hero of her childhood.

The mirror in Lu's big chamber — for her father had long ago given her the best room in the house — was suspended at right angles to the window, and thus there could be seen in it, in addition to the shrinking little face of its owner, quite a few objects of the landscape below, chief among these being a fragment of the avenue leading to the main entrance of the building.

And it had become, long before that happy August ended, a morning habit with this little "bundle of fancies," as Rhys Ddu called her, to gaze at the leafy approach to her father's dwelling between the luxuriant cascades of her own brown hair.

The combing of Lu's hair, for she was too shy to allow any servant so much as to enter her room, took a very long time, partly because her hair was the most remarkable thing about her — indeed her nurse used to say that all her beauty had gone into her hair — and partly because she told herself such interminable stories about Catharine's Meredith, stories that always began with her suddenly catching sight of him in her mirror, between the dusky falls of her long hair, as in the flickering sunshine he rode up to the gate.

Thus when Catharine suddenly uttered this bold suggestion about their going together to Pilleth it was as if the radiant mirrored Meredith had suddenly turned into a pale, faint, pitiful Meredith, one to be protected rather than to protect. And this transformation was so serious to Lu that for a second or two she could make no reply.

When she did speak it was to merely mutter: “Thank you, Catharine dear. I should like it very much,” and even these platitudes were overpowered by the sudden straining and barking and excited tail-wagging of the great hound.

Lu straightened herself at once and instinctively renewed her clutch on her companion’s mantle; and then they advanced, the excited dog dragging them forward almost at a run.

“Rhisiart!”

“Catharine!”

And then, finding some kind of sanction in the presence of Lu and the Lollard, the lovers embraced more closely than they had done for many weeks. Whatever thoughts they were that went whirling about in his long and narrow cranium Corbyn took the opportunity of dragging his little mistress as fast as possible in the direction of home, and Master Brut hurried along at their side. The dog pulled and strained to such effect that they were soon out of sight in the mist.

Once again the lovers embraced; and Rhisiart became aware that the proud girl was in a softer, tenderer, more submissive mood than he had ever known. Her lips responded to his in a manner that sent an electric quiver through every fibre and nerve of his lean frame, and through both their cloaks he could feel that her body was given up to him as he had never known it to be given up before. This was the crisis in their fate — though neither of them knew it.

Catharine was a very young girl. She had lived a protected life. Proud and gallant as she was, she was like a beautiful spring-time shoot on the bough of her father's being. Her romantic love for Rhisiart had from the start been surrounded by a blank void; a void that as far as any future with him was concerned she had instinctively set herself to ignore, hoping blindly as the simplest child might have done, that the wizard father would find a way to give her her Love as he was giving Wales its Freedom.

Faced with the actual possibility of leaving her father in the midst of-his great struggle, and of going God-knew-where, to live among foreigners, everything in her, even her romantic love itself which after all was for a Rhisiart associated with the life she knew, drew back, with panic-stricken roots, as a water-plant would draw back from transplantation to a desert. Rhisiart was the background of her present life, but this Rhisiart-and-Catharine living as forlorn pensioners of the Duke of Brittany was an image as cheerless as it was inconceivable, an image that held scant joy.

But what she'd never counted on, for she'd instinctively kept their passion on a high romantic level, was the treachery of woman's nature. The idea of giving herself to her lover, apart from marriage, had never crossed the threshold of her consciousness. She was a young girl in love; but she was a young girl with unawakened senses.

But she had all a woman's awareness of the weaknesses of her lover; and between the real Rhisiart who was so transported by her presence and this other Rhisiart of plans and schemes there seemed a wide gulf. The pictures he painted of what struck her as a pair of pitiful ghosts at the court of Brittany only distressed her. He wasn't the Rhisiart she knew when he talked like that. He himself became as unreal as his talk.

But what she didn't know, and what Rhisiart didn't know, was the difference between a girl in love and a girl who has yielded to her lover.

The exultant happiness that her unexpected response roused in the lad nearly turned his head. A new emotion such as he had never experienced before raced through his heart. She was his! She was his! He felt strong enough to defy all the world. He let her go, and drew a long deep breath, keeping his hands on her shoulders.

It was the crucial moment between them. Had his passion been ever so little greater; had it possessed ever so little more flame and less tenderness, he could have carried her then and there beneath those dark tree-trunks and made the rain-drenched leaves their bed.

But the fate of their diverse natures, the terrible power of that undertide of inheritance, was too strong. Her Welsh blood might cry out to his Welsh blood, “Take me! Take me!” But the forward-looking, clearheaded Norman in him — since this wasn’t a case for brutal seduction — reverted irresistibly to practical decisions, to legal precautions, to well-laid schemes.

Alas! the only “scheme” that would have served him then was the prehistoric way of a man with a maid. But he dropped his hands; and under the pressure of three generations of sheriffs’ clerks in the shrewd City of Hereford he gasped forth, eagerly, feverishly, hurriedly: “He’s got another journey to make after this one! So we’ve plenty of time. I’ve thought it all out. We’ll begin collecting our things at once. I’ve got a hundred silver groats. You’ve got your jewels. I’ve been making a few enquiries. Ships from France leave our coast every month, whenever the weather’s calm. And there’s a priest in Cardigan-town, who for—”

But she stopped him with an imperative gesture. The back-flow of her yielded blood, of her yielded life, reverting inwards, ebbing inwards, under the shock of the withdrawal of his domination, froze her whole being.

But not for nothing was she Owen’s daughter. She might not — as her father in his remorse had told himself — possess his saving trick of exteriorizing the soul, but she was of the same proud race, and now at this crisis her will rose up, like a towering column of ice-cold mist from the crack in her heart.

“No silver of yours, Rhisiart,” she said in a low voice, drawing her cloak with both hands round her, “no jewel of mine, will that Cardigan priest ever see.” She paused for a moment, gazing at him as if from the other side of a gulf wider than that sea over which he’d said the ships sailed when the weather was calm. “Goodbye, my dear,” she whispered hoarsely. “Kiss me and let us go. We have had — Kiss me and let us go — Rhisiart, my only love!”

Heart-felt and solemn as was her tone, final and hopeless as were her words, the impatient child in him refused to understand. Instead of kissing her he fell to staring at her in indignant wonder. Casting about in his mind for something to distract her, for in his innocence he took this new mood as a mere vagary of girlish pride, what must he now do but begin blurting out the news of her Nurse’s death.

“And I wasn’t there! I wasn’t with her! Merciful God, what have I done? Oh misery! Why was I ever born! I bring unhappiness to everyone! Oh Nurse, darling, darling Nurse — and I wouldn’t wait with you one little hour! Quick! Let’s hurry! Let’s run! Perhaps she isn’t dead. Old people fall into these trances that look like death! Let me go to her. I want to go to her!”

Poor Rhisiart! If he’d fancied that an old woman’s death would set free a young woman’s heart from its unpredictable caprices, and bring it back to reality, he had blundered once again.

The girl was actually running now; and he was running by her side, explaining, imploring, consoling. Some women have room for more than one master-feeling at a great crisis; and if the dripping beech-tree trunks under which those two were running had been possessed of the power of reading thought they would have soon realized that the first shock of her nurse's death had already spent itself and that the boy's pitiful distress, as he panted out his explanations, was not without its effect.

The motion of her blood caused by her running was itself a redeeming agent in the unfreezing of that lump of ice which the too sudden withdrawal of his ravishing embrace had congealed in her bosom. She relaxed her speed. "Oh Rhisiart," she murmured. "Why weren't you and I born brother and sister so that we shouldn't ever have to be parted?"

"I'll never, never leave you!"

"Are you sure she died happily?"

"It was Broch's doing. But when we asked him why he did it he said it was life, not he, who lied. We couldn't understand what he said."

"I feel now that the sooner I'm married to Sir Edmund the better for both of us. I oughtn't to have let you love me. Deep down I knew it would come to nothing."

"I'll never, never leave you!"

Though the dark, dripping trunks of the beech-trees may have understood nothing of this dialogue, there was something in the girl corresponding to this dumb world of rain-soaked vegetation that didn't miss the curious effect of their voices as they hurried along. The wet vapours that moved with them were thinner and less palpable than rain, but they were chillier and even in a queer sense more watery. They were like the element of water in its essence, that essence through which all those vast Forests of Tywyn, with their dripping branches and fallen leaves, were compelled to endure whatever life brought.

And the voices of the boy and girl as they moved, sometimes running, sometimes moving as gently — so soft was the drenched moss — as if they were gliding without lifting their feet, struck this passivity in the girl with the effect of voices in a derelict boat, carried on a tide in which “near” and “far” have been drowned. There come moments in life when one accumulative aspect of Nature — in this case the drifting of rain-soaked leaves in desolate mist — permeates and possesses the human soul.

Catharine felt, as she glided along in that watery element, as if all the words she or her lover uttered were the murmurs of a couple of hollow straws floating on a dark tide. And although this feeling was in a measure due to the fact that they were both of them running, or almost running, it had the effect of bringing their souls together and of softening her heart towards him. And the further they went the tenderer did her heart grow; until it came to a point when she didn’t dare to pause in their advance lest she should sink recklessly into his arms and feel again that blind, dark, sweet yielding which had so nearly decided their fate.

What impulse was it in her that gave her so wild a satisfaction in murmuring to him yet again, “It’ll be best for us both that I marry him quickly”? Was it the vast, dumb acquiescence of those forests of rain-drenched vegetation? Or was it that as her limbs failed and her heart melted in the mist she was holding up between them, as a priest on the scaffold holds his crucifix to the lips of the condemned, that sad, black figure of the man on the balcony?

But what a long way she and Lu had penetrated into the forest! What if it were her destiny after she died — as a punishment for loving one man and marrying another — to run like this by Rhisiart’s side forever, through an eternal mist, towards a “figure on a balcony” who eternally receded as they advanced?

“You are absolutely sure Nurse was dead when you came away?”

Rhisiart repeated what he'd told her already; but he began, as he kept glancing at the ghostly face above the wearily hurrying figure, to have an inkling that it was only to put the dead woman, as she had already put the figure on the balcony, between herself and her life, that she kept up this ridiculous running.

But the wet grasses dragged at her feet, and the soaked mosses like great undulating sea-sponges dragged at her ankles, and the gaping tree-roots full of jet-black watery mouths sucked at her knees, and the tall trees waved mesmeric arms towards her thighs, and the down-sinking vapour drooped about her waist, and hung heavier and heavier upon her bosom, and inserted itself between the hood of her cloak and her bewildered brain: and— "Let him take you! Give up! Sink down! Make all the Forests of Tywyn your priest of Cardigan! Rhisiart is your life, your soul, yourself! Yield to him, yield to him! Sink down and give up! The Forests of Tywyn are yielding to the mist. The mist is about us, round us, in us. We have given up; and oh, the deep, deep sea! Give up, you also, Catharine ferch Owen!"

It isn't only the vapour that's round your waist, Catharine! It isn't only the mist that's heavy on your breast, Catharine! And as she stumbled on, and as Rhisiart kept pace with her, measure for measure, step for step, breath for breath, the proud virginal girl in the relentless treachery of her woman's senses felt as though the waiting figure on that balcony must wait forever and the waiting figure on that deathbed must wait forever.

The Forests of Tywyn had yielded, the mist had its will of them, their leaves had fallen, their trunks were encircled, their branches were still, their sap was sinking, and the correspondence between the element within them and the element without them was complete.

The girl sank down under an immense and absolutely immobile oak. Scarce any foliage had this tree lost, but from all its twigs and from many of its leaves the mist hung in whitish drops, drops that were forever quivering to their fall but which never fell.

Her lover breathed long and deep, gazing down at the vaporous blur that was her face and at the dusky shell-like curves that made up her unresisting form.

“Kiss me goodbye, Rhisiart!” Her words were simple; but much more so was the primordial appeal that rose up to him from that confused heap of breathing darkness. The half-life which was the woman’s called dumbly from the mist-ravished earth to the half-life which was the man’s.

Why then did he go on standing there mute, motionless, like a carved effigy above a tomb? Such was his nature that of these two appeals it was only to the articulate one he responded. Had she seen him as he now saw her in helpless weakness, or had she seen him rob, pillage, murder, burn, commit hideous sacrilege, and even appear like a gaping idiot before the execrations of a blind mob, she would have felt the same identity between them. She would have felt it beyond all his crimes, beneath all his cowardice.

But he was not made after that fashion. Reactions, fears, scruples, doubts poured into his mind. The very fact that this relaxed, abandoned, desperate heap before him was so different from the proud, indignant Catharine whose strength had gone suddenly weak under his embrace left a troubled empty space in his mind. And into this space with the glint of armour and the gleam of gold rushed the figure of Owen, as he had seen it when, below the walls of Dinas Bran, he sucked that arrow-wound.

All his passion, all his devotion had seemed too little then to lay upon that heroic breast. And now he was going to betray him, now he was going to strike him a deadly, cowardly, secret blow, as from the blade of David Gam!

Between him and that heap of mist-drenched clothes and that white face that seemed to be sinking deeper and deeper into those tree-root hollows of black rain the figure of Owen appeared to Rhisiart, as he had first seen it, with that air of being the symbolic victim in a tribal ritual, decked and adorned for sacrifice.

The lad knew well — indeed his had been the hand that penned these intricate plots — all that depended on the marriage of Catharine and Mortimer. The liberation of Wales depended on it; yes, more intimately than upon twenty such victories as Bryn Glas!

It wasn't as if all these thoughts followed one another in a stream through the boy's head; it was as if they were revealed to him, instantaneously and simultaneously, from their pre-existence in some over-dimension.

"Aren't you ever going to kiss me goodbye, Rhisiart?" The words were followed by the descent of a couple of faded oak-leaves which fluttered down upon that phantom face; and, immediately afterwards, certain whitish-coloured bird-droppings descended into the centre of that heap of clothes.

"Love me once more, Rhisiart; and then we'll go."

But at that instant he had to give her his hand in haste, and she had to take it and struggle to her feet; for there were horses and voices and the barking of dogs close upon them!

"Who goes there?" cried our friend.

"Rhys Ddu of Ceredigion!"

And then came the voice of the Lord of Tywyn himself "Catrin ferch Owen, can it be you? Master Rhisiart, God keep you in his caring! You've lost your company I see, my young friends, and your good men are all scattered, and your hounds all gone. 'Twas lucky I came upon you. What's that, Master? What's that, Princess? My little Lu has gone to find your lost people! Eh? Is that it? And under the protection of Master Brut? I hope, young sir, that Master Brut is as discreet and wise as some young men are — and not as foolhardy as others! But perhaps one of you Fathers will give the Princess the use of your horse. We're near home now. You won't have to walk far.

"This is Master Griffith Young, Princess," he went on, "Canon of Bangor; and this is Master Lewis Byford, our Roman Pontiff's choice, he tells me, for the episcopal throne of the said city. They bring, they tell me, important messages from my Lord of Northumberland and Harry Hotspur, and I think from the Scottish lords, too. Will the Prince your father, Mistress, be home to-night? These gentlemen intend to remain here for eight days I believe, and then go straight to my Lord of Northumberland; and after that, it may be, to France; and this, Master Canon, is —

"But you two know each other already! What a blundering old fool I am! Forgive me, Rhisiart. Do'ee know Master Byford, too? No, not Master Byford? But you learned clerks of the great world have none of our rustic shyness. 'All chins without beards and all hearts without windows,' as our Cardigan saying is!"

All this while Rhisiart kept casting furtive glances at Catharine, fearful lest the shock of Rhys Ddu's appearance with these great clerics would prostrate her. But on the contrary! Never had he seen her more completely the proud, self-contained Princess. Such was his own contrariness that it was even with a certain pique at her easy manner and her refusal to meet his eye that he plunged into conversation with Master Young.

With Catharine mounted on the good man's sturdy palfrey it was natural enough for the former acquaintances to walk side by side; and they began by exchanging impressions of Rhys Ddu.

Catharine had long ago confessed to Lu that this chieftain with his black curling beard reminded her of descriptions Rhisiart had given her of the Emperor of the East. Rhys' manners, though courtly, were in the large, free, grandiose, old-world style; and what Rhisiart had told Catharine about him — though this she had kept to herself — was that he was a better huntsman than statesman.

It was clear as he now rode by Catharine's side, his three big hounds sniffing at every patch of under-growth, that Rhys Ddu was glad enough to escape from his recent companions.

Rhisiart and Master Young therefore walked quietly by the side of the Rector of Byford, whose horse was a sluggish one, and it soon transpired that the Canon was very anxious to get our friend's support in the matter of his argument with his fellow-traveller.

"It may be, it may be, dear Canon," the Rector of Byford was soon retorting, "and I don't deny that Benedict, as a man, is easier to handle than Boniface. But what we have to consider in these delicate matters is not the present but the future. Benedict may be easier than Boniface, and his successor may be easier than Boniface's successor; but the fact remains, and I'm sure our young master here will agree with me, that it is impossible for any serious student of the history of Christendom to regard the Avignon schism as anything lasting. It'll pass, dear Canon, it'll pass; and what men like ourselves, who are the advisers of princes, have to consider is the future, when there will be once more one flock and one shepherd."

It was a considerable comfort to our friend to mark how straight Catharine sat upon the back of Master Young's steed, and it relieved him, too, when he heard her give vent to a quite natural little laugh at something Rhys Ddu said. The black-bearded Lord of the Forests of Tywyn seemed well-pleased to have Owen's daughter to himself; and it wasn't long before their two horses had put a perceptible distance between themselves and the rest.

"You two," remarked the Rector of Byford, who had no difficulty in keeping his horse to a walking pace, "are such old friends that I'm sure, Canon, you won't hesitate to question Master Rhisiart as to the interesting topic we were discussing just now."

Master Young turned upon his fellow ecclesiastic a very complicated look, a look that Rhisiart was quick enough to catch; and having caught it — for the situation was one exactly suited to his gifts — he scrupled not to take the bull by the horns.

"You were speaking, reverend sirs, if I mistake not," he remarked in his best Hereford Law-Court voice, "about the rumours that are spreading through Cardigan as to a marriage between the Prince's daughter and Sir Edmund Mortimer. You are men of the world as well as ornaments to the Church, so that I can speak freely; and let me hasten to confess that I myself — unknown as I am — am an aspirant for the hand of Catharine ferch Owen. But the Princess and I are so devoted to the cause of Wales that we have already begun to wonder — all this, my learned Fathers, is, as it were, under the seal of the confessional — as to the particular direction towards which our conscience points."

Master Young — too sly to be twice caught exchanging looks with his friend on horseback — turned his toothless countenance towards this frank and straight-forward young man.

"What you have just told us, Master Rhisiart — you must pardon me if I omit any title that your distinguished courage in the battle of Bryn Glas may have added to your name — jumps with what we have heard as we travelled. You have been pleased to call us — humble priests as we are— 'men of the world', and as such we cannot conceal from you that it has crossed our mind that young people like you and this spirited child must often ere now have thought of escaping from Wales — no! don't interrupt me — and taking ship for France. Such a course would be, my dear son" — and he hesitated for a moment, as if searching for an appropriate word— "such a course would be—"

But Rhisiart's brain, keyed up to a fine point of self-defence, had considered and rejected at least five different lines of possible policy during that pause. The one he finally selected really did do his shrewdness credit.

"Not only ships for France, Father," he replied lightly and carelessly, "but ships to the unknown country to which Prince Madoc sailed, have crossed my mind; but Owen is a magician, and from beginning to end of my friendship with his daughter he has read every thought that flitted through my head. I can hide nothing from him. And since he has made no attempt to separate us, aren't I justified in concluding that he himself is still a little undecided about the advantages of this Mortimer match? Neither he nor I ever refer to it. It is true I've noticed once or twice that he speaks as if Sir Edmund had already given up all hope of being ransomed by the House of Lancaster. In fact, I myself copied out quite recently a letter from Sir Edmund to his tenants hinting at a change of allegiance."

"Has that letter gone?" enquired Master Young with innocent abruptness.

"Well, no," replied our friend quite unperturbed. "There's been no opportunity to despatch it yet; and, as I say, Owen knows so well his daughter's affection and my own loyalty that he recognises there's no hurry. He discusses everything, as you know, with Master Broch of Meifod, and I'm not sure that Master Broch wouldn't sooner see the Princess married to a devoted Welshman than to a Mortimer."

The ecclesiastics were silent after that, and so was Rhisiart. "How on earth," the latter asked himself, "did they guess that we'd thought of running away? I must be careful; but I must give these men confidence in me; and I must be as frank with them as possible, else I'll never disarm them, or find out what they're after. Both for Owen's sake and Catharine's I must be open with them and yet be on guard."

It was clear to him that his unabashed simplicity and openness had already nonplussed the two churchmen; for Master Young began explaining with uncalled-for minuteness and with engaging confidence all the high state reasons which made it essential that Catharine should marry Mortimer.

"How lucky I took the line I did!" he kept saying to himself. "Merely by admitting what they already knew I am now completely one of them. They won't say anything to Owen that they don't say to me first. Master Young recognized me as a kindred-spirit that day Mad Huw saved him from Rhys Gethin. He'll tell me everything now; and that'll be to Owen's interest as well as to mine."

It never occurred to this "kindred spirit" of Master Young to be "on guard" against himself; but the truth is, as the Canon of Bangor went on revealing all the threads of the elaborate combination, of which he held the secret, as to the part to be played by Mortimer when married to Catharine, and as to the part to be played by Northumberland and his son, by Scotland, by Ireland, by France, our friend's mania for political intrigue and legal niceties began to go to his head. This element in Rhisiart had always been Catharine's worst rival. The sandal-wood sweetness of Luned was a bagatelle in comparison.

Once having been, as it were, "broken in" to the odious phrase, "Catharine and Mortimer," this "Catharine and Mortimer" ceased to have any vivid connection with himself and his love, but became simply a move in the great chess-game of World-Politics.

He was like a man who loves the chess-board so much that if during some desperate ride for life and death he were to find such a board by the fire of a wayside inn, he would be lost.

Lewis Byford's horse was of a dark chestnut, but on its left shoulder was a long curious scar upon which the hair had refused to grow. Upon this scar, when he got weary of Master Young's toothless mouth, Rhisiart now fixed his gaze; and as he gazed he began confusedly to wonder, for the scar was under the rider's nose, what the thoughts had been — thoughts rather concealed from than revealed to Master Young — which had associated themselves with this object in the mind of the Rector of Byford as he rode along.

Once or twice, as the Canon murmured his disclosures, he was sure he detected disapproval on the Rector's face — and what a face it was! Providence had given to Lewis ab Ieuan a square brow, a straight nose and enormous ears; but he himself by some ingrained habit of reticence had reduced his naturally capacious mouth to a downward-sinking curve of double-locked suppression.

It was from this locked-up mouth, which when it did open displayed quite a number of serviceable teeth, that the following words issued, the moment Master Young drew breath:

"As a Proctor in Litigation at the Roman court, Master Rhisiart, I cannot completely endorse our dear Canon's views. For my humble little church at Byford on the Wye — I don't know whether you're acquainted with the country round Hereford — the Holy Father has granted me so many privileges that I've been encouraged to take advantage of this recognition of my poor gifts and have dared to suggest that since the episcopal throne of Bangor is at present vacant it would be proper and seemly for His Holiness to 'provide,' as we say, a Welshman to it.

“As any friend here may believe, my first thought in these conversations with the Holy Father was to suggest his name. But since some crafty enemy of our race had apparently informed His Holiness of our friend’s association with the anti-Pope at Avignon my kind patron, I may even say my benefactor, was so partial to his poor Welsh Proctor that he hinted that if I obtained Owen’s sanction, assuming of course that our cause is triumphant, there might be a possibility that he would see his way to provide me to this vacant episcopal throne.”

Our friend glanced hurriedly at Master Young; but the mist was too thick to see anything but a round orifice in a white blur. “You see, Master Rhisiart, how you and I are destined,” were the words that now issued from this orifice, “to encounter each other on momentous occasions! In me, of course, Owen will meet only a humble candidate for the Archdeaconry of Merioneth, but in our learned Rector here he will find the Lord Bishop Elect of Bangor.”

Rhisiart began to feel happier than he had felt for nearly an hour, happier than he had felt since Catharine so indignantly rejected all his well-arranged plans. He couldn’t conceal from himself how perfectly he was equipped to cope with these two ambitious ecclesiastics.

“How much good and how much evil are mixed up in us all!” he said to himself. “Both the Rector and the Canon are patriotic Welshmen, but of course I can see that the Canon gambles on Benedict while the Rector gambles on Boniface; and that when it comes to bishoprics there’s a deadly rivalry between them!”

“I’m myself a native of Hereford,” he remarked aloud, addressing the Rector. “Perhaps you may be acquainted with my new step-father, Montfoison by name?”

The Rector of Byford shook his head; a gesture which brought very dark suspicions to our friend's mind. Was it possible that his susceptible parent had been deceived by some rascally French adventurer of no background at all?

"Did you hear anything," he went on, "of the trial of Master Brut for heresy? Master Brut is a great friend of mine, and has been appointed Owen's Librarian."

"My dear young gentleman," said the Rector gently, "you must realise that for several years I have been living in Rome. I assume this Brut you speak of was entirely acquitted of this deplorable obloquy?"

"At any rate he's high in Owen's favour," announced our friend proudly, "and even at this moment he is escorting the heiress of Rhys Ddu back to Tywyn."

"Alone?"

"Certainly, Rector, certainly alone!"

"May I enquire if the daughter of Rhys Ddu is affianced to any suitable young gentleman?"

"To none that I've ever heard of, Rector!"

"Really? Dear me! Perhaps then in that quarter — I have no wish to offend — a handsome young scholar like yourself might find—"

Rhisiart bit his lip in the darkness; and savagely transferred his whole religious allegiance from Rome to Avignon. Realizing his blunder the Rector of Byford took from his saddle-bow a daintily-carved flask, put it to his own lips and, courteously bending down as they moved, offered it to Rhisiart.

Naturally anxious to conceal the fact that he had in a single second selected a new Vicar of Christ, Rhisiart drank deeply of the fiery restorative offered him, a privilege which the cautious Master Young refused with a gesture.

Advancing in silence after this they all three became aware that with the deepening of twilight the mist had also thickened, it was only by the feel of the pathway under their feet and the density of the trees on both sides that they kept the track. But it was clear that if it got any darker the non-human senses of the chestnut-coloured horse with the scar on his shoulder would be their best hope.

Dazed by what he had drunk Rhisiart now began to reproduce in his narrow skull almost the precise feelings of the bewildered Catharine. He too visualized the black figure alone on his balcony. He too visualized the white figure alone in her bed. But in his youthful imagination he felt as if between himself and these singular harbour-marks there floated, over the waves of darkness, the shimmering pali in which he had first seen the form of his love.

Suddenly the horse stopped. They had reached a spot where the track divided.

“Are you sure we’re going the right way?” said the Rector. “Why has your horse stopped?” said Master Young.

And Rhisiart cursed the Forests of Tywyn as he had never cursed anything in all his life before.

“If we don’t appear,” said Master Young with grave assurance, “they’ll send back to find us. But if we take a wrong turn it won’t be easy to find us, I suggest we stay just where we are, even if an hour has to pass.”

The Rector of Byford, whose form on the back of his horse had now become to our friend a darkness within the darkness, began to murmur the inspired words of Zacharias in the Gospel, in which the Canon reverently joined.

“Ad dandam scientiam salutis plebi ejus” chanted the man on the horse.

“In remissionem peccatorum eorum,” answered the other.

“Per viscera misericordiae Dei nostri,” intoned the Rector.

“Inluminare his qui in tenebris et in umbra mortis sedent; Ad direngendos pedes nostros in viam pacis,” they concluded together.

The familiar psalmodic rhythm deepened rather than lessened the trouble in our friend’s brain. His whole soul felt drugged, distracted, amort. He longed to be sailing over unknown seas with Catharine, and at the same time he longed to be resting his head, pardoned and at peace, on the golden breast of her betrayed father. But here he was leaning against a horse whose whole body was nothing but a hairless ghostly scar: here he was listening while the phantom echoes of ecclesiastical unction sank out of hearing.

It seemed to him as if in that dense darkness the ghosts of those resonant Latin syllables were uttering querulous moans and plaintive whimperings as they settled down among the expectant black slugs, waiting for them on their balconies on the under-side of the fallen leaves!

And he was aware, too, of a persistent and mortuary smell of funguses. The Forests of Tywyn were famous for funguses. Autumn lasted longer in the Forests of Tywyn than anywhere else in the world. Summer turned quicker into autumn and autumn more slowly into winter! The Forests of Tywyn patiently suffered the spring and the summer and the winter. But their inmost soul responded to the autumn. It rose up then and sucked at the autumn, it drained the autumn, it metamorphosed itself into the autumn! And since the extent of the Forests of Tywyn was so vast, the mass of vegetation with its sweet, sickly, autumnal smell, never quite obliterated by the other seasons, was correspondingly vast; and so now on this particular day, when the wild winds sank down and the persistent rains ceased, the whole forest became one all-dissolving, all-absorbing, all-unfathomable fungus.

Yes, the Forests of Tywyn were well adapted to suck the life out of young hearts. Elliw ferch Rhys was their natural and congenital offspring. But what was that? Rhisiart's whole body stiffened and he listened intently. Ah! he knew what that was — the deep unmistakeable bay of Corbyn, the wolf-hound!

"You're right, Master," he cried joyfully, addressing the Canon. "They've not forgotten us! Mistress Lu's sent back her hound. Corbyn! Corbyn!—" and he raised his voice to its fullest pitch.

Contrary to expectation Owen did return that night; so that all the wanderers, at whose life-springs this Tywyn mist had been at work as though with the innumerable mouths of a colossal fungus, had plenty of time to warm themselves and to wash and change their clothes before the banquet began.

But all the days of that November were pitiable and shameful days for Rhisiart and indescribably tragic days for Catharine.

Owen reached such a point that though he wouldn't give in he couldn't look at her and could rarely bear to speak to her.

The Arglwyddes, however, behaved quite differently. Catharine's one desire was to get away and cry in solitude, but since the Arglwyddes persisted in making these escapes more and more difficult the girl's pride came to her aid. The one person from her earliest childhood before whom she had always refused to weep was her mother, and she felt the same about her brother Griffith; so that either of these persons had only to approach the door of her chamber, or of her friend Lu's chamber when she'd taken refuge there, and at once there was a cold, calm, cheerfully-smiling, though ghastly-white, Catharine ready to receive them.

Rhisiart supposed that after her formal troth had been pledged to Sir Edmund and their espousals drew near she would avoid him as the Prince avoided her. But the contrary of this proved to be the case. She managed — the Mother of God alone knows how! — to see more of Rhisiart than she had done before.

These encounters were pure misery and shame and embarrassment to our friend; but he made it a point of honour to follow her cue and copy her air as far as in him lay. Of their love she never spoke; and, when he spoke of it, all she did without looking away or betraying emotion was to slowly shake her head, while her mouth took on such a lamentable twist when he tried to press her that he hadn't the heart to persevere. He felt her eyes on him all the while. She treated him as she had formerly treated Meredith, who was still too weak to leave Pilleth, and she seemed totally unaware of the effect of this upon any onlookers. She kept gazing at him as if her marriage were to be her death and she wanted to impress his image upon her mind so as to carry it away with her into that unfamiliar realm.

One thing astonished our friend. She seemed to prefer the society of her future husband to everybody's in the place except his own, nor did it appear to cause her any particular distress, though Sir Edmund's melancholy perceptibly deepened, when it fell out that she was alone with the two of them.

From her parents, from the Rector of Byford who had been chosen by the Arglwyddes as the officiating priest at her wedding, from Master Young, from Broch-o'-Meifod and Master Brut, from the Fathers Rheinalt and Pascentius, she seemed to be always escaping to her cold, sad bridegroom, whose melancholy dignity had completely isolated him from everybody. She would be always at his side, with her ungloved hand on Mortimer's black sleeve, standing in the covered porch watching the rain, or seated together in some black oaken chair in the library with some great illuminated folio on their knees, but both pairs of eyes fixed upon vacancy.

Nobody ever saw them talk to each other. Catharine’s eyes would follow Rhisiart everywhere, and would search for him if he wasn’t there; while Mortimer’s eyes would be fixed on any object: a window, a door, a fragment of tapestry, a picture, through which he could stare into some receding horizon.

Mortimer’s courtesy towards her was exquisite. Rhisiart saw him do little things for her that he himself had never done. And though they never conversed, they often exchanged a word, or a look, or even a smile.

Once or twice it struck Master Brut, who hesitated not to observe them closely and who was always troubling about how thin she was growing, that Mortimer treated her with the tender reverence that a devoted servant would offer to a mad queen. It was the coming of the Rector and the Canon that hastened on the date of the wedding. And it was the presence of these much-travelled and politically-minded men that kept Rhisiart from dwelling any more upon ships for France or priests in Cardigan.

Owen was naturally reticent with his Secretary as to the advantages to be derived from the Mortimer alliance; but the two ecclesiastics talked to the lad of nothing else. They soon found out that the deepest element in Rhisiart’s life-illusion was his faith in himself as the guide, counsellor, minister, chancellor, secretary-of-state to an enlightened and civilized ruler of an independent Wales; and upon this they steadily, without pause or intermission, went on playing, till they felt sure that all furtive and reckless schemes had vanished from his mind.

As the fatal day drew nearer Catharine spent more and more time with her friend Lu. This young woman, indulged by her father in all her whims, had grown so eccentric and so much of a recluse that nobody, not even the Arglwyddes herself, who after all was only a guest at Tywyn, dared to do so much as to knock at her chamber-door. On one occasion when the well-meaning Mistress Angharad had presumed to go as far as this, the queer little creature had fallen into hysterics and shrieked down the passage that she must be “left alone, alone, alone” — or she would kill herself!

At the very last Catharine seemed not only to avoid all contact with Sir Edmund but to have torn her eyes away from Rhisiart. On the last day of all nobody saw her but Lu and Father Rheinalt. Father Rheinalt was the only priest she would allow to approach her. She made her confession to him. She had no concealments from him. She must have felt that with his tragic and passionate past he knew better than anyone what love was.

Owen was careful to keep Rhisiart close at his side and to cover the table at which the lad worked with rough drafts of eloquent letters to every potentate in Christendom who had ever quarrelled with the House of Lancaster.

A few days before the wedding Rhisiart had rather a startling surprise. Owen’s most active leaders in the field, each with their separate army, the Abbot of Caerleon, Rhys Gethin, and Henry Don, weren’t able to be present; but day by day various adherents kept arriving, who had either to be provided with tents under the trees or lodging in the foresters’ huts.

It was when he was wearily and sadly ascending the front stair-case of the house to put himself in the dwarf’s hands that this surprise occurred. The tiny creature had for some time astonished him by her understanding of what he was going through. Never before, since their strange covenant in Dinas Bran, had she kept such a check upon her sharp tongue; and she allowed him to unburden his heart to her as he couldn’t do to another soul in the place — no! not even to the Lollard.

But on this occasion, while he had stopped for a moment to gaze out of a window that opened on that fatal forest-path up which he had followed his love after the Nurse’s death, he heard himself addressed by name, and there at his side stood the beautiful page, Elphin! The boy was dressed in white silk that fitted tight to his girlish body; and round his slender waist was a crimson sash.

The sight of him brought back so vividly his first day at Glyndyfrdwy — could he too be wearing pali? — that he recklessly embraced him and kissed him on the lips.

But extricating himself quickly from this embrace, Elphin began in his familiar faltering and nervous manner— “Oh, how fate repeats itself!” thought Rhisiart — a timid request that he would be nicer to Luned when he met her and not go on passing her by without a word or look.

“She promised that if you’d only see her once, and be kind to her like you used to be, she would let me hold her for five minutes by the great clock in the library.”

The perfume of sandal-wood swept over our friend with such an insidious wafture when he heard these words that he was forced to gasp and swallow his saliva. Was Providence beginning to imitate the ways of Saint Derfel? Was it its fault, or his own fault, that at every important crisis in his life, and always on a stair-case, this curst sandalwood smell should stir his senses?

“Tell Luned—” he began; and he was going to say something bitterly cruel to both her and poor Elphin. He was going to command the boy to declare to her — but suddenly he saw in the beautiful eyes of the page a look that completely disarmed him.

“Why he’s looking at me,” he thought, “just as I look at Mortimer! Tell Luned,” he said, “to come any day to the dwarf’s sewing-room. I’ll be glad to see her." And then he added, with a smile as melancholy as his rival's: "Will that purchase you your five minutes?"

"You — couldn't — possibly — see — her — alone, Master Rhisiart?"

At this our distracted friend did burst out, "No, I could not, you silly child! Oh, for Mary's sake, leave me alone!"

And as he ran up the stairs his mind reverted to Rawlff's last words on the battlefield. "Tell Luned — tell Luned — tell Luned," he muttered bitterly.

It fell to the lot of Mistress Angharad to arrange the details of the great day. It was the Arglwyddes who had sent to Snowdon for Luned and the dwarf, for she refused to trust any of Mistress Rad's maids in the delicate matter of bridal-dresses. Indifferent as to her own appearance, the good lady became more agitated than anyone had ever seen her over her youngest daughter's wedding. Sir Edmund's melancholy sweetness and courtly manners had made a deep impression on her and she alone of all the ladies concerned seemed conscious of the almost royal dignity of the proud House of Mortimer.

At one point there seemed a danger that Catharine might insist that Father Rheinalt should be among the officiating priests; but the poor man was so upset at the mere mention of such thing that the kindhearted girl quickly put it out of her mind.

It was Father Pascentius who was Mistress Rad's right hand in all her arrangements. His insatiable black eyes and unwieldy figure moved here and there at the house-wife's bidding like some obedient Genie or Jinn from an Arabian romance. All the patriotic gentry of that part of Wales rode over mountain and moor to be present at this great occasion, for, though the marriage itself was to be celebrated in his little ancestral chapel, Rhys Ddu had caused to be erected a vast rain-proof pavilion outside his mansion where a sort of after-ceremony in the traditional Welsh manner was to take place.

There were all manner of wild rumours in the air. All agreed that Hotspur, the new Lady Mortimer's brother-in-law, was on the verge of raising the great Percy standard against the King. French ships in aid of the movement were, it was said, only held up by the gales. Messages of congratulation kept arriving from all sorts of unexpected quarters. Even John Trevor, Bishop of St. Asaph, had allowed his Prior to represent him, King's man though he still was.

Do what he could to escape, Rhisiart soon found his own costume for the occasion the object of the special attention of his little friend with the purple beard. He had insisted on black as best suited to his mood, but this small tyrant, whose fingers were as deft as they were tiny, soon managed to slash his scholar's velvet with so much sky-blue and silver that before she had done with him he had more resemblance to the dazzling Sir Gawain than to the grave Sir Peredur.

Owen himself, as at his proclamation, shone resplendent in gold; but he bore on his flowing mantle of scarlet the solitary black lion of his paternal house.

One thing our friend couldn't bring himself to do and that was to enter the chapel while they were being married. Side by side with Master Brut, whose own attire was as rich as it was simple, he stood in the front rank of the spectators who in a covered way awaited the passing of the bridal procession from the chapel to the pavilion.

A deafening clamour greeted Sir Edmund and Catharine as they emerged from the ceremony, and it was this roar of wild excitement that made it possible — while the bridegroom paused to acknowledge the crowd's salutations and to say something to Master Brut — for Catharine and Rhisiart to exchange a word.

The girl was as white as her dress. Rhisiart feared she was on the point of fainting, but she managed to look straight into his eyes which were burning-dry above his hooked nose; and as he pressed the bare knuckles of the hand she gave him against his clenched teeth she had the strength even to whisper to him. He could feel her breath as she whispered. He could even catch its fragrance which was like that of a crushed briar-leaf; and well — too well — could he catch her words. “I shall call my first boy Rhisiart,” she said, and that was all. Then she tore her eyes away and passed on.

After the old Welsh custom they were to spend their bridal-night in the house of their marriage; and Rhys Ddu had resigned to them for this purpose his own private chamber, which was only a little less spacious, though a good deal plainer, than his daughter’s.

How he endured the hours that followed our friend would have been hard put to it to describe. He lacked even the heart to drown his feelings in drink, though mead flowed like water that night. One thing he marked, and there were the wildest rumours concerning this: both the Prince and Broch-o’-Meifod vanished from the scene long before the bride and bridegroom went to their chamber.

But the terrible hours passed at last, as all passes, and Rhisiart found himself with the rest of that great assembly — only this time anything but in the front row! — watching those two figures, hers and that other’s, grow more and more indistinct under the flickering of the torches, as they ascended the ancient stairs.

Then, frantically forcing his way through the gleaming crowd, that seemed to him like gorgeously attired dancers at a dance of death, he fled to the stables and buried his face in the familiar-smelling hide of Griffin. Deep blood-currents of comprehension and satisfaction quivered through those piebald sides at his having come to him and to him alone; nor was the old horse in the least astonished when, freeing him from his stall and wrapping his sack-cloth round his own finery, his master leapt on his back and rode him at a gallop down the nearest starlit avenue.

This, as it turned out, was the very one down which he and the Lollard had followed Catharine and Lu on that fatal day of the arrival of Master Young. How he had longed for the presence of that great statesman — and now he was reaping the benefit of his hero's farsighted schemes!

He urged the old horse on, recklessly, heedlessly. It was lucky for both Griffin and his rider that the night was frosty and clear. How the stars glimmered through the bare branches, endowing each one of them in its motionless age with the monumental glamour of something withdrawn, unearthly, expectant!

A faint cool air blew upon his face, an air so light and noiseless that the sounds of the forest, the stirring of sleepy birds, the scuttling of rabbits over the dead leaves and pine-needles, the barking of dogs in distant wood-men's huts, the hooting of night owls, the scampering panic of wild-wood ponies, only intensified the spaciousness of the silence.

The stars were so bright and the branches so still that he felt as if he and Griffin were moving together through some celestial Forest of Tywyn, a forest older than the earth, larger than the earth, with its own gleaming firmament above it and the leaves of centuries piled up beneath it.

He had already gone a good deal further than Catharine and Lu went, in their search for Pryderi's Tree, when suddenly he pulled Griffin up, pulled him up so violently that the old horse nearly collapsed.

There in front of them, gathering what looked like toad-stools at the root of a beech-tree was Broch-o'-Meifod.

"Oh it's another of you life-lovers, is it?" said the giant calmly. Rhisiart perceived even by the faint light of the stars that the man was more upset than he permitted to appear.

"Ride on, if you want to find him, laddie. He's playing his tricks at the Tree."

"Who, for Mary's sake?"

"Owen, Owen — I tell you. He's at Pryderi's Tree. He's punishing himself for this marriage. I can't do anything with him; but you're another of these—"

"But — Master Broch — how could you leave him? What can I do that you couldn't do?"

"Ride on, boy. It's not far. You'll soon see what he's been up to. I'll follow you in a moment. I'm getting something to stop the blood."

Rhisiart obeyed him without further protest; but his heart grew more and more ice-cold as his sweat mixed with Griffin's sweat. "This is the end of all," he said to himself. "Catharine gone, and now Owen gone. O Mary, Queen of Heaven, save him! It's for Owen, Griff; it's for Owen, old friend — faster — faster — faster!"

Though he had never seen them before, the mound and the Tree were unmistakeable when he reached them. They stood in a large clearing which itself lay above the level of all but the tallest trees; and as the clearing was above the forest, and the mound was above the clearing, so the Tree was above the mound.

Jumping off Griffin's back and leaving the old horse panting and exhausted, Rhisiart bolted up the bare hillock, scrambled up the mound, and then stopped, aghast and petrified at what he saw. On the top of the mound were the remains of a gigantic oak, an oak compared with which the one into whose heart he had helped his master to fling the Lord of Nannau was a mere sapling. Its girth, even in dissolution, was the greatest he'd ever seen of any forest growth. It was entirely hollow, and it gaped up at the stars like the jagged throat of some prehistoric monster that had upreared itself from the bowels of the earth to reproach the heavens.

Down upon its gaping jaws shone the glittering hosts of stars; and all the multitudinous branches of that vast forest waited at its feet in spellbound expectation. It was as if the Forests of Tywyn, burdened with the wrongs against which Pryderi had struggled in vain, were holding their breath until that mouth should utter its defiance of "Caer Gwydion", its challenge to the mocking immensity of the Milky Way!

Above the forest rose the mound. Above the mound rose the Tree. And out of the centre of the tree rose the figure of Owen. Pryderi's Tree was nothing but a ruined stump. The Prince had found no obstacle — save the superstitious fear of a whole countryside — in precipitating himself into that cavernous excrescence, the whole height of which could hardly have been more than five feet above the surface of the mound.

But Broch was right. The Prince had done something to himself! Only his torso was visible. He was leaning against the jagged rim of the orifice, his hands on its edge; but his head was flung back, as if, like the funnel in which he stood, he were lifting up a voiceless curse upon that starry expanse.

But what made our friend's knees weak and his stomach sick was that he could clearly see dark blotches upon that white throat under the lifted forked beard. Were they blood? He feared it, he greatly feared it.

"My Prince! My father!" he cried aloud; and his voice sounded so strange, so unlike any voice he'd ever heard, that the silence which followed it seemed full of ghostly echoes. Then something made him glance down to the ground. And there, just beneath the figure in the tree and just at his own feet, lay an object that he knew too well. He stooped hurriedly, picked it up and thrust it away amid the loops and embroideries of the dwarfs handiwork. It was his own dagger; and it came over him that he had left it in the Prince's room, lying upon his final copy of the letter to Mortimer's tenants: the letter that told them how Owen would place the Earl of March on the throne and how the border lordships of Maelienydd and Gwerthrynion and Rhayader and Arwystli and Cyfeiliog and Caer Einion must not be incommoded.

With a sick terror in his heart he now pressed his body close to the oak-stump and flung his arms about his master's shoulders.

"My Prince! My father!" he moaned hoarsely. "It's Rhisiart, my Prince — it's your own poor Rhisiart!"

Oh, Mother of God be thanked! Hail Mary, hail Mary! The man did bend down his head at this.

"Rhisiart?" The syllable came from his wounded throat like bubbles from a tree-root bole full of black water.

"It's I, my Prince, my father! It's your Rhisiart, come to bring you back to life, to Wales, to — to Catharine!" He knew the man had heard him, he knew the man had understood him; but the trance, or whatever it was, into which he had fallen broke under the too-sudden return of his soul to his body and his head fell forward, the blood from his hurt throat spurting against Rhisiart's face.

But a great human shadow rose up by their side now, and Broch-o'-Meifod, panting like a hunted mammoth, laid hold of the unconscious man. Together they dragged him out of the tree and laid him on the turf.

"Is he dead?" whispered Rhisiart. The giant didn't answer. He was busy with the wounds in his friend's throat into which he was pressing some sort of queer-smelling fungus-powder from the handful of toadstools he had garnered in the forest.

At last he rose from his knees. “No, lad, he’s not dead. Nor is he in the least danger of dying. He’s only been play-acting for conscience-sake.”

“I don’t believe it!” cried Rhisiart indignantly.

“No, you don’t believe it; because you love him without understanding him. He was only trying experiments! I know him. I tell you I know him better than I know myself. The man’s a life-worshipper. He’s wickedly alive!” He paused for a moment, staring at the silent figure on the turf. Then he said slowly, “What I can’t get him to understand, with all his tricks, is that this earth” — and he lifted one of his great heels and brought it down again like the hoof of a centaur— “with all these loves and wars and plots and counterplots on it, is no more than a distorted mirage of the reality! There — he’s coming back. Let’s carry him to your horse.”

At the moment when Rhisiart was setting off into the forest, Sir Edmund and the new Lady Mortimer heard the door of their chamber closed upon them.

“Turn away, if it please you, dear my Lord, till I’m in bed!” But there was no need for the Welsh bride to say this to her Norman bridegroom. A gentleman of the old tradition was Sir Edmund; and he was already moving to the small oratory concealed by heavy curtains, whither his personal possessions had been conveyed. Here, in almost complete darkness, he remained so long on his knees that a far less gallant girl than Catharine would have had all the respite she required.

As she lay in Rhys Ddu’s great ancestral bed, her sea-green eyes wide open and staring at the steady candle-flames reflected in a shield above the smouldering hearth, she could hear the click-click of Mortimer’s rosary as he told his beads.

"It won't be the pain I shall mind," she thought. "I'm glad it hurts. The more it hurts the better!" And she clenched her fingers into the palms of her hands as they lay at her sides, which was what Luned told her — though it was entirely from that queer one's imagination — all girls did under the sweet pain of ravishment. "I shall think of you, my only love," she said to herself, "all the time! Whatever he does I shall think of you. Whatever I endure I shall think of you. And I shan't cry out. Lu says all girls cry out, and that the maids will be waiting with bare feet outside the door to hear me. Well! Let them wait! They won't hear a sound."

"Shall I put out the candles or leave them?" he asked her. How grand and sad his head looked as he stood there in his long linen gown, a gown just like her own only of thicker stuff! She turned her head a little as she lay on her back under the wall — as close under the wall as she could get; for, for all the calm of her mind, her body kept yielding to curious little tremors and shiverings — and with her head thus turned to one side against the portion of the pillow that was covered with her flaxen hair she surveyed him with a thoughtful puckering of her brows.

"I hope my teeth won't begin chattering," she thought. "Lu didn't say whether girls' teeth chattered." And she began clenching her teeth just as tightly as she was clenching her fingers. But he had a noble head — and oh! how sad he looked!

This grave, melancholy silence, as he stood there in the chilly room, waiting till she chose to unclench her teeth and answer his question about the candles, now began in some fantastic manner to annoy her. It made her feel very lonely; and it made this clenching of her fingers seem childish and ridiculous. Why didn't he say something outrageous and obscene? Why didn't he say something sardonic and life-weary, as Meredith would have done? His grave, sad politeness made her feel as if she were going to give up her maidenhead in the chapter-house of Valle Crucis!

"Well, child," he said, "I'll put them out. I can easily light them again if you don't like the darkness."

Oh how silly her body was to shiver like this just because there was a man lying by her side! And he hadn't even touched her yet. The bed was so big, and she had made herself so small against the wall, that there must have been a dagger's length between them. A dagger's length? Rhisiart's dagger's length!

For a few wretched minutes, and these were certainly the worst of all she'd gone through that wretched day, they lay in Rhys Ddu's great bed without a movement, a word, a sound. The young man lay on his back staring at the unglazed window from which an air that seemed almost frosty was blowing in; and the young girl lay on her back staring at the tiny points of redness and the wisps of blue smoke of the extinguished candles, and at the fire-light shadows flickering about the walls.

At last she couldn't stand it a second longer. "Why are you so sad and so silent, dear my Lord? Do you hate it so much being married to a Welsh girl?"

"I'll tell you in a little while, Catharine," he said, pronouncing her name in the manner in which it was pronounced in France, "only you must let me do everything I want to first!"

Her relaxed fingers clenched themselves again and those tremblings recommenced. But this "everything" he wanted had apparently nothing to do with a girl's body, whether willing or unwilling; it had to do, it seemed, with re-lighting the candles, visiting the alcove where he had left his belongings and getting into bed again with a Provencal lute in his hand.

He now sat up in the bed, arranging his pillow behind his back and crossing his legs; and in this position, while the candle-flames were again reflected in the crusader’s shield, he began playing on the lute.

Catharine’s fingers relaxed, her mouth opened in wonder, her eyes got round, the blood returned to her cheeks. As he played — and she remembered with what interest he had listened to all their Welsh music and never breathed a word about his lute — he became a different person.

Flickerings of something resembling gaiety crossed his haughty profile, with its short upper lip, and its high retreating forehead passing into tight, small, dark-brown curls. One Provencal tune after another he played, and the faint smiles with which he became aware that with the motions of a timid bird, every time he began again, Catharine slid a little nearer, had a touch of mischief in them.

At last she was so near that as he commenced a melody known to all young people from Dublin to Constantinople, he felt her body touching his; and it was almost with the inevitableness of a movement in a dance that he slipped the hand that had been holding the lute round her form, so that when he grasped the instrument again it was in such a way that her breast was pressed against him.

One more ditty he played; and to the girl’s amazement it was a tune that she had heard her Nurse repeat to her a thousand times when she was an infant at Glyndyfrdwy. This loosened the flood-gates. All those tears that her mother wouldn’t let her shed and that she was too proud to shed before Lu began to pour down her cheeks.

Mortimer tossed the lute to the foot of the bed and drew her towards him till with her hair covering his chest and her face pressed against him she sobbed to her heart’s content.

The candles were guttering in their sconces and Mortimer's nightgown clung about his throat as if he'd been exposed to the rains of Tywyn before that fit of weeping was over. Then settling his pillow in its proper position and sinking down in the bed with his arm still under her he began to speak, "Do you still want to know why I've been so sad — Catharine?"

Once more that French pronunciation of her name gave her a curious relief. She began to feel as if the Catharine who loved Rhisiart needn't be so stern with this other Catharine whose name sounded so different!

"Tell me, dear my Lord," she whispered.

"Do you mind if I let the candles burn themselves out?"

She replied by the faintest possible movement towards him.

"Well, child, it's a long story and a piteous one," he said, "but I'll make it as short as I can. Before my elder brother died there was a girl I loved and who loved me. She was—"

"What was her name?"

"Her name was Bridget, and she was fair like you, only her eyes were different. She was of the people, but she was very proud. She refused to be what we call my paramour, and what she wanted I wanted."

"You wanted to marry?"

"We decided to marry and escape to Scotland where I had many friends."

Catharine was silent, thinking of those ships to France and of that easy priest in Cardigan-town. Then she said, "Did your brother find out?"

"Yes," he said simply. "He found out."

"Did he make you leave her?"

A prolonged silence followed, in the midst of which the candles flickered down and were extinguished. Then she became aware that the man in whose arms she lay was making proud and indignant efforts to keep his self-control. She could feel his chest heave, and she clung to him the closer. But he recovered himself and went on.

"I don't know what happened. I never spoke to my brother again, and he died soon after; but she — she was found drowned in the Severn."

Catharine made no movement. She lay as still as if she were drowned, too. She saw this Bridget with the cold, proud face and the hair like her own and the heart that they'd broken.

"Whether she did it herself," Mortimer went on, "or whether it was done by my brother's orders I shall never know."

Once more there was complete silence in the marriage-bed of Tywyn; while the air that blew upon their faces from the window grew yet more frosty, and the last red embers faded.

Suddenly, when the room was quite dark, Catharine said, very quietly, "If we have children, dear my Lord, I shall call our girl Bridget and our boy Rhisiart. But it's been worse for you than for me; and I shall never, never forget your having told me this!"

XVII. THE GOOSANDER

THE TWO YEARS that followed the marriage of Catharine and Mortimer were years of steadily increasing triumph both for Owen and for Wales. The year of grace 1405, the fifth year of the Prince's assumption of his title, opened for all Welshmen with what looked like an irresistible wave of victory. It is true that Mortimer's brother-in-law, Hotspur, was dead, slain at Shrewsbury as he faced the King and his son, but Hotspur's father, the old Earl, was still in arms against the House of Lancaster; and a new adherent, and a very crafty one, had recently declared for Owen in the person of Thomas, Lord Bardolf.

This Bardolf was a King's man who had turned against his master with that undying hatred which Henry the Fourth seems to have had the power to excite; and his grand passion now was to unite the King's enemies in one triumphant pact.

The popular Bishop of St. Asaph, John Trevor, whose heart had long been wavering towards the Welsh cause, had now openly joined it; and though, in the North, the castles of Carnarvon, Beaumaris, Conway, Rhuddlan, Denbigh, Flint and Welshpool remained in English hands, the far more strategic fortresses of Aberystwyth and Harlech were securely in Owen's possession.

The fortunes of war still swayed up and down, sometimes with the most tantalizing chances lost by the breadth of a hair to one side or the other; as, for instance, when in the beginning of February the notorious Lady Despenser, who had actually kidnapped the little Earl of March, the Mortimer claimant to the throne, was only caught at the last moment with her convoy at Cheltenham, as she rode post-haste towards a sanctuary in Wales.

Owen had already summoned one of those parliaments of the commonalty, towards which both Rhisiart and Rhisiart's legal ideal, Master Young, had been steadily urging him; but our youthful friend was now arranging for a much more extensive assembly, modelled not only upon the parliament of Hywel the Good, but upon the parliament at Westminster.

For weeks he had been drafting and issuing writs to all the cantrefs in the principality, and he was in high spirits over the response. This second parliament was to be held in the castle in a few days so as to enable the free-holders, among the "four good men" of each commote, to return to their farms for the March ploughing.

Our friend's old acquaintance, the Rector of Byford, had by this time used the hold he'd acquired over Boniface the Ninth to get himself promoted, as he had predicted in the Forests of Tywyn, to the See of Bangor; but Byford's Pope was now dead, and the new Roman Pontiff, Innocent the Seventh, found it as hard as his predecessor had done to cope with the Great Schism.

It was no doubt this change among the successors of the Fisherman that encouraged King Charles of France to send his private confessor, Hugh Eddouyer, a diplomatic preaching-friar, to make a personal appeal to the new Prince of Wales to transfer that country's spiritual allegiance from Rome to Avignon. This crafty messenger from Charles the Sixth timed his visit to a nicety; for he caused it to coincide with the return of Master Young, now Owen's official Chancellor, from Paris, bringing news of a great French fleet on the verge of sailing to give him substantial aid.

The ubiquitous Lord Bardolf, urged on in his devious ways not so much by love of the Welsh as by hatred for Henry, had persuaded the new Bishop of Bangor to appoint to the archidiaconal office in his diocese a mysterious young Welshman who called himself Father Ignotus, and who was reported to be a somewhat questionable relative of the Bishop's own; and it was arranged by this shrewd pair of plotters, lest Bishop Byford's hand should be too apparent in the matter, that instead of the episcopal palace in Bangor, the private house of the newly-ordained Archdeacon should be the trysting place between any emissaries that Owen might wish to send and the representatives of the Earl of Northumberland.

It was Master John Hanmer, the Arglwyddes' brother, who had been Owen's lay ambassador at the court of Charles; and it was he who now appeared at Harlech, in company with Brother Eddouyer and a couple of young French noblemen, to report on the success of the embassy to France.

Chancellor Young himself went straight to Owen's other headquarters, the impregnable castle at Aberystwyth, where he was to hold an ecclesiastical court of his own; but it was in Harlech that Owen's family, including Sir Edmund and Lady Mortimer, were now permanently established.

Almost all the devoted personal adherents of the Prince were gathered about him in these noble purlieus, the most ancient as well as the most romantic stronghold in the land; and it may well be that not only King Henry's Lodge at Berkhampstead but even King Charles' perambulatory court had less of the antique ritual of a royal residence than this great Castle by the Sea.

The vast space of its battlemented enclosure, the immense number of its chambers, its impregnable position, all these things rendered it an ideal sanctuary for a prince at war. Bran the Blessed himself, who was of such gigantic stature that no human erection could contain him, might have exercised his colossal limbs in the base-court; while the stairways and passages and banquet-halls and libraries and chapels with intricate ascents and descents everywhere, and with turrets crowded with arrow-slits looking across the water, made Harlech a world of its own, a world where dramas of love and birth and life and death could go on, and only the seagulls screaming about the battlements be aware of them, while from the infinite horizon where sea met sky any imaginary watcher on the ramparts might fancy he heard, when dawn rose or twilight fell, the far-off mystic song of the Birds of Rhiannon.

Rhys Gethin came and went, like an unpredictable thunderstorm, between his now well-seasoned army of spearmen and his perilous mistress, if such she were. Nobody knew how far this affair had gone. All that could be said was that Lowri still clung, in her perversity, for none could sound that strange heart, to Master Brut's converted, or half-converted, Hog of Chirk.

Lady Mortimer had kept her word. She had now a son of two years called Rhisiart and a little baby-daughter called Bridget, and, managing both her husband and her lover with a dangerous skill that made the Arglwyddes regard her with puzzled wonder, she had already begun to take her mother's place as the Great Lady of the Castle.

Catharine, and she alone in that embattled princedom, broke every rule of the prehistoric ritual with which Owen and his bards and his prophets had surrounded themselves. She insisted on nursing her infants herself, whereas from time immemorial such babes of a noble house had been handed over to the care of a foster-parent. She insisted on leaving the women's quarters; and with little Bridget at her breast and little Rhisiart clinging to her gown would move freely, wherever her fancy led, about this huge and intricate pile. She was often with Sir Edmund, but she was quite as often with her little son's namesake. But such was the proud beauty of her blossoming womanhood that not a flicker of any uncomely rumour floated across her path.

It was Owen's way to get rid of his overpowering emotions by some weird penance inflicted upon himself; and even if his Meifod friend had been correct in his supposition that those stabbings at his throat with Rhisiart's dagger had been well under control, they and his whole abandonment between Pryderi's Tree and the "Caer Gwydion" of the firmament had been real enough to work their purpose. He had felt remorse, and he had punished himself; and his love of life had gone on.

The Arglwyddes did notice a certain reserve between him and Catharine; but she couldn't detect the least sign of such a thing between him and Rhisiart.

Catharine herself didn't forget her girl-friends in this new half-royal life. To the joy of everyone in the place she made the Prince send to Snowdon for Tegolin and her Friar; and since Rhys Ddu was now fighting for Owen at some distance from Tywyn, she persuaded her friend Lu to share her many-storied turret fronting the Harlech waves.

Whether there was a definite purpose or not in her choice of the moment of Lu's arrival, which coincided with a second convalescence of Meredith, wounded again in battle and again committed, but this time under the eye of his father, into the hands of the Scab, neither Sir Edmund nor Rhisiart could decide.

It became a sort of half-humorous link between them, the discussion of this nice point, a link that to the watchful eyes of Father Pascentius presented itself as pure masculine jealousy over a friendship between two women.

But whether intended by Catharine or not, the mere physical conditions of Meredith's second recovery, in a chamber adjoining the Mortimer turret, made it impossible for even Lu's shyness to create a barrier; and very soon the queer-looking little creature, her long hair floating about her frail form like the dusky smoke about a bonfire of weeds, was accepted by everyone in the castle as the natural and unquestioned guardian of the invalid's pillow.

How Lu dealt with the Scab nobody but Catharine was ever told; but the complete absence from her timid personality of every kind of ordinary feminine appeal made it seem, even to Father Pascentius, that unless the prophet had a mania for mouse-coloured hair it was unlikely that he would treat this intruder at his patient's bed-side with anything worse than professional indifference.

As a matter of fact a couple of weeks had hardly passed before the Bard of Ffinnant began to interest himself in transactions that drew him for many hours every day from Meredith's side; and it wasn't long before the whole castle, Father Pascentius included, took for granted that that queer and eccentric young lady must have a knowledge of herbs and lotions and unguents and even of elixirs of life, hardly inferior to that of a real conjurer.

The Arglwyddes' brother, John, resembled his sister in almost every respect. In face and figure he was a middle-aged replica of her son Griffith, while in his calm, wise, unruffled nature he had the same power of steering his way through life as the Arglwyddes was destined to display to the bitter end.

John was on excellent terms with Father Rheinalt and he had equal respect for the monk's daughter whose presence in the castle he had welcomed from the first; but he could hardly bear the sight of Father Pascentius! He would complain to his sister that this spying monk from Valle Crucis spoilt Harlech for him. "I feel," he told her, "as if I were an heretical version of Saint Thomas that had to be revised from cover to cover!"

John Hanmer was heartily glad, too, when his fellow-ambassador to France betook himself to Aberystwyth. He had got thoroughly weary of the smooth gabble of that toothless mouth; and he had a private notion that the knavish tricks of these incalculable Frenchmen were countered more effectively by a laconic reserve than by the voluble protestations in which Master Young loved to indulge.

The high-born young gentlemen — they were scarcely older than pages — whom Charles the Sixth had deputed to convey his promises of help to the Prince were two youthful cousins, Gilles and Jean de Pirogue. Jean was a big, blond, imperturbable young aristocrat, of whose personal characteristics nothing was betrayed, save a passion for hunting, a genius for hurriedly-invented lies, and an unconcealed loathing for his cousin Gilles.

This Gilles was more of an agitation to our friend Rhisiart than he was to Owen. Owen treated him with a grave punctilious courtesy from which every personal reaction was excluded. He compelled the lad, whether he liked it or not, to go through the long, wearisome formality of the presentation of certain ornamental pieces of armour, triumphs of the art of the Parisian goldsmiths, which he had brought from the French King.

This ceremony, Rhisiart assumed, was organized by the Prince solely to impress these young scions of a noble French family, but it was hard for him to imagine Owen going through such a tedious ceremony if he hated it as much as he himself did. And how could he not hate it? To our friend's Norman taste such ceremonies were simply tiresome and ridiculous. He could see the giggling fits against which his naughty mother would have had to struggle at the sight of Owen kneeling down so humbly while this repulsive young man hooked and buckled the pieces of armour about him.

The longer this young Gilles de Pirogue remained in the castle the more agitated did Rhisiart become. Only a very short space of time passed before he discovered that his own worst vice — that sensual ecstasy he derived from the thought of particular kinds of cruelty — was shared by this unpleasing youth to a degree that amounted to insanity. And yet the boy wasn't insane. In everything else he was crafty and cold and calculating. On this path only he seemed prepared to take the maddest risks, whether to his honour or to his reputation or to his life.

The culminating revelation he got of this young aristocrat's peculiarity came, as might have been expected, from Father Pascentius. The Father called him one day into the smallest and most remote of Harlech's three libraries, where he had collected the rarest of all the books in the castle round his own desk. It was Candlemas Day, the second of February, the day devoted to the Purification of the Blessed Virgin; and Father Pascentius commenced by inquiring whether his fellow botanist had fasted from meat that morning.

"It's good to fast, my son, good to fast, good to fast," he repeated as he pushed his visitor into a chair by the fire and planted himself upon a wooden stool near him.

Rhisiart was amazed by the deft way the Father seized upon this three-legged object, shiny as an axe-handle from the daily pressure of his huge buttocks, and whipped it so neatly between his legs ere he lowered his weight upon it.

"Good to fast, my son!" and it seemed to our friend as if over one of those incorrigible eyes the eyelid perceptibly fell. Had the interpreter of Saint Thomas winked at him? And then he remembered. Father Pascentius was making sport of the present Abbot of Valle Crucis!

"My soul shall magnify the Lord and my spirit shall rejoice," was his next utterance, half to himself and half aloud; and it was impossible for Rhisiart, after five years of Master Brut's friendship, not to wonder what the Virgin Mother, if she were watching this ungainly recorder of her Purification squatting on his stool, thought of his rendering of her Song of Conception.

"Well, my son, I expect you want to know what I bothered you about"; and, seizing his stool with both hands while still seated upon it, he caused it to hop along the edge of the cinder hearth, so that he could get closer to his interlocutor. "The matter is this," and he cast a cautious glance at the massive door of the chamber, "and it is an important—" And then quite suddenly, but not to Rhisiart's surprise, who had long since grown accustomed to his vagaries, he thrust a hand into his habit and brought out a tangled mass of minute plants. Dropping these into his capacious lap he selected one of them and held it at arm's length in the shaft of sun-motes that fell across the room.

"You see the genus of course," he said. "Of course you do! But this is a separate species. At first sight you mightn't think so, but I'm sure I'm not mistaken. It's a kind of bitter cress. Of course you see that, from the corymbose arrangement, but the common bitter cress never shows itself till March. I believe it will be necessary for me" — in his excitement he used a characteristic Welsh idiom— "necessary for me to put a name on it, and I have decided to name it Cardamine Pascentius. And since it may be hereafter the only plant to bear my name, I would be glad, my son, if, when I'm dead, you'd be good enough to plant it — Cardamine Pascentius — upon my grave."

Rhisiart dutifully rose, took the Cardamine Pascentius between his finger and thumb, and walking to the window surveyed the small object carefully.

"Blessed Mary!" he thought, "it looks like little Lu!" And he held it in such a way, framed in that narrow window, that it made a tiny dark pattern against the golden sun-path upon the in-rolling tide.

Then coming back to his seat by the hearth he returned it to its complacent god-father, who without moving from his stool thrust it back with the rest into the pocket of his habit.

"I shall remember, Father," our friend promised him. "But, if the Prince allows me, I hope in the next campaign—"

He crossed himself hurriedly; but the monk was now with the familiar gesture of his hands reducing all such relativities as human promises to the indifference of the absolute.

"What's your opinion, my dear son," and, though Rhisiart attributed the impression to the dazzlement of his eyes by that bright path on the waves, the fancy did cross his mind that a quite human glance of affection had reached him from the unwieldy figure on the stool, "with regard to this young Pirogue?"

"Jean, do you mean, Father?" our friend hastily murmured. "I believe he's out hunting already; though what he'll find at this time of year—"

"No, no, my son, the other one, the other one! What is your opinion of him?"

Rhisiart might as well have looked for enlightenment into the bottomless depths of Llyn Tegid as into the orbs that now confronted him. "Oh, I don't know, Father," he brought out carelessly. "He's got an unnaturally pale complexion, and his mouth makes me think of that water-snake we found the other day swallowing a frog."

"You remember, son, how in one of your early confessions to me, before you loved Lady Mortimer, you spoke of the bloodlust — well! not exactly that, but in the same category of mortal sin — which you found to be such an agitating temptation?"

Rhisiart nodded without speaking.

"Well! this Gilles lives for that! Nothing else on earth has interest for him. Everything else is done mechanically, seen mechanically, spoken mechanically. The lad's like a perambulatory corpse, I tell you, except for that."

Rhisiart bent his head frowning, gazing uneasily at the Father's ragged sandals. "Father," he enquired, "why do you suppose it is that such horrible temptations reach us in these modern days? Do you think there's been some marriage in Hell since that star with a tail appeared?"

"Marriage in Hell, my son?"

"I mean a new type of devil, born to betray us, such as was never known in the earlier times? Or do you think, Father, it's because of the anti-Pope at Avignon? Or is the Christian Faith gradually dying out, as Master Broch says?"

"Every age, my son," the monk replied quietly, "feels itself to be worse and more wicked than the preceding ones. Our age does, as you say, suffer from the breaking down of faith and chivalry and from the grievous imputations implied in the mere existence of the anti-Pope; but you must remember that all great virtues carry their defects, I might say their curse, with them. Things were done under the urge of faith that sicken us in these enlightened days. Between ourselves, my son, I think the worst aspect of our age is the intelligence of its cruelty. King Hal, for instance, in his burning of heretics, is influenced by no old-fashioned wrath against blasphemies. It's a pure political move, to gain favour with the —

"But I didn't come to lecture you, my dear boy, "I came to tell you that since Owen and Griffith and Sir Edmund have all gone hunting with Jean de Pirogue, there's no one left in this castle — for you know what Master Hanmer is! — that I can depend upon in the matter that's now come up. I don't want to go to Broch—"

Rhisiart leapt out of his chair with a bound. "You don't mean," he cried, "that Lord Talbot has rushed here from Hereford, or John Grendor from Glamorgan, and we've got to man the walls?"

"Tut, tut, lad! What are you talking about? Isn't the Abbot of Caerleon keeping at bay the last big army King Hal has the money to muster till his next parliament? You, the Prince's adviser, to talk so wildly!"

"But the Abbot may have been defeated! He may have been killed! Oh, for Mary's sake, Father, tell me what's happened! I'm only" — and the Secretary paused and groaned bitterly— "only a letter-copier, a clerk, a scribe, a wretched book-worm; but I have ridden a horse and drawn a sword in my time — and my horse is no fool either, though he is getting old. John Grendor's known to be the best captain in Christendom, and Lord Talbot runs him close. Our Rhys Gethin's a ramping madman compared with either! For Mary's sake, Father, what has happened? I'm sure it's John Grendor — I'm sure that's what it is. He must have raised the money and the men himself and decided to attack our main stronghold! It's just like him to have found out the day when the Prince would be hunting; for he always—"

But the Father had risen to his feet and in his impatience with his young friend had actually flung his stool against the wall. "Listen to me, Rhisiart, listen, boy! Your horse may be sensible enough, I don't deny it; but you yourself are a fantastical fool! Can't you believe me when I tell you that it's the doings of this damned French boy I've come about? So stop roaring of your swords and spears and your Talbots and Grendors! You’re as touchy as an old bowman from Crecy, who can do nothing but talk of the Black Prince’s horse-shoes. How can I trust you in a crisis when you behave like this?”

Rhisiart couldn’t help smiling at the monk’s reproaches. In his huge relief that it wasn’t an English army — for of course there was serious danger of this, as he alone in that castle realized — he would have continued to smile if the Father had struck him with his stool instead of flinging it against the wall.

But the monk was in a very serious mood; and the most curious evidence of this was that his eyes had that same odd film upon them — like thin flakes of transparent horn — which they had when he was speaking of the Cardamine Pascentius.

“Something’s happening that must be stopped, my son,” he said gravely. “There’s pain being inflicted in this castle that cannot be allowed. But I don’t want to go to the Prince about it!”

“Why not?” asked Rhisiart. “The Prince wouldn’t put up for a second with such things in Harlech.”

The eyes of Father Pascentius came to life; and like two ferrets whom their owner sends down a rabbit-burrow they plunged into the young man’s soul. “The Prince,” said the monk solemnly, “isn’t like you and me. He has himself in control as a rule — but not always! Cast your mind back, my son, and ask yourself, as others have asked themselves, what happened to Hywel Sele of Nannau.”

“Let’s go then!” cried Rhisiart impatiently. “Don’t let’s delay a moment! I ought to have a sword, though, oughtn’t I?”

“Have you your dagger?”

The young man showed it to him and concealed it again.

“I’ve worn it bare,” he said, “since we heard Davy Gam was on the prowl. ’Twould be out as quick as his knife if I saw him near Owen!”

“Come then,” said the monk in a low voice. “But remember we’ve only got to stop this. You know as well as I do that nothing must happen to King Charles’ envoy.”

The theologian shook down his habit, pulled his cowl over his head and pushed back the curtain, for the door of this particular retreat was rarely closed, and went out into the passage followed by his young friend. Up and down endless corridors and endless flights of narrow stone steps Rhisiart followed the cowled figure. Sometimes the passages they traversed were nearly dark, in spite of the sunlight that poured down against the seaward battlements. More than once they emerged into the open air, and Rhisiart turned to glance at the fishing boats on the glittering waves. He found himself growing more and more nervous. What kind of scene was awaiting them?

Rhisiart felt puzzled and sad. This great castle by the sea, over which now flew Owen’s new standard, the four lions rampant of Gwynedd, had it been built for one kind of greed and cruelty, only to prove a protection for another, a subtler and a worse? Master Sparrow was still in good spirits; but what had the common people really gained by being free of the English? The countryside, he knew, was burnt and ravaged in every direction. And what had Owen himself gained beyond those ramping lions on his armour, on his shields, on his horses’ trappings? In his imagination Rhisiart already began to hear the cries of that “pain” they were going to bring to an end. It must be something exceptional to have sent those deadly eyes of Father Pascentius voyaging down the sun-path. But what sort of a promise was it for the future when the Prince of Wales mustn’t be told of what was going on in his own castle?

While he watched the cowled figure before him dive through a narrow arch, leading down from these high ramparts, our friend, who was no longer an impulsive boy but an eccentric and anxious man, cast a final look at the glittering distance. He was too high up to see the beach, or the rocks, or even the little stone-jetty; but he noticed how far the tide was drawing back, leaving a great stretch of yellow sand.

“In Bran the Blessed’s time;” he said to himself, “the waves must have washed against the wall. The sea’s receded. A few hundred years more and all this sand may be tilled pastures!” He turned his head and glanced at the dark steps down which his guide had descended. The monk too had turned and was looking back at him. That meant they were at the end of their quest! He thrust his hand under his jerkin where he wore an “unseen belt. Yes! he could draw his dagger at a glance from the monk, at less than a glance, at the flicker of an eyelid!

“I must go,” he thought; but oh, how reluctant his body was to obey that command! Was he about to be seized by one of those attacks of black darkness, as when he drew his sword in front of the Chirk archers or followed the Lollard down that swinging rope? “But I did what I had to do,” he said to himself, “even though I didn’t know I was doing it! I killed that English boy at Bryn Glas — but that was with my sword. I’ve never stabbed anyone to the heart. Where is the heart? Under the left ribs? Blessed Virgin! I’ve become a monk myself with all my letter-writing!”

And as he bent his head to join his companion he heard the voice of his mother chaffing and laughing at him. “But what,” he retorted, “did you want with a lousy Frenchman? Montfoison is he? Oh the sly son of a whore! Oh the lecherous pretender! And to get the prettiest lady in Hereford for a nod and a kiss and a French song!”

Yes — there were sounds now — strange, appalling sounds! Mercy of God! Was the Frenchman turning Harlech into —

But there was Elphin, the pretty page, with his hands full of wet sea-weed, trembling like a wisp of shudder-grass! And there was Gwalchmai, that ill-favoured ostler Rhisiart had met when he first arrived at Glyndyfrdwy and had always detested, holding the lad by the wrist, while with his other hand he kept tapping at the bolted door.

The sounds from within the chamber, some of them human, some sub-human, not only made these tappings inaudible but muted the approach of our two friends.

Father Pascentius gave Rhisiart a look which the latter interpreted correctly. Leaping upon his ancient enemy, whom he'd suspected for months of ill-using the aging Griffin, he seized his ugly head by its thick locks and struck it — once, twice — with all his force against the granite door-post. Gwalchmai fell without so much as a groan; a stream of blood, blacker than the darkness, trickling from his skull.

Then Father Pascentius, who had clapped his hand over the page's mouth, began questioning him.

"Who are with him in there? Whom is he tormenting? If you scream—"

But Elphin, when the Father removed his plump hand, was nearer swooning than screaming. His awe of Father Pascentius kept his soul in his body, but it was in a gasping and piteous whisper that he revealed all they needed to know.

It was a stray hound Sieur Gilles had got in there, tied up for his experiments; and there was a man too he was tormenting — a wandering Jew-pedlar, Livius by name.

"He said," and the boy indicated the unconscious Gwalchmai, "that I was to bring him these—" and the sea-weeds slipped to the ground beside the trickle of blackness.

“Who’s with him?” asked the Cistercian.

“Mistress Lowri, Father, and Lawnslot’s with her. And the Scab’s there too and Mistress Sibli.”

The monk and Rhisiart exchanged glances. “We must get the door opened,” whispered the former; and he turned with stern authority upon the shivering boy.

“You’re going to shout to them till they draw the bolt, Elphin,” he said; “but the moment it opens you’re going to run as fast as you ever ran in your life; and you’re going to fetch Master Broch here. Do you understand? And you’re going to tell him to bring his poppy-drug. Do you understand? His poppy-drug.”

“Need I come back, Father?”

“You need do nothing but get Master Broch here! Do you understand now?”

“Yes, Father.”

“Then shout your loudest, and say you’ve got the sea-weed!”

At the back of his mind during all that followed Rhisiart kept thinking, “Could I have done that? Could I have sent for my greatest enemy at such a crisis?” And his respect for the discoverer of Cardamine Pascentius mounted to a point from which it never afterwards declined.

Whether the Jew had suffered as much as the dog he couldn’t tell, but the man hadn’t bitten his tormentor as he was thankful to perceive Sieur Gilles’ other victim had succeeded in doing. The sensation he got when he first entered the room was a revolting one. It was the smell of pain. Then the impression branded itself on his mind of two vortices of pain, vortices that issued screaming from both the tormented forms and filled the chamber, interweaving their fiery flukes, so that what was endured by the Jew, and had become the Jew's whole consciousness, mingled with what was endured by the dog, and had become the dog's whole consciousness.

Mistress Lowri had no need to give Rhisiart more than one quick glance; and after that, with the eyes of Father Pascentius boring — so it seemed to our friend — two livid holes through her yet shapely back she began to move to the door.

In a second Sieur Gilles made a bow worthy of a Lord Chamberlain and offered his arm to lead her away. But at that the Father rose to his full height, his ungainly figure made almost dignified by his Cistercian habit.

"A moment, a moment, my Lord de Pirogue!" he said. "You, Lawnslot, take the lady down; and remember, not a word—"

But at the opening of the door there came a groan from Lawnslot's prostrate mate; and seeing his fellow-servant bleeding so profusely the man paused irresolutely. Then a sudden wave of anger overcame him; for Gwalchmai was his only intimate in the place and they both came from Denbigh.

"It's you we've got to thank for this, you interloper, you traitor, you scribbler, you Englishman!" And advancing threateningly towards Rhisiart he made as though he would strike him. Something however about the look in our friend's eye and the quick movement of his hand into his tunic changed his intention.

"The Prince shall know of this," he muttered savagely, "and if Gwalchmai dies—"

But Mistress Lowri, who had taken the opportunity of examining her servant's hurt, now drew his indignant comrade away.

"I bid you god-den, Sieur Gilles," she said. "And I shall try not to forget the methods of your science. No, he won't die, man, he won't die. Master Rhisiart isn't brave enough to strike a real blow. Why don't you see to your precious infidel, Father? Or is the mongrel your concern?"

She had the grace to bend down after that and to arrange her veil under the groaning man's head; but this done she hurried off taking Lawnslot with her.

Rhisiart meanwhile was untying the dog who, bleeding as he was, resigned himself to his hands. But when the creature was free he sank down on his haunches with nothing alive about him but the look in his eyeballs.

The Jew was a different case. The "scientific method" referred to by Lowri had done less vital harm to him than to the dog. Freed from his bonds by Father Pascentius he was able to pull his cloak about him and to stagger back on the same bench where he'd been recently outstretched.

All this while the prophet of Derfel had been edging himself in silence inch by inch along the wall towards the still open door, where little Sibli was now on her knees, wiping the blood as best she could from Gwalchmai's hairy skull.

Then for the first time Sieur Gilles himself spoke, turning from the window to which he had nonchalantly retired after offering his arm to the lady.

"If you were of suitable rank, Master," he said with a bow, addressing himself to Rhisiart, "I should take pleasure in giving you the chastisement your interference deserves. But a de Pirogue — I must ask your pardon for the ridiculous rules of a civilized country — cannot enter into personal conflict with — forgive me — a petit clerc or sous-commis, like yourself. At the same time — no! calm yourself, mon ami I too have a bagatelle of a couteau-poignard — at the same time since you are a little upset, how do you say it? a little bouleversé, and quant à moi je suis cool — cool as — as la glace — you would be, apart from your lack of habitude of the sports of gentlemen, you would be at a — how do you say it? — at a désavantage with me.”

Rhisiart withdrew his hand from his tunic. Past the white face, past the dead-black damp hair that framed it, his eyes fixed themselves, sadly, wearily, upon that wide expanse of yellow sand that he had recently imagined converted into green pastures.

What vast spaces of non-human elements there were still in the world, unaffected by the perversities and cruelties of men! It was the raised voice of Father Pascentius that made him turn at last, and both he and the young Frenchman surveyed with curiosity the scene that was taking place.

The monk had caught the Bard of Ffinnant just as he was on the point of edging himself out of the chamber; and concentrating upon the man’s roving blue eye the full force of his piercing gaze he was unloading upon him the accumulated indignation of a score of long years. Shamed and disgusted with himself as he was, Rhisiart was still youthful enough to be amused at this easy victory of the priest over the prophet.

Derfel indeed seemed completely to have deserted his champion. The Scab looked for help at the crouching figure of Lemuel Livius. He looked for help at the cowering form of the dog. He even shot from his single eye an appealing glance at Rhisiart.

But there came no help from any direction. He was compelled to listen in undefended trepidation to a mounting sequence of supernatural threats that were of a kind not at all dissimilar from those of his own armoury of holy terrors.

As Rhisiart contemplated these two singular figures, wondering whether it was just a lie of the Scab’s that — like Merlin — he was the son of a nun, and observing with unpardonable interest how the rose-marks on his face kept getting redder in various particular spots as if his terrified soul were hurrying about, just under his skin, with a red lantern, he thought how different from both these men the gigantic Broch-o'-Meifod was. "If he comes here now," he thought, "it'll be like the ghost of Bran come up from the sea!"

And then as he watched the Scab's unmistakeable discomfort while the monk drew shamelessly upon his erudition to describe in detail the proddings and pinchings, the scaldings and scorchings, the hookings and harrowings that were to be his lot the second his soul left its disfigured frame, it struck him as viciously typical of their modern life that in the breaking up of the old communal faith, everything had become personal, a personal mania, a personal obsession, a personal superstition! Here was the Scab who had blackmailed all the cantrefs of Ardudwy and Caer Einion; and for twenty years had crossed the Berwyns to gather his conjurer's rents, filled with just the very perturbation he himself habitually excited.

The wielder of Derfel's plagues was now learning what would happen to him at the hands of the Almighty the second his soul reached Hell. And the curious scene was made more significant by the unconcealed glee of Master Livius of Burgos, who as he stroked with his long Mesopotamian fingers the portion of his person to which Sieur Gilles had been applying his science gave vent to such low-voiced murmurs of approval as: "Father Abraham, it's the truth! Father Isaac, the holy man's read the Torah. Yes! yes! yes! to the good work, master devils! Don't let the false prophet escape! Father Jacob! see to it that he doesn't edge back across the gulf!"

But the final denunciations of the monk, as he drove the Scab into the passage, were attuned to the movements, not of a fly, but of little Sibli. Finding that Gwalchmai had ceased groaning, though whether this indicated his recovery, or the reverse, she had no idea, the devil in her small frame — and it was hard for our friend not to feel as if the combination implied more devil than dwarf — prompted the diminutive creature to cross the room and offer the sea-weeds, which Elphin had dropped, to Sieur Gilles de Pirogue.

This she did, while the full sunshine fell on her purple beard, with a mocking curtsey and a wicked glance at Rhisiart. The sea-brine that still clung about these slippery objects was mingled here and there with the wounded man's blood, but it was the smell of the salt sea they brought into the room, and it seemed to our friend, as he watched the Frenchman make a ceremonious bow and lay them on the window ledge, as if from the receding waters and the yellow sands there had come a token of the obliteration of all the tribes of men and their curst cruelties, a premonition of the end of an epoch, a hint of a new era.

At that moment Broch-o'-Meifod entered the chamber. The giant's familiar weapons gleamed like sea-shells about his waist. He had clearly come straight from the sea's edge, for his bare feet were caked with sand and several seagulls' feathers had been thrust between the shining axes in his belt.

"Mother of God!" thought Rhisiart, "he does look like Bran!" Broch gave the merchant from Burgos one quick glance and went straight to the crouching dog.

Rhisiart followed him anxiously. Had Elphin told him what to expect? Had he had time to get his drugs? But what the man first produced from his leather pocket was more necessary just then than any drug. He — and he alone — had thought of water. Pouring this element from a metal flask into one of his great palms he knelt down and held it to the dog's mouth.

Lap! Lap! Lap! There was no other sound for several minutes in that room. Twice, three times, four times, he filled his palm with water; while each time he did so the dog gave him a look that our friend to the end of his days couldn't forget. It was more, not less than, a look of human gratitude.

It was the look of one who finds God at the bottom of Hell. It was the look of one who finds a crack in a universe where all is allowed and nothing forbidden. And out of this crack water was coming.

Substituting at last a few diluted drops of what Father Pascentius had called his “poppy-drug”, Broch now spent some time in sending his patient to sleep. Meanwhile Sieur Gilles, who clearly was unaware of any crack in a world where all is permitted, was leaning out of the window.

Something made our friend follow the Frenchman’s investigations, and he soon realized that this particular window, an unusually wide one for Harlech, opened upon the roof of the castle chapel. He and Sieur Gilles turned simultaneously; and standing side by side they both began, as any onlookers at any embarrassing scene might have done, mechanically squeezing certain little slippery blobs in the sea-weed under their hands, till they caused these blobs to vent the air they contained, in inaudible pops.

The dwarf by this time had transferred her attention to the scene that now was proceeding between Broch and the Jew. Unlike his fellow victim, the merchant from Burgos showed no desire to accept the giant’s aid; and when the giant produced his drug he thrust it away, summoning to his aid from their sepulchres in the desert the mothers of his people, Sarah and Rebecca and Rachel. The mention of these sublime names seemed to excite implacable fury in little Sibli. She endeavoured to thrust her purple chin into his pain-exhausted body.

“Jew! Jew! Jew!” she kept crying; and when Broch flicked her off she danced up and down, making lewd gestures in front of the injured man and blaspheming those mothers of Israel he had invoked.

Broch drove her off mechanically till she worked herself up to such a pitch as actually to spit at the man’s face; and even then he only brushed her away with the flapping hem of his leather jacket. But she was drawn from the Jew now, as was our friend himself, for Broch-o'Meifod had turned his attention to the French envoy.

It was plain that the youth was staggered and puzzled by this queer friend of the Prince of Wales. Rhisiart who had gone out for a minute to satisfy himself as to Gwalchmai's condition, and had been relieved to find that Father Pascentius had effectually forestalled him and that both the Father and the wounded man had disappeared, returned to the room to find the Frenchman actually uttering a weird and monstrous defence of what he had been discovered doing.

There must have been something in the mere stature of Broch-o'-Meifod that awed him into this proceeding; and something too in the expressionless enormousness of Broch's face. Ever since as a child Gilles had begun his career of the infliction of pain, he had been put to it to harden his heart against the pity and wrath of others.

It was therefore in real desperation, though his hearers would never have guessed it, that he uttered this unexpected apologia. "It's that meddling sous-commissaire," he cried, pointing an accusing finger at Rhisiart, "who brought that staring monk here! Madame and le poète avec le visage de rose were très intéressés in my little experiments. It is my méthode scientifique, Sieur Broch de Meifod. A little of pain I must give, that is true; but for what an end? That I may obtain the secret of life, the secret of not-dying! What is the pain of a stray dog, of a rascal Jew, if I can find by my méthode scientifique the elixir of life? Consider the logic, mon cher Broch de Meifod; perhaps a little nothing of pain, perhaps a little nothing of death even, to a useless dog, to an infidel Jew, to some unwanted brat of a peasant-slave — but consider the children of noble birth, so beautiful, Sieur Broch de Meifod, so beautiful and tender, who will live long lives because of my méthode scientifique, because of my discovery of the elixir! I give pain, yes! But I give life, too. It is the logic, Sieur Broch de Meifod, it is the logic to which I appeal!"

It was, however, as Rhisiart perceived, a "logic" that had scant effect upon the person addressed. Broch-o'-Meifod moved a few paces nearer to the envoy of King Charles. What the giant would have done when he reached this vivisecting prolonger of life was not clear. What was clear was Gilles de Pirogue's determination to risk no contact with superstition on so large a scale. He whirled round and with one bound was at the window, through which he had no difficulty in squeezing his elegant form. In a second, agile as a young monkey, he was on the roof of the chapel!

Broch himself had moved to the window now, so that Rhisiart missed the spectacle of this messiah of science scrambling down a flying buttress; but the youth's devilish laughter entered the chamber; and he even had the gall to refer to Elphin's sea-weed.

"There's plenty of sea-weed upon the coast of France," he screamed. "Enough for all my little experiments!" The truth is that the obsessed envoy had long since permitted his eyes to wander during Holy Mass, and he hadn't missed the fact that from any of the flying buttresses outside, into any of the chapel windows, there was, for jackdaw or devil, an easy entrance.

The state-banquet at Harlech that February afternoon was delayed several hours. The great hunting excursion, designed for the pleasure of the younger French envoy, had proved both tedious and disappointing; and Owen had returned in no very amiable mood. Nor did his spirits pick up during that long and formal meal. His friend Broch was unusually taciturn. Rhisiart excused himself as soon as the ladies retired, under the excuse of visiting the bedside of Meredith, while the elder envoy, who had been feverishly lively during the repast, left the hall before the drinking began, with an imperious request for a private interview that same night.

Now it happened that the Prince had already arranged for a similar interview with two other important persons. He had told Brother Eddouyer, the emissary from Benedict the Eighth at Avignon, that he would see him about the allegiance of Wales; and he had told the Archdeacon of Bangor, who brought the terms of the secret pact, that he would see him about the Tripartite Indenture. In regard to this latter affair it was essential to have the presence of Sir Edmund; and it was an added vexation to the harassed Prince when, on the top of this untimely demand for an immediate interview by Gilles, Mortimer announced that owing to some trifling indisposition of their infant Bridget he and Catharine could give only very hasty attention that night to business of state.

The Prince had been so diligently occupied in propitiating Gilles de Pirogue, who sat by his side during the banquet, and from whom he extracted a promise that his royal master wouldn’t fail to send James Bourbon, Count of La Marche as well as Jean de Hengest, Lord of Hugueville, with the expected expeditionary force, that he felt it essential to agree to the envoy’s request. After all, the French monarch had sent this ambassador, whether he was a persona grata or not.

But even these trials weren’t all. Fate indeed was set upon persecuting him that night. For what must his Secretary disclose at this juncture but the information that he intended to spend the evening with Meredith!

The Prince felt very indignant with Rhisiart for this selfishness. Naturally a young man would prefer to exchange ideas with the brilliant Meredith rather than to discuss a “Tripartite Indenture”. Heaven knows, he would prefer it himself! But, after all, Rhisiart was the Clerk of his Council-Chamber and he had no right to absent himself when matters so serious were in the air. The only flicker of irresponsible pleasure of which the Prince had recently been conscious amid all these worries came from the presence in the castle of the prophetic Bard of Gower, the famous Hopkin ap Thomas, whose mysterious and occult poems written on the banks of the Tawy and known by the name of cywyddau brud were being passed surreptitiously all over Wales. These weird verses predicted the most startling events, from the crowning of a Welsh prince in London to the anointing of a great King by a girl in armour; while some of them even went so far as to hint at the imminence of a suicidal war in which humanity itself would perish!

But even this pleasure had been rudely shaken. At first when this extraordinary personage — called by many of his contemporaries "the divine Hopkin" — appeared at Harlech, the Prince would hardly let him out of his sight. Broch-o'-Meifod, on the contrary, got so little joy of him that in avoiding his society he remained completely in the background; with the unfortunate result that in these important questions, the pact with Northumberland and the acknowledgment of the anti-Pope, Owen began to follow the advice of his new rather than of his old friend.

"The divine Hopkin" treated the Prince not so much as a ruling potentate as a fellow-magician, and this brought back, in one great overpowering wave of temptation, all that dangerous dabbling with the unknown future which Owen had shaken off when he destroyed his crystal.

Both the Arglwyddes and her eldest son were grievously troubled by the presence of this new prophet. Nor did the leaders of Owen's armies like it any better. They had grown accustomed to the peculiarities of the Scab; and since so many of them were men of Gwynedd and Merionydd it was one thing to accept oracles from Ffinnant, but quite another thing when they came from the Tawy!

But magicians are men; and men, when they acquire influence over other men, tend soon enough to carry matters too far. It was all very well to fascinate the Prince with cywyddau brud about the crowning of a Welshman in London; but when the present crowned King of that city sent the famous Talbot into Gwent, and Rhys Gethin's faithful troops had to oppose him, it was less of a pleasure to Owen to puzzle out riddling oracles to the effect that if the war ever approached the native district of "the divine Hopkin" himself, it would be the Prince, and not the prophet, whose life would be in danger!

This particular danger to Owen's life was — Hopkin ap Thomas kept repeating — to descend upon him under a black flag; and since Lord Grey of Codnor, a formidable namesake of the now impoverished Grey of Ruthin, did actually carry some "quarterings" that were, in heraldic language, sable, this "black flag" soon began to get upon Owen's nerves.

Grey of Codnor was as troublesome a King's man as were Talbot and Grendor; and it was upon this sable streak in the Codnor escutcheon that the Prince was meditating now as he sat in his "magician's chamber." He decided to let his son Griffith and his brother Tudor face the sable arms of the Lord of Codnor, while he himself took command of the forces collected by Henry Don and Rhys Ddu to oppose Talbot and Grendor.

It was towards the Usk rather than towards the Tawy that Codnor was now advancing; and it was due to this fact, as Owen sat alone, that there began to insinuate itself into his mind his first serious doubt as to the integrity of his new friend! "The divine Hopkin" had only yesterday informed him that he'd been inspired with a new prophecy about the victorious "virgin in armour". He had hinted that it might refer to some native Welsh maid; and Owen, as he gazed at his smouldering logs, conceived the not unnatural idea that it must apply to none other than the Maid of Edeyrnion. This idea, as soon as it entered his head, absorbed him so much that he completely forgot the passing of time.

As he gazed into his fire the image of Mad Huw's Maid — whose legend had now, though the girl herself seemed quite oblivious of it, spread from the north to the south — clothed in bright armour, mounted on his own Seisyll, leading his troops in their victory over these Talbots and Grendors, began to dominate his imagination. That's what he wanted, that's what Wales wanted at this juncture, some moving bardic symbol, at once poetic and religious! What was the use of being the acknowledged Prince of Wales from Môn to Gwent, when at a word from Worcester or Hereford these accurst Grendors and Codnors could penetrate as far as the Usk?

The Abbot of Caerleon, it was true, was there to resist them, and a great patriot was he, but if only by the Abbot's side could appear a figure such as his imagination now conjured up, the figure of a Maid in whom all the heroic traditions of Welsh womanhood were embodied, the English wouldn't have a castle left in the land!

"I'd be then," he thought, "what I'm not yet, for all their flattery. I'd be a real sovereign of a free people!" He moved from the window and began pacing the room. "Dewi Sant!" he thought. "What a fool I've been not to think of this before! It'll enrapture Mad Huw. It'll bring the whole country round us! It'll do me more good than any pact with Benedict or any league with France. By God! That's what I'll do. Into your armour, Tegolin Goch! Into your armour, Tegolin Bach! So I'm not to put a foot on your damned Gower, eh, Master Hopkin? And I'm to perish under a black flag, am I? Well, we'll set word against word, and it shall be a Welsh virgin who shall drive the English out of Wales!"

He moved to the door and opened it. There sat Glew the Gryd, faithful as ever, silent as ever, and still, for all his fourscore years, polishing his great war-axe with an especial piece of holy stone.

“Anyone been here?”

“Only the Tawy man.”

“What did you tell him?”

“I told him you were calling up such spirits as he’d never seen nor ever would see, and that you couldn’t be troubled to-night.”

“Anyone else?”

“Only that white-faced French boy.”

“You didn’t send him away — after what I told you?”

“No, Owen ap Griffith Fychan.”

“What did you do?”

“Nothing, my Prince.”

“What did you say?”

“Nothing, my Prince.”

“And so he just went?”

“Yes, my Prince. When I looked up again there was nobody there, my Prince.”

“Has the guard at the end of the passage been changed yet?”

“Twice.”

“Mother of God, Glew! how long have I been calling up spirits?”

“I don’t know, my Prince.”

“Has the man from Bangor been here?”

“Three times, my Prince.”

Owen stroked his beard. “And the Friar Preacher from France — what’s his name? — Hugh Eddouyer?”

“Just gone, my Prince.”

“How long did he wait?”

“An hour or so, my Prince. He sat with me and talked.”

Owen looked down the passage. “Do you think he’s talking to the guard?”

“Yes, my Prince.”

“Go and fetch him, Glew. Tell him I’ll see him now. And make them send up some more logs, will you, Glew, and some more wine and goblets. Let them be alder-logs, Glew; and tell them the wine of Provence!”

Owen wasn’t long, as he sat opposite the much-travelled emissary from Benedict the Eighth, in taking a fancy to the man. “Jesu Maria!” he thought, “what a different fellow from that popinjay of an Italian who brought the indult from Rome when Iolo died!”

Hugh Eddouyer looked indeed, as he bent over the aromatic smoke of the alder-wood and sipped that rich wine of Provence, a rare specimen of his order. With a bright eye beneath a bulging brow, with thick lips forever twitching with ironic merriment, with a sandy beard that wagged as he jested, there was something in him, from his pilgrim indifference about his patched habit and frayed sandals to the careless way he rubbed his uncomely features with the palms of his hands, that inspired belief in his fundamental honesty.

It soon became clear to Owen that the man had a genuine respect for his master Benedict and an authentic belief that any nation that transferred its allegiance from Rome to Avignon would receive much more generous pontifical care than it could hope to get from Rome.

“You don’t object, Sire,” he was saying now, “if I show to King Charles — that is, if he’s well enough to attend to business — these little points we’ve just jotted down for the Holy Father?”

“Not at all, not all! The most Christian King is, or soon will be, our staunch ally against this tottering House of Lancaster. Show him everything! Keep nothing from him! Is he, may I ask, a sensible man when his infirmity leaves him?”

Hugh Eddouyer rubbed his broad nose and corrugated brow. “I couldn’t talk to him as I talk to you, Sire, if that’s what you mean. But I can talk to him as one talks to an intelligent — to an intelligent invalid — with flashes of fine intuition. I’m not at ease with him, if you understand, as I am with the Holy Father; but I feel — what shall I say? — a tendresse for him, a — a pulse sympathétique.”

Owen stretched out his long legs in their olive-green hose and surveyed his fantastically elongated slippers. A sprinkling of ashes had fallen upon one of these to which chance had given the shape of an “E”, and Owen’s thoughts rushed to the Maid of Edeyrnion.

“Read over the points we’ve agreed upon, Brother, will you?” he said.

The Friar, for he was short-sighted, lifted the document from beneath his wine-cup to where the light of the flickering lamp, swaying from the oaken beam above the hearth, helped his vision. “One,” he read out, in a voice intended to mock the gravity of a royal herald: “All oaths of obedience to the late Roman pontiffs Urban the Sixth and Boniface the Ninth to be annulled.

“Two: St. David’s to be a metropolitan church and its Bishop an Archbishop.

“Three: All grants of Welsh parishes to English monasteries and colleges to be annulled.

“Four: A Welsh University—”

“Two Welsh Universities,” broke in Owen with a chuckle, thinking of Master Brut.

“Hee! Hee! Hee!” laughed the travel-stained emissary. “Your gracious Mightiness has never seen a riot in our University!” But he duly made the correction and went on.

“Five: The campaign of liberation from the blasphemous destroyer of sacred edifices, Henry of Lancaster, to have the title of a Crusade or Holy War.

“Six: The Holy Father to grant plenary remission of all mortal sins, when, where, or how committed, for the duration of the war, to all those who fight on the Welsh side, provided they hold the—”

At this point Owen pulled in his legs with a jerk and interrupted. “Hold the orthodox faith, eh? But stop a moment, Brother. Suppose there arose — I don’t say it’s likely to arise, you understand; but suppose there arose a movement among us, a religious movement, perhaps in your own Order, for the Franciscans have always been our friends — a movement, shall we say, to greater freedom and simplicity in the worship of God? — would such a change, for Holy Church moves slowly in such things and Saint Francis had his opponents at first, ipso facto negate this blessed absolution?”

Hugh Eddouyer gave him a quick, shrewd, humorous glance, and turned his gaze-upon the burning logs. Then, after a moment’s thought, he lifted his wine to his lips.

“It is not,” he replied slowly, replacing the goblet on the table, “for a humble Friar like myself to answer for the Vicar of Christ; but I can certainly say to you, Prince Owen, that if I were His Holiness, and I have, up to a point, a certain influence at Avignon, the fact that the de comburendo edict, with all its implications of undue Dominican influence, has encouraged Henry of Lancaster in his subservience to a meddling Archbishop, would certainly make me lean to a milder policy.

“And since neither the word Lollard, nor the name Wycliffe, has passed between us, we may, I think, assume that as long as my master lives there will be no Papal inquisition made into the orthodoxy of your Welsh subjects. And as long as this is delayed there can be no question of anything but paternal indulgence to reckless patriotic brains, too occupied in their Holy War with sacrilegious usurpers to exercise that control over our erring human reason, which—"

"Enough, enough!" interrupted Owen. "We follow you, Brother; we follow you. His Holiness will have no occasion for burnings among our people. I can promise him that! Oh yes! And there's one other thing you might add to the points we've named." He paused to replenish both their goblets, looking straight into the man's eyes.

"What a strange face he's got!" thought the Friar Preacher. "They talked in France of his golden beard. It's grey now, anyway. Power and success! Power and success! That's how things go."

"The Holy Father," Owen began gravely, keeping his eyes fixed upon the man, "won't of course forget his faithful and devoted adherent, our learned and pious Chancellor Young, Archdeacon of Merionydd?'

The other uttered a rich chuckle, careless and roguish, straight in the Prince's face. "Archbishop of St. David's shall he be, my gracious Lord! Only I may as well warn you" — he paused and leant back, tilting his chair till his knees pressed against the table— "for I know the man as if he were my brother; once Archbishop, some of your good friends here had better leave the country!"

Owen tried for a moment to frown and tap the table and tug at his beard: but Master Eddouyer had seen too many hectoring princes of this world to he monarchized or brow-beaten; and his frank smile had its way.

"'Tis my turn, dear my Lord, to cry 'enough' now!" he remarked. "But don't forget the words of an old observer of spiritual magnates. Have a watch on the tongue of your worthy Librarian here, the good Master Brut. If he can keep his mouth shut, all will be well. But if not — don’t ask the Pope to make Young your Metropolitan!”

Owen stared past him at the closed door, and through the door down the passage, to where his men-at-arms were doubtless at that very moment talking gross Lollardry. Well did he know how there was that in Master Brut’s doctrines to which his Welshmen responded like wild-geese to the waters of Llyn Tegid.

“Have you had time in your travels,” he remarked now, anxious to turn the subject from episcopal peculiarities, “to note how few men there are without some irrational prejudice? You referred to my Librarian. Do you know, Brother, that wise scholar as he is, and a good tolerant man, he can’t abide our Castle of Harlech?”

“You astonish me, my Prince.”

“Can’t abide it; no, even though in a day or two his nuptials are to be celebrated in it.”

At this the traveller couldn’t restrain a sly grimace. “Perhaps that’s the reason.”

“Not at all. He adores the wench. The reason is that the place is soaked with sea-water legends. They say Bran the Blessed comes wading up with the tide when the moon’s full. Yes! A great ghost he comes, carrying on his back the ghosts of half-a-dozen bards. By the way, Brother, the moon’s full to-night, if my calendar’s not mistaken.”

Hugh Eddouyer shrugged his shoulders and turned to his wine. He had been warned on the Continent again and again that if he wished to please this strange new sovereign prince he would have to listen patiently to just such skimble-skamble stuff as this; but he couldn’t do it! He could put up with many absurdities, and in his journeyings he’d done so; but cock-and-bull stories of Welsh giants carrying bards on their backs — as if there weren’t enough of them in the place already! — were more than he could bear.

“I’ll tell my master,” he said to himself, “that if he wants to win this horned Welsh ram heart and soul to his flock he’d better send him not indulgences but a few books of magic.”

But Owen, paying not the slightest heed to the Friar’s lack of interest, rose from his seat and going to the window thrust his head through the narrow opening.

And in a second Brother Eddouyer, the Avignon Pope, Master Brut, and Chancellor Young, all were forgotten. What a sight met his eyes! The moon was full; and not only so, but the great brimming tide, carrying on its rippled surface what looked like an undulant highway to eternity, was bearing this moon-bright track close up to the castle-walls.

Owen could hear the splash of the waves against the castle-jetty. What this morning were rock-pools were now a portion of the sea’s bed, and it was hard for a man far deeper versed then Rhisiart’s Modry in the ancient tales not to behold riding upon that brimming tide the moonlit sails of the fleet of Matholwch, with the Irishmen’s great shields upturned in sign of peace, a swch y taryan y vynyd yn arwyd tangneved!

Peace? Peace? What prevented him now from making a final peace with Henry and ending this burning and despoiling? What prevented him? His own success prevented him! How could he stop now, when, if he went on a little longer —

But he had a strange feeling, as he stretched his head through this stone slit in the great wall and listened to the breaking of the waves, that all these blackened towns and ruined villages were the result of an enchantment, like that flung by the magicians upon the persecuted Pryderi; and that if only the clue-word, the exorcising word, could be uttered on such a night as this, all the waste-lands of ashes and blood would grow fresh and green again!

Moving his head, not without difficulty, for the masonry of the aperture grated against both sides of his skull, he gazed straight into that round orb of mystical whiteness. No, it wasn't whiteness! It was something for which there is no name. What he really felt was that there had been bored a great luminous hole in the swimming ether, a hole that resembled a hole in space; and that through this hole, and in his moon-mad fancies he felt as if the slit that was now scratching his ears was this mystic hole, it was possible to pass beyond space into whatever lay on the other side!

A real moon-intoxication began to seize upon him as he stared at that hypnotic rondure. No, it wasn't white at all! The night was white but this was different. There must be droves of gleaming fish below that moon-path drawn landward against all reason. What heavenly madness to plunge forward at the pull of that ravishing radiance!

There were certainly mother-of-pearl shells down there, deep down below those heaving undulations, which had fish within them, fish who were struggling to leave their protection, struggling to be caught up in that moon-tide, even though it meant death!

And how well he knew what the sea-weeds felt down there who were yearning, quivering, trembling upward; every drop of their oozy sap drawn upward, drawn with maddeningly-sweet spasms upward, to the moon-drenched ripples on the surface!

Tearing his dizzy eyes from that circle of circles, he could see in the moonlight some great somnolent sea-bird rocking up and down on the illuminated tide.

To his moon-drugged fancy the eye of this bird met his own. “What human greybeard is that,” the seagull's eye seemed to say to him, “straining like the fin-backs in their shoals, like the shell-fish in their shells, like millions of sea-weeds, like millions of sea-worms, towards our goddess, our darling, the great Whore of Eternity?”

If that rocking seagull had been endowed with the eye of a sea-hawk instead of with the round, simple, greedy eye of a goosander, it would doubtless, after its fashion, have registered astonishment at the appearance of that protruding white neck and well-combed beard thrust out from the huge embattled front of that sea-castle.

And if it caught the moon’s white glint upon the golden band round the skull of that outstretched head, it might have whistled softly to itself: “Whirrraroo! It’s Manawydan fab LJyr come to life again! Whirrraroo! Whirrraroo! We shall all be safe now from the clutches of Llwyd fab Kil Coet!”

To the round, mild, greedy-idiot eye of this simple goosander, whose personality reproduced to the smallest particular that of its ancestors of two thousand years ago, it appeared obvious that there was a sea-king in Harlech. The bird regarded the phenomenon of moonlight in two distinct ways; and it expressed this difference by the pose of its head. With its head erect, its view of such a night as this was grossly realistic. Shoals of fins and tails came crowding into the shallows that as a rule fluttered and waved and flapped and squirmed in unfathomable depths. Now the wakeful and contemplative goosander wasn’t a fish-eater; but there were certain small creatures that the fish brought up with them from the fathomless ooze, not to speak of certain minute sea-floor weeds broken from their roots by this lunar migration and rising as if by their own volition, which left an unequalled after-taste in its fastidious gullet.

But at this moment the goosander tilted its head a little to one side as it contemplated the huge grey front of Harlech and that solitary human skull projected from the centre of it; and the tilting of its head meant a more recondite train of thought. For there floated into its simple intelligence race-memories of sea-castles and sea-kings of thousands of years ago.

It had been driven from the north in search of unfrozen marshes and estuaries; but it already was conscious of more warmth than it liked, and it had decided a week ago that soon it would have to fly northward again.

But that head with its strong white neck and its forked beard and its golden circlet evoked strange, weird, obscure feelings in him. He didn't make any attempt to tell himself that the goosanders and mergansers of the early days of the world had seen just such persons, staring out of stone battlements over moonlit seas; but an indescribable feeling quivered through the roots of his feathers.

And the goosander's ecstasy only increased, as long as he kept his head tilted a little to one side, when the sea-foam swirling about the rocks grew still whiter in the moonlight, when the sea-anemones in the lost rock-pools, and the star-fish in the submerged shallows, and the sea-weeds in the furrows of the sea-floor, all grew white, white with a whiteness like the breasts of sea-queens, white with a whiteness that to the goosander's arctic blood was a beauty so extreme that it resembled the passing from love to death!

Thus did Owen's thoughts on that night of the Purification of the Virgin mingle with the thoughts of the goosander, and the goosander's thoughts with his.

And though the Prince forgot those eight hundred men-at-arms and those six hundred cross-bowmen, and those thousand and one light-armed troopers that Gilles de Pirogue had sworn were already assembled at Brest, and though he forgot the envoy from Bangor with his "Tripartite Pact", and though he forgot the danger to Master Brut of a Welsh Archbishop, there was something in this white night that brought Hopkin's cywydd brud about a Maid crowning a King most vividly to his mind. He had been extremely impressed by the beauty of Tegolin when she re-appeared at his court. "Her skin," he'd quoted to himself when he first saw her again after those eventful years, "is whiter than the spray of the meadow fountains."

The Friar's Maid had indeed blossomed forth from a brave, athletic, boyish wench into a surpassingly lovely girl. He hadn't seen much of her since she arrived; but what he had seen had stirred his senses and troubled his mind. The girl puzzled him completely. What were the actual relations between her and the mad Friar? The man clearly worshipped her, depended upon her, watched her every movement. Could it be said that after his own crazy fashion he was in love with her? The Prince caught himself indulging, more often than his reason or conscience approved, in all manner of unbridled thoughts. What, for instance, were her relations with Rhisiart? Here again Owen found himself baffled. They seemed to understand each other perfectly — that at least was evident; and it was evident that the two were entirely at ease with each other, and that the Maid had a strong protective feeling for the young man. But the Prince didn't fail to notice that it was towards Lady Mortimer rather than to the red-haired girl that the Secretary's eyes would turn when the three were together.

But — for the boy was a man now — perhaps he realized that he was being watched! It was still Owen's habit to analyse every flicker of emotion that came and went within him. To his most scandalous and shameless thoughts he always allowed free scope, merely noting with an inward ironic comment where his reason or his conscience disapproved.

His conscience, not his reason, had protested in the matter of Catharine's marriage; but he observed with sardonic interest that the feeling for his daughter which had killed all other wandering thoughts, from the Snowdon days to the days in Rhys Ddu’s forest, changed completely with the birth of her children. And how queer that was! Rhisiart apparently felt nothing of this reaction. His attitude, self-controlled and dignified as it was, seemed to have suffered no change; whereas — Yes! this moonlit sea, this white night, was certainly putting strange thoughts into his mind. A Maid in armour crowning a King! And that other cywydd brud of Hopkin’s, of a Welshman being crowned in London. Well! He had sacrificed himself and his children for Wales. Did the gods of his race intend to reward him with a triumphal entry — he and his French allies — into Lud’s town?

Were the Gwynedd lions destined to wave over that White Tower whither they’d carried Bran’s head from this very spot? How white Tegolin’s skin was — whiter than Catharine’s! They say it often happens so with red-haired maids.

But this Maid’s hair was more than red. Couleur de flamme it was! Red flame over pure snow! But to put those white limbs into golden armour; to have her riding by his side over the border, through Hereford, through Worcester, through Evesham, through Oxford — and finally, over London Bridge —

And then to take off that armour; to unclasp with his own hands that cuirass, that gorget, those greaves — yes, yes, she should wear the very things King Charles had sent him. Never mind if Hopkin were a liar about the black flag in Gwent. There would be no black flags in Hereford, in Worcester, in Evesham, in Oxford! Hopkin was a great prophet; but all prophets could be false prophets.

Oh, when would the French come? That de Pirogue boy swore they were at Brest now, only waiting for the right wind. Well! he must conjure up a wind for them. But meanwhile — into armour with her, into armour! With her at his side he could defy even Codnor and his sable arms. Yes, she should ride with him to the help of the Abbot! She should —

It was the opening of his door, accompanied by noisy protests from Glew the Gryd, that made him withdraw his head, not without some pain, from that narrow orifice; and there before his eyes was that French boy, cursing Glew to the devil while Eddouyer talked to him as fast and with such a Provencal accent that it was impossible to follow a word!

To appease the indignant old porter and get him out of the room was the Prince's first task. Then turning to the intruder he found that the white-faced boy, when once he'd bent the knee and kissed hands in his foreign fashion, chose to leave his business to the genial Franciscan, while he himself paced in pregnant silence, his hands clasped behind him, up and down the room.

Owen signed to Eddouyer to be seated, and sat down in his old position opposite him, glancing now and then with some apprehension at this perambulating image of wounded feelings.

"He says your Secretary insulted him. He says he was experimenting on a couple of unwanted animals for the benefit of humanity — in fact to find the elixir of life — when Master Secretary set a monk at him, and when that didn't stop him, Master Broch also was sent for to bully him; and he bullied him so much that he had not only to disappoint the ladies who had come to study his 'méthode scientifique', but had hardly time to escape with his life by taking sanctuary in your Saint Chapelle. It was all Master Rhisiart's spitefulness, he says, because he caught this insolent clerk alone with the Maid of Edeyrnion. He doesn't blame Father Pascentius, he says, nor Master Broch de Meifod. They just believed the lies Master Rhisiart told them. He says Master Rhisiart drew a dagger on him, and if the man had been a gentilhomme he would have been forced—"

“Is this the truth?” cried Owen fiercely turning upon the perambulating envoy.

Gilles de Pirogue swung round, struck the heels of his fashionable upturned slippers together, and proceeded to make such a deep obeisance, bending himself so low from the waist, that his clammy black forelock hung suspended, while his slim form in its satin tunic took to itself the shape of a small but neatly-erected gallows, suitable for the execution of delinquent dolls. “By Saint Denis it is the truth, Sire!”

Owen made a haughty gesture with his hand as if dismissing to its play a tale-telling child, and the young nobleman, exchanging a quick glance with Brother Eddouyer, resumed his sullen march up and down the room.

It must have been by some leap of the devil’s own instinct in one or other of these Frenchmen that they introduced that touch about the Maid. Either the Pope’s envoy or the King’s must have noted, with a Frenchman’s eye for such things, the way the Prince looked at the girl. One thing was clear to Owen even in his agitation and that was that the genial, frank, friendly Eddouyer must have known this all evening, since they’d both been struggling to get an audience; known it and kept it as dark as if it had been the Pope’s death.

So this jesting tippler had the power of being your honest boon companion at one moment and the next of obliterating you from his slate! And although less interested in diplomacy than our friend Rhisiart, Owen did make a mental note that cynical and shameless bluntness could be the most effective of masks.

And what, in Our Lady’s name, had made them bring in that tale about Rhisiart and the Maid? Was the castle seething with gossip about her — about Rhisiart and himself being both in love with Mad Huw’s girl? Was this the price you had to pay for being a Prince, that every emotion you had was bandied about among the pages? "After Catharine, Tegolin!" Was that what they said? The Master and Man once again peering and spying and stealing marches on each other! Ho! ho! the Prince and his Secretary! Oh, the rare tale to spread through the bythynnod of Wales from Aberfraw to Gwent!

Tell me more of this, Brother Eddouyer, tell me more of this! Exactly how did you find them together? Was he combing her red hair? Was she sitting on his knee? Clerk Rhisiart has free entrance where Prince Owen must pass by! Dewi Sant! 'Tis like one of those bawdy ditties that that rollicking rogue of The Cuckoo and the Nightingale used to trilla-lirra on his sweet tongue, to tickle the kitchen-knaves at Rhys Ddu's!

While these disturbing thoughts jigged and jangled in his mind, the triumphant ruler of Wales was pretending to listen to all manner of further innuendoes about his Secretary, conveyed to him through the smiling wine-stained lips of the envoy of Benedict.

"I must never be fooled again," he was saying to himself, "by this honest, too honest, knave of hearts! This fellow looks me in the eyes like a downright truth-teller; but I know he's lying."

There came a moment presently, however, when — Owen couldn't have said how — the Pope's envoy and the King's envoy were standing side by side at the door. And then he realized what, with his head full of moonlight, he hadn't grasped before, what indeed was so serious that he had pushed it to the back of his brain, namely that Eddouyer had been for some while outlining in a most disconcerting manner what he would have to report to the King of France's Pope with regard to the treatment received by the said King's ambassador.

It was then, and only then, and not till then, that the full weight of the blow fell, the full realization of the damage, perhaps the irretrievable damage, that Rhisiart's quarrel with Gilles de Pirogue, whatever justification for it there might be, had done to this French alliance, this alliance upon which so much — upon which all as far as striking a crushing blow at the House of Lancaster went — hung and depended!

Never had Owen's mind moved faster than it did at this moment. He was de facto — save for a few castles in the north and extreme west — master of Wales. He knew at the bottom of his heart that if he confined his ambition to Wales and performed the ancient gwrogaeth, or homage to the crowned King in London, he could end the war; but Hopkin and his dark cywyddau had upset all this, had aroused larger hopes; and it was to these hopes — to the idea that with a great French army behind him and the Maid of Edeyrnion at his side he himself might be the destined Welshman to be crowned in London — that Rhisiart's quarrel with Gilles struck such a blow.

But it was precisely at a point like this that the strange resources of this man were quick to show themselves. In prosperity he gave way to the most extravagant imaginations. In adversity he possessed what was almost like the power of cracking the wall of one dimension of life and passing through the crack into another! Perhaps it might be said that he was too much in love with life, as a thing of more than one level, ever to succeed in the manner in which his royal enemy succeeded. He took life too seriously to take success seriously. Thus it was the destruction of Glyndyfrdwy and Sycharth that had sent him to Snowdon; and it was as an outlaw from Snowdon that he had rushed, like the ramping lions on his shield, from victory to victory.

And now as he stood there, an imperturbable and incalculable figure towering above the two Frenchmen, he kept them both, by the mere magnetism of his presence, waiting while he made up his mind.

Gilles de Pirogue shivered and looked down at his fantastic shoes. Once again, as in the case of Broch-o'-Meifod, this strange young man's soul melted within him. Indeed it spilled itself, through all his nerves, like bilge-water seeping upwards from the hold of a sea-sick boat.

The "torture-insect" in him was too purely evil not to be as weak in the presence of a great life-lover as it had been in the presence of a great death-lover.

As for Brother Eddouyer, his mind reverted to an occasion when travelling in Eastern Europe to obtain help against the Turks he had met the Abbot of a monastery in the Aegean Sea. He recalled how this personage, by merely rising from his seat and surveying him as if he were insubstantial and immaterial, had driven all the irony out of him! This island-prince was doing the same thing now; and he remembered how an astrologer in Salamanca had told him that the crossing of water was unpropitious to French diplomacy.

All this while the Prince himself was calmly indulging in his old trick of "exteriorizing" his soul. He was thinking hard too, but he was thinking from some point in the moon-light outside the castle walls. He felt faintly surprised at himself that he wasn't more angry with Rhisiart for this blow to his far-flung designs. "But I shall punish him," he thought. "I shall send him to the Usk with Griffith and Tudor; and I'll follow later with the Maid. Rhisiart! Rhisiart! Well, you shall mount your horse again and draw your great sword! You're a brave man and I've kept you too long at this lawyer's job. As for Master Brut, he'll have to manage his parliament and his bride at the same time! And now to unloose this knot by a little stage-play. Up from the void with your spirits, old conjurer! Turn your wheel, Fate, turn your wheel!"

The first motion the Prince made on releasing his envoys from the paralysis into which he'd thrown them was to cajole them back to the seats by the fire, and to pour out more wine. Neither of them wished to stay; but it was just as if they were in a real magician's cell, the exit from which was guarded by some cabalistical sign to which they lacked the clue.

Seeing them settled down to their drink and their furtive whispering, the next thing the Prince did was to open the door and give orders to the still deeply offended axe-bearer that he was to summon from the guard at the end of the passage as many pages as he could lay hands on. He himself remained on the threshold till the old man returned, bringing Elphin, now grown into a grave and comely youth, and a couple of younger lads.

"Tell the Archdeacon of Bangor I will see him at once," he directed Elphin. "Tell him to bring the 'Indenture' and all that's necessary for signing and sealing. Then go to Sir Edmund and Lady Mortimer and say I request their presence at once for a matter of the first importance. Tell Sir Edmund it concerns the Pact with Northumberland; can you remember that? The Pact with Northumberland."

When Elphin was gone he despatched another lad for Rhisiart and Master Brut, and the remaining one for the Maid and her Friar. "And tell," he added to this final messenger, "tell Master Hopkin I wish to see him; and one thing more — tell him to bring his brazier and his divining-rod. Say our French guests would like to see a specimen of his art — do you understand? — and use just those words, boy. A specimen of his art."

Spending a minute or two after these drastic orders in conversing so tenderly and frankly with Glew that the cloud lifted from the old man's face, the Prince re-entered his chamber, glanced round to make sure there were seats enough for all these people, and walked thoughtfully to the window.

"I must rage at Rhisiart," he said to himself, "before them all. But I must give him — yes! and I'd better give Catharine too — a hint of what I'm doing, so that they won't take it too seriously."

Just as he'd done before he now squeezed his head through that narrow aperture and gazed out upon the moonlit sea. There was that same bird! Was it asleep upon the long in-rolling waves? "It doesn't look like a sea-bird," he said to himself. "It's a marsh-bird of some sort, come down the estuary. How queer it looks with its head sideways!"

But if the contemplative goosander looked queer as it rocked in the moon-light, Owen's own head, thus protruded from that vast grey pile, would have looked to any human eye more than queer. It would have looked grotesque. But neither for the organs of birds nor of fish, nor for the less complicated apprehensions of sea-anemones, can we conceive the category of the grotesque as an aspect of life.

Perhaps never again, till in the revolution of time Rhisiart's prediction of the retreat of the sea took place, would a grey forked beard and a forehead circled with gold confront from that mass of wave-defying masonry the round atavistic eye of one whose race-memory went back to Caer Sidi and Carbonek. But even so, even if a forked beard and gold-circled brow protruding from an arrow-slit and confronting a goosander never repeated themselves through all eternity, can we conceive such a sight presenting itself to the world-spirit as grotesque? The world-spirit and a moonlit starfish on Harlech sands must share, we feel, the same attitude to such occurrences — all grotesque; therefore nothing grotesque.

"I'd better warn the Maid, too," he thought, as with more care than before he extricated his head. "I don't want her to think me an irascible tyrant at the very moment when—"

Thank the Lord! It was Master Brut who first presented himself; and since a frigid nod was all that French etiquette permitted a de Pirogue to bestow on a bibliothécaire of questionable theological views he was able to enlighten the worthy man in a few whispered words as to the whole situation; begging him to convey to Rhisiart, as well as to both the ladies, that the tone they would presently hear him adopt was political rather than personal.

The Lollard received these instructions with his usual equanimity. There was, however, a certain eager abstraction about his manner, as he lent his ear, which the Prince quickly attributed to the correct cause.

"I hope," he reassured him with a friendly smile, "that the ladies will bring Mistress Alice with them. I know you would like in after years to be able to tell your children of the signing of this historic Pact. And this being so, you'd better hurry back to her. She was dressed very becomingly at dinner, so no change of clothes will be necessary, but remember she won't like passing the guard alone; so be sure Lady Mortimer waits for her. And tell Rhisiart and the ladies that this is a political, not a personal meeting." And then, as he pushed him out of the chamber, he repeated in tones so menacing that old Glew jumped to his feet: "No, no! We shall disgrace him before you all! We can't have guests of ours insulted in Harlech! We shall dismiss him from the castle. We shall send him to the Usk, where the Abbot is hard-pressed and the fighting's heaviest."

As Owen returned to the fire, Brother Eddouyer remarked with an almost maudlin tenderness that it was a thousand pities such a useful civil servant's career should come to an end. "But better in battle than in — other ways. It's extraordinary how men who're not of very ancient descent show some bad breeding sooner or later. It's a very good custom in our French civilization not to allow a gentleman to cross swords with such people. We don’t even execute them in the same way, do we, Sieur Gilles? ‘The rope for the serf; the axe for my lord,’ is the saying in Auvergne”; and the waggish Friar, fixing his clear, candid, confidential eye first on the Prince and then on de Pirogue, proceeded — for he had discovered what topics best pleased the clammy-haired boy during their tedious journey together — to relate in detail various public executions at which he had had the privilege of being present.

Owen himself, like a great golden cat, began to move stealthily about the room, lighting more candles and dragging out more chairs. His brain had never been so active or his nerves so calm. Whether he would be able to undo the damage done by Rhisiart he couldn’t tell; but in some queer way he felt pleased rather than troubled by the incident. To be generous to Rhisiart while he publicly denounced him gratified some perverse irony in his nature.

“I’ll indulge it now and analyse it later,” he thought. The truth is that what Broch’s elf-wife would have called his Brythonic pride had been outraged all along by King Charles having sent a couple of boys as his ambassadors; and whatever the quarrel may have been about, he wasn’t sorry that this furtive youth with his dank hair and corpse-like skin had been ruffled in his composure.

“As long as he doesn’t stop their fleet from sailing,” he said to himself, “I don’t care what he does. But oh, Rhisiart, Rhisiart! You’ve done me a scurvy turn over this business; and I hope you’ll feel a little ashamed as you ride off to aid the Abbot. But I warrant you won’t — with your old sword and your old horse!”

He paused in front of a polished shield in which he could dimly catch the outlines of his own face. “What are you smiling about now, old grey-beard? The ‘Indenture’? The anti-Pope? The ‘Maid in armour’? Not a one of them!

But you're wrong, Broch, old friend, it's life, not death, that's the thing; and there's more in life than Hopkin knows, with his crowned kings and his black flags. If Hal Bolingbroke had all Wales at his bidding, the soul of Owen and the soul of that bird out there would still be at large!"

And there fell upon him as he stood at gaze, hypnotized by his own sea-green eyes, one of those singular escapes from the pressure of the moment that Rhisiart always thought of as his "attacks"; but when he did turn, it was to find Master Brut arrayed in a brand-new court dress — so Alice's lover as well as Alice had realized the historic importance of the 'Indenture' — tugging obstinately at one of his flapping sleeves.

"Eh? Eh? what the — Oh they're here, are they? Well — let me think a minute, Brut! My grandfather — and they say it was the fashion at Griffith ap Madoc's court — used always to have a gentleman of noble blood at hand to call out the names of the guests at any great event. Do you think — would you mind — it wouldn't be hurtful to your dignity, would it, my friend" — and he laid hold of the Lollard's satin doublet— "acting as our herald to-night? You see I've played chamberlain myself in arranging the chairs, so it's only to open the door and call out the names as they enter. I trust you entirely about the order of their entering. You know how it would be on the Wye. Let's have the same order in Harlech!"

The Lollard bowed gravely and moved to the door while the Prince informed the Frenchmen that a Pact was now going to be signed between himself and the Percies and the Mortimers, dividing England into three parts.

This brought de Pirogue and Eddouyer at once to their feet, and had the innocent goosander observed the gleam in their eyes it would have undoubtedly concluded that "England" was a wicked dog-fish about to be cut up to feed meritorious mackerel.

"The signing of this Pact," Owen went on, "which of course will be in accordance with our own treaty with France, will take place at once; but the moment it's over you shall see our blundering and ill-advised Secretary dismissed in disgrace from our castle."

The Frenchmen glanced at each other. "These savages," their look said, "can do nothing without our aid. Well! they'll have to pay for it!"

Owen took his seat now beneath the window, and beckoned them to take their places beside him, Gilles de Pirogue on his left and the Friar Preacher on his right. But once more, as the door was opened by the squire of Lyde in his black satin, these exiles from civilization exchanged glances across the Prince. And perhaps on this occasion there was some excuse for them; for certainly in no court in Europe or Asia would ceremonious entrances into a sovereign's presence have been made as simple as Master Brut made them.

"The most noble and honourable Princess, the Lady Mortimer," announced the Lollard in the precise tone in which he would have preached before Master Wycliffe.

"The most worthy and puissant Knight, Sir Edmund Mortimer," he went on. "The most gracious and honourable Lady, Elliw ferch Rhys — the high and noble Ambassador from King Charles of France, Jean de Pirogue — his Reverence Father Ignotus, Archdeacon of Bangor — his Reverence Father Pascentius — his Reverence Brother Huw and the Maid of Edeyrnion, and — and Mistress Alice."

Here there was a pause; while with many stately formalities and a good deal of what Broch-o'-Meifod would have called "bowing and scraping" this august company found appropriate seats.

The Lollard's bride, whose voluptuous figure was certainly shown to engaging advantage in a filmy rose-coloured gown, stood for a perceptible moment hesitating awkwardly by Tegolin's side; even going so far in her embarrassment as to imitate the shy little Lu, who in her bird-like fashion had taken a wisp of Catharine's fair hair between her finger and thumb. Thus Alice, with less delicacy but almost equal confusion, thrust her fingers into the flaming tresses of the Maid.

Even the two Frenchmen, however, were compelled to recognize a touch of civilized regality in the gesture and word with which the Prince directed the witch's daughter to sit down by the Maid's side.

"Hopkin ap Thomas ab Einion!" announced the Lollard now; and attended by Rhisiart, who, garbed in the robe of a student of civil law, was literally weighed down beneath the brazier and cinnamon-sticks and censer and inflammable oils of the great "Maister of Brut," there entered the chamber a figure so extraordinary that while Gilles de Pirogue drew in his breath, and Lu clung to Catherine, and Alice to Tegolin, a shiver of startled excitement ran through the nerves of them all.

The countenance of the "divine Hopkin" was of such a character that Rhisiart had long since assured the Lollard that the man's whole life must have followed the tynghed, or fate, which Nature had moulded into his physiognomy. He was as toothless as Chancellor Young, but he had a nose and a chin that were so prominent that the scurrilous pages of Harlech, watching him as he dined, swore that both these features plunged, in the manner of an open beak, into the meats he mumbled.

This singular countenance was now topped by a high-pointed cap upon which had been embroidered various terrifying symbols, while the black robe, through the slits of which his tight-sleeved arms emerged, was scrawled from collar to skirt with the signs of the zodiac. In his hand he carried a long ebony wand, the top of which bore a silver knob carved in the likeness of a serpent's head.

The Prince rose and indicated to this apparition the great oak-wood upright chair which he had reserved for his reception. Here the magician solemnly took his seat, his yellow-stockinged ankles and upward-curving slippers resembling the legs of a fantastic bird as he rested them on his footstool, while Rhisiart looking, as well he might, in spite of the Lollard's assurances, grave and gloomy, placed the man's paraphernalia in front of him and sat down by his side.

Meanwhile the Archdeacon of Bangor — whose face, as Rhisiart watched his proceedings, struck him as resembling the mask worn at Hereford Carnival by the impersonator of the Devil — had spread out upon the table, without bothering to remove either the wine or the goblets, a great fourteenth-century map of England and Wales wherein the projecting dominions of Owen were painted red, of Mortimer green, and of the Earl of Northumberland yellow.

Rising from their seats Owen and Sir Edmund now proceeded to examine this map, asking as they did so, a great many hurried and pertinent questions of the Archdeacon, questions that chiefly referred to the winding curves and disconcerting debouchings — marked as blue undulations full of whales and dolphins — of the river Trent.

Father Ignotus, Archdeacon of Bangor, as Rhisiart watched him from across the magic instruments of Master Hopkin, not only had the face of a mask in a morality-play: he had the voice, too. "Where on earth," thought our friend, "did Bishop Byford discover this youngest of Archdeacons? Can he have been a 'by-blow' of his own?"

Rhisiart felt as though at any moment this young automaton might slip out from behind both his voice and his face, and vanish in a cloud of vapour!

Whether it was the trouble on his mind about Gilles de Pirogue, or his proximity to Hopkin ap Thomas, or some unprecedented magic that was being worked by Owen, our friend now began to experience a sensation different from any he had ever known.

"It's the Prince," he said to himself. "I know him better than does anyone in the world save Broch-o'-Meifod. He has magical powers. He has all the powers that Hopkin pretends to have. He's punishing me now — in his own way!"

Whether it was the Prince "punishing" him or not, there was one person in that assembly who began to be seriously worried by the expression on the young man's narrow Norman face; and that was Tegolin.

"Is that blackness coming over him," she asked herself, "that he said he had when he drew his sword that day and when he climbed down that rope? No, no, no! It can't be that. His eyes are so bright; and he's staring so intently at the Archdeacon's map. But he's staring without seeing it. He's staring without seeing anything — unless — but that's silly! What's the matter with me to-night? But he does look as if he were seeing a ghost!"

When later that night Rhisiart was trying to explain to Master Brut what he really had gone through, he kept using the word "timeless". "I felt I'd got out of today and tomorrow, and out of yesterday too and the day before yesterday," he told the Lollard, who, while quoting comfortable sayings of Saint Paul, had his own private explanation of his friend's psychic experience.

"Did you feel like that before you saw anything or only afterwards?" he asked him.

"Oh, before, before!" Rhisiart firmly declared. "I suddenly felt as if the Archdeacon, and his map too, yes! and all of us there, were puppets in a masque that I'd seen — I don't know where!"

The Lollard smiled and sighed. “We’re all puppets of the great Predestinating Will,” he said.

“Yes, but I felt more than that, Walter.”

“Of course you did; you felt that our Lord—”

“I felt nothing about our Lord!” cried Rhisiart crossly. “I felt we were all parts of a — of a reality, Walter — that was like some — some timeless masquerade! There was a book in our library at Oxford, Walter, with bits out of Plato in it — not in Greek, you understand — in Latin — translated by a very dangerous scholar — so our lecturer said — but this was a piece about shadows on the wall of a cave; and it always gave me, when the man quoted it, the feeling that there was some hidden reality, of which everything that happens to us—”

“But who knows anything about this inner reality?” enquired the Lollard.

“That’s the point!” cried Rhisiart eagerly. “Whoever knows about it, you can be sure of one thing; Hopkin ap Thomas isn’t that man!”

“You mean it’s religious truth, that we can grasp if we want enough to grasp it?”

Rhisiart frowned. This wasn’t in the least what he meant but the worst of it was he wasn’t absolutely clear himself as to what he meant; but it had more to do with bards than with priests; but not with bards like Hopkin, or the Scab, or even old Iolo — not with cywydd-makers at all; but bards more like Merlin and Taliesin, if they ever could come again.

And yet not exactly that! Bards so great that they could discover the immortal essence which — in the timeless — lay behind everything that happened in time, and was the truth of it, and the reality of it, and, if you only were a bard great enough to catch it, existed in both the future and the past at the same moment!

Both the young men, while they sat on their bed that night talking about all this, had queer feelings about each other. The Lollard's face showed the passing of time much less than Rhisiart's. Remembering the causes of worry the man had, and from his point of view must be even then concealing, such as the de-virginating of that witch and all the tales about his heresies that Hugh Eddouyer would most certainly convey to Avignon, it was astonishing how youthful Brut remained!

Rhisiart, on the other hand, struck his friend as looking ten years older than he was, and this especially when he cast down his eyes; for then, in addition to his heavy eyelids, there seemed to wrinkle and fold and crease and gather certain leathery corrugations — almost like the scales over a dragon's eyes the Lollard thought — that gave to this down-looking something far more subtle than ordinary modesty, something indeed that was very formidable, and suggested that, when next that geir-falcon gaze was lifted, the glare of a great judge would blaze out!

But it was — and this made a deep impression on Master Brut — with his heavy eyelids still downcast that Rhisiart told him that night how he knew before the Presence uttered a word what the substance of his word would be; and yet when he'd listened to him in Dinas Bran the man had never referred to any river — certainly not to the Trent. "How then did I know," Rhisiart asked his friend, keeping his heavily-lidded eyes still lowered, as though to talk seriously about such things abashed his pride— "that he was going to protest about that particular boundary? Of course the way he protested was the way he would have protested, for that was the way he talked; but why was I sure it was going to be the Trent? Do you know, Walter, what it felt like when he did it? Like seeing a ghost out of the future! No, not a ghost out of the future" — and Rhisiart bent his head still lower as if his fantasies grew more and more humiliating— “like the truth of the present out of the future!”

Thus, hours later, Rhisiart described his feelings; but as he watched this equivocal Archdeacon and his great map it was before the man had said a word about the Trent that the thought of Hotspur came irresistibly to his mind.

“And what a thing,” he said to himself, “that when England is being once and for all divided into three parts under the complacent eyes of France, an event which affects our children’s children for generations, it shouldn’t be any Richard Coeur de Lion who conducts the transaction, or any Saint Louis either, but an Archdeacon of Bangor, a mask of parchments and seals!”

“By the terms of this everlasting Indenture,” the mask was declaring now, “the aforesaid high contracting parties, my Lords Northumberland, Mortimer and Glyn Dŵr, undertake to defend this Realm of England against all men, saving the oath of alliance which the last-named mighty Prince has sworn to the King of France.

“The map of the aforesaid Country and Nation of England, now displayed before you and before all men” — at this point the Archdeacon picked up from beside his map a little “sanctus bell” and tinkled it three times— “and henceforth divided forever before you and before all men and before Almighty God into three parts, never to be united again, shows clearly to all, and without question by any, how my Lord Mortimer’s dominion stretches from all the southern and western seas as far north as the Thames and as far west as the Severn; how my Lord Owen’s dominion follows the above-mentioned river to the north gate of the City of Worcester, thence to the group of ash trees on the high road from Bridgnorth prophesied of by Merlin to his sister Gwenddydd and commonly known as ‘Onennau Meigion’, thence by the old road running north to the source of the Trent, thence to the source of the Mersey and along that river to—”

But Rhisiart was suddenly too overpowered by what he now saw to pay any attention to where the Mersey ran! Apparently no other person present saw it, though everybody was staring at the Archdeacon’s map. The roots of his hair tingled, the flesh of his body became what children call “goose-flesh”; he clenched his teeth to stop their chattering.

His first instinct was to suspect some trick of Hopkin’s. No! the man’s black wand lay across his knees. Then he said to himself: “The Prince is calling up his spirits to punish me!” And what was that out there in the moonlight? He was sure he heard a long-drawn cry from the sea. Was Owen really a magician? But there it was — clear before him — and no one saw it but himself. Between Owen and Sir Edmund it was — its point upon the outspread map — the sword of Hotspur!

He knew at once. It was the “kind sword” he had seen in the man’s hand at Dinas Bran. “But he’s dead!” his pulses pounded. “He died at Shrewsbury!”

He shut his eyes for a second, telling himself that he was feverish, that it was a false creation of his brain. But no! There it was still — as palpable as Owen’s forked beard and Mortimer’s proud profile! He straightened himself, straining his fixed gaze. He knew where it was pointing. It was pointing at those whales and dolphins by which the Archdeacon had depicted the great river of the Midlands! He began to shiver. “Yes,” he thought, “he’s calling up his spirits to punish me!”

But suddenly he felt quite different. His hair ceased to tingle, his flesh became normal again. Slowly, slowly, the sword was fading away. But what restored him wasn’t the fading of the sword; it was the dead hero’s own voice in his ears. And the strange thing was, this voice seemed to come from the future as much as from the past. But it was Hotspur's voice; it was full of the dead man's impetuous humour.

But it came from a dimension so completely beyond the revolving spheres of this distracting world that it soothed him rather than troubled him. He had been, it must be confessed, disturbed by the Archdeacon's map and by those tripartite greens and reds and yellows; for, after all, though he had sworn to give Wales her liberty, he hadn't sworn to divide England between a Percy and a Mortimer to the delight of a de Pirogue! If this were a turning-point in history, as the Archdeacon declared, it was a deep comfort to him that this great and gallant ghost from God-knew-where — from some Shrewsbury beyond space and time — should utter such wanton, such whimsical, such careless words.

They gave the whole business a touch of the unreal as if time itself were unreal — and though he still smelt that mixture of an old bard's perspiration and an old magician's chemicals that emanated with such unpleasant actuality from the personage at his side — Well! whether that ghostly sword-point on the map and this ghostly voice in his ears were false creations of his brain or not, they certainly made —

'See how this river comes me cranking in,
And cuts me from the best of all my land
A huge half-moon, a monstrous cantle out!'

— they certainly made this whole spectacle, as he watched it now — the fair hair of Catharine, the flaming hair of Tegolin, Mad Huw's bewildered face, Hopkin's fantastic cap and yellow hose, the morality-mask of the Archdeacon — fall back, fall away, fall into remote perspective, as if it had all happened before and would all happen again; while its real significance —

But the signing of the great Indenture had begun; and first the Archdeacon on behalf of the dead man's father, and then Mortimer on behalf, it would seem, not of the little Earl, but of himself and of — this made Rhisiart's cheeks grow hot — of Catharine's children, and finally Owen on behalf of Wales, put their names to this division of the Usurper's kingdom. Well! It was over now. "And now," thought our friend, '"he's going to turn on me!"

But while the Archdeacon was rolling up his great map with the Indenture inside it there came a series of violent but erratic knocks upon the door, knocks that seemed to be resisted even while they were delivered.

Rhisiart saw the Prince nod to the Lollard, who, this time without uttering a word of ceremony, admitted a figure staggering with exhaustion, his face bloody, his clothes disordered, his hair dishevelled, his eyes wildly staring round the chamber as he searched for the Prince.

Owen moved impetuously towards him and reached him just as he staggered and nearly fell. He would have fallen if the Prince hadn't held him up. There was first a deep hush, then excited murmurs, then questions and cries through the whole assembly.

It fell to Rhisiart's lot, for the Wizard of the Tawy had only seen the famous Captain at a distance, to explain to Hopkin that this scarce-recognizable figure of defeat and blood and fainting exhaustion was none other than the notorious Rhys Gethin.

"It must be a great disaster," he whispered, "a bloody battle lost, or he wouldn't be here!"

Hopkin ap Thomas began hurriedly asking where the battle had been. "I hope," he said, "it wasn't in Gower. For the Prince's sake I hope so. Oh! I hope it was anywhere but there."

"And for your own sake too you old humbug!" thought our friend. But all he said to the man was: "Shall I help you carry your things back to your chamber?"

Hopkin ap Thomas surveyed him with angry astonishment. "But Owen ap Griffith Fychan asked me particularly to bring my things! He said he wished to see a — a specimen of what he was pleased to call my — my art. You surely don't mean—"

But Rhisiart as he contemplated the feverish egotism under that peaked cap could no longer contain himself.

"I tell you a great battle has been lost!" he whispered savagely. "The King and the Prince and the Duke of York and Codnor and Grendor and Talbot must be marching straight for Harlech. There'll be some fine trials for treason here soon."

Meanwhile Owen himself, leaving the wounded man to the women, was thinking bitterly: "This finishes me in Môn! I know those Tudors — they'll rush for pardon to the King!" And his mind flew back over the years to his standard-raising in Edeyrnion and his visit to Mathrafal. "What did the man tell me? That he'd brought that child Efa with him here? Mother of God! I'll soon have all the princesses of Wales in Harlech! What do they think? That Manawydan fab LJyr is going to rise up out of the sea to fight for us! He said something else, too. But how did he know that? John ap Hywel already out-manoeuvred by Codnor, and his people deserting daily? No, no! Gethin thinks because he's hit the whole game's up. But the French fleet — ah! that's the rub! A few thousand cross-bowmen, a few hundred men-at-arms, a few seasoned knights, and with the Maid in her armour we'll cross London Bridge yet. Rhisiart! Rhisiart! How could you betray me on such a night?"

Rhys Gethin had been conveyed to a recess by the fire, where no less than three of the women present were gathered round him; but Owen, standing alone, seemed unable to do anything but stare into vacancy.

The appearance of his wounded Captain — and a terrible instinct told him he was hurt to death — together with the news he brought, was a crushing blow on this night of all nights! The man had left the battlefront on the Usk to go to the aid of the men of Anglesea, as the English called the famous Druidic island of Môn, but Stephen Scrope, the King's deputy, had not only recaptured Beaumaris Castle but had defeated Gethin with such devastating slaughter in the battle of Rhosymeirch that every Welshman who bore arms in those parts had fled to Snowdon, while the Shrine of St. Cybi, the glory of Holyhead, had been carried off to Dublin!

"Well! it only bears out what the Scab's been telling them all, that by turning away from Derfel I've done myself a fatal hurt. But Rhisiart, Rhisiart, son of my secret soul, there's a double need for shaming you now! That fleet must sail — even if I have to make you kneel down before this devil of a Pirogue! Well! I must announce the worst to them! But the worst is in that damned Frenchman's black skull. He's saying to himself now: 'I'll stop that fine fleet!'

"But what on earth's my Maid doing? Leaving her Friar to talk to that other Frenchman! Things are getting out of control. The moon's gone over to Bolingbroke; and that bird, free as my own soul, has deceived me!"

But he began to address them all now, though Catharine and Mortimer were in such deep colloquy that they didn't listen to him. "There's been a great defeat of our people in Môn," he said. "Beaumaris has fallen, and the sacred isle's declared for the Usurper. Not only so, but it seems that Codnor has already surrounded the Abbot's levies between the Usk and Severn. It'll be necessary to change many of our plans. We cannot postpone our parliament; so we ourselves must remain here for at least eight days; but neither the Usurper at Berkhampstead, nor his son at Hereford need think that these disasters will abate one jot of our resolution. In three days our parliament will assemble — such an assembly as has not been seen in Wales since the days of Hywel the Good, nearly five centuries ago! And our answer to these Grendors and Codnors and Talbots and Scropes, who deem that a few lost battles can quiet our determination, will be to have ourselves solemnly and before God — and in the presence of such envoys from France and Scotland and Castille as are expected daily — crowned and anointed Prince of all this land between Môn and Monmouth, between Trent and Tawy! Yea, and we'll do more than this. We'll declare to the world, before all the nations and courts of Christendom, that Henry of Lancaster, falsely called Henry of England, is a blasphemous and schismatical opponent of the only true Vicar of Christ, our most reverend Father-in-God, Benedict the Thirteenth, now in exile at Avignon!"

He paused and then turned suddenly and unexpectedly upon Rhisiart. "There is one other matter which must be settled to-night. There has come to our ears an act of unpardonable discourtesy committed upon the dignity and honour of one of our noble ambassadors from France. I regret to say that it has been traced to some insane prejudice entertained against this esteemed lord by my own confidential Secretary, Rhisiart ab Owen. Stand forth. Rhisiart ab Owen!"

It now became clear that what Sir Edmund and Catharine had been so earnestly discussing had nothing to do with the wounded Captain's news; for simultaneously with our friend's shame-faced advance into the centre of the chamber Mortimer approached the Prince. But Owen — though treating him with the politest respect — wouldn't listen to a word.

Making sure that he had caught the full attention of the two Frenchmen, he went on, taking a tone that made his daughter's cheeks blanch and Tegolin's mouth grow round with indignation. "Rhisiart ab Owen, we must dismiss you from attendance on our person as squire of our body and from attendance at our council-board. You have heard what we all have heard. Our Captain is wounded. The Abbot is in peril. The best place for an ill-advised adviser is at the front."

"He's talking like a Tartar or a Turk," thought the Lollard. "This is unseemly. This is degrading in a Christian prince. This is the sort of thing to which the Institution of Parliament was designed to put an end. No self-respecting Christian has a right to submit to such despotism. It's nonsense to think he can have it both ways! If I were Rhisiart I'd mount my horse and ride off to-night. Why doesn't Father Pascentius defend him? Rhisiart says he saw it all! And why isn't Broch-o'-Meifod here? By the blood, I've a mind to tell Owen that if Rhisiart goes I go, too! That de Pirogue — Christ forgive me — looks as if he were predestined to damnation!"

But Owen was speaking again now. He and Rhisiart were facing each other in the middle of the chamber and a curious psychic struggle was going on between them, a struggle which Catharine and Sir Edmund were watching closely; whereas the magician from Gwent, indifferent to everything but what he regarded as a personal affront, was sulkily gathering his belongings together and looking about for assistance in carrying them away.

As for Father Pascentius he had evidently decided that the wise monastic procedure was to postpone meddling with the course of events until they clarified themselves a little by their own momentum; for he had already vanished from the scene. Mad Huw, however, had not vanished from the scene; and although separated from his Maid many of those present heard him say, as if to himself: “He’s asleep, he’s asleep; but beware of him if he wakes.”

“The envoys from our cousin of France,” Owen was now declaring, “cannot be permitted to leave our court without witnessing a full reparation for the discourtesy of which they complain. We must therefore require of you, Rhisiart ab Owen, a formal return to us of the Great Seal of our Chancellor’s Court, with which we had endowed you, and with which the recent Pact has just been sealed.”

As he spoke he pointed to the table upon which the materials for the transaction still lay; and from which the mask-like Archdeacon, for whom formalities of this kind were a second nature, promptly picked up the object in question and held it out for Rhisiart to take.

All this while between Owen’s brain and Rhisiart’s brain there was proceeding an exchange of telepathic communication. Owen’s brain was saying: “Take it, take it, you idiot, and hand it to me on your knees — and that will end this absurd play-acting.”

“You took Catharine from me,” Rhisiart’s brain was answering, “but my honour you shall never take! This means an apology to that devil over there and I’ll die before I give it!”

Like two thunder-clouds, full of electricity of equal force, the willpower of the Master was confronted by the will-power of the Servant. But the damage that would have been done by the discharge of these electric bolts was destined to remain forever obscure; for an intervention came from a totally unexpected quarter. There was one person in that chamber who hated Gilles de Pirogue even more than Rhisiart had yet learnt to do, and that was Jean de Pirogue, and it was Jean who now came forward.

“Our royal Master, he said with a cold smile, “appointed not one but two ambassadors to this court. Quant à moi I shall inform our Sovereign Lord that we had had nothing to complain of here; and what is more, I can assure you, most mighty Prince de Galles, that King Charles knew very well what he was doing when he gave your humble servant lettres de créance plénipotentiaire equal to those of my cousin!"

Both the Prince and his Secretary drew a deep breath. "Saved!" thought Owen. "The fleet will sail."

"Saved!" thought Rhisiart, "and I didn't apologize!"

It was, however, with a sigh of disappointment that the Archdeacon allowed his outstretched hand, holding the Great Seal of the Principality, to sink down. "They're like a pack of women," he groaned. "Not a thing, not a thing can they do in order and in decency. I was a fool to leave the King's service. He knew what business is, and that's why—"

A few minutes later as Rhisiart was hurrying down the passage he heard the voice of Elliw ferch Rhys behind him. The little lady was alone and beckoning to him. "They're all busy over their own affairs," she said, "and none of them thinks of Meredith lying there. Griffith ab Owen and John Hanmer are with the Arglwyddes; Crach Ffinnant's with Mistress Lowri and Master Simon. Poor boy, lying there alone! He must feel the castle's full of rumours and alarms, and there's no one but me to tell him the news; and I never can get things straight. Please, please, Master Rhisiart, come with me to him! It's not behoveful anyway that I should wander about at this hour and the place full of refugees from the battle! Oh, why can't they leave us alone in our own boundaries, and we leave them alone in theirs? That's what puzzles me." And laying her infinitessimal leaf of a hand upon Rhisiart's arm and clinging so closely to him that her loose mass of mouse-coloured hair entangled itself in the dagger on his hip, she went on murmuring in her low querulous voice, that was like the wind in a wisp of grass on an exposed buttress, about how both she and Meredith thought that if only the Prince would keep out of England the King would keep out of Wales. "Why doesn't he sign a treaty with England? That's what we think. We think this wily Archdeacon's a mere tool of Henry's to lure us to destruction! What do we want with 'Tripartite Indentures'? Why can't the Prince do homage to the King, as they did in the days of Harold the Saxon and William the Bastard? Oh do look what's coming, Master Rhisiart—" and she pulled him back against the wall to permit a stretcher to be carried past. "The Maid sent for that — I heard her tell Alice to tell old Glew — It's for the Captain — he's got a bit of broken steel in his side — the Maid thinks he's worse than they know. She thinks of everything, the Maid does!

"Did you notice how she was talking to that fair-haired Frenchman before he came up to you and the Prince? What a world a great castle like this is! I've never been in one before. Do you think the White Castle in London's as big as this? You don't mind my chattering, Master Rhisiart? I never used to do it. I never spoke to anyone. But it tires Meredith to talk, and so I talk. Besides you're his friend. You and Master Brut are the only friends he has. And Master Brut's always with Alice now. Do you like Alice? Meredith and I haven't made up our minds whether we do or not. Oh yes, and I've always wanted a chance of asking you something, something very personal and very important, but I expect I'd better not ask you now; for you're — What is it, Master Rhisiart? No! no! Don't look in there! — that's where they put the dead before they know their names, before they take them to the chapel. Some of them are still warm. They came with the Captain. They just got here, and then went — like that! Father Rheinalt's been there all day keeping people off. They say he wouldn't let Mistress Lowri come near them. You don't like her, do you, Master Rhisiart? Meredith called her an Ellylles once, but I wouldn't have that — it's too like my own name!

“No! no! Take me on! I don’t want to look any more. He! Oh he’s nobody. He’s not a person. It isn’t him I mind. Catharine can’t bear him, but I don’t mind him at all! He’s what I often used to think about at home. I used to think I’d like him to do that for me when I was dead! There! He’s doing it for that dead boy! You needn’t be afraid, Master Rhisiart. He’s only eating bits of meat and bread laid on the boy’s chest. With a girl they put it between her breasts. I’ve never thought I’d mind the feeling of it. He mustn’t touch it with his fingers, Rhisiart! Look how he’s doing it — bending down — just like a wolf! What’s the matter, Master Rhisiart? You look ill. You’re not going to faint I hope! ’Twould be no good my calling for the Sin-Eater if you did — unless you were dead; for he mustn’t speak to a living person, ever again for the rest of his life; nor must a living person speak to him. I used to envy him when I was at home and people came chattering — like I’m chattering now! Rhisiart — Master Rhisiart — you’re not going to faint, are you? Oh, please come on! I told you to come on before.” And she pulled so hard at his black scholar’s sleeve that she was fain to give a scream; for her hair was twisted round his dagger!

Her scream made the Sin-Eater look up from the bread and meat between the boy’s bared ribs. He must have thought this hook-nosed young student had brought the girl here on purpose, to enjoy her the more in such a place. But the lifting of his face made Rhisiart certain of what he’d suspected before. The man thus regaling himself upon all the sins ever committed by this dead youth was the nameless pariah— “the Droog,” as the lay-brother from Scotland had called him — to whom he’d given that bone of blood at Valle Crucis!

Hooted out of society for causing the living to sin, he now took upon himself up and down the land the sins of the dead. Reduced by the harshness of humanity to sub-humanity, he was now transformed from sub-humanity to super-humanity. From being a creature below human pity he had become a god-like being who bore human sins. From being a leper reduced by men to a condition lower than Hell, he now stood like Aaron between God and the Devil, turning the wicked into the innocent by taking upon himself their guilt.

And as Rhisiart stared into this wolfish mediator's eyes, and saw his mouth looking just as he'd seen it at Valle Crucis, he wondered how the creature had the spirit to move from one nocturnal orgy to another, being as he must be, weighed down by the sins of so many!

But as little Elliw, using all the strength of her thin arms, drew him away, Rhisiart's mind trembled on the obscure brink of something that made him feel that if he could only once more mount Griffin and draw his sword for Owen it would —

But at that moment a torturing, deadly thought came to him. Hadn't Father Pascentius been speaking with the very voice of God when he hinted that more good would be done by sticking his dagger into the heart of Gilles de Pirogue than if he cut off the heads of a score of Greys of Codnor!

And how easy to waylay the French boy in the intricacies of a castle as big as this! He could kill him and bury him. Nobody would be the wiser. The cousin would be delighted.

And all the future victims of the "elixir of life" and the "méthode scientifique" would be spared! He felt as though he could see a multitudinous procession of frantic eyeballs imploring him to use his dagger before such a doctrine of devils hypnotized the gullible crowd.

Why then did he know with an absolute certainty that tomorrow he'd be riding to Caerleon; and Gilles de Pirogue, unharmed, would be sailing for France? "There are certain things," he said to himself, "that for each man born are impossibles; and to put my dagger into this vivisector's heart — though my deepest conscience bids me do it — is impossible to me!

"What then? Well! I must just forget him, and forget those frantic eyeballs left to their fate by letting him go. Life, with such as he abroad, has no defence, no justification, no redemption. Well! I must forget such a life in—"

They were moving along an arched passage now, just above the third line of battlements, for as Lu had justly remarked Harlech was more like a towering sea-city than a buttressed keep, and they came to an arrow-slit through which the full moon was pouring her radiance. With the moonlight came a wafture of sea-scents, sea-murmurs, sea-brine. The girl stopped and pulled him to this opening. She had hoped to look out; but it was only her forehead that touched the base of the aperture.

"Lift me up!" she whispered; and then: "One minute! My hair's caught in something."

He obeyed her, and held her so tight that his narrow visage and sucked-in lips were lost in that mouse-coloured moonlit cloud. "She's in love with Meredith," he said to himself, "and I with Catharine; and yet—"

But he had forgotten Gilles's victims when he put her down. "Life," he told the next sea-window, "cannot bear thinking on. Broch is right — not Owen"

And then he said: "Mistress Lu, may I tell you what someone used to lull me to sleep with, when — you know how it is sometimes?"

"Say it to me, Rhisiart."

"Then they went on to Harlech — and there came three birds, and began singing unto them a certain song, and all the songs they had ever heard were unpleasant compared thereto; and the birds seemed to them to be at a great distance from them over the sea, yet they appeared as distinct as if they were close by—"

"Rhisiart!'

"Yes, Lu."

"Catharine told me that Tegolin's got a treasure-box that has only one thing in it."

It was his turn now to drag her by the arm and quicken their speed. For some queer reason he felt furious with Tegolin for showing her treasure-box to Catharine.

He vented his anger on the speaker. "That's what I can't bear in you girls!" he burst out in the very tone of the Rhisiart of five years ago who rode between the arrows and the spears. "You show each other everything!"

Lu laughed a little tinkling laugh like the sound of a reef-bell as far away as the Birds of Rhiannon.

"There's one thing we don't always show, it seems."

"What are you talking about now?"

"Our hearts, Rhisiart ab Owen, our hearts."

XVIII. THE MAID IN ARMOUR

THE WEEK THAT followed that eventful Candlemas, of the fifth year of Owen's proclamation as Prince of Wales, was a week long remembered by the people of Ardudwy and Meirionydd.

But when it was over and the second parliament of his rule had come and gone, the Prince's after-thoughts were anything but enviable. The great assembly only sat for three days; a hurried despatch of business that was due to the dangerous number of English troops now invading Wales and to the deadly strategy of the gentlemen who commanded them.

Both these disastrous facts were, as Rhisiart alone in the castle realized, due to the rapidly-growing military genius of the young Prince Henry, from whose headquarters at Hereford there emanated measures for harassing Owen that proved far more effective than any of the grandiose invasions of Wales led by the King.

The unfortunate issue of every one of the Usurper's own Welsh campaigns had begun to have a noticeable psychological effect on his English subjects. The impression kept sinking deeper and deeper into the popular mind that this mysterious "Owen Glendourdy" really was possessed of supernatural powers, and could call upon the elements at will to overthrow his enemies.

In many an outlying homestead all along the eastern coast, from Yorkshire to Kent, English mothers would make their children obey by the threat "Glendourdy will have you!" while terrifying rumours ran through all the shires that this incalculable Welsh wizard, in league with all the forces of destruction in the unseen world, had threatened to exterminate, by his devilish power over water and fire and wind, the whole English race from the surface of the earth. It was his friend Master Brut who postponed Rhisiart's departure for the front. The fearless Lollard indignantly rejected the Prince's suggestion that he should manage the parliament alone. He threatened point-blank to leave the lady who was now Mistress Alice Brut of Lyde and gallop off with Rhisiart to the aid of the Abbot of Caerleon if his friend wasn't kept at Harlech till the parliament had dispersed.

For a moment Rhisiart feared that they were both going to be clapped into prison; but Chancellor Young, arriving post-haste from Aberystwyth, allowed his toothless gums to emit such a pontifical chuckle at the mere notion of dispensing with two such competent clerks, till their gifts had been exploited to the full, that the Prince became more reasonable.

It was Chancellor Young too who on the very eve of the coronation got rid of Hopkin ap Thomas. This he achieved by a method well known at most European courts but not yet practised at Owen's; the method of warning the victim of a plot against his life. Hopkin believed and fled. Nor has any prophet ever rejoiced at returning in safety to the home of his birth more than this inspired but timid magician when he beheld the silver Tawy again.

Each of the young Frenchmen being anxious, though from very different motives, to return to France, they were the first of the envoys to leave; and they hurried off directly the coronation was over; the representatives of Scotland and Castille lingering till the roads to the coast should be less invested by Owen's enemies.

Neither the parliament nor the coronation created as much enthusiasm as the Prince expected. This was chiefly due to the impossibility of concealing from the natives of Ardudwy the melancholy processions of wounded men who kept pouring into the neighbourhood. It was also due to the fact that while the Prince’s eldest son was away fighting, and his son Meredith was still confined to his chamber, Rhys Gethin’s hurt proved to be a mortal one. The great Captain took long to die; but that he was dying seemed indisputable.

As far as Owen’s own secret feelings were concerned there was one aspect of this sumptuous ceremony that hurt him far more than the presence of Bishop Trevor and Bishop Byford could give him pleasure, namely the absence of Broch-o’-Meifod. It wasn’t that the giant had rushed off to visit his wife and children. It was, in a sense, worse and more startling to Owen than that. “If he had gone to Maen-y-Meifod,” the Prince said to himself, “I could perfectly well understand it. He’s not one for ceremonies. But knowing what I feel about it and the importance I attach to such things, it does seem really treacherous to the link between us to choose to remain perdu when such a thing was going on.”

It soon became apparent that Chancellor Young’s constant presence in the castle of Aberystwyth was indispensable from an ecclesiastical point of view. If Harlech was the base of the military operations of the principality, Aberystwyth had already become the centre of its ecclesiastical polity. And just now the proposed transfer of Welsh devotion from the Pope to the anti-Pope, rumours of which were spreading through the country, was exciting a perilous agitation in all religious quarters.

The secular Welsh clergy were on the whole in favour of it; the monastic orders, with the exception of Owen’s faithful adherents, the Franciscans, bitterly opposed to it. Benedict the Eighth had already discovered that it was easier to dominate bishops and bishoprics than to meddle with abbots and monasteries. He was helped, however, by the vein of cynical materialism in the character of the English King, which had led to sacrilegious despoilings on the invaders' side worse than any of which Owen was guilty.

The couple of days that followed the dispersing of the parliament and the scattering of the coronation-guests were days of weary anxiety to Owen and of violent altercations between his advisers in that still overcrowded castle.

The Arglwyddes kept imploring him to start at once for the Usk to aid the hard-pressed Abbot. Much as she loved her son Griffith, she had little confidence in his ability as a leader; and it was only the steadiness of her nerves that kept her from spending hours at her tower-window, watching in maternal anxiety the bands of fugitives who kept drifting to that sea-coast from the fields of battle.

Meanwhile all manner of messengers arrived at Harlech with news, some bad, some good, some obviously false, some with the very impress and seal of truth; and, by degrees, as he tried to sift truth from falsehood the Prince slipped into the cynical and fatalistic attitude of believing none of them, either good or bad.

Henry Don, he surmised, was still holding his own in Glamorgan, for the rumours from that quarter remained contradictory; and as long as he got no news of a definite reverse from Rhys Ddu he kept up his hope that that seasoned warrior was keeping the enemy out of Carmarthen.

Shropshire, left to its own devices by the King, who apparently had ceased forwarding Sheriff Burnell any further pay for his troops, had taken its affairs into its own hands and was now openly sending Owen money to keep his raiders from crossing the border; while Pembrokeshire where the English were especially strong had for some while been buying him off.

"If only the French would sail — if only the French would sail," was the constant burden of his thought. With the French army behind him all might still be well; for his English prisoners kept assuring him that the terror of his name had travelled from Durham in the north to Chichester in the south.

Mortimer had begun to be an anxiety to him, from his growing impatience to take the field; but in this point Catharine was proving curiously obstinate. She had heard of so many castles being lost from lack of an effective leader within the walls that imaginative ideas about being left alone in Harlech with her mother and her children till the garrison gave them up to the English kept obsessing her mind.

Owen himself was extremely unwilling to let his half-royal son-in-law, upon whose life so much depended, go to the front. When the French came, and they all marched upon London, it would be a different thing; but to risk Mortimer's life in some trifling skirmish in the mountains seemed ridiculous.

It did strike the Prince more than once, as he wasted precious hours analysing his feelings in his room overlooking the sea, that it was strange he should feel far more anxious about the fate of his brother Tudor on the Usk than that of his eldest son. Tudor was an elderly man like himself. Like himself he wore his beard forked. Like himself he was meticulously careful of his appearance. Like himself his favourite colours were yellow and green. Tudor ap Griffith Fychan appeared, however, some-ten years younger, when in reality there wasn't twenty-four months between them. In the last five years Owen's hair had turned grey, while Tudor's remained as yellow as when they were boys. The chief difference between them lay in their eyes. Owen's were sea-green, mutable, equivocal, whereas Tudor's were a pure grey-blue, out of which a natural goodness of heart looked forth, faithful and unchanging.

Not only was the Arglwyddes made indignant and John Hanmer irritable by the queer lethargy which fell upon the Prince when his parliament and his ambassadors were gone; our friend Rhisiart was completely puzzled. Though the uncharacteristic rage he had fallen into with his Secretary and his Librarian soon vanished, Master Brut would often leave his bride's bed, both early and late, and visit Rhisiart's tower-room, where both the men tried in vain to get at the secret of their Prince's mood.

But the explanation came before a week had passed. The day was Friday; and Rhisiart in his almost legal superstition, that certainly was more Norman than Welsh, felt it was only viciously natural that he should wake on that chilly February dawn with anxieties going round and round in the revolving cage of his brain like a procession of agitated rats.

Some of these anxieties were purely political, some were very personal; and chief among the latter was a queer intangible estrangement that had made itself felt since her father's coronation between Lady Mortimer and himself.

And now in that dangerous clear air of the hour before dawn, when the nature-nourished illusions, upon which the life of all living things depend, grow thin and transparent, leaving nearly bare that naked reality which the Great Mother so tenderly pads and plasters with her imperishable pretences, Rhisiart beheld in sharp, cruel, self-accusing outlines the cause of this estrangement. The ignoble truth was that his own passionate love for the mother of Rhisiart and Bridget had cooled without his knowing it! But of late one of the results of this interior cooling had been an accession of exterior demonstration; and through this sweet treachery Catharine's sea-green eyes had pierced, as the Prince's lance might have done, to the heart of his false gesture; and it was this — not that his passion was less but that its romantic demonstration was more — that had given her tone this impalpable accretion of bitterness.

But as he lay there, inhaling the vague salt-water scents and enjoying the pre-dawn breath of the in-rolling tide, he began to be aware of some unusual stir going on in the castle, a stir, it seemed to him, both down in the base-court and within the walls. He listened intently, throwing off his Oxford sheepskin, tilting himself up, hugging his knees.

No, he heard no bugle, no trumpet, no word of command. It couldn't be the English then. What the devil was it? Had he forgotten some February saint's day, some local market? Had Lemuel Livius of Burgos been the fore-runner of a host of pedlars? They did come in crowds sometimes, and not only Jewish ones; and it was quite possible that the ladies of the castle had kept their knowledge of their coming a secret, lest Father Pascentius or John Hanmer — or even the Prince's Secretary — might, in their masculine prudence, have ordered them off.

But the stir continued and kept mounting up. "Curse your blood, Walter!" he muttered viciously to himself. "You can leave your clippings and cuddlings to tell me how your witch has learnt three words in Greek; but now, when the whole castle's in an uproar, you must turn her about, and e'en at it again. Oh, the witch, the witch! You're lost to me, brother; you're lost to me from now on — and the Prince is lost to me — and Catharine's lost to me. I'll have to botanize with Father Pascentius! I'll have to add the hundred and fifth article to the Tripartite Indenture and illuminate all its capitals!"

He jumped out of bed and rushed to both his windows. How many times he had done this since his first coming to Harlech, only to find that save for a strip of the sea's horizon from one of them and a couple of mountain peaks from the other they revealed nothing at all.

With some trouble, for he was a bad fire-lighter, just as he was a bad swimmer, a bad falconer, and no kind of an husbandman; fire, water, air, earth, all throwing him back to his desk! — he lit a candle and placed it in the window, wondering to himself, even as the flame blew inwards against his hand, how many other lights in the arrow-slits of Harlech could be seen at this hour from a boat at sea.

But the elements were, as usual, in conspiracy against the Secretary; and his candle, quietly, obstinately, resolutely flickered out. Lighting it again and -placing it on a stone bracket out of the draught, he heard the familiar cracked-metal sound of the old chapel bell strike the hour. Was it five or six? He'd let the strokes pass uncounted.

But he began now hurriedly pulling on his black Oxford-scholar's tunic, his original faded one, half-a-dozen years old, and much too tight for him. Little Sibli — who had made herself responsible for his clothes — liked this costume the best of all he had. It must have been for that reason that whenever she saw him in it her wit at his expense became lacerating. She would run her little hands all over his body and call upon Luned to see how he was growing, as she declared, "out of his clothes."

And some instinct in him today made him not only put on black but reject every sort of ornament. His dagger, still without its sheath, was concealed below his tunic, and though he mechanically picked up a beautiful piece of red embroidery that Sibli'd told him she'd held against her body all last All Souls' night to bring him luck, he soon laid it down.

But since the sounds increased, and Master Brut didn't come, he decided to go down into the corridor beneath his turret and ask the sentry there what the stir was about. As he hurried down the winding stairs with the candle in his hand he thought of Luned, the damsel whom he'd come, by reason of so many queer experiences, to call his "stair-case girl."

"Mary, Joseph!" he muttered. I'm certain she's in the corridor." So certain was he, that there actually came to his nostrils that particular cinnamon scent which he always associated with this young woman. “She’s like the one in Modry’s stories,” he said to himself, as he pushed open the turret-door; “only Modry made her keep changing, from ugly to pretty, and this one’s always the same!”

No, there was nobody in the corridor — not even the sentry. “He must have gone, like me, to find out what’s up,” and he stood still, listening, and guarding his candle-flame with his hand. Mary, Joseph! if there wasn’t a woman, with a candle just like his own, coming towards him — and it was Luned!

The encounter was less astonishing than it seemed to him just then, seeing that the girl had come expressly from the other end of the castle with the sole intention of finding him; but when the actual cinnamon scent was really about him he could think of nothing else but this piling up of coincidence into what couldn’t be coincidence!

“I was thinking of you,” he blurted out, as they simultaneously moved their candles so as to envisage each other’s faces.

It seemed so natural to Luned that the Secretary should be thinking of her at five o’clock in the morning that she didn’t even smile.

“Kiss me, Rhisiart!” she said quietly. “You can kiss me as much as you like now, and — and anything else,” she added significantly.

“What do you mean?” he whispered, when he had kissed her.

“Can’t you see?” and she moved her candle again so as to throw her figure into full relief.

Rhisiart might have been less stupid if Luned’s figure hadn’t always been so lavishly developed. But, as it was, he gave her one quick glance and then stared at the wall, where their candles were throwing two monstrous shadows. These shadows — one of which resembled a drooping heron with the head of a frog, and the other a tilted wine-cask out of which an angel was peeping — seemed, as he stared at them, to have taken the whole situation into their hands.

"No, I can't," he replied. "But do look at our shadows, Luned!"

"I'm going to have a child, Rhisiart!" At this the angel's head sank back into the wine-cask, and the frog's head leapt up to the roof, where it transformed itself into a flying-fish. "Look at me, dear! Do you know whose child it is?"

He did indeed look at her now; for a wild rush of alarm shot through his heart. Was she going to father her bastard on him?

"It ought to have been Rawlff's," he remarked coldly and rather cruelly.

"Bend down your head, dear!'

It was clearly no use being bitter or unkind to this cinnamon-scented bundle of feminine confidences, so he simply obeyed her; and with what seemed to him an unnecessary amount of warm breath and of tickling locks the syllables "Elphin" caressed his ears.

"Does he confess to it?" he enquired, in his most business-like sheriff's-office voice.

She shook her head, "That's what I've come to you about, Rhisiart."

"He denies it?"

She nodded sadly.

He surveyed her from head to foot. How queer it was that just when the Russian's curst "insect" ought to have made all this engaging and exciting it completely deserted him and he could only feel towards her as if she were some great soft-scented peony bud, ready to burst prematurely into bloom!

"You know what's done in — in some countries — to girls in my state when the man gives them the lie?"

"Don't be silly, Luned! We're in the fifteenth century not the fifth. The worst the Arglwyddes could do would be to send you back to Snowdon.

You'd better go to Cath — to Lady Mortimer, and tell her about it."

"Rhisiart, dear—"

"Well?"

"It's not easy to say this, Rhisiart; but if the Prince is sending you to the war anyway, and taking Tegolin to the war himself, it wouldn't make any difference — I mean it wouldn't hurt you any more than you're hurt already — if you were to—"

"What — are — you — saying, girl?"

Luned now began to cry. Her candle went out, and she scrupled not to hide her wet face against his shoulder. "I've been lying awake," she sobbed, "thinking of this all the night."

He was unable to resist her tender gesture because of the absolute necessity he was under not to let his candle go out. Coldly, angrily, helplessly, he remembered the Ladies' Tower at Dinas Bran. How things did come round!

But her mention of Tegolin had profoundly disturbed him. "Listen, Luned," he said, almost beseechingly. "For heaven's sake tell me what's going on in this castle?"

She raised her head and stopped crying. It was an appeal to her discretion, to her superior wisdom. His tone was boyish and plaintive. Her protective instinct was dominant, and in a moment she was happy. She laid re-assuring maternal fingers upon his wrist. "It's Mistress Alice, not I, who's been helping her to pack. I've only helped Sibli with her armour."

In a single flash the whole truth revealed itself to Rhisiart. The Prince had out-witted him. He was going to rob him of Tegolin just as he'd robbed him of Catharine! He suddenly felt very old and very reckless. "He'd better take care!" he thought; and shaking off the girl's fingers he plunged his hand into his tunic.

"But Mistress Alice is so fond of her," he murmured, staring past Luned into vacancy. Nor did his hearer miss the implication that to fling the Maid into the arms of the Prince was anything but an act of fondness.

It came sliding into his mind how passionately Alice of Ruthin had courted Tegolin when they first met; and how he'd caught her that night at the banquet clinging to her form with a look of ecstatic adoration. It was incredible to him that so simple a matter as the virtuous embraces of Walter Brut could have turned her against her former idol.

"But perhaps they're like that," he thought, "and when once they've got a man they're ready to outrage and desecrate their girlish ideal."

But if Dame Alice's treachery was a thing to ponder on, the change that had come over Luned since she'd taken control of the situation out of the hands of their shadows was quite as bewildering. And this change was such a relief to Rhisiart that he found he could endure quite cheerfully her feminine gossip.

Every tear she had shed had made him feel harder. If the Russian's "insect" had been roused ever so little it would have been different; for then he would have at least felt a wicked substitute for pity — something indeed that could have been transformed into pity!

But between the cold distaste her tears excited in him and every margin of pity a great gulf was fixed; and it was for this reason that the moment she began to gossip — even about Catharine and Tegolin — it was such a relief to escape the most unpleasant of all feelings, unsympathetic disgust, that he felt quite a friendly glow towards her, and was prepared to hear the most scandalous revelations without being offended.

He listened patiently, therefore, when she went so far as to assure him that Lady Mortimer was going to have another child, and that only a day or two ago the mere shock of encountering the Sin-Eater in one of the castle-corridors had caused her to faint away.

"I've always been unfair to this girl," he thought, as Luned went on telling him the most surprising things. She told him, for instance — while the imparting of such knowledge, as if by a clever mother to a stupid son, completely drove away her dread of becoming a mother — that the Arglwyddes was extremely upset by this whole project. There had been a dramatic scene, she told him, between the Prince and his wife only yesterday, with little Sibli as eavesdropper, but the Prince by a crafty appeal to his wife's patriotism had conquered; and the Arglwyddes had consented to allow the Maid an official farewell.

In the joy of telling him all this, Luned so far forgot her own trouble as to allow him to re-light her candle; and it was thus quite a harmless-looking conversation that the appearance of Master Brut finally interrupted.

With Luned's departure, and the men's ascent to the turret, candles proved no longer necessary; and by the time the two friends had got Rhisiart's fire burning the light of dawn was filling the room. They had just begun to break their fast upon beer and bread when they were astonished to hear a furtive knock at the door; and on the Lollard's opening it they were still more amazed to see the figure of the Grey Friar.

There had descended upon Mad Huw a state of emotional trouble quite different from any that Rhisiart had ever seen in him before. If his own appearance revealed the passing of time, the Friar's did so much more.

Neither of the men before whom he now presented himself had realized this change as they were compelled to realize it now. In that pale dawn-light, Mad Huw looked like an old man. Before letting him speak Rhisiart took the precaution of descending the stairs once more and bolting the door at their foot. The chamber smelt strongly of a bitter-sweet aroma; for the wind blowing in through one window and whirling off through another kept the apartment clear of smoke but not of the taste of smoke; and this may have reminded Mad Huw of his youth. At any rate, in combination with the brown ale it certainly loosened his tongue.

The curious thing was — and both the men noticed it, though they took care to avoid each other's eyes — that the shock the Friar had received made it possible for him to keep the late King out of his mind. And once He was expelled Brother Huw could hardly be regarded as mad at all.

But if not mad, he was clearly very much upset, though his words were intelligible enough. Indeed their calmness alarmed his hearers more than the wildest incoherence would have done.

"It was in confession to Father Rheinalt — I couldn't keep it back — for Saint Francis says 'keep nothing back' — and the Father said I was to tell you. The Father said: 'Tell this to Master Rhisiart. He'll know what to do.' But — God forgive me! — I couldn't tell you. I couldn't! I couldn't! You remember when the Prince kept back the Maid after Mass? No, no! You can't remember, for you weren't there. Nobody was there but Father Pascentius and me, and the Father was thinking of nothing but a plant he'd left in the sacristy — you know how he is — sometimes he sees everything, but when he's got a plant waiting for him — But the devil tempted me in the sacristy. He put his head out of the wash-basin. He said: 'Are you there, Brother Huw?' And I said, 'I am there, Brother Devil.' And then he said: 'You can spy on the Maid and the Prince! You can hear every word, too; if you stand on the chair behind the story of Bel and the Dragon.' And I said: 'Is that the truth, Brother Devil Bach?' And he said: 'It is the truth, Brother Huw Bach!'

"So I did what he said. Father Pascentius was writing down like he does, the place and the soil where he found the plant — I know what he writes, for he showed me once, and got cross with me when I said he oughtn't to write devils' names in the sacristy — so he didn't see me go — but the Prince was holding the Maid's hand and making her cry. He was telling her that Hopkin ap Thomas said she was to wear armour. He was telling her he'd had Master Simon make that golden armour the French King sent him smaller, so it would fit a maiden like her. He told her that he'd had it taken to her room and that Mistress Sibli was to help her put it on; and that when it was on she was to come down and he'd bring a horse for her into the base-court — and that when she could sit on the horse, all glittering and golden, and the French were here, she should ride by his side all through Hereford and Oxford and Worcester and over London Bridge. Then the Maid said: 'Will Brother Huw be with us in Hereford and Oxford and London?' And he said 'yes'. And then she said: 'Will Rhisiart be with us?' And he said he didn't know. And then he whispered something to her and held her hand.

"And he held her hand so hard that he made her cry; and when she cried my knees shook so that the chair fell down, and when I'd got it up again there was nobody there. When I told Father Rheinalt about it he asked me whether I thought the Prince loved the Maid, and I said 'yes'; and he asked me whether I thought the Maid loved the Prince, and I said 'no'. And then he said: 'You must go to Master Rhisiart and tell him all you've told me'."

The two men stared at Mad Huw — this form so familiar to them that seemed suddenly to have grown old — and as his beautiful womanish eyes, now so unnaturally bright, met their own, they were afraid, not of his insanity, but of his sanity.

The Friar was now sitting hunched up by the hearth on a roughly-carved chair, while both the men were on their feet watching him. He had lowered his head and they were presently conscious that big silent tears were running down his cheeks.

Rhisiart's face had grown hard and stern; but his dark eyes were blazing. Thoughts, images, memories whirled through his head in rapid succession. Tegolin kissing his sword — Tegolin putting the orchid into her braid — Tegolin asleep with him under his sheepskin — Tegolin hand in hand with him entering Glyndyfrdwy — Tegolin's voice calling him "Gwion Bach" — Tegolin comforting him after the scene with Luned — Tegolin sending him his sword before Bryn Glas. And those words of Elliw ferch Rhys came to him: "Catharine says Tegolin has only one thing in her treasure-box." What was that one thing? He hadn't let himself think what it was! But he had known very well, all the while.

"You took Catharine from me," he thought, "and now you want to take Tegolin." All these thoughts, images, feelings whirled in such rapid succession through his brain that it was as if he'd been drowning. And when he came back to watching those silent tears of Brother Huw it was as if he had drowned — and then been restored to life.

The Lollard, too was quite clearly passing through some interior mental struggle. When Rhisiart brought himself at last to glance at his face, it was anything but the calm, unruffled face to which he had grown so accustomed. It had gone haggard and drawn. It looked almost thin!

A silence fell upon the three of them now, a silence through which they could hear all manner of faint sounds. The silence seemed to mount up from the sea and sink down from the sky. It flowed around and around; buoying up the sounds that floated upon it, as if they'd been relaxed swimmers on a smooth tide; and the silence mingled with the sun-sparkles, too, that were rocking on the incoming waves, and with the rare sea-scents that kept entering that turret window. But the sounds were what the silence loved best of all; and they rose from all manner of different directions..

They were casual sounds, drifting sounds, accidental sounds, without order and without cohesion. But they were the music of life. Some came from fishermen drying their nets on the rocks, some from seagulls along the walls of the jetty, some from cattle and sheep in the castle meadows, some from horses and hounds in the castle-yard. They were fainter, more volatile, more ethereal than the living things that uttered them.

A cock-crow was less and more than any chanticleer, a lamb's bleat less and more than any actual lamb, a horse's neigh, or a rook's caw, or a seaman's whistle, was a voice rising from generations of horses, rooks, and fishermen!

Fused together, these isolated sounds evoked a sense of the continuity of life by sea and land, a continuity simple, tranquil, universal, detached from individual hunger or desire or pain or joy.

Mad Huw, crouching by their newly-lit fire, lost the effect of this awakening; but in Rhisiart and the Lollard, as they stood staring at his silent tears, there moved and stirred an obscure home-sickness for the streets of their native Hereford and for the green banks of the Wye.

"Where is the Maid now? Is she still asleep?" enquired Master Brut. Mad Huw scrambled to his feet and wiped his eyes with the back of his hand. "She's putting on that armour," he murmured hoarsely. "Mistress Luned and the dwarf are helping her; and the Prince is waiting for her with a big grey horse in the base-court."

Rhisiart's eyes had such a dangerous expression in them that the Lollard laid his hand on his arm. "Did you see the Prince in the courtyard?" he asked, clutching Rhisiart tightly.

Mad Huw nodded. “My black angel told me to look,” he added, with a nervous glance round the room. “He’s holding the horse by the bridle and walking it up and down. It’s got that frontlet on with the black lions that Master Simon made for the coronation.”

“It’s Seisyll!” muttered Rhisiart. “Let me go! What are you holding me for? I must go down to him!”

But the Lollard only tightened his grip. “Was she willing to put on the armour, Brother?”

“She cried and prayed all last night. I would have come to you last night, but I dursn’t leave her. She kept saying, ‘Oh God, tell me what’s right to do! Oh God, tell me what’s right to do!’”

Rhisiart flung his friend’s hand from his arm with a violent jerk. But he allowed Master Brut to put his back to the door without any protest. Indeed he didn’t seem to notice what the other was doing. His burning eyes remained fixed on the Friar’s.

“What else did she say last night?” he asked, in a queer, strained voice.

Once more Mad Huw glanced furtively about the room; and he did so with such an air of seeing more than his companions that they both automatically crossed themselves. “She talked of the shame. She asked me if it were not a shame for a maid to be seen of men in the armour of men.”

“What did you answer to that, Brother?” enquired the Lollard, his back still against the closed door.

The Friar gave him a steady, resolute look. It was clear that they were now on familiar ground, the ground of spiritual discrimination, in the niceties of which every religious man is professionally at home. “I told her the truth,” he replied simply. “Because — because I am a man, and she — is what she is, is that a reason why I should deceive her? I told her that the shame, if shame there were, lay in the lusts of the heart, not in what we put on or take off."

Rhisiart's feelings were in too dark a whirlpool of disturbance to evoke many clear thoughts, but he did say to himself: "That's where his honesty betrayed her! He should have told her that it was a shame. He should have remembered the damnable and lecherous wickedness in the mind of Owen ap Griffith!"

But the Friar's answer so greatly pleased the Lollard that in his fatal passion for theological controversy he went too far. "But if," he cried eagerly, forgetting that an advocate who had just slipped away from a love-exhausted bride was scarcely an unbiassed authority, "if the sight of a maid in armour should arouse—"

But the animal-like groan that this nice casuistical point, thus laid bare, drew from the smouldering bosom of his friend cut his words short; and he turned his innocent blue eyes, full of bewildered sympathy, from Rhisiart's distorted face to the Friar. "What did she say then, Brother?"

"She asked me if there was any danger of violence to her chastity from the Prince's love."

Expecting every second that his friend would fling himself upon him in an unbridled desire to rush down and face this lecherous despot, the Lollard's cautious murmur: "What did you answer to that?" sounded like a violent and disturbing sneeze at the moment of the Elevation of the Host.

Mad Huw's throat was evidently swallowing something that resembled a large round marble; but once more his training in the cloister compelled him to pronounce the confessional truth. "I told her that a thousand angels of God guarded the chastity of a true maid; and that if she herself, in the frailty of our human flesh, weakened not, the heat of the wickedest passion would turn to ice."

"God forgive you!" broke from Rhisiart's twisted mouth; but the Lollard, from his position at the door, stared at the Friar in astonished admiration.

"He loves her," he thought, "and yet he can say that!" And the worthy man sighed heavily, knowing that he could never have uttered such things to his Alice.

The curious thing now, in that scene between the three of them, was the manner in which the Friar's companions completely discounted his insanity; and not only so, but from the moment he brushed away his tears with the back of his hand, it was Mad Huw who dominated the situation.

All Rhisiart's belongings lay about him in that turret-room; and though Master Brut had moved most of his possessions, which were not many, into his bride's chamber, he had begged him to leave him the Consolation of Boethius. And as the Lollard went on questioning the Friar, Rhisiart's eyes moved from Boethius to his crusader's sword and from his crusader's sword back to Boethius. Boethius made him think of Catharine. In fact the image of Catharine suckling her first-born possessed itself of the space — for in thought space is malleable — occupied by that parchment volume with its illuminated title. The crusader's sword, however, remained in situ, but its sheath disappeared; and across its naked steel lay the red braid of Tegolin.

And little by little his blind anger against the prince receded, ebbing from his veins as if it had been his own blood. In fact he began to feel dizzy and faint and, like the eclipsing form of the moon darkening a segment of the sun, that curious "blackness" he had known once or twice in his life began again to invade his consciousness. But he struggled against this "blackness" and overcame it; and as he overcame it there swept through him, emanating from the Friar as the man answered the Lollard's questions, a feeling as though they all, Owen, Tegolin, Mad Huw and himself, were bound together by a fate that was larger and deeper than any anger he could indulge.

The Friar had never grudged him his share in the Maid — and what right had he? In the turbulence of what was happening in his own puzzled heart Rhisiart began to be aware of a childish humility before the victorious tourney that was reeling to its close under that grey habit — the victory of a faith beyond his comprehension over a love greater than his love! He suddenly found himself — just as he had always done with his trouble over Catharine — instinctively rushing to Tegolin for comfort and help, only to remember that it was about Tegolin that he needed this support!

"Does he want her to ride with him to the Usk," the Lollard was asking, "or the banks of the—"

But the unmistakeable notes of a horn, blown loud and clear in the court below, came through the window, breaking into the man's words; and simultaneously with this came a loud knocking at the foot of the tower.

It needed little insight on the part of Master Brut to realize that some sudden change had occurred in his friend's mood, and opening the door now without any apprehension he ran down the winding stairway. He returned with a handsome young man who was no other than the girlish Elphin, promoted since the coronation to the envied position of one of the Court Heralds.

"Everybody to the base-court!" this proud official declared in a breathless and extremely important voice; though it was evident that his surprise at not finding Rhisiart alone had chastened a little the jargon of his heraldic office.

"Has He decided to show himself to his people?" cried Mad Huw; and this reversion to the man's familiar mania seemed so pitifully natural that it was down an almost unnoticed glacier-slide that his madness merged, for Rhisiart at any rate, with the spiritual authority of his recent tone.

"The Maid of Edeyrnion is going into the battle," announced Elphin. And as he stood there with the light of the morning on his tabard, and on its "four lions, rampant and sable," Rhisiart couldn't repel a boyish surge of exultation, couldn't resist the triumphant thought: "Now we'll drive them over the Usk, over the Severn, over the Wye! Now we'll have a Wales for the Welsh!"

But immediately afterwards, when this resplendent young person followed up his first news by proclaiming with more professional circumlocution than was necessary that the Maid's sword and shield were now to be blessed by Holy Church and that all the liege subjects of "Owynus Princeps" within the walls, who were not at present sick or dying, were commanded on pain of their Prince's displeasure to be present at this sacred scene, a ribald vein of Norman profanity in our friend was stirred to its depths.

"You'd say your lesson to a different tune, my lad," he thought, "if it were you, and not my Tegolin, who were going into battle!"

But when they were all gathered in the court; and Elphin had even got Meredith himself carried down there on what, not very long before, must have been a bier, not only Rhisiart's anger, but his Hereford profanity, dissolved and melted away. And the strange thing was that the same effect was produced — save for one single exception — upon that whole motley company.

Long, long afterwards those who survived the troubles that followed remembered that scene in the Harlech court. And whenever they did remember it a curious mingling of infinite sorrow and proud exultation came into their minds.

As for the soldiers and the old retainers of the castle, most of whom had known the Maid before in her simple page's attire, none of them had the remotest idea into what startling beauty she had blossomed forth.

The castle was crowded with wounded men and with refugees from devastated areas who had nothing to do but wander about in melancholy indifference, pining for burnt homes and murdered mates; so that there was not lacking in this crowd that weight of anonymous resistance to a magnetic current, which is always what lends volume to any electric wave, capable of over-riding such elements of opposition and of carrying them away with the tide.

But the most remarkable aspect of the occasion was the manner in which all the particular individuals connected with the Maid's life responded unanimously to this sudden apotheosis of her beauty and her character.

Even Mistress Lowri — and this was as amazing to Rhisiart as it was to the Lollard — had tears in her eyes as with her hand on Master Simon's arm she stood apart from the Arglwyddes and the other women, staring at her daughter as if upon a vision.

Had Rhisiart been in a less exalted mood he would have been absorbed by the sight of a vivacious and demonstrative girl to whom both Luned and little Sibli were clinging in fascinated admiration.

But, as it was, several minutes passed — for she had changed bewilderingly in five years — ere he recognized in this striking young person his old acquaintance Efa ferch Tudor of the tower bed in Dinas Bran.

It was clear to Rhisiart that the Prince must have planned all this and sent his instructions through the castle after his Secretary had retired for the night; for though the custom at Harlech was for the inmates to break their fast at an early hour, the Arglwyddes was rarely visible till the sun was high and Mistress Lowri never left her chamber till noon.

Broch-o'-Meifod, whose stature alone made him an object of wonder to the crowd of refugees, who'd only seen him seated in the banquet hall, looked even more of a cynosure than usual that morning, because in the bright February sunshine he had left uncovered his great hairless head. His own attention just then was a little distracted from the Maid in armour by the presence of Gilles de Pirogue's victimized dog, who, though still weak and limping, insisted on following his rescuer wherever it was physically possible for him to go.

And as if the dog's presence were not enough, Broch-o'-Meifod's contemplation of this curious ceremony was further interrupted by the presence of his revolutionary henchman, Master Sparrow, who, though obviously impressed by the Maid's appearance, was anxious to compel his master to admit that these archaic rites though they might have their mystical interest were totally unsuited to a war like this, which was a war of the common people against feudal tyrants armed with modern weapons.

"Everybody knows," he was protesting, "that Prince Hal has got several of these new pieces of ordnance-cannon, Master, cannon I tell you, Master! And what could spear and shield do, even if blessed by the Holy Father, against what cannon can fling?"

The ascendency which Broch had established over his revolutionary adherent was proved by the manner in which Master Sparrow's realistic opinions were now expressed. The fellow looked chastened by these recent disasters and by the sight of the refugees; but the absence of contemptuous derision from his tone was not due to this. Broch had been listening to him now for five years, and listening with so much sympathetic interest that the man's pendulum-swing between sardonic silence and bitter invective had changed to a more normal tone.

As has been hinted, all in the castle, save the watchers on the ramparts and the severely wounded and dying, were present in the base-court; and only one of them — and this one was not Master Sparrow for all his talk of overpowering ordnance — remained unaffected by the startling loveliness of the Maid mounted upon Seisyll.

This one was Crach Ffinnant: and he was already making trouble. Moving furtively among the rank-and-file of the crowd, joining one group after another of the more truculent spirits among the refugees, whispering bawdy jests to the castle servants and Derfel-threats to the natives of Ardudwy, he was doing all he could, and none knew better than he how to do it, to counteract the wave of enthusiasm that was now mounting up.

Remembering what Mad Huw had said to him about Father Rheinalt and wondering how Tegolin's begetter could endure the presence of the girl's fatal mother, Rhisiart kept looking about him to catch a glimpse of the man; and at last he was successful. The monk wasn't in the courtyard, but he was looking on. He was high up above the whole scene, standing in the shadow of a buttress upon one of the narrow stone abutments used for flinging destruction on the heads of besiegers. He was too high up for our friend to see his face; but the way he balanced himself on that dizzy ledge, with his arms outstretched on either side of him, as his fingers clung to the projecting corbels, produced an uneasy impression on Rhisiart's mind.

As for Mad Huw, it was clear not only to Rhisiart but to all who knew him — indeed our friend could see from the way the girl kept turning her grey steed so as to keep as close to him as she could that she too recognized the danger — that the Friar was in the familiar state of excitement that usually portended an outburst.

It was Father Pascentius who represented the Church on this occasion, and he was supported by a group of choir-boys from the castle chapel who chanted in their high treble voices the psalmodic responses to his solemn words.

"The Blessing of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost be upon this sword!"

And as the "sword-blessing" merged into the "shield-blessing," and as the "shield-blessing" merged into old Latin and Welsh war-prayers for victory, such as the whole concourse of people could join, it became hard for anyone in that assembly, save the unsubduable Scab, to gaze upon the Maid's figure without ecstatic awe.

And as the deep-rolling syllables chanted by so many voices rose and fell, in that queer blending of Latin and Welsh whose liturgical lilt, the bardic mystery embracing the Christian mystery, has such infinite seduction, the Maid herself seemed lifted up on the magnetic wave generated by the people's emotion. No one present had ever seen the beauty of a woman so heightened, isolated, thrown into intense and solitary relief, as Tegolin's beauty was then.

Owen had kept saying to himself all the day before: "No glory for you, old conjuror, but the glory of your Maid in armour!"

In his present mood, a mood that his subtlest introspection could scarcely follow, all the good in him and all the evil in him seemed to keep rising to the surface in one wild water-spout after another. What he was doing just now was making use of every mental art he possessed to reduce himself to non-existence by the side of Seisyll's new rider!

It is true that he himself was mounted; but he was mounted on the back of a horse he had chosen from the Harlech stables not for its significance but for its insignificance. It was a small dusky animal, hardly bigger than a Welsh pony, and though its back was broad and sturdy, it looked a commonplace nag compared with Seisyll. And not even content with this, Owen had rejected all armour, all weapons, and had attired himself completely in black.

Apparently he had tried to resemble some elderly master of ceremonies; but all he had succeeded in doing was giving himself the air — with his grizzled beard and ensorcerized eyes — of a demon-worshipping student of alchemy in some lonely tower in the Hartz Mountains.

Owen's mind had never moved with such pendulum-like alternation from pole to pole. The curious thing was that both these poles of psychic attraction were compounded of almost equally balanced ingredients. Nor for one instant was he able to stop the "tick-tick-tick" of his secret analysis of all he was feeling. He knew his longing to drive all these clever captains of Prince Henry out of Wales was as closely mingled with his passion for this girl as blue and yellow are mingled in the colour green.

He knew his Welshmen well enough too to be certain that he and she together would stir up a wave of sacred madness such as hadn't moved the country since Arthur's, or even since Boadicea's, time; and at the thought of this there surged through him a mighty afflatus of unconquerable power, as from the back of his dusky nag he gazed at her. He felt as if he himself were merely the medium through which some vast planetary force that was absolutely irresistible was pouring into the girl's form. He felt as if he were no longer a separate entity. He and his ignoble steed were melting into her and into Seisyll; they were endowing her and the grey horse with a supernatural strength that nothing could resist!

But what had he done with his soul — that live thing within him whose freedom from his body had been the secret struggle of all his days? This madness which was upon him, this dark power which was pouring through him into that white-and-gold form with its burning hair, took no more account of his soul than of a moth burnt in a torch!

He had no soul. But even as he moved closer towards her — his mind so deadly clear — it seemed to him as if against all his purpose and in spite of all his desire his will were bringing his soul back from God-knows-where.

“Yes, yes,” he thought, coldly and cruelly, “if I had the will to let her go, and to let this supreme chance of victory go, it would be a proof to me forever that my soul is outside my body and is able to be as free as that goosander I saw on the waves!”

But if Owen’s consciousness was playing these juggler’s tricks within the circle of itself, Rhisiart’s had never been more compact, more alert, more integrated. His narrow anxious face kept turning from the Prince to Tegolin, and from Tegolin to the Prince.

As for Father Pascentius and his beautifully attired choir of handsome lads, they were apparently prolonging the religious part of the scene far beyond what had been originally intended. Rhisiart wondered what on earth the man was up to now. He had heard a bugle outside the gates and he had seen one of the porters hand a missive of some sort to the Father; but since the Father was always receiving furtive messages from one quarter or other this incident carried no particular weight.

But Tegolin’s beauty as she held aloft that naked sword — and it crossed our friend’s mind to wish it had been the one he’d just left in his turret! — was beyond all he had ever imagined. There was Catharine, leaning upon Sir Edmund’s arm, with the little Rhisiart holding tight to his father’s hand, and fair as a queen she looked; but though he had never until this moment allowed such a thing to cross the threshold of his consciousness he caught himself with the thought — and the thought itself was like a sacred bird, a forbidden bird, that he had dared to shoot and now held warm and palpitating in his hand — that the Maid was the more lovely of the two!

The warm February sun fell full upon the loosened mass of the girl’s flaming hair, hair so thick that it almost hid the gleam of her cuirass, hair so long that it flowed down in blood-red waves upon Seisyll’s flanks; while the golden armour covering her breasts and guarding her thighs made all that was visible of her virgin flesh show white as the petals of wood-anemones exposed before their hour amid yellow leaves.

The bare arm that uplifted the sword — aye! but Rhisiart knew it now; it was the Roman sword the Prince had worn at Mathrafal! — passed through the leather straps of a heart-shaped, shell-bright shield, upon which was depicted, in vermilion enamel-work, the mystic Pendragon of Wales.

And it struck Rhisiart as he watched her that it needed all her strength to hold up that sword and shield. Her arm seemed quivering with the effort; and he felt — life-weary man as he was now, and one in whom the Russian’s “insect” had long ago been scotched — that both he and the Prince, yes! and her mother too and Father Rheinalt too, perched up there so perilously, all, all, except the Grey Friar, were, as in that sea-weed dance of five years ago, clapping their hands while she grew faint under the tension.

Yes, he felt as if the Prince and he were united now, united in keeping that bare white arm aloft, with its dragon and its sword! And suddenly he caught the eye of Mistress Lowri, and — Mary, Joseph! — a terrible revolution turned his whole heart round, as if on an interior pivot. He suddenly felt a spasm of ungovernable anger mount up from the pit of his stomach against the Prince. The eyes of the Maid’s mother were quite tearless now. They were worse than tearless. No, no; this whole thing was wicked. They had no right to keep that sword and shield so tremblingly erect. They had no right to let the Prince use Tegolin so!

But Owen’s dark figure upon that dusky, dwarfish horse seemed growing steadily more ominous and more dominant. The Father’s chanting was now at its height. The choir-boys' responses were shrill and clear. But something else was happening. A power was emanating from Owen that he couldn't understand. Was that dark figure with those sea-green eyes, mounted on that squat, goblinish creature, really possessed of supernatural power? He had never quite lost, in all his five years' association with him, a feeling that the man was different from other men, that he had, in an obscure sense he couldn't define, something unearthly about him. He found himself moving closer and closer to Seisyll and his rider. That bare uplifted arm, holding both sword and shield — too heavy, too heavy! she must let them sink if he didn't help! — was fatally drawing him.

It was the look in Mistress Lowri's eyes, the look in the Prince's eyes — oh, he must go to her help! One wild thought after another whirled through his brain. That witch-woman had thrust Alice just like this upon young Grey. It must be a mania with women to offer up their daughters — yes, a mania with them! Those tears he'd caught in the woman's eyes weren't for Tegolin at all. They were for Rhys Gethin, they were —

But his friend Brut was at his side now; and he too was angry; he too was outraged. In a moment he too would rush forward and help support that trembling arm. He suddenly felt impelled to glance up at Father Rheinalt. He was her father. How long could he endure to see the quivering of that white arm? Oh, the brave girl, the brave girl!

But somebody must rush in and stop it. Was Owen working some dreadful magic upon his enemies through that uplifted sword? Was the tide of battle on the Usk at this very second swaying, swaying, like a great sea-wave, uncertain where it would fall? Father Rheinalt couldn't — but where was the Father? Were his eyes dazzled by the Maid? No, he'd left that ledge. He'd climbed back — or fallen down. No! There he was, approaching them now, pushing his way through the crowd, saying something to the Scab.

And the Scab was coming with him now, and an angry tumultuous section of the crowd was following the two of them. Strange for him and the Lollard to be on the same side as the Scab! And Mad Huw too — Mad Huw was weeping again as he clutched at Seisyll's harness, that harness covered with gorgeous trappings across which the black lions ramped. Tears as big as wren's eggs were streaming down the Friar's face as he turned it now towards the Maid's begetter and towards the gesticulating prophet.

"He's fallen back. He's lost his vision," our friend thought. "If Owen takes her from him now, he'll resist. The man's as angry as I am! Yes, yes, call upon your King, Grey Friar! That's right! Call upon him! Master Simon's watching you; but he can't hurt you. Lowri's eyes can't hurt you. They can watch the méthode scientifique of Gilles de Pirogue; but if Brut and her Father and the Scab and all these Ardudwy men were to join with him now in one great rush to rescue his girl — for what was Tegolin if not his girl? — they could stop Owen from riding away with her to the battle! What right had he to—"

But what was that? Two young heralds were bringing the Prince his armour, his helmet, his great lance; and the keepers of the castle-gates were dragging them open. Slowly, slowly they were forcing them open, with the harsh, strange, musical sound of vast hinges turning, and with the rush of sea-scents and sea-murmurs, and with the clatter and trampling of a host of armed men! Spearmen, bowmen, men-at-arms — an army was pouring in! And as they came they raised shout upon shout. "With the Maid to the Usk! With the Maid to the battle! With the Maid to London-town!"

There! The chanting had ceased; the responses had died down; and Tegolin had endured to the end. With her sword and shield laid across

Seisyll’s back, and her head so drooping that her chin rested against the front of her cuirass, she now allowed Mad Huw to possess himself of her numb fingers; and these the good man rubbed between his own in so besotted and pitiful a manner, wetting them as he did so with such a flood of tears that there wasn’t a damsel, save little Sibli, among all the Arglwyddes’s ladies, but wept too for very sympathy with so passionate a love.

But little Sibli, after giving her tearful friend Luned a glance of sharp contempt, transferred her small person and the insatiable “insect” within it to the voluptuous side of Dame Alice of Lyde, as the witch’s daughter now insisted on being called. Rhisiart had taken advantage of the Prince’s movement towards the in-rushing soldiers to take hold of Seisyll’s bridle, thus enabling his rider to relax at her pleasure and devote herself entirely to the Friar; but he now became aware that the Lollard’s wife was dragging her husband aside and whispering God knows-what honeyed treacheries in his ear. That they were treacheries, to him, to the Lollard, to Mad Huw, to Tegolin, he divined easily enough, from the wicked delight which Mistress Sibli was manifesting.

Meanwhile the Prince, who had dismounted from his sorry nag, and had been armed by his pages in a resplendent suit of glittering mail, had leapt, all heavily armed as he was, upon the back of a horse Rhisiart had never seen before, a coal-black horse of menacing appearance and startling size. Thus mounted, and with his great lance in his hand, he looked indeed a formidable figure; and an involuntary cry of admiration and pride rose from the newly-entered troops.

“Owen and the Maid!” they shouted: “Owen and the Maid of Edeyrnion!”

It was then that Master Brut, breaking away from his bride, came up to Rhisiart's elbow. "He has thought of everything," he whispered. "Alice tells me all the Maid's things are packed on mule-back, ready to follow them. He's made up his mind to take her. Our last chance is Father Rheinalt. He's her father and a good man. Let him — let him say something to the people. Let him say something to her!"

Rhisiart cast a quick look round them, and then turned to Tegolin, tightening his hold on Seisyll's bridle. Something about the bend of her head and the way her hair fell across her cheek as she leaned down, comforting the Friar, brought back that Midsummer Day of five years ago so vividly that some inward band about his heart ripped and was rent, dividing itself like a strip of pali.

No! The Prince shouldn't have his will this time. He'd taken his love from him and he'd endured and lived. But Tegolin was more than his love. "She's part of me," he thought. "If he takes her away, if he makes her his own, that's the end. Blackness forever; blackness in this world, blackness in the next!"

The scene in that base-court of Harlech had certainly become a singular one. Our friend saw clearly enough that it had taken to itself the nature of one of those turning-points in life that are the heavier charged with fate, because, in the tragic tension, the good and the evil are by no means all in one camp. Owen with the Maid at his side would — both Rhisiart and the Lollard knew it well — raise such a tide of mystical loyalty that it might easily sweep these Grendors and Talbots and Codnors and Charltons out of the country once and for all!

And to clear Wales of the English — for what else had he left Oxford? But here he was — and the refugees from the Usk and the Tawy and Severn had already begun taunting the soldiers standing between Tegolin's mother and Tegolin's father, just as he had done five years ago! Here he was — and oh! how noble the Prince looked on his black horse and in his glittering arms! — prepared to put himself, his own life, which was Tegolin's, his own honour, which was Tegolin's, between his Prince and his one grand chance of saving Wales. Why didn't Tegolin look up? Why didn't she speak and help him and decide it all? It was always of the Friar she thought. It would be of the Friar to the end. And yet he knew, and she knew that he knew, what was the only thing in her treasure-box! Did she think the Prince would respect her maidenhead? Owen ap Griffith prove another Mad Huw? Or was she prepared for the sacrifice of everything to save the country?

Father Rheinalt was at their side now and so was the Scab — a nice partner to have in his defiance of his Prince! — and there was someone else here, too. Yes, he was here, that traitor ancestor whose infinite remorse had looked out of the smoke at him from that ruined wall in Dinas Bran. He became conscious now that his tight clutch upon Seisyll's bridle was only with his left hand. His right hand was in the folds of his scholar's tunic.

And if this crucial moment was a crisis in the life of Rhisiart, it was hardly less so in that of Walter Brut. The Lollard had already been troubled by his bride's attitude to the Maid's departure. He knew she'd helped Tegolin to put on that rich French armour. And now as she approached him and took her place by his side he sought in vain to get at the secret of what she felt, as she gazed so intensely at the girl in armour. Was it that she thought it was the grandest and most enviable lot that could fall to any girl, to ride into battle by the side of Owen? Or was it some subtle vicarious sensuality, some vice in women that was new and strange to him?

The man's guileless soul had already received several startling shocks from his intimacy with the witch's daughter; but what he saw now in the look she fixed on Tegolin troubled him in the depths of his nature.

“She and I are one now,” he thought as he watched her, “and her sin is my sin.” A curious and tragic sadness swept over him as he felt the complete strangeness of this human creature from whose obliquity, whatever it might turn out to be, he could never be separate again. “What the Prince is doing is wrong,” he said to himself, “and I shall oppose him, if I die for it! The look Alice has got on her face now as she watches her is an evil look. Well! we’re one now; and if her thoughts are evil and make her suffer — mine be the suffering! If she creates worse evil by her thoughts — mine be guilt! I used to think that a man who had a woman could save his soul alone. How little I knew how it would be!”

With these thoughts pursuing each other through his mind he pressed her arm against his side. “You are mine,” he thought, “and all the guilt and shame and suffering that such a look brings I must pay for; for you and I are one.”

Meanwhile Rhisiart, as he held fast to Seisyll’s bridle, felt a faint stirring of hope when he saw Broch-o’-Meifod move across, with Master Sparrow at his heels, to where, under the shadow of a buttress, the faithful little Lu was standing by Meredith’s stretcher.

The Arglwyddes, with her ladies gathered behind her like so many murmuring pigeons, was talking gravely and earnestly to Mortimer and Catharine. Was she, Rhisiart wondered, begging Catharine to interfere — to hold her father back from this fatal adventure?

For some curious reason, deep, oh! fathoms deep in his secretest soul, he found himself hoping that it wouldn’t be by Catharine’s intercession that this thing was stopped! Mistress Lowri — alone now — had moved near them. Had she sent Master Simon to watch Rhys Gethin die? Was she going to give her daughter a Judas kiss?

And then he started back a step, still holding the horse's bridle, still clutching his dagger under his tunic; for Father Rheinalt had thrust Mad Huw aside, and — for the first time in his life completely disregarding Mistress Lowri — had thrown back his cowl and flung his arms round Tegolin's neck. So he, even he, had, in his burning patriotism, accepted the girl's supreme sacrifice!

Buried like that in her father's embrace, would she never turn, would she never give him a look?

But the Prince on his black horse was approaching to take her now; and Father Rheinalt had let her go. She settled herself on Seisyll's back, lifted up her sword and shield again, inclined her head beneath Father Pascentius's formal blessing and then, in the full sight of them all, bent down and kissed the Secretary on the mouth.

On seeing this, Owen jerked at the bit of his black horse with such unnecessary violence that the animal shook his head, scraped the stones with one of his front hooves, and clapped back his ears. "Oh mild and everlasting Mare," he groaned. "Mother of Creation! Thou who has given thy servant the magnanimous docility of thine own patient and all-enduring heart, save me from the power of this Prince of devils!"

The only individual in that company who took any notice of the offended feelings of a being whose inner vision beheld the lustrous eyes and flowing mane of the Queen of Heaven was Broch-o'-Meifod's dog.

He looked from the horse to his rescuer and from his rescuer to the horse in so emphatic a manner that the giant bent down over Meredith's stretcher, nodded to Master Sparrow to help him, and proceeded with this assistance to carry the wounded man into the open space that was still left between the opposing ranks.

And then as will often happen in a psychic crisis of this sort, when neither side wishes to take the final responsibility of precipitating the event, the electricity of action began to discharge itself in other ways.

For the crowd in that castle-yard had, clearly enough, divided itself into two indignantly tense parties; the newly-arrived soldiers clamouring to follow the Prince and the Maid, while the opposing ranks, led by Father Rheinalt and the Lollard, seemed resolute in their refusal to let the expedition start.

The Maid herself, after what she evidently felt to be her farewell gesture, began to make before them all a palpable effort to gather up her reins. This, however, she couldn't do; for Rhisiart had twisted the reins about one of his own hands, while he plunged the other into his tunic.

At the sight of his wounded son, thus placed — and placed by his best friend — between himself and the one thing on earth he wanted, Owen released his hold on his lance, letting its butt-end sink into the leather case in front of his saddle. Then bending his head over his horse's mane so low that the red feather in his helm pointed earthward he began talking to the prostrate man as if talking to himself. Breaking off this soliloquy he suddenly said in a low vibrant voice: "So you too my dear lad, are against our one chance until the French come!"

"Not against our one chance, Sire," replied the man on the stretcher, "but against our Prince leading it." He paused; and then in a much lower tone, while the Prince strained every nerve to catch his words: "She loves Rhisiart, Sire! Can't you see it? Let him go with her, and the monk and the Friar, too. My father, my father, think of the honour of our house!"

"I have thought," cried the Prince, rising suddenly to his full height. "I have thought!" he repeated in a loud and terrible voice, "and nothing, lad, nothing, I say, can turn me back!" His words were heard and their meaning fully caught by all present.

There rose a ringing and exultant shout from the armed crowd behind him; and he beckoned sternly with his hand for Broch and his servant to lift the stretcher out of the way. "Why does he move his arm up and down like that?" he thought. "If he touches one of his axes I'll ride over them all and take her."

But Broch-o'-Meifod wasn't touching any of his axes. He was moving one of his great bare hands up and down; moving it with all the fingers outspread from where it hung straight by his side till his enormous fore-arm was at right angles to his biceps. It was a queer movement; it seemed a meaningless movement. The man's face expressed nothing as he made it. He did it as if it were the automatic gesture of a mechanical colossus. Was it a signal to someone?

But to whom could it be a signal, for the crowd was dense round the two horses now, and little Lu was bending over Meredith, while the figures of Mortimer and Catharine hid the Arglwyddes.

"I can do what I like," Owen said to himself, watching that hand go up and down. "It's all in my will. I can take her. I can give her up."

And then as he watched that moving hand, which only himself from his position above them all, could possibly see, it seemed to him as if that hand weren't a hand at all but his own will, his own will deciding everything — up down — down, up — just as it chose!

"What I'll do," he thought, "shall be without cause, without reason, without motive. I'll do it just to prove to myself that I can do it. If I let her go they'll think I do it because of them. If I take her they'll think I do it because of my pride. But they'll be wrong. I'll take her because I want her more than my free will. But if I don't take her I'll prove to myself that my will can do — in a complete void — what it chooses — without cause or motive or reason! Just my will in a void, doing what it chooses! Up-down, down-up — like Broch's hand. They'll think I give her up because of them. But Broch will know — that's why his hand goes up and down like that! — Broch will know that I give her up because 'up-down' and 'down-up' are equal; and my will is my will. I could take her in a minute. She'd tell them herself she wished to come. She and I together could do anything. She'd know what love was if I took her, and there wouldn't be an Englishman left in Wales! And when the French came we'd ride through Hereford and Worcester and Oxford and over London Bridge, until — playing off the Mortimers against the Percies — and no one but I would take off your armour, you lovely one! — but that would tilt the balance — up-down, down-up! — with her for the motive, for the reason, for the cause! But if I don't take her — then, in an absolute void, my will will please itself. It will choose to sacrifice everything — everything but its own life; and thus it will show the power of its own life! Yes, yes, that's what it'll be — my will alone; my will where there's no 'up' — do you hear me, hand of Broch? — and no 'down'!

"So be it. And now, old conjurer, a little entertainment for you!" He patted the neck of his black horse; he waved to Catharine as if he had only just realized she was there; he made a quick gesture with his hand for Broch's benefit alone, which evidently completely satisfied the giant; and then, bending down over his son's stretcher, he uttered in the rustic dialect of Powys Fadog an old nursery jingle which means: "If you've won it's only because I've let you win!" Then he swung his horse round and facing the excited soldiers behind him lifted his arm for silence. So majestic did he look in his shining armour, with the long heraldic pennon of his lance streaming in the sea-wind, that not one of those war-fevered men, wrought up as they were, but lowered his weapons in submissive silence.

"Before we set out to battle, my comrades, it were well if we all, men and women, priests and laymen, gentles and commons, visit our castle-church, and there assembled consecrate our cause to Heaven, in the name of Cadwallader the Blessed, Bran the Blessed, Tysilio the great Saint, and Derfel Gadarn, our Patron and Protector. My family and my household will lead the way; and since it is the help of Christ and Our Lady and the Blessed Saints that we shall now invoke, I wish every man of you who cares to follow us to leave his arms behind him here — my pages will look to them — and to join our solemn procession to the chapel, chanting the Battle-Song of Uther Pendragon."

It was one of those extraordinary inspirations of the man, that made those who knew him best feel most astounded, that he should have set them upon intoning this particular war-hymn. Almost every national Welsh air had some local tradition behind it that would have clashed with others in a crowd drawn indiscriminately from north and south; but the deep Gregorian-like notes of this ancient Pendragon Psalm, familiar from childhood to every soul there present, was calculated above anything else he could have chosen to deepen patriotism to a religious intensity, and to draw upon a past so high and remote that all modern diversities and dissensions were lost in the unity of its ancestral grandeur.

It was none other than Father Pascentius — profoundly delighted at this twelfth-century turn given to what he had already decided to be a typical scene of fifteenth-century disorder and degeneracy — who promptly began intoning the harsh martial stanzas of this noble chant, whose rugged music might have risen to the Milky-Way from the summit of Cadair Idris or of Eryri.

As soon as Broch-o'-Meifod, who seemed completely unperturbed by this new turn of events, had with Master Sparrow's help got Meredith and his little Lu safe out of the press, there was such a confusion around the black horse and the grey horse that Rhisiart and the Lollard drew aside. They still suspected the Prince of some sinister design but there was clearly no immediate danger of Tegolin being spirited away.

Rhisiart felt a most devastating sense of incapacity and helplessness. The sight of Catharine and Tegolin talking to each other, which was now what was happening, caused a queer disturbance to take place under his ribs. It resembled shame; and yet it wasn't shame. It resembled the feeling of the most miserable kind of blushing; and yet it was deep below the surface of his skin! He felt as he watched that fair hair in actual contact with that flaming hair, as the one young woman looked up and the other leaned down, that if they were to kiss each other he would hate them both!

If he had had even so much as a spark of divine power he would have ordered it so that never more on earth should those two converse together! But it was hard not to look at them side by side. Where else should he look? For the Prince, holding Mad Huw in a low-voiced dialogue, was delaying the procession behind Father Pascentius; while Father Rheinalt was being compelled to lend an ear to the Scab who in his excitement was actually clutching the monk's habit.

But never had Rhisiart reached such a level of humiliation. What had he to fall back upon? He had lost his position as the Prince's legal adviser. He had forgotten how to use his sword. And here were the only two women in all the world he wanted to look up to him, to admire him, to watch what he could do, to listen to his knowledge, to wonder at his courage, conspiring together to treat him with maternal tenderness and consideration!

Inch by inch, like a sinking boat, all Rhisiart's passionate self-respect began to go down. It was what he'd endured in the tower at Dinas Bran; but this was far worse. What was he? A nameless nobody, an unwanted lawyer's clerk, the weak protege of a couple of fair women! Ah yes, of course! And here too was Luned; but he had no desire to-day to prove the freedom of his soul by making love to a bundle of sweet cinnamon! Who was the father of her child? No, no, it couldn't be Elphin. Elphin could play the herald manly enough; but to think of him — No, no! It was probably some soldier from the camp by the sea.

What on earth was the Prince talking about to Mad Huw? He could see both the flaxen head and the flaming head turned towards those two, waiting till they should have done, so as to follow Father Pascentius and his choir. Could they hear what the Prince was saying? Mary, Joseph! Both the girls' heads were turned towards himself now. No, no! No response while you're together from Rhisiart ab Owen!

"I'd far sooner," he said bitterly to himself, "make Efa ferch Tudor smile at me!"

But the Prince had beckoned to one of the pages who was pushing his way through the crowd. Ah! He was giving the lad the bridles of both horses; and both the riders were dismounting. Dismount? Let all the world dismount; for Rhisiart's occupation was gone!

Oh, never would he forget that dragging procession through all those same identical corridors and courts and balconies that he had passed — and passed behind that same unwieldy figure too — when he went to disturb the new ideal of knowledge through torture. "We scotched his little game," he remarked to Walter Brut under cover of the Pendragon Chant. "But he's up to some other mischief now. How clever the Scab was to make trouble between those refugees and the Ardudwy men! ’Twas that that stopped him. He hates downright brawls. He likes the ritual of power, not its—”

“Hush, lad! Hush, for Christ’s sake!” returned his friend. “You’re being brutally unjust! He was led by his desire for beauty. Have you never been? Have I never been? It was a sin; but he must have suffered horribly when he was hesitating just then. Didn’t you see how he looked? Man, man! He was wrestling with the Devil! What’s the matter with you, Rhisiart? I’ve been watching him closely, lad; and I saw him look at us just now with the face of an angel, over his old forked beard!”

The hoarse, martial notes of the great Pendragon Chant echoed round the two friends as they moved forward together, their neat Hereford clothes, faded during the last five years, separating them, as did their English accent, from the careless, sumptuous colours and wild, rich intonations all about them.

The crowd was so great that, though the austerity of what all were chanting held the excitement in check, soldiers of one rank or another kept pushing past them, most of them with a rough, casual greeting as they went: “God be with you, Clerk Walter! God be with you, Clerk Rhisiart!” — greetings which the Lollard answered spontaneously and naturally, and our friend with a heart-sick effort.

“Clerk Walter” was certainly in the right of it over his companion’s mood. Rhisiart was puzzled by it himself when he thought of it afterwards; but keen lawyer by nature as he was, and intelligent statesman as he had become, he had all the average Norman’s dislike of introspective analysis.

The truth was his emotional nature had only two natural outlets, both of them very narrow ones. He could lose himself in idolatrous devotion for a man much older than himself, a man like the Prince; but where women were concerned his romantic passion could be stirred only when the sense of power rioted in him with a feeling that if he liked he could be despotic and cruel! The only girl he had ever met whose nature seemed to beg her lover to be despotic and cruel was little Lu; but she was so obsessed by Meredith that he never let himself think of her in that way.

But just because he was a man, and they were girls, he had sometimes had moments, both with Tegolin and Catharine, when this despotic craving had had its free fling. At such moments he had been mysteriously happy, and his soul had hurled itself upon this weaker soul with an exultant abandonment; and, not only so, but even in retrospect, an indescribable tenderness had flowed through his veins at the mere thought of his relation with a girl who was at his mercy.

But now, as he sulked under his companion's rebuke and punished him by adding his bass notes to the chanting of the war-song whose archaic heathenism he knew displeased him, the sense of an understanding between the two girls, of which he was at once the object and the victim, tied an obscure knot of contrariety in his deepest soul against which he struggled in vain. Grown man though he was, he felt somewhere within him that blind, childish, angry humiliation, the only cure for which used to be to make Modry strike him; after which they would both burst into tears.

As may be expected this childish mood of his which could have been dissolved only by one of two things, either by risking his life for a man who was his master, or by becoming himself the master of a maid, was anything but lifted from him, when, as they overtook Tegolin and her Friar, the girl turned quickly towards him, and giving him one of her old steady glances, uttered the surprising words: "Well, Gwion Bach, what do you think of him now?"

All the Prince's household crowded into the chapel as soon as the Arglwyddes and the Mortimers had taken their places, and a considerable number of soldiers and refugees succeeded in getting in along with them and finding somewhere or other to stand and kneel. Some of the younger refugees from the Usk actually clambered up on the ledges of the high windows, through one of which the youthful Gilles had escaped from the chamber above; and in one way or another the building was soon so crowded with people that it was all Father Rheinalt and the group of parish-priests could do to force their way to where Father Pascentius was standing by the altar.

But the Prince kept back the Maid and the Friar from entering till Rhisiart and the Lollard arrived; and it was then, as the Master and Man met face to face, that Rhisiart realized the truth of his friend's words.

"We have decided, cousin," he began at once, "upon a little change of plan."

The blood rushed to Rhisiart's cheeks. They felt so burning — especially just above his cheek-bones — that, forgetting how swarthy he was and that no one could possibly see his confusion, he hung his head like a convicted school-boy.

There must have been something about the sight of this thin, lined, anxious face, with the dark moustache under the hooked nose, reduced to such an extremity of embarrassed shame, that was unbearable to Tegolin. She intervened hurriedly, begging the Prince to let Brother Huw tell him everything.

Master Brut, who still detected in Owen's expression a look which, if it wasn't the look of an angel, was certainly a look of unearthly self-conquest, now noted — with his evangelical interest in all such spiritual phenomena — that no flicker of the faintest smile crossed the Prince's face as he responded to the Maid.

The Maid, on the contrary, didn’t notice this. In fact, as the Prince saw clearly enough, she was in so radiant a mood that she had eyes for none but Rhisiart.

“Tell him, then, Brother Huw,” said Owen slowly, speaking in the flat expressionless tone that an idol in a temple might have used, “what we’ve decided between the three of us — though I wish you could tell him what the soldiers will feel when they hear our decision!”

These last words, though uttered aloud, were more like thoughts than words; but so intensely alive at that second were all Mad Huw’s senses that he caught their drift in a flash.

“Fear not, Owen ap Griffith,” he said solemnly. “I will take it on myself to make the men understand that the Maid’s marriage is a holy marriage, undertaken solely that she and I, a young woman and a witless preacher, should have an armed and clerkly man to protect us by night as well as by day as we march to restore the King!”

“But, Brother Huw, Brother Huw,” cried Owen, while, like a sailor whose hands clutch the rudder as he watches the prow of the boat, Tegolin watched Rhisiart’s face, “but Brother Huw, there’s only one kind of marriage on earth, whatever there may be in heaven; and since this ordinary, natural, human marriage is a sacrament of Holy Church we mustn’t—”

“I know, I know, Owen ap Griffith! But the Maid will be a maid still, though lawfully wedded, as she rides with us this morn to fight the battles of the King.” Here he lowered his voice and laid his fingers on Owen’s wrist. ‘“Tis the King himself tells me — for the man’s his godson you see — they should be wedded before she rides! And the King says — that — that” — here several big tears splashed upon the Prince’s armour and chased each other down its glittering surface, turning to gold as they ran— “that her Friar mustn’t think of it that way, else he’ll go mad. ‘Pray, Brother,' the King says. 'And when you pray stop thinking! Saint Francis is here with me,' the King says, 'and Saint Francis says, to love is better than — than to — than — to think!'"

Certainly it seemed that either the prodigal King or the poverty-wedded Saint did come to the Friar's rescue at that moment. For Mad Huw pulled himself up erect now, and calmly taking Tegolin's hand placed it in Rhisiart's.

All this while Rhisiart himself had been like one whose mental consciousness is fatally active while all his feelings have been struck numb and dead by a bolt of lightning. Once, however, his fingers clasped Tegolin's, and behold! this numbness came to an end, and his life-stream began flowing again!

And what was this? He suddenly felt as if he and Tegolin had always been holding hands like this, behind and beyond all that happened. He even felt that holding her hand he was beyond the bitter humiliation of that knot of frustration that had been recently damming up the channel of his spirit.

Meanwhile with exquisite punctiliousness, heedless of how Rhisiart and Tegolin lost themselves in their union, Owen was following with an ungauntleted finger the blurred track made upon his armour by the Friar's tears. Then, as if it were somebody else thinking a tiresome thought, he began vaguely wondering to himself what on earth the people would make of a married Maid of Edeyrnion.

"I must get these two, and the Friar with them," he thought, "straight up to the altar before this office ends! Better make one of these parish-priests marry them, while Pascentius and her father are witnesses."

As soon as he had decided this he noticed quite calmly — as a drugged sacrificial victim might notice the scent of the flowers round his neck — that he was in a hurry to get them wedded, and in a hurry, too, to receive, like spears in his flesh, the looks of Catharine and the Arglwyddes.

"Cousin Rhisiart!" he found himself beginning.

But he spoke coldly, without giving either of them a smile. "Your wife must ride Seisyll, Cousin Rhisiart; and I'll have your things — the sword and the rest — put on my black charger. But I'll tell them to saddle your old horse; and then our friend here," and he turned to Master Brut, "or the Friar, as they please, can rest their feet. But you'll be moving pretty slowly, for all the troops save yourselves will be on foot. Rhys Ddu will meet you in Carmarthen and take command; and until then—"

"But my Prince," broke in the Lollard, "you're going with us yourself, aren't you? We shan't feel — the army won't feel—"

Owen gave him a quick startled look out of his sea-green eyes. No, the man couldn't be lying! And yet how could he possibly not be lying; for what could be pleasanter for the good man than to go to war alone with his friends?

"No," he said in a firm clear voice and a voice so loud that many of the soldiers at the back of the little chapel turned their heads. "No, we're not going to the Usk. We have other plans. And our other plans will hurt Hal Bolingbroke more than our going to the Usk. Kindly put your hand to this, will you, Master?" and turning a little as he spoke he indicated one of the fastenings of his helmet.

Master Brut's thoughts were singularly simple and direct, as struggling with this metal clasp he lifted both hands to Owen's neck. "This is Our Lord's doing, and it will give my little Alice the chance to go with us. But I don't think she will go with us! Some girls find travelling harder than others. Their bodies are softer and more delicate." He was careful to thrust to the back of his mind the formless, wordless thought that "some girls" had a much greater dread of battles than others and of being roughly handled by the enemy. “They’re more sensitive about jolting paths and hard saddles,” he repeated to himself; and without removing his fingers from the clasp with which he was busy, he stared with amorous guilelessness at Alice’s sturdy and voluptuous back.

“She has her faults,” were the thoughts that now kept twisting in and out of that obdurate fragment of gilded silver; “but any man who reads the words of Jesus — especially in Greek — knows that we must be indulgent without limit to others while to ourselves we behave as if we were dogs on a string, pulling ourselves away with a sharp jerk when we begin to feel—”

In order to unloosen this obstinate fastening Master Brut found it necessary to push back from the Prince’s shoulder the rim of his hidden mail-shirt; and upon a couple of the links of this object, the morning sun, gleaming through the red-and-blue dyes of a just-finished fourteenth-century window, threw a blaze of rich colours, colours that spread across the scar on the man’s neck, where, five years before, Rhisiart had sucked the blood.

The Prince himself all this while was explaining to Tegolin, gravely, coldly, and in clear-cut detail, exactly where, without going too far out of their way, they might get in touch with Henry Don. “I tell you this,” he insisted, while he felt as if it were Rhisiart’s eyes that were looking at him out of her face, and her eyes out of Rhisiart’s face, “because my cousin may be far too gone in love or drink to see where he’s going. Oh yes! and remember that when he last sent us news Henry Don was in the valley of the Monnow, with Grosmont as his goal. But he’ll have laid waste Grosmont completely by now no doubt. Most troublesome King’s men they were, though their homes are black enough by now, I doubt not! Don does what he does right well; and he’s got the men of Morgannwg with him too; and they don't leave much behind! Grosmont's in ashes; there's no doubt of that. You can rest assured of that! Welshmen and yet King's men. Well, well. Their homes are ashes now anyway. Black ashes!

"Hark'ee, my pretty, as Broch calls his mistress, and I'll hammer you out a right clever englyn about black ashes and staunch King's men."

It wasn't only Tegolin and Rhisiart who now stared at the Prince in startled trouble. The Lollard with all his guilelessness and goodness had played the part of a lay-confessor to Master Simon and other neurotic spirits too long not to recognize this unbalanced note. His full lips assumed the shape of a knot that is not tied tight, while a faint susurration, almost approximating to a low whistle, issued from his mouth.

But Mad Huw intervened. "Hush, hush, Owen ap Griffith Fychan!" he cried, taking into his hands the Prince's helmet, now at last unfastened, and entrusting it to Elphin the Herald. "This is a day for a psalm, not an englyn, a day for the priest, not the bard! Take them to the altar, Owen ap Griffith! The office is finished. The Fathers are ready. The King has spoken. A moment, a moment, Daughter of my Soul! The Friar and none else shall be your armourer!"

Thus speaking, and as he had done in Rhisiart's turret, dominating them all by the force of his pure spirit, the devoted man knelt down before the Maid; and there and then, while the girl, still with her hand in Rhisiart's, bent her head above him, unloosed the straps that bound King Charles's greaves about her shins.

This was the worst moment of all for Owen; for the Friar hesitated not in his spiritual ecstasy to unwind the linen cloth beneath the armour, leaving the flesh bare.

There was one flickering second when he might have broken down; but not for nothing had he played his games with his soul since he was a child.

In absolute desperation he now went through the long-practised motion, the motion which, though none knew it but himself, was his real claim to being a magician. He did what felt to himself — though it would be easy to pretend he "imagined" the whole thing — like taking his soul, the entity within him that said to itself, "I am Owen Glyn Dŵr," and flung it — through one of those open windows through which Sieur Gilles had skipped like a devil — far out to sea.

There, on the rocking waves, though there was no goosander to rock by its side, his soul floated now free, detached, stripped of all desire — and yet capable, from where it floated, of directing with lucid precision every gesture of the glittering eidolon with the forked beard!

As they all five, escorted by the young herald carrying the Prince's helmet and the French King's golden greaves, pushed their way to the altar, the choir burst into a psalm that seemed to carry into the incense, into the rosy light from the painted windows, into the rich fourteenth century carving, something of the wild Pendragon Chant with which they had entered the chapel. And in the exultation of his mood it seemed to Rhisiart that Tegolin's hand trembled in his own. She was his! She was his! And — like the first woman given up to the first man — she was troubled, she was bewildered, she was dominated! She was no longer the Tegolin to whom he'd turned too long for comfort. She was his now — passive and docile. He was a man, a master, soon to lift upon old Griffin's back the sweet captive of his sword and his dagger!

The one thing lacking to his complete happiness was the thought of the Prince. It wasn't that he pitied him for losing Tegolin. It was something deeper, more personal, more intimate.

As they made their way slowly through the crowd there came to him, along with the heavy sweetness of the incense and along with the fragrance of the girl's loosened hair, a strange salty taste upon his lips and palate, the taste of blood, the taste of that blood of his master, when he'd sucked at his arrow-wound beneath the ramparts of Dinas Bran.

"Oh Mother of God!" he prayed. "Grant me to give my blood for his blood before I die!"

But having made his prayer it seemed easy to let this silent figure at their side, this imperturbable ghost to whom he had sworn allegiance, fade into a cloud, a shadow, a pillar of smoke, a thing without substance, without feeling. This reduction of the Prince's presence to something so phantasmal that it seemed lawful to disregard it enabled our friend to turn his full attention to his bride.

And what was this? Was it the sun-rays falling through cunningly painted windows, through all the modern foliated tracery that his Oxford friends so despised compared with the heaven-aspiring purity of the earlier style? Was it the stained windows that threw this deep rose-petal tinge on the soft curves of the Maid's cheek? If he had been excited before — this idea, this vision — imaginary or not — of Tegolin's sudden shyness, and shyness of him, made the pulses of his heart dance like the waves on those Harlech sands.

What a thing in the world — what a miracle such a blush was! That he'd caught this wise, strong, calm Tegolin, this unruffled second-self, whom he had leant upon, whom he had confided in, whom he had trusted for a thousand years, blushing like the little girl he'd once kissed in the unfinished cloisters of Tintern — oh! it made his blood race up and down his veins! — oh! it took that Russian's "insect" and turned it into a soaring eagle! So this was what the wisest woman was, when the primeval shyness in her was caught off guard and laid bare!

And as he stole glance after glance at that flushed profile, framed in its flaming hair — for the press was great and the Prince moved as if his mind were far away from the whole scene — he felt as if it were his prerogative and his privilege, his alone among all men alive, to catch in that rosy stain the aboriginal tremor of the female yielded up to the male, which made the very waves of the salt sea shiver and dazzle and redden to the power of their recurrent dawns!

Yes, he was sure the music he was hearing carried the lilt of that Pendragon Chant into the red glow from the windows and into the red stain on his girl's cheek!

It was fortunate for the whirling exultation in Rhisiart's narrow head that his romance with Catharine had remained on so rarified a level. The only woman whose body had ever lain by his body in the magic bonds of sleep was the woman now by his side. The Maid had known all the while the mystery of this bond, the fusion of their souls on that Midsummer night beneath the sub-rational, sub-passionate under-tides of sleep.

He had been oblivious of this. But it was this, and nothing less than this, that gave to his possession of her now this incredible feeling of recurrence, as if they were only returning, easily and naturally, to a link that had existed between them time out of mind.

Well! it was over now; and when the Maid of Edeyrnion, leaning on her husband's arm, but with her free hand twisted tight in her Friar's corded belt, emerged from the chapel, she noticed a squat, ungainly figure crouching by one of the door-posts.

The Prince, moving still like an abstracted armorial ghost, was on the further side of Mad Huw; the Lollard, with Alice at his side now, just behind them.

Then, in one blinding beat of time two startling things happened, and happened simultaneously. It must be remembered that our friend Rhisiart was the only one in that group of persons who could boast Norman blood. And the Norman in his narrow skull had been roused to its most alert activity by the ritual he'd just been through. His companions were absorbed, preoccupied, remote, lost in their feelings. But never in his whole life had the Maid's young lord been more dangerously alive to all that was around him. The subtlest necessity of his life-illusion — his feeling of power — was satisfied. But the effect of this satisfaction was not to drowse, drug, daze, or benumb; it was to rouse and quicken. Rhisiart's temper was at the extreme antipodes to that of his chief. Success stirred his faculties to their liveliest pitch; whereas Owen's powers mounted higher and higher in precise proportion to the piling up of disaster.

It was the leaping into deadly activity of two separate human forms that now crashed through Tegolin's consciousness. One of these forms was the crouching figure at the chapel-porch; the other was her husband. The Maid found herself actually staggering against Mad Huw, so sudden was the impetus with which Rhisiart freed himself.

Two gleaming blades — a devilish hunting-knife and a Toledo dagger — made quick-cross lightning-flashes; but neither of them seemed able to bury themselves in human flesh. Both of them whirled and gleamed; but all they pierced was the air. This was due to the fact that Gam's leap at the Prince's throat had been so effectually countered by Rhisiart's leap at Gam that the two men were locked so closely in each other's arms that both their weapons were ineffectual. The gleaming flashes of white death whirled about helplessly in the air while their owners spun round; Gam endeavouring to crush his adversary's bones, Rhisiart endeavouring to throw the assassin to the ground.

Chance had decided, or perhaps Rhisiart himself had decided, for never had his wits been clearer, that the weaker of the two had the under-grip; and this fact enabled our friend to fling a quick glance around him and to gasp out in a ringing voice: “Back, on your lives — avoid! avoid! — this — is — my quarrel!”

So nice, so punctilious were the new-fangled customs that had already spread into Owen’s court that even the Lollard drew back; and although little Sibli — heedless of modern etiquette — skipped past the Prince and began dancing like a demented elf round the combatants, no one else dared to intervene.

In contests of this sort, the psychic mood of the opponents has an incalculable influence; and Gam who had counted on one deadly blow — and had seen himself, with or without his knife, forcing his way down the stairs into the base-court with a second wild rush — was reduced to his old stupid, bear-like, bone-crushing hug, his impetus checked, his mind befuddled. Rhisiart, on the other hand, was strung up to a power and spirit far beyond his normal state; and it wasn’t long ere, by the use of an old Hereford trick with legs and feet, he’d tripped up his enemy and had him on the ground, the knife useless, and his own dagger at the man’s throat.

At that point both the Friar and the Lollard intervened; and our friend, his unblooded blade returned to its place in his tunic, rose from the ground, panting and radiant. Something in him kept up a drumming beat, a throbbing refrain “My heart’ll burst! Is it to me, is it to me, this moment’s come?”

The kind-hearted Lollard, as he relinquished the prisoner to the Prince’s guard, experienced the sensation of hot tears behind his eyeballs, as he noted his friend’s happiness. “He deserves it all!” he thought. “He’s never been satisfied till now.”

Walter Brut was right. The two irreconcilable longings that had consumed the young man for the last five years were assuaged at last. He was the master of his own true-love and he had saved his Prince, and as in a few minutes, for news of this kind travels faster than any herald’s voice, he heard the shouts of the army outside, acclaiming their Maid’s marriage to the saviour of their chief, his heart would have burst within him if, as he snatched at Owen’s hand and pressed it to his lips, he hadn’t caught sight of Lady Mortimer making a step towards him, and then staggering, swaying, and falling heavily to the ground.

XIX. TILL THE FRENCH SAIL

THREE DAYS AFTER the departure of the army, and at the very hour of day when Rhisiart had saved his life, Owen was standing at the narrow window in his chamber, looking across the sea. He was trying to recall every detail of the Maid’s farewell to him, as she and her husband, with the Friar and Master Brut in attendance, rode off at the head of those troops.

How instantaneously the news had flown that day of Rhisiart’s deed! It had been the one thing needful to reconcile the men to his own absence and to being led as they were now led! “I ought to have made him a Knight,” he thought. “It was due to him. Why didn’t I do it?” And then in his old inveterate way he set himself to analyse his motives in not knighting his Secretary. “Gam would have struck at my throat,” he thought, “and if he’d struck downwards Iolo’s shirt would have saved me. But if he’d struck upwards nothing could have saved me.”

Pondering on this nice point he couldn’t help recalling the similar insoluble doubt as to whether Hywel Sele was alive or dead when he left him in the tree. “My life,” he thought, “is like crossing the Eel Bridge — every step’s between fatal alternatives!”

He was beginning to follow his usual method of squeezing his head through his window, when the image of Tegolin as she looked when mounted on Seisyll seized upon him with such force that it severed the connection between his movement and its intention: and drawing back his head with an unconscious jerk he scraped his ear against the stone, breaking the skin and drawing blood.

Still unaware of what he did he automatically clapped his hand against his face, and feeling his fingers wet, stared at the blood upon them with a dazed, puzzled surprise. “What queer stuff blood is when you come to think of it!” he muttered. And then, forgetting about his ear, he picked up from the floor a letter he’d just received from France and had flung down in a rage.

It was a letter from the French Chancellor, Arnand de Corbie, and it informed Owen that the said de Corbie was despatching to him from Brittany, under the care of two noble gentlemen of France, “a marvellous great ape,” which he begged the Prince de Galles to accept as a token of his veneration. “I ask for an army and he sends me an ape!” Owen had cried as he read this; and he had become still more angry when the letter went on to say that the writer had begged this “Marvel of Creation” from his young friend, Gilles de Pirogue, whose purpose it had been to subject it to “pains unspeakable” for the prolongation of the lives of “high-born Christian babes.”

Still mechanically putting his fingers to the side of his head and mechanically staring at the blood upon them, Owen listened to the wind blowing in from the sea, and to the sound of the waves breaking on the rocks by the castle-jetty. And with the sea-sounds and the sea-smell he thought of a dead porpoise he’d seen the day before, stranded on the beach, with the seagulls greedily devouring it; and it came into his mind what a gulf there was between sea-creatures and land-creatures, and how the gulf was only bridged when they were both dead and eaten by the birds of the air! “I suppose,” he thought, “if this wondrous great ape, saved from the hands of my Lord Pirogue, were to fall into the sea the very fishes would refuse to eat it!” And for some reason the idea of a creature like an ape struggling for its life in the sea struck his mind with a curious pain.

Amid gills and fins and lidless eyes in jelly-like slime, and undulant slipperinesses gliding through ooze and silt, how painful to think of the struggles of a warm-blooded hairy ape!

And then, without any apparent cause, the solitary blue eye and rosy birth-marks of Crach Ffinnant came into his mind. “He’s my enemy,” he thought. “He’s a danger to me!” And then he thought: “What’s the use of being a Prince if I can’t get rid of an enemy like that?”

Up once more to the side of his head went his fingers; and again he muttered: “What queer stuff blood is!” Then he searched in the folds of his jerkin for a handkerchief, and even thrust his fingers with the same intention up one of his wide-flapping green sleeves; but unable to find what he wanted he rushed to his mirror and proceeded to dab the bleeding scratch with the ends of his carefully-combed hair, which he now wore after the newest of all the fashions, no longer reaching to his shoulders but cut evenly all the way round.

The sight of his familiar visage in the mirror brought him to himself as it always did; and in his habitual manner — and the custom had grown more heavily on him of late — he began a one-sided monologue addressed to this mirrored double.

“Fifty-five years old, old conjurer! And until these last days you’ve not even known what the bards meant when they talked of unreturned love! By Saint Francis, you know what they meant now, and a good deal more than they meant. And yet, what madness! Come down to reality, Master, and think what a woman actually and physically is. Think of her organism! Think of what she’s like — yes, then — yes, and then — don’t shirk it! and then too! But God help you, old fork-beard! It’s no use, and you know it’s no use! We can see her so — and we can see her so — and we can drag down her beauty low and low. But — curse her sweet blood! — it’s not her beauty. It’s something else. God knows what it is! It’s not our ideal of her. It’s her actual self. Isn’t it, old dotard? Isn’t it her actual self? It’s the turn of her head. It’s the way her lips don’t quite meet! It’s that little triangle of freckles above the corner of her mouth. And there’s a freckle by the side of her nose, too! That’s what happens with skins as white as hers. But we like her to be freckled — aye, old grey-beard? — we wouldn’t mind if she had freckles on her breast!” And as he and his double stared at each other the flicker of a smile passed between them; for they recalled a passionate obsession of theirs during these last days — a pure game of the imagination — in which they undressed her by this very mirror. But this smile of theirs soon died down; and the two masks of consciousness, the subjective one and the objective one, exchanged a grotesque grimace, distorting their features into the likeness of a pair of monstrous gargoyles.

The moment their features had relaxed, however, a quite different and still more complicated phenomenon occupied that portion of the magician’s chamber. For if the power possessed by the body of Owen of seeing itself in a mirror created one “mysterious double,” the power possessed by the mind of Owen of analysing its own thoughts created a second mysterious “double”; so that the Prince of Wales at that moment became a four-fold being, became, in fact, what might be called a Quaternity.

But the curious thing was that the existence of this four-fold Owen was of a very transitory duration; for it was not long before the soul of Owen in the absorption of its analysis of the mind of Owen reduced both the image in the mirror and the body before the mirror to complete nothingness. They would have been there had another person entered the room, but to the man’s soul that was analysing the man’s thoughts they were simply not there at all.

Without the least change of position, without any farewell being taken of one another, the body of the Prince of Wales and the reflection of the body of the Prince of Wales vanished away.

Owen's was the only consciousness in that magician's chamber, and to the consciousness of Owen there was now nothing in the mirror and nothing standing before the mirror. There was nothing there at all but what Owen was thinking and what was analysing what Owen was thinking. From a Quaternity the Prince had diminished into a Duality.

And what was the thought in his mind with which his analytical soul was then so busy that it had the power to annihilate both the man before and the man in the mirror? It was the thought of his enemy Gam, chained to the wall in a room next to his own.

So far he'd resisted the temptation to visit him; but such a dark, deadly, quivering sweetness rose up within him when he thought to himself, "He's absolutely in my power," that his soul was constrained to wonder why his giving up Tegolin should have left him vulnerable to so abominable an urge.

And pondering upon this he recalled a curious compendium of Roman history that with the aid of his friend Iolo he used to puzzle out, and he remembered how this chronicle declared that it was only when Tiberius was separated from the woman he loved that he discovered his appalling mania for cruelty.

Struggling against this devil's advocacy on the part of his analytical soul he allowed the red drops from his ear to trickle down disregarded, while to help him against such devilish excuses he deliberately called to mind an odd volume Meredith had shown him the night before which he'd bought from Lemuel Livius for fifty silver groats. The Jew, Meredith said, swore it was worth fifty ducats, but he'd let him have it at that low price because several pages of the script — itself only a portion of the whole work — had been obliterated by the blood of its former owner, on whose murdered body it had been found by the vendor.

Owen couldn’t recall the title of the poem; but it was a fragment in the Tuscan vernacular about Paradise; and it accepted without question the orthodox theory of the revolving spheres. Owen had seen enough of the dark-rolling sea just now, before bloodying his face, to realize that the day was a wet and gloomy one; and as he struggled against his impulse to visit Gam he tried to imagine himself mounting, as this Tuscan pretender declared he’d done, by the help of his sainted mistress, through heavenly circle after heavenly circle, towards the Empyrean.

He was still staring into the mirror; but all he saw there now was a nebulous reproduction of the Tuscan’s spheric heavens as he was whirled upwards! He imagined himself — and didn’t this Florentine, or was he a Sienese, say his mistress did it with her eyes? — drawn up in ecstasy by the very smile — yielding, impassioned, provocative, ravished — of his Maid in armour; and she didn’t stop at either the Primum Mobile or the Empyrean! Through both these divine areas Tegolin drew him — her red hair streaming across the firmament! — until they were — mirabile dictu! — outside Space altogether. He had always been a bold heretic in his magical astrological and alchemical studies. And he had often questioned this orthodox cosmology, so slavishly and ferociously reproduced in these Italian “triads.” And now it seemed to him as if in pure reaction from this conservative poet’s iron-bound universe he were exercising his old trick of exteriorizing his soul as he’d never dared to do it before. For he was exteriorizing Tegolin’s soul along with his! That was a thing he’d never even tried to do with Catharine. Did Rhisiart note — as he gazed into her eyes — that her soul wasn’t there at all? Yes, it was with Tegolin’s soul that he was striding now along the spheroid back of the whole cosmic orb, feeling the wind of outer space on his face, feeling it dry the wet blood on his ear, feeling it heal his longing.

Faster, faster he must stride, for he felt her begin to stir, to struggle, to resist! Rhisiart was enjoying her on the small round earth, and her soul wanted to be enjoyed too, along with her body. Oh, how Rhisiart was enjoying her. He was made for the act of love, that boy — the lean, hawk-nosed, sinewy young rogue — made for overcoming a girl's resistance!

So there you are, soul of Tegolin — struggling to get back to him, struggling to join your body! Well! he must let her go. Ah! there was his forked beard in the mirror again. But how he had loved that narrow-faced boy! Loved him more than anybody in the world except Catharine. Well! why couldn't he be pleased that the boy he loved had the girl he loved? It was the natural consummation — youth to youth, and the old man standing aside! Were they thinking of him at this very moment as they clung? Oh no! no! He didn't want them to think of him while they clung. Not like that — not as hunters think: "What a lovely creature he looked!" as they ate the venison. "Think of your Prince another time, maybe! but not while your kisses are so hot, not while your limbs are—"

His reverie was interrupted by the irritation of a violent tickling. Curse these whoreson fleas! If he'd caught one he'd caught a dozen since Hopkin ap Thomas had been so much in this room! There! He'd got that one anyway. How should he kill it? It was fairly caught. Safe between his finger and thumb. What a hard husk! It was in his power — just as Gam was in his power. What was it about lively independent things — fleas, murderers, or girls — being absolutely in your power, that had such a dark, delicious shiver in it?

Yes, he must visit Gam. A man oughtn't to be left cramped up like that so long. He must unlock the chain and let him stretch his legs. He hadn't had much water either. He must take him a drop of something. That cats' basin would do. Milk for cats, and milk for murderers! "All right my good flea, it's no use struggling: I've got you quite firmly! The question is, are you going to live or are you going to die? You don't know; and I don't know either; though I am your Fate, your Destiny, and your God. What's that you're saying, flea? That you want to live, because you have a lively and a skipping love? I had a love once myself — and I had a tall horse; but my horse is gone, flea, with my love on his back — and where is my servant Rhisiart? Aye? What's that? Talk a little louder, flea. You've got a faint voice for one who comes from the beard of Hopkin. Oh that's it, is it? Owen's between God's finger and thumb, as you're between Owen's? Well! And that's true too."

He moved to the door and opened it with his left hand. Glew the Gryd, grown heavy with years, had been permitted the privilege of a horse-block at Owen's door; and now, roused we might imagine by the indignant spirit of young Madoc, with his decapitated head hanging from its neck by a shred of ghostly skin, the old man blinked in bewildered astonishment to see his master flick something from his fingers into the air, while he uttered the enigmatic words: "May God do the same with me, then!"

"Herald Elphin has been here with news of battle, my Prince."

"Why didn't you let him in?"

"I knocked, but you didn't answer, my Prince."

'What did you say to him?"

"I told him you were engaged with the spirits."

"What else did you tell him?"

"I told him you might be back about noon."

"Back from where?"

"From riding with the spirits on the wings of the wind."

"Gryd—"

"Yes, Master Owen; yes, my Prince?"

"What do you think I am?"

The old man gave him a long, grave, drowsy, sly stare, screwing up his eyes as he did so. "I think you're the son of Griffith Fychan of Glyndyfrdwy, in the vill of Carrog, in the cantref of Edeyrnion."

"What about the spirits then?"

"The House of Powys Fadog has always been—"

"Speak up, old friend! Always been what?"

"Different from the House of Powys Mathrafal!"

"A lame conclusion, Gryd, and a foolish one; for as all the world knows, the belt and the sword of Eliseg — Dewi Sant! but what are you making me say? Off to the guard, my old friend, and tell them to send me Herald Elphin at once."

He closed his door and waited in the passage while the old man, leaving his axe behind him in his haste, hobbled off down the corridor.

"The Maid's victory!" he thought. "That's what it must be. But can they have reached the Usk in less than four days march?"

It was soon evident — when the two figures appeared — that the old one was actually dragging the young one. The Herald of Victory seemed strangely reluctant to speak his news.

"Well, Elphin lad — out with it! A silver groat if the tidings are good!"

"A great battle on the river Monnow, my Prince. Lord Talbot, William Newport, and John Grendor have utterly destroyed our army from Morgannwg, and have retaken with great slaughter the town and cantref of Grosmont."

"On whose authority comes this news?"

“My Prince, the wounded are pouring into Ardudwy, and some have just reached Harlech.”

“Thank you, Elphin. That’ll do. Will you tell Master Broch to come to me at once.”

As soon as Elphin had scampered away, which he did with a speed rather befitting a page than a tabard-bearer, the Prince turned to the old man. “When Broch comes,” he said, “let him into my chamber.”

He pushed open the door. “Get me that basin of milk, Gryd.”

“The cats’ basin, my Prince?”

Owen nodded.

“For him? Is he to live, then?”

But the Prince didn’t answer. Carrying the basin carefully so as not to spill a drop, he walked slowly down the passage, and entered the room where his enemy was chained to the wall. No sooner did Gam see the milk than he scrambled along the ground to the full length of his chain. He seemed to see nothing but the milk; and when Owen held the basin to his mouth he choked and spluttered as he gulped it down, spilling it over his hairy chest and making inarticulate animal noises.

“Gently, gently, man!” murmured Owen, moving back with the basin. But Gam, never a very human figure, continued to strain towards the milk with a countenance so distorted that it made the Prince think of the face of their Harlech Sin-Eater, whom it was the custom to keep only just alive until the bosom of some dead one served him as a table.

Owen let him scrabble for a second or two, not from cruelty, for that mood had passed, but in fascinated wonder. Then he approached him again and allowed him to empty the basin.

This time, the trusted servant of the House of Lancaster did glance up as he gulped and gurgled. “What arms he’s got!” thought the Prince. “Except Broch's I've never seen such muscles!"

When the milk was gone, the man sat on his haunches and stared at his feeder. "You want to live then," murmured Glyn Dŵr in an abstracted tone, more to himself than to the other. "Have you got a love like Hopkin's flea, or are you a married man with a family, like King Harry of England?"

And then he became aware that Gam was prostrating himself before him and tapping the ground with his head.

"What are you doing, man?" he muttered in a low voice. "Have you forgotten how I killed Hywel Sele?"

Gam raised his head. "It's just because of that!" He spoke in a husky grumbling tone, but without any particular emotion. His animal spirits had already begun to feel the good of the milk; and as if accustomed to address superior beings from a position like that of a leashed dog, he proceeded to shuttle to the wall so as to have something against which to lean his back.

Owen mechanically stepped up to him and arranged his chain to his comfort, touching the padlock as he did so as if to test its fastening. Then — this time quite consciously — he slipped his fingers into the pouch of his belt to make sure he had the key. Assured of this fact, he dragged a bench from the hearth and sat down over against his captive, whose red arms, red chest, and touselled red head showed dark in the smoky light.

"What do you mean, 'Just because of that'?"

"I tried to kill you for it, but I couldn't. Your spirits were too strong. Now I know I never shall kill you. I serve the strongest. I served King Hal till your spirits drove him across the Severn. I served Hywel Sele till your spirits put him in the tree. I would have done for you, Prince, for I never strike twice; but your spirits saved you. And now it's you — not the King — not the ghost of Sele — who're my God." He was silent, stretching out his sturdy, leather-bound legs with a groan of physical relief, while the milk he'd gulped down made contented noises in his stomach.

Owen surveyed him thoughtfully.

"What do you think I'm going to do to you?" he asked.

The little red man shrugged his shoulders and made no reply. He seemed to feel that between a man and a man's new God silence was the indicated attitude.

"It's a curious feeling, Gam," Owen remarked, "to know you have an absolute power over another living person."

The ex-servant of King Henry settled himself still more comfortably; and only the faintest puckering of his heavy forehead indicated that he was giving this soliloquy of omnipotence any serious consideration.

"My Lord of Nannau," he brought out suddenly, "used to talk to me like a scholar — just as you do, Prince."

Owen sighed. It was clear that what might be called the metaphysical aspect of his relation to his prisoner was destined to remain a one-sided problem. He took a new line therefore.

"What would Hal Bolingbroke have done," he enquired, "if you'd tried to put your knife into him?"

David Gam's countenance brightened. This was talk he could understand.

"He'd have had fresh bread and fresh water brought to me every day, he replied, "and left just out of my reach."

Owen rose from his bench and regarded the man pensively for some moments. Satisfied by this scrutiny he drew forth the key from inside his jerkin and unlocked the prisoner's iron collar. Both collar and chain fell down with a loud metallic clang on the stone floor, and Gam after a second's pause made a rapturous but clumsy attempt to leap up into the air.

Then he stood before the Prince with his arms folded; but he evidently had something in his mind to say which he found too difficult. Twice he began; and for the first second or two Owen thought the joy of life had turned his head.

But with the third attempt he delivered himself of his trouble. It appeared he had a vague fear that Owen's "spirits," in whose power he considered himself inescapably to be, might begin tormenting him for their private satisfaction, unknown to their master.

"No fear of that, Gam; no fear of that. I swear to you" — and the Prince crossed himself— "on the bones of my mother, that any spirit who dared to disobey me would have to come himself — and none other — and tell me what he'd done."

"And then you'd make him suffer for it, eh?" And the ex-assassin gave himself up to an agreeable vision of this rebellious spirit "suffering for it".

But, attended by his new "familiar," the Prince now returned to his own apartment where he found his friend Broch awaiting him. Old Glew the Gryd certainly gave this red-haired "slave of the lamp" no very sympathetic stare; but he obeyed humbly enough when Owen told him to take the man to the soldiers of the guard and explain that they were to treat him well and give him arms, as a loyal adherent of the national cause.

The following day the truth of the Grosmont disaster was most lamentably confirmed; and not only so, but an unpleasant incident occurred in connection with it, for when the Prince encountered a group of these new refugees in the castle-yard, instead of greeting him with the enthusiasm usually shown by the commonalty to their leader, these unhappy fugitives actually burst into hostile and derisive murmurs, expressing the view that their new ruler from the north lacked the traditional valour and wisdom of their ancestral Arglwydd Rhys.

On the second day after the arrival of these indignant fugitives the castle was thrown into an uproar of excitement by the appearance of a distinguished-looking party of Englishmen bearing a white flag. This party turned out to include not only Denis Burnell from Dinas Bran, bearing Owen's tribute from Salop, but no less a personage than the famous Lollard, Sir John Oldcastle, who, unknown to his master the King, had taken advantage of Denis' business to come on a private mission of his own, which, when plainly put, amounted to little more than pure philosophical curiosity.

Oldcastle had, it is true, been in the field against the Welsh for the last five years, but he had the excuse of his ancient friendship with Owen as a law-student at the Inns of Court, not to speak of a learned correspondence that had passed between him and Master Brut during the latter's trial for heresy before the Bishop of Hereford.

No news of any kind had of late reached Harlech from the Usk. Whether the Abbot of Caerleon was still holding his own with Tudor's and Griffith's help and whether the new army under the Maid of Edeyrnion and Clerk Rhisiart had reached the scene of action was still completely obscure. No word had come from Henry Don either, or from Rhys Ddu; and from what could be gathered from the sullen fugitives from Grosmont it appeared that the defeated Morgannwg host had lacked any competent leadership save that of local free-holders of small experience in arms.

It was characteristic of Owen that the mere reverberation of so many accumulated shocks, and the mere oppression of so much ominous silence, increased rather than diminished his power of mental detachment. Where Henry of England would have been acutely conscious not only of the balance, to an inch, of the swing of the historic pendulum, but of the attitude towards him of his own court and parliament and people, Owen

Glyn Dŵr seemed completely indifferent even to what the Arglwyddes and Catharine thought of him and of the failure of his statecraft.

He received the murmurs of the fugitives from the Monnow with absolute equanimity. He disregarded with an amused smile the protests of both his son-in-law and his brother-in-law over this crazy "parole" allowed to the assassin Gam.

To crown it all he took no energetic measures, indeed he took no measures at all, to stop a movement of serious insubordination worked up by Crach Ffinnant. This ill-timed conspiracy came very near to actual insurrection. Jealousy of the spiritual leadership of the Maid was at the bottom of it. The Maid had always been an enemy of Derfel; nor was Derfel, to judge by the traditions concerning his cult, likely to be propitiated by the Maid.

At any rate Crach Ffinnant began to suggest both to the people of Ardudwy and to the soldiers of the castle that since Owen's handling of the Welsh cause had proved so ineffective it might be a good thing to take the leadership out of his hands and offer it to the Tudors of Môn, especially since the young man, her cousin, to whom Efa ferch Tudor was now affianced, had shown himself, though not a very successful warrior, at least an extremely crafty diplomat.

From this it may be seen that the reckless Scab had his eyes — or his eye, to speak more exactly — still fixed upon this sprightly young lady, once more sojourning among them, who alone among all damsels had actually wished to be Derfel's bride.

Conspiracies of this sort, the Scab told himself, though rising from small beginnings, could grow into world-events if directed by prophetic intuition; and he had found support for his idea that the Druidic "Mona" rather than the Bardic Edeyrnion was the true soil of Welsh victory in one of the mystic poems of the great Hopkin himself, a cywydd that definitely predicted that from Môn would come the red dragon who was destined to unite all Britain.

Everybody but Broch-o’-Meifod had been daily warning the Prince, since the Maid’s departure, of this dangerous activity of the Scab’s; but all the Prince did, as far as his little court could detect, was to devote more time himself to this attractive young woman whose betrothed was the heir of the oldest branch of the House of Tudor.

On the very day of the arrival of Denis and Sir John the besotted Scab had actually persuaded the little Tudor lady, herself of their purest blood and affianced to their craftiest chief, to accompany him to Derfel’s shrine, which was situated at Llandderfel in Meirion, a long day’s ride from Harlech.

The Arglwyddes protested in vain against this mad excursion; but the Prince was obdurate. “If the girl wants to go,” he declared, “let her go. We were responsible for her as a child. She’s a grown woman now. Her betrothed knew what she was doing when she came to us. He sent us no word. He let her follow her whim. Who are we to interfere?”

But worse — from the Arglwyddes’s point of view — was to follow. For when at early dawn, for the road was long and mountainous, the little cortege set out, it was discovered that the Prince had deputed none other than Gam — his late desperate assailant — to be of the party.

It is true that both Lawnslot and Gwalchmai, together with Herald Elphin and the page Iago, made part of Efa’s escort, and there was a small troop of soldiers besides; but if it had been anyone but this incorrigible young Tudor the Arglwyddes would have implored Sir Edmund to accompany them.

Before they set out, however, the thing had been rumoured so far and wide that the expedition took on the shape of a formal pilgrimage from Owen’s court to Llandderfel, for the purpose of consulting the oracle.

The late Abbot of Valle Crucis might talk of gods and demons; but as Father Pascentius said, when the Arglwyddes appeared to him, "No young Lord could object, even in our degenerate days, to his betrothed going on a pilgrimage." If rumour had been active throughout Ardudwy and Arwystli as to the organization of this journey, it spoke with ten times more emphasis and with ten times more lurid unction when the expedition ended as it did.

The most popular version of the tale was that the great statue of Derfel itself had descended from the Horse and attempted to ravish Efa ferch Tudor; while Crach Ffinnant wrestling with the lascivious idol had been miraculously slain.

Another version declared that no sooner had Derfel's Horse caught sight of David Gam than he neighed like a thousand stallions and would have torn him limb from limb, and that, in the struggle between them, the Scab being concealed within the Horse, received Gam's dagger in his heart!

Herald Elphin was the only member of the party who actually saw what happened, and he saw it through so small a chink that the spectacle must have been presented to him in broken segments.

It wasn't till the ride back to Harlech through the cloudy spring night that Herald Elphin had a chance of unburdening his mind of what weighed upon it; and he couldn't have done this if it hadn't been that young Iago from Dinas Bran was his companion. Born in the racial confusions of the border, trained by his ambitious friend Rawlff to listen with discretion and keep his thoughts to himself, constantly watching the artful ways of old Adda, that dove-like pacifist with the guile of the serpent, not Father Pascentius himself — and the Father had never yet been able to coax or bully one single genuine confession from this youthful courtier — was a better confidant than Iago for dangerous secrets.

In his relations with his friend, though he was five years the elder, Elphin was like an excitable girl compared with this thick-skinned youth. Poor Elphin! he was more than excited that night. It was a crisis in his life. He underwent — and he realized it in a measure, too — a complete psychological transformation.

All the castle — as these agitating days came and went — began to recognize the change; but the person who got the greatest benefit from it was Elphin himself, for his shocking vision, even through so small a chink, into the underflow of life, gave him what might be called the courage of his own timidity.

None but a born listener like the young Iago would have let him ramble on as he did, while they followed the wind-blown torches. Their track led them along a wild mountainous path, with the waters, first of Lake Tegid and then of the broad sea-estuary, lying dim and ghostly beneath them.

The cortege had to move very slowly; and, as it was, the soldiers who carried the corpse of the Scab were hard put to keep pace with the horses of the lady's escort, near whose person, acting as guide when they approached the estuary, strode the obedient servant of Owen's "spirits."

Elphin's listener soon discovered that there was to be no attempt by the relater of the weird tale that fell upon his ears, as the bare slopes and rocky ridges of Cadair Idris towered above them, to assume the heraldic tone of the professional announcer of dramatic events.

Elphin spoke simply and directly; concealing nothing of the less heroic moments of his behaviour or of his less honourable emotions. He explained that the curious Gothic Betws, or Oratory, built near the Llandderfel parish-church, outside which everybody but Efa ferch Tudor and Crach Ffinnant were compelled to wait, was the prehistoric headquarters of the worship of Saint Derfel.

“Derfel Gadarn fought by Arthur’s side at the Battle of Camlan,” Elphin kept repeating. Indeed the excitable young man, in his unending monologue, used this majestic sentence about “the Battle of Camlan” very much as the compilers of the Psalter used the syllables “Selah”, with the effect of a liturgical echo or muted antiphony after the Psalmist’s more passionate notes.

For all his calculated detachment in human affairs, the vigilant Iago wasn’t devoid of a certain lonely and quite special response to the subhuman elements in Nature; and it would have been an added shock to poor Elphin in his emotional confession had he realized the cold-blooded abstraction with which his hearer observed the majestical panorama of earth and sea. It was only at intervals, as they followed the estuary among the mountains, that with the lifting of the mist by some gust of south-west wind the unruffled stars of Idris, the Giant-Astronomer, rose into view above his rocky throne. But, when this did occur, the vision of that winding stretch of tidal water, as the dark mountain and white stars looked down upon it, appealed to something in him that he’d never revealed to anyone, and was convinced in his own mind that he never would reveal to anyone!

“Did they know Master Gam had entered the Betws, behind them?” enquired Iago, when the mountain mists once more swept over that phantom arm of the salt sea.

“I told you,” replied Elphin reproachfully. “Didn’t you hear what I said? I told you that I was sure Efa ferch Tudor knew that Master Gam was there! I could see her eyes shine when he first came in. He must have hidden behind a pillar. The place was full of pillars, like the dining-hall at Snowdon; only these were stone ones. He must have opened the door so quietly that the Scab didn’t hear.”

"No woman that I've ever known," threw in his cynical hearer, as if he were hoary with such experiences, "could see a man like Gam hide behind a pillar and not scream out."

"Luned wouldn't have screamed out."

"She certainly would," said the other. "Indeed she did."

"When?"

"Never mind when."

"You don't know anything about Luned!"

But Iago stared at the starlit water, as the wind once more swept the mist aside, and held his peace. He recalled without any sense of shame, but also without any particular feeling of pleasure, the occasion when he had completed the virile task from which his enamoured friend had shrunk.

But Elphin went on. The lad was shaking with so much excitement that neither the flickering torches nor the swaying corpse, no! nor even the horses and their riders, had any reality for him. He craved one thing only — to tell, to tell! He felt as if — until he'd told — something would burst in his heart and drown his life in blood.

"The Betws wasn't dark. It was only that I couldn't see anything but what was just in front of me. It was the Leper's window I think. The Scab couldn't take his eye off the lady. She was smiling at him. She was playing the whore with him."

The obscuring of the estuary had coincided at that moment with the disappearance, behind the next turn of the path, of the torches and their burden. There — the riders were out of sight, too! The lads were alone on the mountain-side.

Elphin laid his hand on his companion's wrist. "It's the eyes," he whispered hoarsely. "I can't get the eyes out of my mind."

"Whose eyes?"

"She was playing the whore with him. She was making him mad."

"Whose eyes?"

"I couldn't see the Saint's face — only his knees and his hands. He's on his Horse, you know. She was making him mad, I tell you! He was whispering to her — I couldn't hear — but he was wanting her to give herself up, to offer herself up."

"To him! And she a Tudor from Môn, and he—"

"No, no! It wasn't like that! Oh, can't I make you see how it was? Won't you see how it was, Iago? It's the eyes I can't get out of my head!"

"He's only got one."

"I'm not talking of him! I tell you she was making him mad. But it wasn't her. She didn't do it. And though I saw him strike with his knife, it wasn't Gam who killed him."

"What in heaven's name are you talking about, Elphin? Hurry up and tell me! We can't stand here all night." As he spoke, Iago turned his head to look at the estuary beneath them. The wind was faintly moaning just then through the branches of a Scotch fir above their heads; and through his sturdy frame Iago felt a surge of a curious exultation. "It's the sea-tide," he thought, as he gazed at the grey waters; and for some reason the idea of this alien salt stream forcing its way so far inland gave him extraordinary pleasure.

"Tell me quick, Elphin," he repeated. "We can't wait here forever. Did she lie down for him? Is it her eyes you're talking about — and she a Tudor of Môn and he—"

Elphin tightened his grasp upon the younger lad's wrist and tried to speak calmly. "It's not of her I'm talking, Iago, nor of the Scab. And I'm not speaking of the Saint either; for I could only see his knees and his hands and that great painted rod, like an axle-tree, which he carries. I'm talking," and here Elphin's voice grew so low that his friend had to strain his ear, "about Derfel's Horse. Have you ever seen those fish they bring up from the Bottomless Hole, pwll diwaelod, a mile out beyond Madoc's Haven — what eyes they have?

"They're the eyes of y fagddu and yr abred! They're the eyes of the abyss! And they were looking at him, at the Scab, as she led him on, as she played the whore upon him. Her eyes drew him, mocked him, maddened him, but the eyes of Derfel's Horse swallowed him up. They were dead eyes. Yes, they were the eyes of the Devourer of the Dead. They were the eyes, Iago, of the Sea-Horse of Annwn!"

"Let me tell you something, Elphin," and the youthful seducer of Luned deliberately extracted from his pouch a sweet-meat of a particular kind the girl was wont to make for both of them, and breaking it in his fingers, offered the half to his bosom-friend. "You're as much of a fool as our noble Prince! Why don't you imitate Clerk Rhisiart? There is a man! The accepted lover, one after the other, of the two most lovely women in the world. And all got by his brain. Do you understand, Elphin, you trembling fool? Got by his brain! Nobody who lives could call Clerk Rhisiart handsome. He can't ride anything but that old piebald. He can't hold a lance, or handle anything but his pen; and yet there he is, going off with the Maid of Edeyrnion — snatching her from the arms of Owen! It's brains we want in this world, my dear, not chatter about wooden-horses with the eyes of—"

But at this point the incalculable wind rose with a rush and howl and revealed to the eyes of this sagacious youth the one thing that had the power of reducing his brains to complete non-existence — the sight of his nature-estuary in clear starlight. It was indeed the vision of Elphin dragging Iago from his obsessed contemplation of this scene that met the suspicious eyes of Gwalchmai when in obedience to Master Gam he came to find out why the lads were lingering.

But the same south-west wind that gave Iago that fortunate moment soon covered everything with such a cloud that it was only the dullest simulacrum of a red glare that indicated where the torches were moving; while the horses of Efa and Gam were completely obscured.

And Elphin took advantage of this cloud, as they went on, to make it clear to Iago how the girl from Môn played upon the lechery of the luckless Scab till it was aroused to a point so desperate that, shameless coward as he was, he was prepared to risk everything to satisfy it.

It was only when his friend arrived, in the course of his feverish narrative, to the moment when the one-eyed man had actually got her down and was fumbling at her garments that the impervious Iago began to manifest any interest.

“Was she frightened? Did she struggle?” he asked.

“I’ve just been telling you,” complained Elphin crossly, “that to the very end she kept leading him on. I couldn’t see Master Gam till the last, but I think he had his knife in his hand and had left the pillar. I think she saw him all the while and knew what he was going to do! Do you know, Iago, I believe it had all been arranged by the Prince beforehand! Well — perhaps not all — for I don’t think the Prince could have believed any girl in the world would let a man like that go as far as she let him go before she made the sign. But what I don’t think any of them counted on was Derfel’s Horse. Of course I never saw the Saint’s face, for I could only see his hands and his knees and his rod of—”

“If you go through that business again,” interrupted his friend, “and say one more word about Derfel’s rod being like an axle-tree I’ll beat you like a dog!”

Elphin wondered what Luned would have thought had she heard this violent language uttered by a mere page-boy to the Castle Herald; he was himself far too girlish to take it amiss. He took it as a woman might take the threat of a blow from a rough but easily-managed mate. It endeared Iago to him, and indeed was one of the strongest links in the bond between them, that the latter should be able to threaten in that particular tone to "beat him like a dog."

The darkness at this point became so dense that they had to look to their feet as they went along; and the fact that the torches in front of them had come to resemble a number of blurred red bruises on the flesh of a troop of dusky tumblers indicated that the soldiers who were carrying Crach Ffinnant's corpse had had to lessen their pace and to change their position about their burden.

Unable to enjoy his favourite sight of the grey arm of the salt sea thrust between the precipices of the mountains, Iago began, one of his cheeks still bulging with Luned's sweet-meat, to press his friend as to how he was so certain that when her assailant's body was pulled away Efa ferch Tudor was still a maid.

"I think," replied the excited Herald, whose coveted rank was only indicated to-day by the now invisible black lions on his leather surcote, "I think that she had meant to make the sign sooner; but you must know, Iago" — and he addressed his companion in the superior tone of Luned's lover explaining matters to their boyish confidant— "that there comes a moment when to yield is such sweet abandonment to them that they can't—"

"I'm asking you whether—"

"If you interrupt any more, Iago, I'll never tell you another word!"

"One of the soldiers told me," threw in his companion, "that he heard Derfel's Horse neigh!"

“I’m the only person in this company, Iago, who saw and heard everything. She never made the sign, but Gam leapt on him; and I heard him go ‘ugh! ugh!’ — just like that — first when he struck him, and then when he flung his weight on the knife and thrust it in.”

“Did his blood—”

“Don’t interrupt me! What does it matter about his blood? She laughed as she got up.”

The two lads were now so put to it by the difficulty of keeping the torches in sight, as their path wound its way down to the sea’s edge, that they were forced to keep silence. And once on the level coast, with the lights from the fisher-huts shining on the shore-road their mood changed and they began to discuss the war.

“He’ll go when he’s got his storm-spirits ready, Iago. I know what he’s doing. No one in the castle but Master Broch and me knows what he’s doing. You can’t hurry Beings as awful as the ones he’s working with now. But you’ll see! When he’s ready, he’ll go, and his spirits with him. And — you’ll see! — there won’t be an Englishman left in Wales. Why do you whistle like that, Iago?”

“Because you’re such a fool, Elphin. He’s waiting for the French — they’re the ‘spirits’ he’s waiting for; and if they don’t come soon—”

“Well? Go on! What if they don’t come? Wales doesn’t depend on a scurvy rabble of cross-bowmen from Normandy and Brittany and Anjou.”

“You don’t think so?”

“‘No, I don’t think so! I think if the country goes on crowding to his standard he’ll have the biggest force in arms in all Europe, and the bravest too! Wait half a year longer, and you’ll see. We shall be marching over London Bridge before—”

Iago stopped whistling. “Elphin, listen. Do you know what Meredith ab Owen said to Mistress Lu the other night?”

“I don’t know and I don’t care! Meredith ab Owen can’t walk half across the court-yard without having to lean against the wall!”

“What’s that got to do with it? And only last night the dwarf told me that Rhys Gethin rose up in bed and said he saw the whole castle in flames and the Arglwyddes and Lady Mortimer carried away on mules.”

“Why on mules? How silly you are, Iago! If the English did take the castle they couldn’t burn it. Fire can’t burn stone. And why on mules? Rhys Gethin would do better to say his prayers and die in peace. Only a man in a fever could imagine the Arglwyddes on a mule!”

Iago sighed. “Now Clerk Rhisiart’s gone to battle,” he thought, “there’s not a soul in Harlech who uses his brains. I am the only one. Oh, Clerk Rhisiart, Clerk Rhisiart, what a great man you are! You’re our only real statesman. The Prince will come to destruction without you. So will we all. But if I escape I’ll imitate you, Clerk Rhisiart, in everything! I’ll rise slowly and steadily, by brains and by women. Yes, like Clerk Rhisiart, I’ll be the secret lover of several women at the same time and I’ll take for my Master the ruler who has the most brains and for my—”

His enlightened and logical train of thought was interrupted — as it had been so often that evening — by the darkness clearing from the surface of the estuary. The estuary’s mouth was now near; and a stone promontory could be seen with a lantern in its watch-tower, a lantern whose light flickered up and down on the waves along with a small boat, in whose stern a couple of fishermen slept, covered with sheepskin blankets. Iago’s whole being was promptly transported with a rush of ecstasy. Something in his blood and in the pit of his stomach responded blindly to this sight, and then and there it made a furtive league with the sea, promising itself to outwit every rational decision of his brain.

The pit of his stomach uttered its own language in his ears, using blunt and illogical predictions. “You’ll imitate no Rhisiart at all!” it said. “What you’ll do is to imitate Prince Madoc, and sail the four seas! That’s where Welshmen can get their liberty, whatever Welsh heads moulder on London Bridge! To sea, to sea, Iago ap Cynan!”

The morning that followed the death of Crach Ffinnant proved to be the darkest and most disastrous morning the Prince had ever known. Derfel’s prophet lay in the already crowded death-room of the castle when Owen went to say a prayer for his soul. Here the corpse must remain till the Sin-Eater had been well nourished from a capacious alms dish on its breast. Then and then only it would be removed to the chapel. There was no Father Rheinalt to keep Mistress Lowri — whose passion for mortality was well-known in the castle — from visiting this temporary mausoleum; but for some reason best known to her own secretive and capricious Tudor heart Efa herself — the direct cause of the man’s death — did public penance by remaining on her knees on the stone for more hours than any damsel of Owen’s court had ever known a woman kneel, whether old or young.

She was there — a huddled young figure — when the Prince appeared; and she didn’t move when he went up to the body; but it was at the moment when he lifted the cloth placed over the prophet’s face, and in his imagination was beholding one of the eyelids raised, and that predatory blue orb fixing him with a ribald stare, that Owen first heard the uproar outside the walls.

He replaced the face-cloth, passed the girl without a word, and hurried to a high window in the passage, the very window out of which his Secretary had helped little Lu to look. Here for the flickering of a second it was his destiny to know what Mad Huw's rejected monarch must so often have experienced.

Half the population of the township seemed to be gathered on the beach, and they were shouting for him, but shouting for him not with love or devotion, but with anger and contempt. The sea was calm and the tide far out; but it was a gloomy morning and the angry shouts of the mob took the place of the receding waters. Their clamour rose in waves against the grey walls; and the wild foam of their wrath beat against the buttresses and scaled the ramparts like the whirling wings of a host of screaming cormorants.

The Prince stood for one second watching and listening, while down the fibres of his thighs and legs ran an unaccustomed shiver, as if his warm woollen hose had suddenly been transformed into the scales of an ice-cold fish. But almost instantaneously his powerful will went through its mechanical gesture of recovery, a gesture which to his unconscionable self-analysis resembled the lifting of an interior dam.

"Well," he said to himself, "these are the experiences of all Princes! Gruffydd ap Cynan had to face worse things than this." Hurrying down the stairs he overtook Elphin and Iago, and caught the drift of their talk. Elphin was murmuring something about "the spirits," while Iago was regretting the absence of Rhisiart.

Arrived in the court-yard he found the Arglwyddes and John Hanmer already there. A crowd of soldiers about them were talking loudly and not very respectfully; and as they talked they perfunctorily armed themselves. Disregarding his wife and brother-in-law, he pushed his way to the postern that opened upon the sea-shore.

Here he found Meredith, unarmed and leaning on his stick; while at his side old Glew the Gryd was struggling with a great rusty bar that for years had been out of use, while the gate itself kept shivering from top to bottom with the blows it was receiving from outside.

Meredith and the Prince exchanged a quick look. Then they both smiled. "You'll risk it, I suppose, sir, and talk to them?"

"They won't rush us, my boy, will they?"

"It won't be you, sir, if they do!" and he turned to the old Porter. "Put down that iron thing, Glew, and open the gate. The Prince will talk to his subjects!"

The old man looked at his master in troubled dismay; but at Owen's nod he slowly removed what bolts there were and dragged the gate open. So suddenly was this done that the leaders of the mob who were striking at the door stumbled headlong into the court, while the billets of wood they carried fell heavily at the Prince's feet.

At the sight of Owen, towering there in that narrow entrance, their followers backed away, while they themselves, seeing the armed guards and the Arglwyddes in front of them, shrank in embarrassed discomfiture against the interior wall.

The foremost ranks of the crowd, however, though endeavouring to retreat, were pushed forward by those behind; while the howls from the rear rose unappeased and incessant. "Give us the murderer of our prophet! Saint Derfel for the Scab! Give us the murdering traitor!"

Owen raised his right hand. "Men of Harlech, men of Ardudwy—"

"Will he do it, will he, will he?" thought Meredith, propping himself against the open postern and trying to make out the nature and character of the rebels, and what local types they represented.

But even before the son had come to the conclusion that the leaders of the mob were a group of obstinate Derfelites who had been reluctant to follow the army of the Maid, fanatics such as Saint Jude calls "clouds without water," the Prince had hypnotized them into sullen, helpless, paralysed passivity. This, however, wasn't enough for him, and using the full force of his powerful voice and magnetic charm, he proceeded by a mixture of cajoling and pleading and threatening to change their mood into one so different, that as Meredith watched them they seemed to him like a great shoal of heaving porpoises, fascinated and allured by some majestic figure-head upon a vessel sailing close to the wind!

This day of evil for Owen had, however, only just begun; for no sooner was the riot about the dead prophet quelled than far worse and far more devastating troubles began. The insurrection of the Scab's mourners had come from the sea-entrance to the castle; but now there burst in from the main entrance, straight into the base-court, encountering the Prince as he was making his way to the Arglwyddes' side where Sir Edmund and Catharine already stood, a ghastly and pitiful fugitive.

Catharine was the first to see this figure, and big with child as she was she staggered into its arms. The man she thus greeted looked like some victim newly risen from the scaffold; for his clothes were sticky with blood and there were wisps of straw and of dead bracken clinging to him, while the hairs of his beard, which were of a week's growth, had turned white with what he'd been through.

Owen at first glance didn't recognize him at all, nor apparently did Sir Edmund; and it was left to the dwarf to cry out in her piercing voice. "It's the Father! It's the Father!" Nor did the little woman content herself with this; for no sooner had she realized the condition of the Maid's parent than she began to emit the most heart-rending sounds that the Prince had ever heard. To his ears they resembled the screams of a hare when the dogs are upon her; though Father Pascentius, who was now entering the court along with the two Englishmen, at once began looking about for Broch-o'-

Meifod’s dog, so much did these sub-human shrieks recall to him the méthode scientifique of Gilles de Pirogue.

Certainly it was like an animal and unlike a person, the power the dwarf possessed of emitting these sounds without falling into blind hysterics. But though the syllables with which she interspersed her cries consisted of nothing but the name “Rhisiart”, repeated over and over, the repetition of this name did humanize to some extent these painful howls.

It was no doubt the dwarf’s repetition of the name “Rhisiart,” conveying, as it did, to everybody present the notion that the man was dead, that made the Prince think it was one of her fainting-fits that left Lady Mortimer so long in the fugitive’s arms.

This, however, was by no means the case. If she wasn’t like her father, in his power of exteriorizing his soul, she was like him in being able to call up from some secret reservoir in her nature a spiritual force that seemed almost non-human.

And it was Catharine who now, disregarding both her parents exactly as the Prince was disregarding her mother, began questioning Father Rheinalt before them all. It was the monk who leaned against her, not she against him; and it was she, for his words were faint, who repeated them in a clear voice for the benefit of all present.

Herald Elphin was irresistibly reminded of the occasion when as a pageboy at Glyndyfrdwy he heard this same daughter of Owen rescue the last words of Iolo Goch from vanishing uninterpreted into the void. She held her head high while the exhausted monk clung to her arm, and she uttered the fatal words clearly.

“Our cause has had a terrible defeat. Codnor met our army at Pwll Melyn and drove it through the Usk into the forest of Monkswood. My — my lord Griffith — is — is a prisoner and—” But there rose a terrible cry from the Arglwyddes, a cry rather of wrath than of grief; wrath taking grief by the hair and whirling her among the rocks and nailing her to the rocks! Never from that time on, though she softened to him again more than once, did the Arglwyddes from the very bottom of her heart forgive the sacrifice of her eldest son. Her maidens crowded round her, but she thrust them back. “What else, Catharine? What else can there be, Catharine?” they heard her moan; and everyone near them saw the terrible look she gave Owen, though if she said anything to him it was lost in the ring of her daughter’s voice.

“My Lord Tudor ap Griffith was slain in the battle. The Abbot of Caerleon was slain in the battle. But he says further” — here the girl had to make an heroic effort not to break down— “he says further that his daughter, Tegolin ferch Rheinalt, together with her husband, Rhisiart ab Owen, have been — have been taken prisoners.”

While Lady Mortimer was playing her part as the messenger of death and ruin and captivity, Father Pascentius, leaving Oldcastle and Denis to the care of Elphin, in whose heraldic lions they pretended a protracted interest, himself moved heavily forward towards the girl.

It was of Rhisiart and of Rhisiart alone he thought as he listened to her words. Not a single soul in the place cared a farthing for him, now Rhisiart was gone! There was nobody now, in the whole castle, to whom he could even mention the Cardamine Pascentius. The Prince, he knew, disliked and misunderstood him. To Broch-o’-Meifod he was merely a clumsy gloss upon Saint Thomas. Meredith always put on his most ironical mask when he approached.

Yes, Catharine might faint when she thought of her lover; but she had her children and her husband. Owen too had his favourite Meredith. But if the Herald were to announce tomorrow, “Father Pascentius lies a-dying in his cell,” not a soul in Harlech would as much as cross himself! How curious, when you came to think of it, that anyone who drank up the spectacle of life with the relish he did should be loved only by one person in the whole world!

“Oh, Rhisiart my son, my son Rhisiart! Will they torture you to get Owen’s secrets out of you? Are you dead already on some Hereford scaffold?”

But if a film gathered over Father Pascentius’ eyes as he heard this repetition of “slain in battle” and “prisoner of the English,” the thought of his brother caused Owen’s mouth to twitch like a child’s, and big tears to trickle shamelessly down upon his grey beard.

“She’s been ravished to death by now,” he said to himself. “It’s she who has perished under Hopkin’s ‘black flag.’” But though he told himself this, it was for Tudor not for her he wept; Tudor who had jumped that stream at which he himself had balked!

By degrees he became aware that Sir Edmund had carried Catharine away, that Father Pascentius had departed with Father Rheinalt, and that Luned— “How big her belly’s grown! I’ll be hearing tales of her soon!” — had managed to convey the heart-stricken dwarf from this arena of evil tidings.

The two English gentlemen, he now observed, not so accustomed as his own court to his reveries and abstractions, were slowly and sympathetically approaching him. He raised his hand to his beard — let it fall to his side — straightened his shoulders — and was preparing to greet them with a polite smile when the image of Rhisiart, torn from his bride to be horribly slain on the scaffold, so twisted his mouth that up to his face went his hand again, even as he made his bow.

But the forces of disaster — were they directed merely by some pure accident of planetary transit? — hadn’t yet reached the culmination; for while the two Englishmen were still some paces away, the Arglwyddes rushed between him and them, her countenance transfigured by blind wrath.

In all her years with Owen this was the one sole time when she lost her incomparable self-control. And just because of the uniqueness of the occasion it was the more shocking.

Nothing in the world but the fate of her eldest son could have roused her to such a pitch. John Hanmer was at her side trying in vain to calm her. Sir John Oldcastle and Denis Burnell drew back. But their previous discretion was lost. They drew back in a manner that betrayed an indignant masculine free-masonry. "Our wives," their expression said, "are under better control!"

But looking straight in the Prince's face, and making no attempt to lower her voice, the Arglwyddes poured forth the whole torrent of the fury that swirled up within her portly frame. Even in the tempest of her emotion she kept her head — as the most angry women know well how to do — sufficiently to pierce him where the armour was weakest and the flesh most sensitive. In one sentence she'd broken his skin, in two she'd touched the quick of his master-nerve, in three she'd so transfixed his soul that it was outraged beyond escape. Her grand taunt was cowardice. "You didn't dare, you didn't dare," she kept repeating, "to go to the Usk yourself because of Hopkin's prophecy. And so where you didn't dare to go you sent your son. No wonder King Harry despises you! He goes to battle himself and the blows he gets he takes — like the man he is! You're not a man. You're a false-prophet and a preacher of vain words! Oh yes! When it comes to lifting your hand and stroking your beard and acting the great monarch, you can do it to perfection. But when it comes to leading your men to the battlefield — you let your son do that! Why haven't you long ago put off that circle of gold from your well-combed grey hairs and let my brave unadorned Griffith be Prince? Then he'd be safe now, and not in Henry's hands, and you'd be in a cloister playing Saint Francis with that — with that girl as your holy Clare! But oh no! you won't do that; you'll be that conjurer, you'll be the magician — Ho there! Spirits of the Pit, rise to the aid of Prester Owen!—" and the poor lady, overcome by a flood of hysterical sobs, turned her back upon him, and supported by her brother moved off to the castle steps.

That night there was held a most lively discussion in Herald Elphin's chamber. He had persuaded Luned — for the Arglwyddes had retired early and the Prince sat long over his wine with the two Englishmen — to come and taste a special bottle of home-made cordial that had been sent him by his parents from Cruc in Edeyrnion. Iago ap Cynan was there too, and the young men were listening to a warm defence of the Arglwyddes from their girl-friend.

It was hard for Elphin to grasp the full import of the tragic news that had come that day. His mind kept wandering to what he had seen through that fatal chink in the Llandderfel Betws. He was also feeling proud of his new quarters; for the Castle Herald had an official chamber all his own, and upon its walls he had hung a rough picture he had himself daubed upon wood, of Luned caressing a unicorn. He had learnt the rudiments of painting at a monastic school; and in one of the castle libraries he had found a book devoted to the history of unicorns. And now in some vague and even mystic manner he had hesitated not to endow this beast, whose head was lifted to the sky, with an extremely human expression, an expression resembling that of a celestial Herald.

To this work of art he had endeavoured to call his companions' attention; not directly but indirectly, referring several times in the course of their discussion about the scene in the base-court to the general subject of heraldic beasts. He found it much easier, however, to draw Luned from the topic of mothers and sons by reverting to Efa ferch Tudor's prolonged vigil over the corpse of the Scab, and by alluding to the psychological question as to whether, when a maid has reached the very edge of yielding to a rape, there comes to be established between her and her assailant some dark, sweet, fatal passion-link that lingers on long after she has escaped the actual peril to her virtue.

This seemed a topic that gave a more piquant flavour to their Turkish sweet-meats and Cruc wine than the problem of the part played in heraldry by legendary beasts.

But Elphin's room that night seemed exceptionally appealing to the lad's own sensibility. A rough sketch upon parchment of a second unicorn, this one with its head between Luned's knees, lay upon a table under his window, and on the window-ledge, a rare possession in a Harlech chamber, was a flower-pot with snowdrops in it. He'd thrown some cedar-wood on his hearth under the excuse of entertaining a lady, and he felt like the Herald of all Britain when he rose from his seat to snuff the wicks of his two candles.

Luned settled herself luxuriously in her host's big embroidered chair by the fire. She threw back her mantle and stretched out her legs towards the hearth, making no attempt to conceal the life-bearing promise of her rounded belly. She joined in their talk, which grew every moment more wilful, critical, and passionate; but under all her prudent strictures upon Elphin's idealism and Iago's cynicism there ran a deep, undulating, brimming tide of unspoken exultation.

She didn't formulate her Magnificat in any definite thought, far less express it in words, but her inner consciousness kept setting the palpable weight of this new life within her, as if upon some invisible, planetary scales, against the lurid horrors of her companions’ talk.

The more comfortably did she settle herself, and the more luxurious did she feel, with the wine on her palate and the sticky sweet-meat on her lips, the deeper grew the delicious unease of her child’s movements within her body.

Without being aware of it, both the lads, as they argued with each other and showed off before her, drew the magnetism of their self-assertion from that gently-breathing, calmly-resting rondure above her dwindled lap. Her great belly, as the fire-light fell upon it, seemed to throw into a diminished perspective the tragic disasters the lads were discussing.

Without their knowing why it was so, the spread sail and lifted anchor of Iago’s escape over the sea, and that fabulous encircling of heraldic beasts by multitudinous spring-flowers which was Elphin’s ideal, kept waxing more and more dominant in the young men’s secret thoughts, for all their discussion of the “drawing and quartering” of Rhisiart, of the ravishing of Tegolin, of the death of Tudor, and of the last stand of the heroic Abbot of Caerleon.

This orbic promise of the unconquerable continuity of life, resting there heavy with the future between Luned’s diminished lap and expanding breasts, threw round every image that was evoked in those lads’ talk a muted remoteness, a softening of emphasis, a recession into far-off vistas of perspective. The girl’s own mind, as she sipped Elphin’s cordial and let the sweet-meats dissolve against her palate, languidly travelled back over the years of her life. She thought how she had always longed for a child; how she had loved Rhisiart; how she had hoped against hope that he might be her child’s father. She thought of poor Rawlff, how devoted to her he’d been, but how his ambition and his boastful arrogance had made a barrier between them.

And then as she listened to Elphin's talk about Owen and his familiar spirits a curious smile parted her lips. Many an amorous scene with this pretty lad floated across her mind. She had never loved him, she told herself — she had loved none but Rhisiart — but so much had she longed for a child that if he'd only been more of a man she would have let him do it. And then, still with the same vague maternal smile, the real recipient of which was the unborn being within her, she glanced at Iago. "If Elphin hadn't tantalized me so," she thought, "and stirred me up so, I'd never have yielded to you, you little know-all sailor-boy!"

And she smiled a rich, wine-scented, sweet-meat sticky smile, as her eyes met those of her young seducer. It was a much more equivocal smile, however, than the bold Iago supposed, as he thought to himself with treacherous satisfaction that she was his, and not his friend's. "No," her smile really said, "I used you, my good boy, to get my child, but if you think I love you, or that I'm your victim, mightily are you mistaken! Oh Rhisiart, Rhisiart, what are they doing to you as we sit here?"

But the queer thing was that she would envisage even Rhisiart's death without anything more than a gentle pity. "I suppose," she thought, as she puzzled over this, "that when a girl's like I am, and has these feelings within her, it's you," and she apostrophized her unborn, "who are the one — you, you, my darling, and nobody else!"

Meanwhile Elphin was assuring them with vehement words that it was impossible that Owen should ever really be defeated. The lad had removed his official costume and stood before them in white tunic and white hosen; and as he lifted up his impassioned face, with the curls falling upon his bare shoulders and the candlelight throwing into relief his rounded hips and slender thighs, it crossed Luned’s mind that he looked more like a Herald of Saint Gabriel than of any earthly prince.

“But a girl doesn’t want beauty in her child’s father, does she, my pet? She wants courage and wisdom, knightly courage and clerkly wisdom!” and she sighed deeply, thinking of Rhisiart on the scaffold.

“Owen’s great year,” declared Iago dogmatically, “was the year after Bryn Glas, the year before he took this castle. This castle’s been his ruin! There’s something about this castle that’s enervated him and turned him from war to magic. And I’ll tell another thing. Having a castle has given him a conventional court with a retinue and a sly Archdeacon Young, or Archbishop Young or Bishop Young, as he’ll soon be. And having a court he must needs listen to wind-bags like that rascal Hopkin, who’s far worse than poor old Crach” — and the lad crossed himself— “and he must needs think of Tegolin ferch Rheinalt, God guard her red hair! When we Welshmen are great is when we’ve got a leader who can move like a dark storm up and down the land — hit them here, hit them there, harry them day and night, and never meet them in formal battle-array. He’s thinking now — you mark my words! — of nothing but these damned Frenchmen. ‘When the French come,’ he’s thinking, ‘we’ll march on London’. But I tell you this, you two. What he ought to do is leave this curst Harlech, where there’s a spell and a tynghed on every stone, and go back to the wild woods and play the game he played at first — rushing about the country and rousing the common people — and looting the greasy merchants of the market-towns. What we want is a thunder-and-lightning leader in the field, not a magician in a closet! Never mind the whoreson castles, is what I say! Keep to the mountains; dodge their lumbering troops. Rule Wales from the good greenwood, until we tire the rogues out!”

He had been pacing up and down the room in his excitement; but, "Why does she smile at me like that?" he thought, as he sat down, leaving the whole chamber vibrating to his bold tones.

But though it was Iago and not Elphin who'd given her her unapproachable superiority, it was Elphin and not Iago who gazed with awe at that great belly, as if it were a planetary orb heavy with fate. She was wearing a garment of light green, very much like the leaves of the snowdrop in his flower-pot, and this particular colour intensified the rotundity it concealed.

Whatever the girl's own feelings were for the living creature that was the burden of her noble amplitude, to Elphin it wasn't so much the child within it, as the actual rondure of her belly itself, that was so beautiful, so miraculous. In the strength of his idealism he had from the start been trying to persuade himself that his own ineffectual embraces were the cause of this miracle; and his head was so full of unicorns surrounded by thousands of flowers that this miraculous rondure seemed like a great water lily in bud, and the girl's equivocal smile like a ripple upon a sacred pond that was his and his alone.

He grew more and more fascinated by the spacious curves of the serene convexity opposite him. And yet he thought, "How unashamed she is! I thought girls always wrapped mantles round them. And this thin green stuff's as filmy as a flower's calix! She feels like me when I've done a good piece of work and just sit back and think. I'm an artist as well as the cause of that big belly; and though I may be the youngest herald in 'Ynys Prydein' I'm the best heraldic painter north of the Severn. I can't, I know, compete yet with Master Trundle of Shoreditch" — and the lad recalled specimens of this expert's work that he'd seen at Saint Matthew's Fair— "but once let Owen's spirits give us peace and I'll soon challenge him!"

And Elphin’s thoughts ran upon all the rich artistic achievements of the flamboyant century just over.

“I was born too late,” he thought. “This modern age has no taste for art! All it cares for are the quarrels of Popes and Princes and the Inventing of Heresies and the Burning of Heretics. Oh! those exquisite windows in Valle Crucis! Who can do work like that today? Why didn’t Father Pascentius let me go on with the choir-stalls? Because he’s a perfect example of the science and logic of this age! He thinks of nothing but confuting Lollards.”

Gazing rapturously at the girl in the chair, and thinking of her form as his handiwork, he recalled certain beautiful grotesques he had designed for the chapel choir-stalls, but had never been allowed to use. Luned’s maternal curves in their green vesture began to assume for him symbolic shapes — shapes of life’s fecundity from all the elements of Nature. The girl’s belly became a capacious gourd in a rich stubble-field. It became a great satiny puff-ball carried over the fields on a warm south wind. It became an iridescent bubble, mounting up from a fern-shadowed fountain. It became a floating Nautilus, bright and gleaming, luring him towards a fairy estuary, where by the reeds of salt-marshes that were neither land nor sea, calm, tame, beautiful-eyed heraldic creatures grazed upon sea-grasses and horned poppies.

But if life under the girdle of Luned and in the enclosed garden of Elphin’s fancies seemed timeless and immortal, in the magician’s chamber of the Prince of Wales it was dark with fatality and sprinkled with the foam of all that rushed away.

Owen had exhausted his will-power in adjusting his mind to the death of his brother, and to the more lurid fate of Tegolin and Rhisiart; and he had no spirit left to play his last card with his wandering soul. Here it was — still the unconquerable soul of Owen but there was a troubled doubt upon it tonight, debarring it from leaving his tall frame and his imposing presence, “adorned,” as Rhisiart would have said, “for sacrifice.”

For an hour or two he had lingered over the wine with his English guests: but when he felt it was entirely polite and proper to do so, he let them pay certain state-visits; first to the apartment of the Mortimers and then to that of Meredith and Elliw. This last incorrigible pair — while the Arglwyddes was too stricken by Griffith’s death to take the least interest in what she regarded as the irresponsible selfishness of her only surviving son — had persuaded Father Pascentius who at least was no wanderer from his post, whatever his private griefs might be, to consecrate their union by a formal wedlock.

Catharine and Sir Edmund were the only witnesses to this lover-like retort to the ills that had descended upon the House of Powys Fadog; for though Father Pascentius duly informed the Prince of what was going on, it proved impossible to get from him, in his present unapproachable mood, anything more than an absent-minded blessing.

A piece of news that apparently troubled Owen a good deal more than his favourite son’s marriage was the fact that Morg ferch Lug, Broch’s tricksy wife, together with their three daughters, had suddenly arrived at the castle. Maen-y-Meifod had been burnt by the English and it had been all their Welsh guard could do to bring the ladies safe to Harlech. Thus it appeared that the disconcerting Lady of the Mill Wheel had proved obedient, after all these years, to the giant’s command from Snowdon, so carefully written with Rhisiart’s red and black pigments.

On this particular night the Prince was in such a dark mood that Father Pascentius, who was pining for Rhisiart, thought bitterly of King Saul bereft by his own fault of his servant David.

Old Glew the Gryd noticed with astonishment that instead of dismissing "Brith", one of the castle cats, a taciturn being of dingy tortoise-shell hue, after its accustomed dish of milk, the Prince allowed the creature to climb upon his knees and curl itself up to sleep.

Lady Mortimer who was worried about her father had implored her old friend to keep an eye upon him; and Glew the Gryd obeyed her literally in this, opening Owen's door at regular intervals and peering shamelessly into the room. Hard of hearing in his old age the devoted Porter could only note, as a bad sign to report to his young mistress, that he found Owen, each time he spied on him, talking aloud to the animal on his lap. What he was saying to the cat, though Catharine would have given much to know this, the old man couldn't hear.

The wind had dropped now and the rain had passed, and it was a calm starlit night, this night of Owen's accumulated disasters. As he stroked the soft fur of the sleeping Brith he could just see through his narrow window, for he had extinguished his candles in the flickering fire-light, a single bright star. What was that star's name? It shivered in its burning, so it wasn't a planet. Was it part of the ruling constellation of his enemy Bolingbroke, triumphing over him across the waves of Bran the Blessed? His mind kept reverting to Broch's wife. It was surely an evil day that had brought that woman here. "She's come to fetch him," he said to himself. "I feel it in my bones. First Rhisiart and then he! And Tudor's dead and Gethin's dying and the French haven't sailed."

It was curious the comfort he got from Brith remaining so sound asleep on his lap. Steadily he went on stroking him, for the calm of the cat and the vitality of the cat seemed to pass with a perpetually increasing power from that variegated fur into his own nerves.

Then he suddenly remembered that his brother had always made a pet of this particular cat. “Brith!” he murmured, “Brith! Where is he then? Where is he?”

And all at once he began to feel that Tudor ap Griffith was actually with him in that darkened room. But he went on stroking the cat and did not lift his eyes, for he felt that the presence so near him was no ghost that he could see, no ghost at all, but the consciousness of his boyhood’s companion close to his own consciousness, without form, without shape, the familiar identity of the man he knew so well impinging upon his identity.

He began to talk to Tudor now; though old Glew, whose head kept appearing round the door, like the man in the clock recently invented by a Glastonbury monk, thought he was talking to the cat. “I’m glad I didn’t play any games with my soul to-night, Brother. I must have known you’d come.”

The trouble was that instead of letting him enjoy in peace their closeness to each other, this presence which was nearer to him than his own hands and feet must needs compel him to use the new strength he’d got through the mediumship of Brith in a manner most distasteful to him. Matters were amiss in the castle that night, he seemed to gather from Tudor, or from Tudor’s pet animal, and it was his affair — so it seemed intimated to him — to deal with what was wrong.

He stealthily slipped his fingers beneath the sleeping cat with the intention of placing the creature on his bed. But a flood of devastating weariness came over him at that instant. He felt as if to sink forever, far deeper than Brith, under a thousand fathoms of forgetfulness was the most desirable thing in the world! But even as he relaxed in his chair, with his fingers under the cat’s warm body, and stretched out his legs, covered so smoothly in olive-green, he knew very well he would be soon exploring every part of the castle and facing just the very people he always found most hard to face.

"You lazy trickster!" he muttered aloud, apostrophizing himself. "Forgive me, Brother, if I find this quest you've put upon me too heavy for me to-night. I feel as if I could sleep, Brother, sound and still, for a thousand years!"

Then he thought — still holding his fingers under the sleeping cat— "There must be, in all the revolving worlds, a place where the soul can rest and be conscious that it's resting! Are you in such a place, Brother? Old Broch talks of death. But death's not what I want. Death's not rest. Not unless you're conscious of being dead! Are you resting, Brother, even while you make your Owen bestir himself?"

Very slowly, though under his olive-green hose he experienced what children call "pins-and-needles," but with the cat still held between his loose, flapping, scarlet-lined sleeves, he did rise now, and, walking gingerly to his bed, deposited the unconscious animal in the centre of it.

Then he looked round the room. "I'd better take my sword," he thought, "for you never know. Joseph, Mary!" he thought, "I must have left my sword in the hall. The stars are certainly against me today. It only needs Hopkin's black flag!"

He unhooked an unscabbarded weapon from the wall and tried its point and edge. It had been his grandfather's sword, and it was only a little less old-fashioned than Clerk Rhisiart's. But at the moment it suited him because its blade was so long and its handle terminated in such a spacious knob that an old man could have used it to support his steps. Owen felt like an old man as he moved to the door, emphasizing as he did so the clattering sound of the weapon's contact with the flag-stones.

On opening the door he was confronted by two figures. Father Pascentius was conversing with Glew the Gryd; and the Father looked unusually disturbed.

The Prince had never felt less inclined to encounter their castle confessor than he did at this moment.

The two men looked at each other, and the torch that burned above the door revealed their unwonted agitation. As they looked, Owen's sea-green eyes dilating against the coal-black orbs of the other, an irresistible wave of antagonism passed between them. The monk thought: "Here's the moody despot who's robbed me of Rhisiart"; while the Prince thought: "Here's the cunning priest who'd be glad to see the Broch desert me!"

"Well, Father," said Owen, leaning on his sword, "I suppose you've come to tell me of some wench who's in trouble, or of some lad who hasn't been to Mass."

For a moment the Father was compelled to swallow his saliva and utter a swift prayer to Saint Thomas for self-control. "Would it were no worse, my son," he said sternly. "Is it your pleasure that we enter your room; or—" and he gave a glance at the Porter.

"It's 'my pleasure' to hear what you've got to say, Father, in the fewest possible words. We have no secrets from our trusty servants."

"There's great dissatisfaction, my son, throughout the castle. The soldiers are murmuring that the slayer of their prophet — God be kinder to that rogue's soul than he deserves! — is treated at your command like a belted knight. But it isn't of the soldiers I've come to speak. There's a scene going on now over Rhys Gethin's death-bed that makes it impossible to give him the last rites. The man's end's come. Dead he'll be before morning; dead and unshriven, unless you interfere."

Owen wrote something with the point of his sword on the floor; but he didn't raise his head. "It's been going on for years, my son, as we all know; but some influence — God working in some roundabout manner for His own purposes — has brought it to a head, just as the man's dying."

"It? Brought it to a head? Stop speaking in riddles, man. Brought what to a head?"

"Simon's jealousy! And if you must have it in plain words, my son, I think Mistress Lowri's mind has broken down."

"Do you mean the woman's gone mad?"

"I don't think she knew me when I spoke to her just now, my son."

The Prince smiled. "There must be many in this place," he said bitterly, "who have good cause not to know their spiritual confessor."

"Do you wish me to tell you what I heard between her and Master Simon by Rhys Gethin's pillow?"

"I don't wish—" but the Prince broke off abruptly, and began drawing squares and circles on the stones with his sword's point. His nervous prejudice against this man changed at this single moment into a violent distaste and an implacable determination to get rid of him. "I've endured his tale-bearing and his spying long enough," he thought. "If I'm to be driven out into the mountains I'll begin by clearing my path."

Father Pascentius contemplated the movements of that sword-point and gave the folds of his cowl several quiet twitches as if to shelter the back of his neck from the chill of the passage.

"You took Rhisiart from me," he thought. But such was his relish for every aspect of the visible world that he couldn't help drinking up as he did so — as if the Prince were offering him a cup of golden wine instead of this angry hostility — the curious lights and shadows, some of them soft and dim like rich velvet, some of them opaque and hard like polished silver, that the torch-light above the door drew from Owen's embroidered tunic, from his scarlet-lined sleeves, from his antique weapon, and even from the forks of his grizzled beard.

"You took Rhisiart from me," his hidden heart repeated, like the striking of a muffled bell, while with his eyes on Owen's he obstinately went on. "There's another thing you ought to know, my son. Since the news came of our defeat on the Usk my Lady's dwarf has taken possession of Clerk Rhisiart's chamber, and the girls tell me she refuses to leave it. They say there've been lights burning all night, and they even say they've heard wild supplications up there, addressed, not to the Holy Trinity, but to the three most potent Devils in Hell, who have — as you know well, my son, and as several angelic Doctors attest — taken upon themselves to simulate the Divine Persons. They also say—"

"I also say," cried Owen, stepping back several paces from the man, and jerking up his arm in its flapping sleeve, and pointing westward with the point of his sword, "that tomorrow morning, Father, you'll choose any horse you like from our stable and any escort you like from our men — they'll be glad enough to leave us if what you say is true! — and ride off to pay our respects to Chancellor Young, Bishop-elect of Bangor. You'll find him at the Castle of Aberystwyth where our flag still flies, and you'll find plenty to do among his colleagues, both secular and religious; and you can take all the books you can carry, whether they deal with the Trinity above, or with the Trinity below. God speed you, and good luck to you, Father!"

And Owen strode off; holding his sword this time so that its point was at an obtuse angle to his flapping sleeve.

When he was gone the monk and the Porter looked at each for a moment without a word. Then Glew the Gryd shook his head sadly. "I told'ee how 'twould be, Father. I told'ee how 'twere with Owen ap Griffith. He's been a different man since the Maid went. She hurt the heart in him, that woman did; and Clerk Rhisiart turning on him killed it. I shouldn't wonder if 'tweren't not thee but him himself what sets out tomorrow. 'Tis this curst castle to my thinking what's done it! 'Twere better for us in the rocks of Snowdon; better in the Forests of Tywyn. Some say Harlech has never been the same place since they took Bran's head to London."

"Do you think he'll come and beg me to stay, after he's slept on it, Master Glew?"

"He may; and again he may not, Father. Owen ap Griffith be wonderful stubborn when 'a's done what 'a knows 'a shouldn't do. But so be all the High Ones of the earth I reckon. If I were you, Father, I'd get a lantern and ramble round the stables to-night. They be tricky devils, these Lawnslots and Gwalchmais, and no mortal person can tell what they'll be up to. Like enough if they hear you want a good horse there'll be none in Harlech to carry your weight till they've taken gold off you. But I wouldn't count on Owen ap Griffith's changing his mind. I've known him stubborn in times past; but his stubbornness, since Tudor ap Griffith have been slain, be past talking of! You saw yourself, Father, how he took umbrage at what you said touching that Trinity of Devils. That's because ever since Clerk Rhisiart and the Maid went he's been talking to devils; and there's not a trinity of their horned heads he doesn't know as well as we know him."

Father Pascentius wrinkled his nose, caused his upper lip to protrude by pressing his tongue against it, and scratched his ribs with his thumbnail.

"Silver groats are heavy when a Servant of God is travelling in haste, Master Glew," he remarked, "and gold nobles are heavier; and I expect I'll be leaving a few of such oddments to the friend who helps me to a good horse and picks me out a couple of trusty men on good horses, if the weather don't change tomorrow. So bear it in mind, Master Glew, and Saint Thomas make you die rich."

While this conversation was going on outside his room the Prince was proving the truth of every one of the monk's words. He felt as if his recent hours in that darkened chamber, wherein he had used the sleeping animal as a link between himself and his brother, had lasted for many years, and that it was as a revenant that he came back now, wandering with his naked blade through a generation that had forgotten him. Had he, like Pwyll Pen Annwn, been living for twelve months in some over-world of enchantment?

But Pwyll's people had been ruled in their lord's absence by an eidolon wiser than their lord, whereas to-night he was aware of grim silence and averted looks, of murmured insults and conspiring whispers. He passed guard-room after guard-room — for the castle was crowded with soldiers — where not a man rose to his feet to greet him; and where if he addressed them he was answered with silence.

By degrees he became aware that he was being treated as if he were already discrowned, dethroned, rejected; and as if the whole castle were only waiting in angry and sullen expectation the triumphant arrival of an English Prince of Wales.

In the last guard-room he entered, before ascending one of the flights of winding stairs to the passages above, he found David Gam sitting by himself over the fire, his heavy features wearing an expression of stupid bewilderment not unmixed with an animal-like dread. His fellow-soldiers had moved away from him as far as they could go, treating him like a leper, like the Sin-Eater himself! This palpable and visible sign of his commands being disregarded and his will flouted struck Owen the worst blow he had yet received. Wasn't it the essential prerogative of princes to raise up whom they pleased and to degrade whom they pleased?

Well! he had just degraded the most learned scholar in Wales. Now he would advance to honour the most unscrupulous bandit in Wales! He had sent his faithful Rhisiart to be cut to pieces on an English scaffold. He had sent the girl he loved to be ravished to death in an English camp.

And these things he'd done without explanation, reason or cause — solely to prove that he could will what he liked, even to the destruction of Wales, even to the death of his brother. He replied half-mechanically to Gam's greeting, though the little red man rose up at once to do him homage; but the sight of the way his men were isolating his new adherent in defiance of his will flung him down to the lowest depths of shame.

But the rock-bottom of pain and defeat and humiliation was always Glyn Dŵr's sounding-board for testing the resources of his spirit. The metallic tappings he now made with his sword-point, as he paused to speak to Gam, were so emphatic that they actually struck sparks from the stone; and even as they did this the living waters of his own defiance of fate spouted forth from the stony floor of his soul.

Gam was probably the most superstitious man of his brains as he was certainly the strongest man of his hands in all Wales. In a battle he would have been invaluable, because since it would never have occurred to him that the supernatural could take part in a battle he would have no fear of anything. What is commonly regarded as the magic of personality Gam interpreted as impersonal magic; and here in Harlech he was at once threatened and protected by the innumerable hosts of Owen's "spirits". He now felt — as his new master smiled at him as he left the guard-room — so completely indifferent to the hatred of his fellow-servants that his very insouciance imparted to his own personality something of the awe that he felt for Owen. They would have been reckless warriors, even from the Scab's own district, who would have dared to meddle with the little red man from Brecon.

Continuing his ghostly round, and feeling more and more like a ghost as he made it, the Prince ascended one of the main stairways of the castle. As he passed the entrance to the Mortimer apartments he caught, through a half-open door, a glimpse of his daughter, in the loose robes of her pregnancy, conversing with a young woman in a becoming black gown whom he recognized at once as Dame Alice of Lyde. He couldn't help being struck by the clinging, adoring and infatuated look with which "the Ruthin girl," as Rhisiart used to call her, was tending Catharine.

"Is it nothing to you," he thought, "that your good man should fall into the King's hands and be burnt at the stake?"

Holding his sword horizontally now, and treading softly on his pointed deer-skin slippers, he advanced down the long dark corridor at the end of which Luned had implored Rhisiart to take upon himself the paternity of her child.

As it happened, Rhisiart's old enemy Gwalchmai was the torch-bearer in this passage to-night, and Owen was so struck by the fellow's surly response to his greeting that he grimly took his torch from him and bade him practise his scowls upon the darkness as he found his way out.

"If I can hold Harlech," he thought, "and if Rhys Ddu can hold Aberystwyth, till the French sail, all may yet be well. Our people are still free. From Aberfraw to Gwent our mountains, our forests, our moors are free. I wish the Usurper would raise money enough to invade us himself. It's these Codnors and Talbots; yes! and that boy at Hereford, who're the trouble. There's a tynghed on Henri Père whenever he crosses the Wye or the Severn."

He stood pondering, the torch in one hand, the sword in the other, and the feeling stole over him that if only he could make the ghostly heroes of his land understand where the danger lay, the invaders would be helpless. “They think it’s the foreign King we have to fear, because it was foreign kings in their time. They don’t understand how everything has changed; and how it’s strategy and skill and trade and money and swiftness of attack — not huge armies with royal banners and royal tents — that’s our trouble today.”

His mind reverted to Father Pascentius. “He’ll be all right at Aberystwyth,” he thought. “Young’ll use his learning and his staring eyes to better purpose than I can.”

And then he realized that he had intended all the while to visit Rhisiart’s tower-room about which the monk had told such tales. He tried the door at the foot of the steps. Yes! it was open. Very softly on his deer-skin shoes he crept up the stairs, the sword’s point in advance, the torch behind his back. Arrived at the top of the stairs he found a rusty iron sconce, a century old, driven into the wall. Into this he inserted his torch; and with his sword gripped tight and it must be confessed with a nervous twinge in his stomach, as if that organ contained a hidden hand that clutched and unclutched its fingers, he softly opened the door.

Not a sound greeted him; and his first impression was that the chamber was empty. Save for a faint whiteness from the starry sky, the only light in the place came from above the half-opened door from his torch outside. It took a second or two for his eyes to get accustomed to the obscurity, for the torch-rays from above the door had the effect of darkening rather than illuminating the rest of the room.

But when he did get his vision — that is to say when he saw the bed and what was in it — he received such a shock that ’twas a wonder he didn’t cry out. For Rhisiart himself lay on the bed!

Had Morg ferch Lug seen her “pure-blooded Brython” at that juncture it is hard not to think that she would have been compelled to admit that the new Prince of Wales had at least some drops of the blood of the “older people.”

Nothing — one might surely argue — but the prehistoric self-control of a race that had tracked mammoths and sabre-toothed tigers through the Forests of Tywyn could have prevented him at that moment from betraying his presence! But Owen ap Griffith didn’t even draw his breath in a sigh that was louder than natural. He lifted the point of his sword about four inches, while his scarlet-lined sleeve entered quickly and left more quickly the wavering path of the torch-rays from above the door.

And then it was given him — largely by reason of this Neolithic self-control of which none but a race with the blood of the aboriginals of the locality in its veins could have the secret — to take in the true reality of what he saw. It was — and was not — Rhisiart. It was his clothes; it was that gorgeous silver and blue costume that the dwarf herself had made for him to wear at Catharine’s wedding; and she had stuffed it out with a long, thin straw-bolster. The little creature herself lay fast asleep by the side of this image — this image of the only man who had ever seriously kissed her — her tiny little arms, like the arms of a doll, tightly clasping its neck, while her disfigured chin was buried in its breast.

The head of the image was a mere blob of rags, but its bed-fellow had drawn so cunningly over this featureless rag-head the neat scholar’s cap the man always wore at his clerkly labour that the Prince was astounded at the thing’s likeness to what he had so often seen — his Secretary asleep!

The moment Owen took in the full meaning of what he saw a transformation took place in him. He ceased to be an aboriginal. He became not only a “pure-blooded Brython” but a representative of the most courtly ruling house west of Constantinople. Automatically inclining his head, he swung round on his deer-skin heels and left the place as hastily and reverently as if it had been the bridal chamber of the Maid of Edeyrnion.

Having closed the door as silently as he’d opened it, he mechanically repossessed himself of his torch, and scarcely less mechanically, as he descended the stairs, lifted the chilly handle of his sword to his distorted face. He was of a far too introspective turn of mind to be long in shaking off this emotional mood, but the almost ghastly glimpse he had been given into the love of women found a crevice in his mental armour that a less grotesque exhibition would have missed.

What he had just seen had indeed one extremely practical effect upon him. It made him resolve that at whatever cost to his masculine pride he would effect on the morrow a reconciliation with the Arglwyddes.

At the moment, however, carrying his now smoking torch less carefully than before, and once more using his naked blade as a staff, he made his way to the death-chamber of Rhys Gethin. Before reaching his defeated Captain’s room it was necessary for him to pass an unfurnished and unaccommodated cell, usually devoted to the commoner sort of prisoners. From this place, reaching his ears through the heavily-barred door, there issued a long-drawn, moaning monotone, in a voice he recognized at once as that of Lowri ferch Ffraid. His torch was nearly out, but he could see a light streaming across the passage at the corner where it turned.

He beat with the handle of his sword against the barred door. “Lowri! Mistress Lowri!” he shouted. The monotone within went on just the same. It wasn’t the voice of wrath or despair or misery. It was the voice of reason, that ghastly monologue of pure reason with itself, when all the humble, natural sub-streams of life's irrational flow have been mentalized into a horrible avalanche of glacial logic.

He struck again at the door, and again shouted the woman's name. But no end arrived to the interminable monologue within; to this monstrous stream of crazy assertion, wherein the reason confided to the reason the causes and effects of irrational passion.

And then the Prince made a grimace at the closed door which separated him from that voice, that high-pitched argumentative voice of the mathematics of passion which he felt would soon sound to him as if it were the pendulum-tick of the whole cosmos: for he suddenly realized that it was barred only from outside; and that all he had to do was to push the bolts and enter!

He hastened to do this; but as he did so the draught between the door he'd opened and the window of the cell extinguished his torch and at first there was only blackness and the voice of the woman. But since there was light at the turn of the passage there was a dim glimmer in the place, which increased when the smoke from his dead torch floated away.

And he saw that there were two figures here, too; but whereas in the other sleeping-place of his nocturnal visitation one was a dummy and one a dwarf, here one was mad and the other a corpse. It didn't take him long to realize that the corpse was that of Master Simon; and he soon understood, too, what it was that the delirious woman was justifying to herself in this one-sided dialogue, while she piled on the Hog's bare chest every scrap of the food that had been thrown into her cell. She was proving to her victim with irresistible logic that their love was sealed by his death.

The curious thing was that in that dim light and with her loosened hair and exposed bosom the mother of Tegolin had never looked more beautiful. She had the look upon her face that women have when they are listening to the passionate words of their first lover. There was a rope lying by her side. But it had not been used; and it flashed upon Owen at once why it was that contrary to the new custom with mad persons — so different from the old way of letting them wander about to the terror and inconvenience of sane folk — Mistress Lowri had been allowed not only the privilege of mourning over her dead but the privilege of neither being chained nor bound.

The only armourer left in the castle was the dead man lying there before him, while the authority responsible for her restraint was the father of her child.

What had the most weird effect on Owen's mind, as throwing down his extinct torch he addressed her by name, was the fact that while she knew him perfectly well and kept calling him "My Prince" she never stopped for a moment her stream of monotonous argument addressed to the dead.

She knelt erect over Simon's body while one logical necessity followed another from her lips; and even in that obscurity her beautiful eyes seemed caressing, cajoling, and hypnotizing the dead man to accept without question this rational and inevitable seal upon their love.

How Simon had perished was as transparent as the reasons she gave for killing him; for if Father Rheinalt had forbidden them to touch her with cord or rope he must have also forbidden them to tear from her victim's heart the small Spanish dagger that had caused his death.

For the second time that night, but on this occasion with full consciousness of what he did, Owen inclined his head as he stepped backwards to the door. Realizing he was going, the woman made a slight gesture with her hand, and he even fancied he caught the whisper of a hurried benediction; but the logical argument with the dead went on; and it was going on without intermission when he closed the door, shot the bolt, and walked slowly away.

"If only I can hold this place and Aberystwyth," he said to himself, "till the French come, all may yet be well." And then he thought, "I'll drink some of that Malmsey presently that Sir John brought me. I'll be able to sleep after that, and forget Rhisiart on the scaffold and that girl. If I can hold out till the French come I may win yet! He's never been able to get into the heart of Wales. Twice he's been half drowned in the Wye; thrice he's lost everything in the Severn. Pull yourself together, old conjurer! This is what you embarked on; this is what you were to expect when you raised your flag. You've got to go on, on, on — till every head you've trusted lies low, and every heart you've loved is broken!"

But by this time he was leaning heavily on his sword, and as he turned the corner of the passage where a blaze of torches streamed out from Rhys Gethin's crowded death-chamber, he found he needed something more than the spirit to go blindly on. I shall see her early tomorrow," he said to himself, thinking of the Arglwyddes. "I've taken away from her all but Meredith; and that little ellylles has got him now. Love? Let it come! Let it go! But if you don't, tomorrow morning, take every shame she can pile up on you, till she melts in your arms, a miserable magician you are, Owen Glyn Dŵr!"

Oh, this room of Gethin's long dying, how well he knew it! He had made a point, during all these troubled days, of visiting for brief, painful, embarrassed moments his dying Captain.

Well! It was over now! He could see at once from the look of the figure on the bed, and indeed from the unrepressed relief on the faces of everyone there, that the great warrior had gone to his account.

He stood for a moment in the open doorway, leaning silently on his long sword. Then growing aware by the sudden hush that fell upon the people — and there were representatives there of every level of life in the castle, even of merchants and craftsmen from the town — that his presence had been perceived, he waited for some murmur of recognition, some sign of greeting and welcome to their Prince.

But no such sign was forthcoming. It was only too evident that the mysterious murder of Derfel's prophet, and the more mysterious enlargement of Gam, and now the spectacular decease of Gethin, had added the last bundle of fuel to the great smouldering bonfire of popular discontent which the disaster upon the Usk, the Abbot's death and the capture of the Maid had already ignited.

What was really going on in that death-chamber was a sort of Lying-in-State; an honour rarely given in Wales to any but lawful Princes of the blood of Cunedda and Rhodri Mawr.

Owen recognized quickly enough that this popular honour paid to the dead Captain wasn't without its implication of dishonour to the living Prince; but he made up his mind to disregard it, and disregard it he did so completely that it would have been hard for anyone to believe he noticed it at all.

Making no claim to any precedence therefore, he quietly moved up to the dead warrior in the patient line of those paying homage; though it is true that when he reached Gethin's bed he took advantage of his height and stood back a little, looking over the heads of the people as one by one they pushed past. The women who had washed the hero's body and closed his eyes had evidently had great difficulty in composing his features. They had forced the dead man's jaws nearly together, but they'd been loth to sever the still fingers with which he'd clung in his last struggle to an iron ring in the wall at his side.

It was the expression of his mouth, however, rather than that clutching hand, which most arrested the Prince. Owen had seen more dead men slain in battle than he could count, but he had never seen on any human face a look like the look on this man's.

He had seen it somewhere though. And where was that? Ah! he had it! It was a great pike he'd caught once in the river Dee; a pike that in place of leaping up from the grass, as most dying fish do, had straightened itself out and clenched its teeth and fixed its eyes upon the sky with a look of such abysmal fury of defiance that those gnashed teeth locked together had remained in its killer's consciousness for more than thirty years.

In addition to the fingers and the mouth, the women who had "laid out" this Hector of North Wales had had difficulty with the eyes.

The warrior must have been roused to such a pitch of passion by the behaviour of Lowri, who, it was said, scrupled not at the last to caress the Hog of Chirk in his presence, that his eyes seemed actually to retain the imprint of that shame as the Prince gazed upon them.

Owen was assured later that it was the visits of Lowri — and several times, they told him, she was accompanied by Simon — that had made Rhys Gethin's hurt incurable. The verdict of both bower and kitchen, of ladies and serving-men, was identical in this matter; namely, that had Crach Ffinnant tended him, and, as was his custom, kept everybody away, the warrior would have recovered.

A base and unpardonable impulse began stirring in Owen now; the impulse to turn from his old friend, the man who above everyone else was responsible for the victory of Bryn Glas, and depart without kissing him.

It was partly the desperate ferocity of the look that had been frozen upon the man's face that tempted him to shirk this natural courtesy. The cause of this look had been the woman he'd just seen; and there seemed something horrible in pressing his lips to such a look. And although he was the reverse of a squeamish person there were two other things that militated against this gesture. In the first place the skin of Gethin’s face wasn’t only whiter than is usual with the dead, but there were drops of death-dew still upon it that normally should have dried. In the second place the women who “laid out” this obstinate corpse had not been able to close the eyelids completely, so savagely had they been fixed upon the sight that killed him; and in the crevice, out of which the eyeballs peered, certain excretions of rheumy glue had formed themselves, that now, catching the light of the candles, gleamed like fragments of sardonyx.

The strain that was making the Prince’s inmost will vibrate like a cord at breaking-point brought it about that he was more sensitive to such things than was his wont. But, nevertheless, muttering “Mary! Joseph!” in his beard, he did at least make the sign of the cross over that scowling forehead.

“I must see Father Rheinalt,” he said to himself as he made his way through the murmuring crowd.

He enquired in vain of one person and another; but at last a little page from the hills, awed and delighted to be able to help the ruler of his land, directed him to the chapel.

Here in the vestibule he found the man he sought. Father Rheinalt was seated on a wooden bench, holding a large rough crucifix in his hands. He rose when Owen approached him and signed to the Prince to sit down by his side. A low-voiced murmur was going on within the chapel where several priests from the neighbourhood were muttering psalms over a row of pall-covered coffins; while from a chantry just within the edifice where a host of candles had been lit a stream of wavering radiance fell upon their two figures and upon the crucifix in the monk’s hand.

The Prince was astounded at the man’s self-control. He had intended to question him as tactfully as be could about Simon’s death; but he had never expected to find a person less wrought up, less confused, and much calmer that he was himself!

"I did what I could, my son," Father Rheinalt said. "It was pain to me to see what she was doing to herself as well as to those two. I think, after her fashion, she loved them both. I think Simon understood her; the other never! How could he — a simple soldier like that?"

"What made her kill him?" Owen didn't dare to look at his companion as he asked this question. He looked instead at the crucifix; but no sooner had he done so than it seemed to him that the face of the figure upon it resembled that of the man to whose words he was listening.

"What — made — her — kill — him?" repeated the monk slowly. "I think I can tell you that, my son, after all we've gone through. Knowledge comes at last, Owen ap Griffith, if we suffer long enough and deep enough. She killed him because with the best that was in him he wanted her to kill him! He understood her, my son — Christ have mercy on him! — as I never have, and as he never could. He thought — Simon I mean — that she'd lost her wits forever; and he couldn't bear to see it and live. I don't think she has lost her wits forever. I think if Denis Burnell takes her back to Dinas Bran she'll recover; but whether her heart'll change, Christ who knows all hearts alone can tell."

Owen lifted his eyes from the other Rheinalt, with the arms stretched out and the nail through his feet, and stared at his companion in amazement.

"Burnell doesn't think of taking her back, does he?" He suddenly felt as if he had been sleeping for a whole Platonic year, and had just awaked into all these people's lives — only to find he had lost every clue.

"I've been talking to Burnell, my son," declared Father Rheinalt, "and he says it was with the hope she would go back with him that he brought the tribute-money himself."

The Prince closed his fingers over the hilt of his sword and, pressing its point against the ground between his knees, gazed at the monk with the expression of a child who has turned the page of a lesson-book and found a picture of a boar-hunt. His grey-blue eyes became round with wonder and his bearded chin sank down on his clasped hands as if the monk were telling him something that transformed the bones of his skull to lead.

"And you—" he began. He longed to say, "How can you, who're the father of this woman's child, go straight from the murder of her husband and the death of her lover to encourage a fourth man to take her?"

But like an open psalter the monk read his thought; and having done so, he quickly moved his crucifix so that the candle-rays from the chantry flickered upon the figure's face.

"I like this one," he said, "better than any I've ever had. It belonged to Abbot Cust and on his death-bed he sent it me. The lay-brother who nursed him brought it — unknown to the present Abbot."

The sea-green eyes above the beard that covered the sword-hilt grew still more like those of an astonished child; for it was apparent to him that across Father Rheinalt's ravaged features there had actually flickered a smile.

The Prince turned back to the pain of the crucifix from this kindred pain that had the power of smiling. "I don't — see," he whispered hoarsely into his beard, as if rather to the hilt of his sword than to his companion, "how the sight of suffering like that — even if it is" and he muttered the syllables "Mary! Joseph!"— "the pain of the cross — could help anyone to go through what you've gone through."

Father Rheinalt bent his head and was silent. For some reason the unfathomable life-force that emanated from those glaucous eyes was harder to bear just then than what was in his mind.

"I don't suppose;" he said, without looking up, "that I can make it clear to you, my Prince; for" — and the man actually smiled again— "God hasn't given me the gift of our good Pascentius. But when you take pain as the — as the basis of human life — and — and — as — as the life of God — there comes up — for it isn't the whole of God — something from underneath — that is — but what am I saying? Who am I to talk like this?"

And to Owen's astonishment the monk lifted his head, clutched the crucifix as if it were a weapon, and striking its foot against the bench between them, uttered the identical words that Owen himself had been hearing in his heart all that night. "If only the French come, my Prince, all may yet be well!"

They rose simultaneously from their seat after that; and the Prince said with his old authority, "Go back now, Father, and see if she sleeps, and if there's water and wine where she is. If it's well with her, I wish you to spend the night with me in my room. Don't fail me, Father. We've got to decide what's to be done if — if the French don't come!"

It turned out that Lowri ferch Ffraid had fallen asleep, fallen asleep even while they'd been talking about her in the chapel; and it wasn't long before the two Welshmen's blood-and-iron discussion of new methods to deal with the enemy ended with the Father's falling asleep, too.

So heavy a drug was the wine Owen forced his temperate guest to drink that he had no difficulty in lifting him, unawaked as he was, upon his own bed, and covering him with as many "black lions rampant" as could warm the most ascetic bones!

The following morning broke with radiant sunshine over Harlech and the sea; and the Prince, though his bones were stiff and cramped from his bivouac on the floor, could feel the spring-warmth pouring strength and vitality into his blood. It was to the power of the sun and of the dancing sun-sparkles on the inflowing tide that he entered the Arglwyddes' room.

Father Rheinalt had passionately entreated him not to risk everything in some wild uncalculated move against the invaders, but to wait for a week or so. "At least," the Father had said, "till news comes from Rhys Ddu."

And this advice, proceeding from the most uncompromising Welshman in the castle, had had its weight with him. Indeed it had jumped shrewdly enough with his own instinct. "There'll be a time," he thought, "to avenge our dead, when we know for certain the French are not coming!"

Never in all their life had the heart of the Arglwyddes been more difficult to soften than it was that day. But he managed it at last, such was the power and vital force given him by that dazzling sun and those dancing waves.

As with Odysseus, when the goddess had made him "taller and fairer in form and in face," it was hard for the mother, even of all those lost sons, even of her lost eldest-born, to resist the man she loved when he wooed her as if she were a young girl, when he courted her with all the magnetic concentration of their first love.

It was characteristic of the Prince that his pleasure at being reconciled with the Arglwyddes ran like quicksilver through his veins and added yet another vibration to those which poured through him that morning from the sun and the sea.

Feelings, emotions, sensations such as he hadn't known since his childhood radiated through him; and his spirit felt so light, so integral, so compact and free that what had hitherto been a patient cult became a spontaneous joy. He kept flinging his soul — or, if you will, imagining that he flung his soul — far out to the horizon, where it seemed to hear clear and sweet, from a yet further horizon, the mystic song of the Birds of Rhiannon!

He even began to feel happier about the fate of the Maid and Rhisiart. Henry of Lancaster had his generous moments, and perhaps — Whereas where his dead brother was concerned, he felt his presence so vividly that it seemed to him as if he were eating for him, drinking for him, losing himself in the elements for him! His brother's nearness seemed to double his delight in the multitudinous sun-sparkles upon those in-rolling waves.

He had the feeling that something had broken — some dam, some barrier, some rampart within him — and that he could draw on a reservoir of power the depth of which he had never even suspected.

So boundless was his feeling of power that he didn't hesitate to snatch his friend Broch from under the very hands of the man's elfish wife; nor, with the assistance of Broch, did he hesitate to entertain Oldcastle and Denis by taking them to the rock-pools beyond the jetty where there were a number of sea-anemones of startling and incredible beauty. Whether it was due to the fact that a large portion of Owen's exalted mood came from the glittering sunshine and dazzling sea, or whether the spiritual forces he was drawing on were non-moral forces, the fact remains that his feelings were by no means all noble or righteous as with his bald-headed friend he escorted the two Englishmen along the shore. He felt outrageously thankful that he had instructed Gam — not without a hint to that unscrupulous young woman from Môn — to use his knife upon the Scab at any serious pinch.

It even occurred to him, and without a flicker of shame, that as he sat with Father Rheinalt in the porch of the chapel, and contemplated that row of coffins, he had completely forgotten that under one of those palls the single blue eye and the ruddy disfigurement of Derfel's prophet were already beginning to revert to the anonymous monochrome of the dust. Nor did he repent for a moment — but on the contrary stroked his beard with grim satisfaction — when Father Pascentius, mounted on one of the castle's best horses and attended by two of the castle's sturdiest guards, not to speak of a baggage-mule loaded with the most precious books of the castle libraries, came jogging and swaying past them along the shore-road.

Father Pascentius looked to him in no sense a pathetic figure. It would have needed the more sympathetic eye of Rhisiart to note the clumsy attempt of the man's plump fingers — entangled as they were with the reins he held — to make his familiar metaphysical gesture, reducing all the changes and chances of this mortal life to the infinite indifference of the Absolute.

Let us hope that the tremendous shade of Saint Thomas himself noticed that blundering attempt of the hands that had composed the great Cistercian Commentary to bid farewell to Harlech with an appropriate gesture. Some of the most piteous things in life are these same brave whistlings and drummings and hummings wherewith, when our stars are crossed, we mechanically save our faces and cover our retreats; and those of us who feel tenderer to the weaknesses of an orthodox Scholiast than Owen did may be permitted to hope that before getting very far on his road to face the toothless sarcasms of Chancellor Young the Father's roving eyes may light upon a wayside plant even more uncommon than the Cardamine Pascentius.

It was not long before the two Welshmen and the two Englishmen were seated upon a sun-warmed ledge above the now ebbing tide, listening to the gurglings and gaspings of the water as the in-flowing waves alternately brimmed and emptied the cavernous recesses below them, and covered or left exposed the jagged shell-bitten surfaces of the rocks.

The talk between the four men turned to the fate of Master Brut. "I suppose I'd recant in his place," Sir Thomas Oldcastle was saying, "for the Archbishop's as fond of the smell of burning flesh as he is of basting peacocks. But a man never knows! As a matter of breviary," he went on, with a whimsical glance at the retreating figure on horseback, "and in the Blessed Order of Holy Reason of which I'm a humble Brother, my Credo is to enjoy such wine as you gave us last night, to savour the heavenly essences of meats and fishes, to get drunk on the raptures of Venus and Priapus — and be ready to believe whatever the Archbishop believes! But, gentlemen, when I saw one of his Grace's latest burnings, I found myself worshipping not the correct theology of that cruel old time-server, but the divine spirit in any poor human breast that could bear such pain and yet not yield! On my life, gentlemen, that burning may be the cause of my burning! Till then, and this was but a few months ago, I was only a Lollard in what you might call a Platonic sense; that is to say, as a matter of ideal intellectual truth. But after watching those two faces — the face of that ambitious, selfish, soulless old man, and the face of that angelic young martyr — shall I tell you what I decided? I decided that even though the Archbishop's belief was true and the other's false, I was all for the other! I decided that it was better to die for the wrong than to torture for the right."

"Wouldn't the Lollards," interjected Denis Burnell, "torture us Catholics if they had the power?"

"Very likely," returned the other, "but not the young man I saw suffer. And that's the whole point. It isn't the Lollard's 'truth' or the Catholic's 'truth' that's the important thing. Truth itself's not the important thing. The important thing is the spirit to defy tyranny and pain. I can imagine" — he paused and chuckled— "only I'm such a whoreson coward! But I can imagine swearing I believed what I didn't believe and swearing I doubted what I didn't doubt, simply and solely to defy to the death the kind of person our present Archbishop is, and even the kind of—"

“This ledge you’ve brought us to, Sire,” interrupted Denis Burnell, fearful lest Sir John — who had already had several flagons of old metheglin — might say something indiscreet, “is such a striking spot that I’d like to know if it has any particular name.”

“It has indeed, Master,” replied Owen; and he looked quickly round to see if he dared, in the presence of his friend Broch, give full rein to his mystical pedantry. But Broch was staring at the two vessels in sight, each of them engaged in elaborate tacking movements against that difficult wind, so that neither encouragement nor disapproval could be got from him.

It wasn’t only that the Prince delighted in letting his imagination, which was considerable, and his learning, which even little Lu respected, have their free fling; he itched to impress Oldcastle, whom of all living Englishmen he most admired, with the superiority of Welsh legends over those of England. So he explained to his guests that this rocky ledge was called Cadair Bran and that it was here that the mysterious god of their fathers beheld the fleet of the King of Ireland. And, he went on, for the temptation in his present high spirits to dilate on this topic was irresistible, arguing that the only way, as you pursued the long reversion of demigods, by which the true Immortals could be reached, was to follow their traditional pedigrees to the end.

“Where,” he went on to explain, while the forks of his beard trembled in the listening breeze, “the pedigrees become silent — where, in fact, a name has no ‘fab’ or ‘ferch’ affixed to it — we touch the depths. I used to beg my friend Iolo to make a litany of the names thus reached, so that we might invoke them with the more reverence just because they have no father and no mother! I often think that the saints of whom we know least are the most powerful; and in the same way—”

But Broch-o’-Meifod hesitated not to interrupt him. “One of those ships is from Môn,” he announced. “I know her build. Those Tudors are the best ship-builders we have. I fancy, my Prince, she brings young Efa’s betrothed.”

But here Sir John broke in. “If Master Broch,” he said, “knows yonder fancy-rigged vessel that’s as high above the water as a church-porch and has a poop like a whoreson whale, I can tell you, Prince, what the other is. ’Tis a Frenchman or I’m no Englishman! Do’ee mark the height of that mast, Denis? And the weight of the sail they’re hauling down? There! They’ve got her! And in good time too, or over she’d have gone! Look, look, Masters, there’s her ensign going up! ’Tis as I said. She’s a French maid and a royal one too! Oh, that old Jack Horne of Deptford were here with his funny little — but what am I saying? Pardon me, Prince Glendourdy, but I never could look at a French ship without laughing. But ’tis the truth before God. This Western Sea don’t suit the cut of a French craft as well as it does ours, whether Welsh or English. Christ! They’re both off again! And if this breeze doesn’t drop they won’t be into harbour, no! by Christ, not your Welsh one nor my French one, for an hour yet! And even then, if yonder mole’s the best welcome you can give them — though I can’t speak about the ship from Môn for I don’t know that build of bow or how she answers to the helm — I can swear to you the boat I call French — though she may be one of those heavier Portuguese craft — I forget their fancy name! — will be mighty put to it to get near that jetty of yours or to cast even a long hawser on’t!”

“Sir John knows what he’s—” began Denis; but Broch-o’-Meifod cut him short with an involuntary “Well done, lads!” as both crews with equal success swung their vessels to the wind and sailed off on another tack.

The Prince tried to catch Broch-o’-Meifod’s eye, for he wanted to warn him that there was no reason why they should betray to their visitors the extreme importance to Harlech just now of any news from France. It was unlikely that Sir John, at any rate, could be ignorant of the assembling of that fleet at Brest; but he might be, and if there were a chance he was, it was silly to refer to it.

But Broch-o’-Meifod was a very difficult person to communicate with by looks. In the first place his eyes were so deeply set in his great bald head and were so peculiar in themselves that it was hard to exchange any quick glance of understanding with them. The chief peculiarity of Broch-o’-Meifod’s eyes was that both the pupils and the irises were so small in comparison with the white convexities out of which they appeared that when the least mist or watery film blurred them they assumed a dull, opaque, neutral tint, and became completely devoid of expression.

But since from the look of things there was, as Oldcastle had said, little chance of either of these ships reaching land for some while, Broch-o’-Meifod now proceeded to climb down from Bran’s Seat and, sinking on his knees, began to examine the contents of a rock-pool from which the retreating tide had only just withdrawn. There was evidently plenty of water still in this pool, for the Prince, who was seated between his two guests, saw his friend pull up one of the leather sleeves of his jerkin and plunge his arm between the glistening rocks.

Presently he held up a starfish to their sight, and while the sunshine danced and flickered in gleaming points of dazzlement up and down his great dripping muscles, “Dead!” he cried. “It’s dead!” And rising on his knees and making a tremendous sweep of his arm he flung the creature far out above the breaking waves, where it sank with a splash.

"What is it, Sir John?" the Prince allowed himself to ask; for Oldcastle's shoulders were shaking with laughter.

"What is it this time, Sir John?" echoed Denis in the tone of one who had been a little longer than he liked in the society of such a Democritus.

But Broch-o'-Meifod relapsed into a sitting posture on his heels, his bald head gleaming before them with a veritable aureole of sun-sparkles. "Out with it, Sir John!" he panted, for he had used most of his breath in disposing of the star-fish, "or I'll tell them myself, if you can't speak!"

"You're enough to make an Archbishop laugh!" gasped Oldcastle. "I've seen plenty of people in my time fish for live things in the sea and shout when they've killed them; but I've never seen anyone fish for the dead."

"Broch's got a mania for death, Sir John," explained Owen, thoughtfully pulling at his beard. "It's an old story with us who know him."

The visitor contemplated the squatting sage before him and hummed a tune. Wondering what the man was thinking, and a little ashamed of having dragged his old friend's eccentricity into the open like this, the Prince gazed at Sir John as Sir John was gazing at Broch.

"What a face he has!" he thought. "And it's the same face — but it's aged a lot more than mine!" And as he looked at the man scene after scene came back to his memory of their student days together in London at the Inns of Court. "It's all that stubbly hair," he thought, "that makes him look old."

Indeed Oldcastle's unruffled brow, full lips, and ruddy complexion were offset by a short rough growth of grey hair, hair that was almost too sheep-like to be called curly, but which, though it served the purpose of beard, moustache, and whiskers, gave a curiously harmless expression to his physiognomy; gave it, in fact, the look of a humorous and philosophic sheep-dog, from whose woolly visage a pair of whimsically affectionate brown eyes looked forth upon the world.

"So you're a death-lover, are you, Master Broch?" he said, leaning forward from Bran's Seat, with his sunburnt hands on his knees. "I've heard of such men in China and Cathay and I met a hermit once in Muscovy who spoke to the same tune. I take it that by 'death' you don't mean the loss of your identity, Master Broch, but rather the passing into—"

The great blurred head and gigantic torso in front of him composed themselves into an opaque and featureless monolith, out of which issued words, as if out of the statue of Memnon. It was only by blinking and screwing up their eyes that the three men on the ledge were able to face the dazzling sunshine which the sea-sparkles multitudinized into myriad pinpoints of blinding radiance.

"I do mean the loss of my identity!" were the words that now issued from the haloed rotundity on the top of this dusky plinth. "That's exactly what I do mean! By worshipping death instead of life I worship the opposite of life; and since the essence of life — ask my Prince over there — is the thing that's forever crying 'I! I! I!' death must be the extinction of this 'I'!"

Sir John's full lips emitted a low whistle, and his woolly countenance wrinkled itself into a courteous attempt to suppress a profane chuckle.

The Prince sighed, and stroked first one and then the other of the forks of the beard. "Is that a French vessel?" he thought. "And if it is, will it bring news from Brest?"

"But isn't it possible," remarked Denis — while in his mind he thought, "How tiresome all these grand dogmas are! We know nothing of life; how can we know anything of death? The more time these two waste in discussions of this kind, the sooner their rebellion'll be over"— "isn't it possible, Master Broch, that life and death are as closely connected as night and day, man and woman, good and evil? Isn't it possible that the reality of things includes them both and explains them both, just as what you call 'nothingness' is nothing, unless there's something to compare it with?"

The sun so dazzled the eyes of the three men seated on Cadair Bran that it was impossible to see the effect of these metaphysical subtleties upon the figure before them.

The Prince, however, as he turned his head towards the speaker caught the fact that what Denis said was on a completely different plane from what Denis thought.

As for Sir John, he was keeping all this while a shrewd weather eye on those two tacking vessels. But whether it was that both the handling of the ship with the crew from Môn and the handling of the ship with the crew from France were so different from the English way that it tickled his fancy, or whether it was that the spectacle of that dusky torso in front of them, with its dazzling halo, advocating death when it looked so preposterously alive, struck him as comical, the man never ceased his low chuckling laugh.

It needed all the respect he had for him to keep the Prince from feeling irritated by this unseasonable merriment; and as it went on the sensation grew upon him that not only he and his friend Broch, but their whole race, their whole cause, their whole country were being subjected to a detached and unsympathetic amusement.

"Mary, Joseph!" he groaned in his beard, and he prayed that Broch would stop philosophizing even if it meant that he had to move out of hearing and hunt for dead starfish among remoter rock-pools. Above all he prayed that the giant wouldn't punish him for starting this unfortunate conversation by any reference to his own mental peculiarities.

"We shall never understand these English," he thought, "and they'll never understand us. What a pity all civilized nations don't talk Latin!"

Several seagulls were whirling about the men's heads just then, their wings irradiated by the sun-glare and their wild screams reaching in sound the same pitch of quivering intensity reached by the sea-sparkles in light; and the fantastic notion crossed Owen's mind, while Sir John began answering Broch, that those scintillating birds that kept darting down and sheering off above them, were feeding on the shoals of thoughts rising from their four heads, spitting out the English thoughts like the bones of dog-fish, and digesting his own and Broch's like fresh mackerel!

"Don't you see, Master," Sir John was saying — and the shameless thought entered the Prince's wrought-up mind that the worthy knight as he leaned forward with his hands on his knees might have been using Bran's ledge as a close-stool— "don't you see that the bountiful Creator has been pleased in his inscrutable wisdom so to construct our mortal intelligence and fashion the frame-work of our terrestrial minds that all ultimate reasoning is impossible? How could we live, Master; how could we enjoy our meats and our wines and our venery, or the classic authors, or the Holy Scriptures, or the blessed light of the sun, if our Creator hadn't blackened out for us with the celestial juice of the sweet grapes of his divine Nescience all knowledge of these remote things? When we say 'Life' we might as well say 'Blub-a-Blub', like the Shoreditch idiot. When we say 'Death' we might as well say 'Ding-a-Dong', like the great bell of St. Martin's. All that is permitted to our intelligence, Master, all that our minds are made for, is to fear God and forgive — But pardon me, gentles all! Pardon me, Prince de Galles et Prince de Bon Compères, there's another ship in sight — and — by Christ — if she isn't—" and even while he uttered the words he was clambering eagerly, for all his portly figure, up the side of a slippery rock a little to the right of them and more seaward than Broch's pool.

"By the fig of the Pope if she isn't — yes! by Jesus, she is — old Jack Redcliffe of Bristol and his Merry Moll!"

But if the sight of the Bristol buccaneer — for Master Redcliffe was at once a King's man and a high-seas pirate — was a mischievous joy to the gallant knight, the sight of this group of personable gentry standing exactly where he had intended to land was evidently disconcerting to the Bristol captain. He was sailing close to the wind and near to the shore with the intention of carrying off what booty he could while bad news and local dissensions kept the Welsh court within its walls, when the sight of these four formidable gentlemen, apparently guarding the very landing-place for which he was steering, changed his intention. Straight out to sea, therefore, with the offshore wind filling her sails, he steered the Merry Moll, only to find himself in the direct sea-path of the high-bulwark'd French vessel, which was now, though very slowly and under thin canvas, working her way shoreward.

The redoubtable commander of the Bristol ship evidently regarded this foreign craft as a prize sent him by a sympathetic Providence, and from the stir on board it was clear he intended to show his gratitude.

As to the vessel from Môn it was soon obvious to all who were watching that she was hauling down the few sails she could use in that difficult wind; and indeed a minute or two later she dropped her anchor.

"Little Efa's betrothed," thought Owen, "is a true Tudor. He's decided to watch events!"

Meanwhile several local fishing-boats that had been launched before the Merry Moll appeared hurriedly put back to land; while, led by Broch-o'-Meifod, both the Prince and Denis joined Sir John on his high rock of observation.

Here the four tall men were in full sight of both French and English vessels; but it was soon plain that the two crews were far too occupied in their personal encounter to pay any attention to spectators.

“There, she flies the Fleur-de-Lys of France!” cried Sir John; “ha, yes! And d’ye see that? Do ye know what that is, my Masters?” He turned to the Prince, as he spoke, and Owen smiled back in response; and then he sighed heavily and a lump rose in his gullet, for what he now saw on that queer-shaped unwieldy vessel brought all his adventurous youth into his throat.

Up to the top of the highest mast of the ship there now slowly fluttered, till it waved well above the Fleur-de-Lys, a long streaming pendant of rich couleur de rose — the royal oriflamme of Saint Denis!

“That means we’re at war with France,” said Burnell quietly.

But the incorrigible Sir John had begun laughing again. “Look! Look!” he cried. “By Cock and Crish! if Jack’s not nailing up his old Bristol shop-sign, straight from the waterfront by the town bridge! Think of the rogue’s gall — taking to sea his old city merchant-mark! No! No! We know you’re no pirate, Jack. We know you’re a huffing and scruffing rope-maker of Bristol-town! You can’t see what he’s nailed up, Prince Owen; but I can tell you I’ve heard that piece of Gloucestershire pine-wood groan and creak and whine in the wind when you couldn’t smell the mud for the tide! He’s one of us, is Jack, the rope-merchant! I’ve heard him read a tract of Master Wycliffe’s from cover to cover in the old Bull’s Head at Bristol docks, and not a gospel-point did the man miss! ’Twas the Bishop’s Court that made a sea-thief of him. You watch, my Masters, you watch how he tumbles the Frenchmen!”

The Prince couldn’t help glancing at the great bald head at his side to see how his fellow-Welshman received this lively information; but Broch was too intent upon the exchange of bow-shots and catapult-shots and oaths and curses and howls of derision and yells of pain and triumph, and upon the ominous splashes in the water and upon the hideous scraping that the wooden sides of the two vessels made as they grated against each other, to give any heed to the talk of his fellow spectators.

Denis Burnell had been aware for some while of a crowd of armed men collecting at the foot of the castle and of a noisy exchange of shouts between them and the fishermen who were dragging up their boats; and it didn't now fail to cross his mind as he saw a group of these men rushing towards them, following what looked like a human butterfly, all black and red and brandishing a silver trumpet, that it was within the bounds of possibility that the bitterness against the Prince had culminated in a successful insurrection; in which case the chance that the rebels would respect the lives of Glendourdy's guests was small indeed!

But it wasn't only the bald philosopher of death who was watching what was going on in front of him with such spell-bound interest. Both the Prince and Sir John were far too absorbed in the struggle between the ships' crews to concern themselves with what transpired behind them.

To the Prince there was something painful and repulsive about this fight. It wasn't only that he regretted the Frenchmen's defeat, but Jack Redcliffe's men were such a rough piratical set, and so well used to this sort of attack, that the French noblemen, of whom there were several on board, and Owen even thought he recognized the arms of two of them, namely Gascoigne de la Roche and Varge-Deslormes, found themselves at a disadvantage that was distressing to see. "There must be something essentially gross about English humour," he thought, as he heard Sir John's chuckles when both these courtly gentlemen, unable to use their weapons at such close quarters, were overpowered by the Bristol crew, who with jubilant shouts were now clambering from one ship to the other.

And what was this? What in the Virgin's name were these ruffians doing now? His eyes beheld what was happening; but it was too monstrous, too grotesque to be real!

Down were coming both those haughty gonfalons and up was going every stitch of sail on the straining rigging of the Merry Moll; until, in Sir John's words, "With the breath of the Lord behind them and a good gospel-rope round the neck of my Lady," Jack Redcliffe steered out to sea with his rich chance-given prize!

Owen heard the shouts of his men behind him, but he heard them as sounds that were irrelevant and meaningless, like a chorus of humming midges on a hot day. The insolent triumph of those Bristol rogues dragged down his spirits till they sank in a moment as low as all that day they had been mounting high. He saw the ceremonious words on the special parchment used by Charles the Sixth. He saw the familiar Royal Seal of France fastened to the document in the delicate way the French Court always did such things. And he saw them being chuckled over by this scurrilous Jack, just as this equally profane Sir John had made sport of their distinguished bearers. They lacked all reverence, these English, whether high-born or lowborn. All they could do was to take and to keep; and laugh while they took and preach while they kept!

He now became aware of an object in the water, about a bow-shot from where he stood, that resembled a human head. Yes! it was a man in the sea. Suddenly it disappeared, but, a moment later, appeared again. It was certainly a swimmer, and a swimmer nigh to the limit of his endurance.

He surveyed this struggling "ego" on the verge of perishing, and he couldn't help glancing at Broch to see whether he'd seen it.

To his surprise, the giant, who was unable to swim, was deliberately advancing into the water; and while he advanced he waved his arms to encourage the swimmer to make a final effort.

Irritated by the cries behind him, for he wasn't in a mood just then to deal with his subjects, Owen swung round on his heel and fiercely ordered the crowd to stay where they were. Then he turned his eyes to the swimmer; and from him to his friend's bald head, which was all that could be seen of Broch-o'-Meifod, who was now standing in seven feet of sea; and in a flash there rushed into his mind the description of Bran's power of wading — nyt oed uawr y weilgi yna, y ueis yd aeth ef: "There wasn't much water there, and he went wading."

No one but the Prince himself caught the quick imploring look that reached him from that bald head; but he obeyed it without question and hurriedly began taking off his clothes.

Even while he did this — so quick is thought — he said to himself: "Owen is Owen still! Never dead nor alive shall Hal Bolingbroke, or any other Hal, or John, or Jack, tow me after him! And what I am, my Welsh are! They can out-sail us, out-fight us, out-trade us, out-laugh us — but they can't out-last us! It'll be from our mountains and in our tongue, when the world ends, that the last defiance of man's fate will rise!"

Stark naked now and stumbling over the slippery weeds and the sharp rock-jags and the cutting rock-shells he could see the bald skull of his friend like a shimmering bell-buoy in the water and, far out beyond it, the head of the swimmer whose strokes had now become those final black, blind, automatic motions of a life-pulse at bay, crying no! no! no! to the down-sucking fathoms of salt-swallowing death.

Denis Burnell, who oddly enough was nervous of the water and unable to swim, watched with interest the deliberate movements of his fellow-Englishman at this juncture: for, divested of his leather boots and his brocaded tunic, the burly knight, panting for breath, but still chuckling in wheezy gasps, was now himself in the sea and swimming with the easy aplomb of a porpoise.

The crowd from the castle, heedless of their Prince's command, had begun to swarm over the rocks; but Denis took no notice of them.

What absorbed his attention just then were the events taking place in that element from which he himself couldn't help shrinking.

He glanced at the two ships — the French prize and the Bristol pirate — and it struck him as one of the most disturbing attributes of this dazzling expanse of sea-water that it should blend the two vessels into one — one fantastically-shaped sea monster, heading for the horizon. Another phenomenon that arrested his attention was the inhuman appearance of certain exposed portions of the drowning creature now being dragged to land by the Prince. Could that be a human head? Could those hairy arms belong to a human being? The water around the two figures was kept in a perpetual turmoil by the Prince's struggles not to lose hold of his treasure-trove and yet not to be dragged down by its insensate struggles.

But there! They were both in contact with John now, whose rotund form seemed to be prepared, like an air-blown wine-skin, to support any number of exhausted swimmers.

Panting and spluttering and slipping many times on the sea-weed covered rocks, Sir John no sooner found his feet than he began making attempts to shout to Denis, but each time he reached some particular point, he would fall into such a paroxysm of laughter that, rocking and swaying as he stood, he would find it impossible to retain both his balance and his power of speech.

Nor was his merriment — though not very polite at that moment — without its excuse; for with mutterings and gabblings and chatterings and many disgorgings of swallowed salt-water, there sank down, on the first dry rock he reached, an enormous, almost human-sized chimpanzee.

The crowd from the castle, by no means all soldiers or even all grownup people, now began to gather in a nervous fascinated circle round this unusual object on the rock; and the sight of their stupefaction started Sir John off upon a renewed laughing-fit.

"Dyma, Maitre Jacques Bonhomme!" cried a cook from Brittany; and several more daring children began throwing stones at the frightened creature, but ceased at once when it uttered a jabbering defiance and rose on its hind legs.

The Prince and Broch-o'-Meifod had both joined Oldcastle now, but Denis hesitated to approach them till the Prince had re-assumed his clothes. He felt a little ashamed of himself with his dry hair and unruffled garments in the presence of these dripping heroes, even though they had rescued nothing but an ape.

He bent down and picked up a seagull's feather and began mechanically stroking it. He had a queerly complicated nature and he experienced no mental shock, nor did it strike him as at all inappropriate when, from the rescued pet of the French nobles, his thoughts fled to Mistress Lowri. "I shall get her," he said to himself, "and when the war's over I'll take her abroad for a while. I'll tell the King it's a pilgrimage." And he began for the hundredth time imagining what he would feel when he showed Mistress Lowri the wonders of the Continent.

While he was lost to all his surroundings in these thoughts of Mistress Lowri, the third vessel of this gathering of swift keels had been cleverly and expeditiously roped to the jetty, and a fashionably-dressed young chieftain, with a countenance as crafty as it was intelligent, was at this moment advancing straight towards him, evidently taking him for one of Owen’s adherents.

Still a little ruined in his self-respect by not being able to swim, and pondering whether, if he’d been in Owen’s place, he would have let that monkey drown, he found himself instinctively taking Owen’s part against this Tudor from Anglesea who had come to claim his bride. He had heard on all sides in the castle rumours of Crach Ffinnant’s choice of this man as the one destined to take the Prince’s place; and as he scrutinized him now he seemed to detect in his face every quality needed for remorseless but infinitely cautious ambition.

He turned his head. Ah! the Prince was being helped into his clothes now by that fellow Gam who’d become such a slave of his. There! He was handing over to him the rescued monkey. And it certainly looked as if the poor beast understood that henceforth he was to be as much a slave of Gam as Gam was a slave of Owen! “Were Gam as naked as the other,” thought Denis, “they’d make a fair pair!” And as he moved forward to greet the young chieftain he decided to hold him in conversation as long as possible, so as to give Owen a breathing-space. He was in complete possession of himself now; and as he greeted the man in the airy, frivolous manner that had become the fashion in place of the old chivalric courtesy, he said to himself, beneath his conventional words: “How anyone as sensible as Sir John can go off into such vulgar guffaws just because a beast’s saved in place of a man! Mother of God! As if we weren’t all monkeys, with our chatterings and our antics!” And while he kept his cold inscrutable grey stare fixed on the restless eyes of this proud youth, his mind reverted to the loosened hair and exposed breasts of the woman he had come to fetch — no wilful young Efa, but a mad sorceress — and his spirit faced his future with this strange being in perfect calmness.

"I shall subdue her again, as I did before," he thought, and all manner of intimate passages between them rose up in his mind. "It's because I'm neither excited by her, nor afraid of her. It's because I like her. It's because I'm fond of her. And I don't suppose anyone else in the world — certainly not her daughter — could say that! The monk loves her, but he doesn't like her. Think of only being liked by one person in the whole world! She becomes a young girl again with me. Nobody else does that for her. And that, after all, is the thing with a woman that outlasts everything else!"

"Exactly, my dear young sir," he was now saying; and there was something about his neatly-trimmed, pointed beard and about his Saxon sang-froid and his cold, detached, indifferent stare that made the Tudor feel as if the prow of his proud boat had struck an iceberg. "Like yourself," Denis went on, having made sure by a glance at the man he had left that Gam had gone off with his fellow "familiar," and that Owen's fantastic Herald, in his tabard of black lions, was delivering his message, "like yourself I am on my own business here. The Baron of Glendourdy has just picked up from the water a valuable present sent him by the King of France. From what I've seen of this treasure trove it ought to prove a most interesting addition to the castle's bestiary. Have you chanced to see in your travels, sir, the talking Ape of the Emperor Manuel? No court, of course, can be considered civilized without some rarities of this kind. Even King Harry has a white mule at Berkhampstead that breaks wind to each letter of the French King's name. I believe, if the word 'Glendower' is uttered in its presence, it—"

But it was no longer necessary to block the young man's audience with the Prince. Owen seemed completely himself now. He was apparently holding the Herald and the crowd at arm's length while he said goodbye to the sea-drenched Broch. Queer that he should be shaking hands with the man and giving him his blessing when the fellow was only retiring to the castle to change his clothes! Had Denis been nearer, however, he would have been astonished to see how calm two Welshmen can be when they are trying to break each other's hearts.

"So this is the end," Owen was thinking, "a monkey instead of a fleet; and my friend deserting me! Well, well, old conjurer, you've got to swim alone to land now, or sink forever! You knew what was coming when that woman arrived, and now it's come!"

But his words to Broch were calm. "No, no. It's all right, old friend. You needn't say anything. There are times when we're forced to make our choice. I made mine at Glyndyfrdwy when I broke my crystal. You made yours just now when you were tempted to let the sea cover your old skull and have done with it once and for all. Goodbye, my only friend. I fully understand. I know what you feel about Morg and the girls. No! no! Don't say any more. Take what men you need and off with you to Snowdon! In Snowdon you can defend your women against King Hal forever! No! we've discussed it enough. We part as we've lived — nearer to each other than any Welshmen have been since Arthur disappeared!"

The salt-water dripped from every curve and every angle of Broch's figure; and for some queer reason he'd been trying, ever since he came out of the sea, to make a great slippery sea-weed ribbon remain in position round one of his huge wrists.

But now he gave this up and threw the thing away. "You're being as cruel to me as you can, Owen ap Griffith," he said, spitting some brine out of his mouth. "But remember this, my love and Prince! We may be play-actors before each other, night and day, for fifty years; but a time comes when we have to act our part for ourselves alone. We shall meet again, my Prince — once again; and then—"

If there were two kinds of brine on Broch's face, as he pushed his way through the crowd past the Herald, who tried to hold him back, past Gam and the monkey, both of whom gave him an obscure greeting, to where Philip Sparrow awaited him at the postern-gate, there were three kinds on the face of the Prince, for the monkey, either in love or in bewilderment, had bitten his cheek as they struggled in the water, and the tears that flowed from his eyes were mingled with blood as well as with sea-salt.

But the impatient and agitated Elphin was now at last permitted to hand to his master the travel-stained letter, the foreign bearer of which, riding post-haste from Milford Haven, had already excited the castle to fever-pitch.

The Prince could see at once — as he raised his head after reading this hurried but ceremonious scrawl, signed by the famous names of Patrouillart de Trie and Robert de la Heuze, that the temper of his subjects had completely changed. He was their venerated leader again; and both Crach Ffinnant and his Demon-Saint were completely forgotten.

"May I announce it in the presence of these English noblemen, my Prince?" asked Elphin.

"You may announce it to the Irish Sea, my lad," laughed Owen. "All Ardudwy seems to know it already!"

And in the most resonant voice that had ever been heard on that Harlech beach the young man proclaimed: "To the Principality and Dominion of our high and mighty sovereign Lord, Owen ap Griffith Fychan, and to the Realm of England lately subject to the noble and gracious Prince Richard, the Second of that name, be it understood and known of all men in both these nations and in all the countries and provinces and continents and islands abroad that the royal army conveyed by the royal fleet of the Royaume de France has safely anchored in Milford Haven, to aid and assist to the best of its power in the downfall of that sacrilegious and treacherous usurper, Henry Bolingbroke, falsely called Henry the Fourth. God save Prince Owen!"

And so deafening was the shout that went up from the soldiers and people that it was only Denis, to whose side the dripping, fish-smelling Sir John had now shuffled, who heard what that incorrigible jester said.

"God save the King!" the old Lollard retorted. "And God confound the King's Archbishop!"

XX. KNIGHTS AND BISHOPS

THE SPRING HAD passed and most of the summer, when on Lammas Day, August the first, in the year of grace fourteen hundred and five, Herald Elphin and his young ally, Iago ap Cynan, stood together in the doorway of a large shepherd's hut, or bwthyn, overlooking the castle of Haverford West. The cottager, or bwthynnwr, to whom the hut belonged, was at their side, engaged at present in a political argument with Master Philip Sparrow to whose care, for both the Arglwyddes and Lady Mortimer had implored him to keep an eye on the lads during their first campaign, Owen had entrusted the two young friends.

It had been at Broch-o'-Meifod's express wish that Master Sparrow had remained with the Prince when he himself with his wife and daughters departed for Snowdon; and all the ladies, with whom the beautiful Elphin was such a favourite, had been delighted when the Prince — always indulgent in matters of this sort — had assigned the formidable Master Sparrow as body-guard to the Court Herald and his friend.

Elphin had just that moment turned to Master Sparrow, whose precise position with regard to them had not been made very clear, and had petulantly enquired how soon he supposed the professional summons, to announce the capture of the castle to the burghers of the town, might be expected to arrive.

To this question Master Sparrow had seen fit to return no answer; and the impatient Herald and his friend could do no better than listen to the argument that was going on between the two men.

"Penfro's more English than Welsh," the shepherd was declaring, "and where her's not Welsh her's Flemish; and what I say is—"

"But you're a Welshman as much as I am," protested Master Sparrow, his high-pitched Powys-Maelor accent rising sharper and shriller the more his feelings were aroused. "What you people of the South don't see is that Owen ap Griffith is fighting for something larger than just Wales against England! He's fighting for the common people against the gentry in all Ynys Prydain! Your Flemish weavers will gain by his victory as much as we. When once the red dragon flies over every castle in the land — when once — I tell you! — Wales is what Owen wants to make her, with her Parliament for the Commonalty and her colleges for poor scholars, these curst gentry behind their stone walls will have to come to terms!

"We'll have then, Master Twm-o'-Bryn, what we've never had yet in the world, a real nation of the common people! I don't care how many foreigners there are in Penfro. To the Devil with your foreigners! If their sweat fattens our soil, and their fingers weave the wool of our sheep, they're our brothers. They're born of women like us, aren't they? They eat, drink, sleep like us, don't they? And when they're dead they stink like us. What do they pay tribute to Owen for, save to be kept from the malice of the men of the castles?

"Do'ee think I'm proud of these French knights, with their fol-de-rols and garde-a-tois, their trilla-lirras and fleur-de-luces? I'm ashamed to the marrow of my bones that we had to have them! But Owen knows what he's about. He's using knighthood to crush knighthood and chivalry to end chivalry! He's going to Tenby next, they say; then off, over the Usk, to Caerleon and Llantarnam! You've got to take a long view, Tom Shepherd, when it comes to this war. It'll go on, I tell you, even if Owen fails. It'll go on as long as there's a shepherd or a herdsman left in the land!

"These Frenchmen won't do us any lasting good. They're not workers like your Flemings. They're just the old love-your-lady and couch-your-lance gentry that the long-bows have unsaddled already!

"Times have changed, Twm-o'-Bryn, times have changed. Owen's doing more than he knows — bless his fork-beard! He may fail — Dewi Sant grant he don't! — but he's already lit such a beacon in this old land that nothing can put it out! It may be lost for a season — buried under the cinders of your Penfro bwthyn and of my Meifod bwthyn — but once lit it can never be extinguished."

"Gently, gently, Master Sparrow," protested the shepherd, winking at Iago ap Cynan who had begun to give ear to their talk. "My wife's dad in there," and he jerked his thumb towards the interior of the hut, "can mind the Black Death; and the day when labouring men, such as we, were beat and tormented and hanged by the neck for leaving their masters' fields. He says of course he's old and dotty, but I've listened to 'un since I were a bachgen and I've never known him wrong — he says that the land-serfs rose in many places and killed their lords, but naught came o't, he says, save a speechless hatred, lying like a millstone at the bottom of our hearts. There've been, Dad says, poor men's revolts, since thousands of years before Jesus, but not a one of them have done no good! Them as has got the land has got the souls of them as has to live upon the land!"

"Master Sparrow!" interrupted Elphin who hadn't listened to a word of this talk, so intent were his eyes on the extremely obscure and bewilderingly confused segment of the skirmishing below that the morning mists were alternately revealing and concealing. "Do you think, Master Sparrow, that the time has come for us to go down and find the Prince? It seems to me that there's hardly any more resistance. He'll want me to announce his terms to his prisoners; as well as to those who aren't yet his prisoners! I'd hate not to be there when he wants me."

Both Master Sparrow and the owner of the bwthyn turned upon the young man faces of scorn. "Where are your eyes, lad?" the shepherd remarked, revealing, Elphin thought, a deplorable ignorance of the great world, and of how heralds were esteemed there. "Don't you see that that wall you're looking at between those trees isn't the town wall at all, but the castle wall! They've a-took the town hours ago — afore you gentlemen were awake! Didn't ye hear what Taid said to little Olwen a while since, when ye were making her cheeks so red by praising her cakes?"

"No, Master, I didn't hear," cried Elphin eagerly; and he approached closer to the shepherd, who regarded his excited young face with less sympathy than if it had been the face of a well-horned tup.

"What did the old gentleman say to Mistress Olwen?" the lad repeated.

"Said young David came along here afore dawn, wi'all his pigs, and 'a told 'n town were took — took in the night. Didn't ye hear? But 'twere when ye were asking little Olwen for more of her bara brith and her were toasting at the coals! 'Twere little Olwen's curls ye were thinking of, I reckon, more'n her grand-dad's talk."

Iago came forward at that point, casually and nonchalantly. He hadn't hesitated himself, during this eventful night, when the town of Haverford West was being pillaged, to lift aside the curtain of the alcove on the left side of the hearth where little Olwen slept. But the old Taid was as uneasy a sleeper as any amorous youth, and before the girl was even aware that the most unscrupulous page in her Prince's court was peering down upon her pillow a significant movement from the ragged deer-skin on the other side of the hearth had sent the discomforted amorist back to his place by his sleeping friend.

"I must not play the fool," was what crossed the boy's mind now, "with any more Luneds! I promised myself I wouldn't. It was only because— "And he tried to persuade himself, as he listened to Olwen's father repeating what the swineherd had said, that the girl had "given him a look" as she drew her curtain.

"No, it's you, it's you, Rhisiart ab Owen, that I must keep in mind. First the Princess and then the Maid in armour! No light-of-love could turn you aside. Nothing could turn you aside! They think the King has caught you. Not a bit of it! Or if he has, he's caught a Tartar."

So absorbed was Iago in the competent steering of his life that as soon as Olwen's father ceased mentioning the girl who had unloosed her black curls behind that curtain, after "giving him a look," there fell between him and the confused mêlée in the valley below a kind of pictured glass.

A parallel intervention, only this was a muting medium rather than a dimming one, rose between him and what Twm-o'-Bryn and Master Sparrow were saying to each other. These subjective transparencies — for a portion of his consciousness pierced through them — contained a procession of moving images and grandiose sounds that weren't very different, for they too were full of blood and iron, from the drama that was now being revealed in the more objective medium of the morning mist and commented upon by the men at his side.

It was thus through fluctuating projections of himself in various commanding situations that Iago heard the men's talk, and watched the mist-magnified weapons as besiegers and besieged struggled for the possession of that fragment of wall.

"I can tell ye, Twm," cried Master Sparrow, "who that tall knight is — there! he's down! No, he's up again! It's from the back of the castle he's trying to get in! He must have bridged the moat — it's narrow there, not more than a ditch! He'll do it! No he won't — he won't!"

Iago's mental mist was all gone now and his pictures of future glory gone with it. He was staring at that gap in the trees as eagerly as Elphin. Neither of them had ever seen such a desperate fighter as that tall knight, or one so reckless of wounds and death.

Presently the owner of the bwthyn, without displaying any particular emotion, said something in a low voice to Philip Sparrow who turned at once to the two lads. "Into the house with ye, gentlemen! My orders was clear — to keep ye both out of harm's way till we're on the march for London town! Then ye can show your mettle as ye will!"

Tom the Shepherd, or Twm Bugail, had already entered the hut and his voice could be heard talking to his bed-ridden wife; but Master Sparrow, recognising that this was a critical test of his authority, had to go about the task of getting his young charges into shelter with considerable tact. But the truth is the man hadn't lived for five years cheek by jowl with Broch-o'-Meifod without noticeable modifications of his former cantankerousness. Besides, he himself found difficulty in withdrawing from this exciting scene, for he knew the bwthyn's one small window would be a wretched substitute for the open hillside.

Thus he kept pulling Elphin by the sleeve towards the door while all the while his own head was twisted round towards that narrow stage of desperate battle.

"Yes! It's Patrouillart de Trie, their chief French champion! I know his black armour. Like all those fool-knights he's been itching, ever since he came over, to do some mad impossible thing. There! They're making a sortie against him — coming over the wall with ladders! Fool! If they begin that he hasn't a chance. He'd better get away while he can. There's not a Welshman with him, look you! It's Patrouillart right enough. Can't you see his black armour? 'Tis the very mail he had on when we found them encamped at Milford. 'Tis a pretty suit. Our armourer can't hammer out all that fancy work. There, he's down! Yes, they've got him; and his men are running! Twm here knows the garrison well. Three were herdsmen from Somerset, he says, not to mention a dozen from Exmoor. Stout men of their hands, he says; and not over-fond of King Harry either. But they'll fight with any coup de Dieus or grace de Maries like cur-bitten badgers! Don't like the cut of a French beard, he says. Into the house with ye, gentlemen! Those were the orders. No, there's not a Welshman down there. French and English; nothing but them; so what's it to us who's prisoners?

"Patrouillart must have thought he could take the castle alone if he got in from the back. There! All quiet. How his household ran! He must be a prisoner. They made a sortie and finished his little game. Well! he's a man anyway. Fair play to him; he certainly is a man! Think of trying to take Castell Haverford West by his own strength! Into the house with ye, gentlemen; and bear witness how I kept my word to the Prince.

"Fight like a devil that Frenchman did; and what armour! Our armourers don't bother with all those fol-de-rols. But 'twas a pretty sight; and he's a prisoner now! A tirra-lirra gentleman — curse his whoreson soul! — but, fair play to him, a man for all that; and a prisoner. Who'll wear that armour now? His magnificence Francis de Court, no doubt, King Harry's pet! And Lady Joan will have those black ornaments made into bangles. Heigh ho! The great Patrouillart a prisoner! Into the house with ye, gentlemen, into the house!"

As they stooped to follow him under the low-hung lintel our two young friends had very different thoughts. Elphin said to himself: "Oh that I'd been sent by Patrouillart to tell the Prince of his plight!" While Iago thought: “Our worthy Sparrow’s torn between his peasants’ revolt and his love of heroes. He hates Patrouillart on principle and adores him in practice! This is what might have happened to me if I hadn’t acquired the philosophy of Rhisiart, that profound and penetrating man!”

Forcing himself, therefore, on the strength of what he considered his hero’s principles, to avoid the peril of those “looks” which he was certain Olwen was giving him, Iago deliberately sank into a concentrated speculation about his future life. The sight of the sea at Milford, though there were only a few French ships still anchored in the bay, had been not a little upsetting to him; and it was upon this overpowering attraction that he now brought to bear the full force of what he had come to call “Rhisiart’s philosophy.”

How could he find these highly-placed damsels — by whose aid he was resolved to rise to power and glory — if he yielded to his longing to go to sea? It is true his friend Elphin often spoke of mermaids; “But I might as well ride to success,” he thought, “on the back of a unicorn, as on the tail of a mermaid.”

The famous Prince Madoc had left the warring nations in disgust and had found some huge continent beyond the setting sun; but none had sailed there since, and even if he followed the example of that great man it was likely enough that there were no more continents to discover.

It almost seemed then that if he pursued the relentless path of Clerk Rhisiart he would have to give up not only the dark curls of the maidens of Penfro but the dark horizons of the sea as well, and this thought troubled him not a little.

“I feel,” he said to himself, “as if this campaign were the crisis of my life,” and he gave a quick sideways glance, full of the irritation of a person who is suppressing himself with a person who is expressing himself, at the illuminated countenance of his friend Elphin who, as they sat side by side on a bench that, by the notches upon it, had evidently served the purpose both of a butcher's block and a carpenter's table, was clearly absorbed in one thing only, the penetrating charm of this bwthyn interior.

The great Patrouillart, whether dead or alive, had passed completely from this young artist's mind. He too was forming resolutions; but these had only to do with certain changes he would make — when this campaign was over and he had proclaimed Owen's victory — in his Herald's Chamber at Harlech.

He had no idea that the shepherds' huts ever held such perfect specimens of twelfth-century carving as was the low bed, only raised a foot from the floor, upon which the sick woman was lying.

There were very few modern objects in the bwthyn of Twm-o'-Bryn. Indeed perhaps only one could be called so; and that was a particular kind of shepherd's crook, a kind that was now being made in Dorset in considerable quantity, and conveyed from Poole Harbour to Milford Haven by that enterprising burgess and ship-master, Dick Hussey of Wareham.

It was by marrying the old man's daughter that Twm Bugail had entered into possession of this homestead, whose name — Tŷ-uwch-y-Llyn — indicated that it had stood for centuries on the hill above the castle-moat.

It was spacious enough, this single room round which Elphin's eyes now wandered; and to the lad's mind it possessed a special dignity and beauty, for it reminded him of his own home, y Grug or "the Mound", bestowed on his ancestor by Griffith ap Cynan.

The mist-distorted image he had glimpsed just now of that tall figure in black armour hurled back into the moat and deserted by his men had sunk deeply into his imagination.

This was the first vision of real war he had seen except for that Bristol pirate and the French ship, and his heart leapt up to think that it had been his privilege to see the great Patrouillart, singly and alone — like Peredur ab Evrawc, or Owain ab Urien — assaulting a whole castle!

The worst of it was — and how mixed up the events of life were! — whenever the heroic Patrouillart appeared between him and all these gracious objects that revived memories of his home in Edeyrnion, a pulse of shame beat in his soul and a hot interior blush, though his friend couldn't see it, burned in his cheeks.

He ought to have rushed down the hill to the help of that noble knight, instead of letting himself be hustled into shelter along with these peasants and these women!

But Elphin's passion for a symbolic atmosphere soon overpowered his shame. "This scene," he said to himself, as he listened to Master Sparrow's prediction that the English labourers would throw off their lords' yoke the moment Owen crossed the border, "is a scene I'll never forget to my dying day. It'll most certainly affect the whole arrangement of my room when I get back to Harlech. And if only I could — oh! if only I could! — see all these heads as the heads of heraldic beasts!"

But whether he could give them an heraldic twist or not, the clear-cut classical lineaments of the sick woman as she rested immobile on her high pillows, the tumbled curls and mischievous mouth and restless eyes of Olwen, the long pointed nose and rough red hair of Twm, the familiar lanky black locks, pinched mouth and sunken eyes of Master Sparrow, along with the bowed grey head of the old man bending over the pot, made up a group of living creatures that roused an indescribable feeling in the lad's breast.

The walls were hung with old-fashioned bows and arrows, intermingled with the still carefully-polished harness of horses long since dead. A massive distaff and weaving-frame stood at the foot of the woman's bed. On the heavy oak table in the centre of the room was a large wooden bowl, surrounded by smaller ones of the same dark oak, rubbed smooth by a century's use, and each containing a battered wooden spoon.

There was a great bundle of dried furze-stalks piled up against the inner wall of the bwthyn; and every now and then the girl would cross the room to this pile and fetching a little bundle of these inflammable sticks throw them upon the hearth where the glowing bricks of peat caused them to break into flame.

But Elphin's artist-eye soon appreciated the fact that the real centre of the whole place wasn't so much the hearth itself as an enormous iron cauldron which stood on a tripod in front of the hearth.

Some extremely savoury stew was boiling in this cauldron; and the grand father, armed with a long wooden spoon, was engaged in stirring this steaming brew.

Elphin soon became teased by the fact that Tom Shepherd, the master of the house, kept approaching the cauldron, as if distrusting the competence of the old man. Elphin himself cared nothing about the brew or its stirring. All he desired was for everything and everybody to remain where they were forever. "This is life!" is what his whole nature was crying; though he made no attempt to put this feeling into words.

With a vague delicious sense of majestical far-off times, when cauldrons like this were mixed and stirred by beings of supernatural power, he would have liked to have immobilized this spectacle and shown to the world its immortal significance.

But Tom Shepherd suddenly cried out, "Take care, Grand-dad! Those daisy-eye bubbles be rising and bursting! Take care or broth will spoil!"

"See to't theeself, Twm!" muttered the old man, without lifting his head. "Stir'un theeself, if thee can't trust one as has stirred cauldrons in Castell Merddin avore thee were born!"

Elphin watched with intense interest these "daisy-eye bubbles" rising to the rim of this huge receptacle, which was so arranged on its iron tripod that the flames kindled by Olwen ardently licked its belly.

He soon perceived what the grandfather's dim eyes, made obstinately dimmer by his son-in-law's interference, had missed; namely, that a thin foam of broth was trickling down the side of the cauldron upon the hearthstone.

The girl, however, also saw this, and running for a cloth was soon on her knees wiping up the steaming drops; while, with the dying down of the flames she'd been feeding, the boiling in the pot subsided too.

"Why do women," thought the young Court Herald, "always go on so long scrubbing the place where anything's been spilt, after they've got it up?"

But Elphin was soon aware of a fidgetty unease on the bench beside him, where his friend was having some difficulty in following his recent adherence to the Rhisiartian philosophy of self-control.

Elphin himself was not indifferent — though being an artist his emotion was more diffused — to the engaging spectacle of Olwen scrubbing the floor at their very feet; but the whole scene was giving him such exquisite pleasure that the kneeling girl became only the final touch in a natural work of art so perfect that it was impossible to isolate any of its elements from the rest.

The whole bwthyn, with all its human figures, was grouped to the Herald's mind round the cauldron; and the longer Olwen scrubbed at that stone, and he began to wonder now if she weren't purposely tormenting

Iago with her proximity, the more the scene lost its prosaic reality and became the kind of symbolic truth that he had long longed to eternalize in some form of art.

Elphin had already been made obscurely aware of the presence in this great western promontory of something that answered a craving in him that he was unable to define. It had to do with a peculiar quality, a hidden virtue in the very texture of these rocks and marshes and mists and headlands; and it seemed to him as if this great cauldron that he now saw bubbling before him, with the girl kneeling beneath it and the old man bending above it, held the very secret he sought.

He even found himself wishing that he were the youngest in the place; so that in accordance with what he had heard was a custom in these parts he might be given the first taste of this magic brew!

His mind had just reverted to Luned and to a fantastic hope, a hope that grew more plausible the further off he was, that he might really be the father of her child, when the white-faced woman suddenly lifted herself up into a sitting posture and brought them all to their feet with a terrifying cry.

"He's at the door!" And Elphin realized then that ever since they had entered the bwthyn, they had all been expecting this, and that every word they had uttered and every gesture they had made had been a mystic prelude to this consummation.

With the woman sitting up straight in bed, with Olwen standing at her side clinging to her hand, with the old man crossing himself and muttering, "Mary, Joseph! Mary, Joseph!" they were all certain now — though no knock had come and no appeal had been made — that the tall figure in black armour was outside.

"Shall I bar the door, Nest?" enquired the man of the house, in a low husky voice, of the woman in the bed.

"Bar the door, do you say? You fool, you fool! Open it quick, for Christ's holy blood, or I'll do it myself!"

Twm of Tŷ-uwch-y-Llyn obeyed her without question; and there, on the threshold, and now stumbling forward into their midst, with bare head bent to enter, was the man who had fought alone against a castle! His long narrow face above his black gorget was white as death. He held a broken sword in his hand, which slipped from his fingers as he stood swaying there before them, and fell with a metallic ring upon the floor.

Iago ap Cynan moved stealthily past him and took it upon himself, unauthorized by anybody, to close and bolt the door. He even went to the window and looked out. "They've gone back," he said, addressing nobody in particular.

Patrouillart de Trie lifted his hands, both of which were bare, to his long death-white face and covered his eyes for a moment as if to give help to his bloodless brain in formulating its last and most difficult thoughts. When he removed his hands there were bloody smears across his thin forehead and it seemed to Elphin, who watched him in spellbound awe, that these crimson stains arranged themselves into a mystic monograph, like the mysterious name written on the foreheads of the army of martyrs in the Book of Revelation!

Elphin never forgot that moment. It was the culmination of all. He felt the presence of the wooden bowl in the centre of the table. He felt the presence of the smaller bowls each with its wooden spoon. He felt the presence of the great cauldron on its iron tripod. And now here was the Black Knight himself, the dedicated subject of all the romances he had ever read!

Elphin could not be called belligerent; but in his heart he cursed Iago just then with a ferocity that surprised himself. He uttered this vicious malediction on his friend’s head because, while everyone else was awaiting in hushed expectancy some word or sign from Patrouillart, whose right hand was up once more at his head, while his left was scrabbling grotesquely and impotently at his armoured breast as if the trunk of his body were a wire cage containing a fluttering bird, what must Iago do — and oh! how he hated that puckery face and those small black eyes! — but kick over a bucket of swill which Olwen, interrupted by their entrance, had forgotten to remove!

And as if this weren’t enough, the insensitive lad proceeded to save himself from a fall by touching with his hand the almost supernatural figure of the Black Knight.

Everybody but Iago was completely under the spell of this tottering and swaying form; and there quivered through Elphin a faint shivering fear, not of Patrouillart, but of the power of his friend to treat Patrouillart so calmly. The spilling of that bucket caused a sour garbage smell to pervade the place; and the unconcerned manner in which Iago was now actually assisting Patrouillart in his advance to the woman in the bed played the same part in the human dimension as the bucket played in the inanimate one, both of them joining to drag Elphin’s enchanted moment heavily to the ground.

It was an indescribable comfort to our young Herald when his friend, having so grossly presumed to meddle with this tragic apparition, did at last fall back, letting the figure sink on its knees at the side of the woman’s pillow.

Olwen too fell back; and it was a surprise to Elphin, though from the expression on that square face it was no surprise to Iago, when the girl’s fingers tightened upon that rogue’s wrist.

“Aux blanches mains — aux blanches mains!” murmured the Frenchman hoarsely; and then, “Tiens!” he groaned. “Désarmez! Délacez! Arrachez! Souffrez-moi que je meurs! Par l’amour de Dieu — cette pointe de lance!”

Whether the woman understood his words Elphin couldn’t tell, but that she understood his meaning was plain to all. Very gently she unlaced his gorget and laid it on the bed beside her. Then with more difficulty — but none of the onlookers, not even Iago as he stood by Olwen’s side, dared to offer help — she unhooked his breast-plate and pulled aside from the ghastly wound his blood-soaked shirt.

“She’ll faint now,” Elphin thought. “She can’t pull out that spearhead!”

But the man kept beseeching her; and it was clear that the pain was almost beyond his endurance. “Arrachez la pointe de fer — for the love of God!” he kept repeating. “Your hands are so small,” Elphin heard him moan. “Mains petites — arrachez la pointe — souffrez-moi que je meurs — vite! vite! — aux blanches mains!”

And then in the view of them all — those two faces, the man’s and the woman’s being as close as they were white and wide-eyed — she clenched her teeth and forcing her fingers into his bleeding flesh, while a choking, long-drawn, shuddering cry tore itself from both their throats, she wrenched the spear-head out of the wound.

Following it, in a dreadful spurt of red, his life-blood poured over her; over her arms, over her breast, over her pillow! His last words seemed to sink with his blood into the inmost being of this woman he had never seen before.

“Vièrge de Chartres! ” Elphin heard him gasp twice over; and then: “Pour le Royaume de France! ” and with this the head of Patrouillart de Trie straightened itself, jerked backward, jerked forward, and sank with the death-convulsion of the man’s whole body against the carved edge of the woman’s bed.

The days that followed this event passed through the brain of Elphin like heraldic pictures embroidered on canvas by the hands of the Fates themselves.

“I don’t care now,” he thought, “even if we don’t crown Owen in London where Bran the Blessed was crowned! I have seen honour in the flesh. I have heard honour give its triumph-cry. And though it was its death-cry also, that doesn’t matter; that’s a bagatelle. N’importe! Ce n’est pas grand’ chose.”

Elphin held fast to the end of his days to this revelation of the spiritual character of French chivalry. He held fast too to his belief in his own capacity for heroism, though this latter faith was now to receive a considerable shock. The allied army — and it was a wonder to see that enormous host; for there must, all told, have been nearly fifteen thousand men embattled there under Owen — moved from Haverford West to Tenby and besieged the castle there. While thus engaged, the King’s courtier-captain, Francis de Court, who had managed by the help of his wife Joan to wheedle himself into the great Lordship of Pembrokeshire, brought into action against the allied host a curious and terrifying weapon.

De Court was a personable young favourite, frivolous and fantastic, and full of end-of-the-fourteenth-century disillusionment; but he took a lively and wanton interest in scientific experiment. Thus no sooner had the enormous allied host, with its numberless banners of France and Wales flaunting in the air, its emblazoned shields, its thousands of bowmen and spearmen, its masses of heavily accoutred men-at-arms, made its first assault upon the walls of Tenby than, with calm assurance and incredible levity, this same unconscionable de Court, perched upon a rampart that seemed impervious to all missiles, ignited a monstrous charge of gunpowder that caused to be flung for a distance as far as a stone's throw projectiles of such size that it was as if Jove himself with his thunderbolts were aiding the defenders.

But this was not the worst. For no sooner had the noise and smoke of this alarming cannonade drawn all the bravest commanders, including Owen and de la Heuze, the one-eyed French champion, to this menacing angle of the fortress than a far more agitating event struck panic-terror into the captainless rear of the allied army. This was nothing less than the appearance of a great fleet of English ships — thirty to fifty in number — in full sail for the landing-place!

The sea was calm, the wind was behind them, their decks were crowded. At the prows of each ship there waited dare-devil desperadoes, armed to the teeth, who looked as if they would leap to the shore the moment the ships touched land. But it was the horrid silence with which they approached, it was the absence of ordinary battle-cries, it was the lack of all the civilized paraphernalia of modern warfare, that made this fleet so terrifying.

In a few moments, all the advantage that Owen had snatched from the reckless de Court by a bold defiance of his cannonade was lost to the allies. The unfortunate thing was that this new attack threatened the less experienced portion of the straggling Welsh army. Their best men were all gathered under the castle walls; and it was their leaderless rear, trailing along the harbour's edge, that confronted the approach of this fleet. Sailing in on a favouring wind this armada looked larger than it actually was. The whole water seemed covered with swaying masts and swelling sails.

Elphin himself, it must be confessed, was among the first to take refuge in flight. The others followed him, and very soon the whole of that portion of the army was seized with a wild panic. It was as if this frivolous young de Court had countered Owen’s “spirits” with some appalling kind of hud or lledrith, some devilish illusion or enchantment, calculated to throw the noblest host into confusion!

As Master Sparrow and Iago ran by Elphin’s side, and as it became evident that the Prince and his vanguard had been compelled to follow their panic-stricken army, Elphin heard his friends breathlessly commenting on this untoward event. Their comments struck him almost as painfully as the phantom-fleet itself; for they both were presuming to criticize the Prince’s whole management of this great campaign. With gasps and groans Master Sparrow, who sweated freely as he ran, for he was no longer the lean and taciturn husbandman whom Broch had lured to Meifod from the Tassel Inn, hesitated not to accuse Owen of buckling to the Frenchmen’s love of display.

“Why the devil,” he panted, “aren’t we now halfway to Hereford, instead of parading our ridiculous pomp round these castles? Owen thinks too much of castles. It’s his curst gentility! He ought never to have left the mountains and forests. Above all he ought to have kept away from the sea. We’re not meant—”

But this aspersion, by a simple rustic, upon the element over which Prince Madoc had sailed to discover new worlds was too much for Iago; and Elphin, who could think of nothing just then but the unheard-of shame of a herald running away, was compelled to listen to a completely irrelevant defence of the fine seamanship of Welsh sailors.

“By Crish and Saint Ffraid!” groaned Master Sparrow soon. “I can’t run a step further. There, there! Enough my masters! Enough in God’s name!” They stopped and looked back. “’Tis as I thought,” the breathless fellow gasped. “Owen’s got ’em under control. There are his black lions! There’s his flamingo-feather!” He paused and rubbed his face with both hands. But the flamingo-feather had excited his spleen. “What does the man want, I ask ye, with all that flummery? To astonish the Frenchmen! That’s all it is. Oh these gentry, these gentry! Here, sit ye down, masters, sit ye down,” and he indicated a fallen tree. “I’ve a pretty little poppet of news for ye, if ye can bear any more.”

The two lads were glad enough to take his advice; and all three sank down in the bracken with their backs against the log, watching the flamingo-feather of their Prince and the white plume of the one-eyed de la Heuze flit about amid the disorganized ranks like a couple of majestic butterflies.

But neither of the young men felt the smallest desire to hear their companion’s “poppet of news”. Elphin had been out of sympathy with this champion of the people all along. The man’s tone made him feel like a pampered page rather than the youngest of the ancient and honourable Order of Court Heralds. It was an insult to his discretion as well as a slight upon his courage that he should have to put up with this cantankerous and crochetty body-guard.

As for Iago, his mind, as would soon have been detected by an observer more on the alert than either of his present companions, was almost oblivious to the impressive scene before him. It is true that his small, deep-set black eyes stared at those tossing banners and glittering spears just as his small, well-shaped ears listened to the shouts and the clamour of the reassembled host; but both sights and sounds were to him just then a negligible background, against which he saw the detestable red hair and inquisitive nose of the owner of that bwthyn, as these objects intruded themselves upon his farewell interview with little Olwen.

“It’s dark chestnut her curls are,” he thought, “not black as they looked in that smoky hovel. Mother of God! What a sneaking devil, to come round the house spying on a person!”

“Tis a wonderful sight, gentlemen, isn’t it,” Master Sparrow was saying, “to see all those spearmen and bowmen from the land of our fathers ready to march upon the city of London? Well! I’ll tell you what reached my ears last night, as I had a cup of mead with certain old mates of mine who’ve friends over the border. It seems there’s a real revolt brewing in Hereford and Worcester against the gentry. They’ve only to catch a glimpse of our people to hail Owen as their deliverer!”

Thus speaking he turned to his companions with the air of an oracle. But the young egoists at his side received this information with complete indifference.

Elphin said to himself: “Will my voice carry in the middle of those tall houses, when I proclaim to the London merchants that their lives and possessions will be respected?”

And Iago thought: “He must sometimes have snatched a little pleasure, on the side as it were, as he pursued his master-purpose. Besides, my princess, my maid in armour, hasn’t yet appeared; and even he must have allowed himself before he met the women he could use — an occasional—”

But their body-guard from the plough hadn’t lived with Broch-o’-Meifod for nothing. In place of falling into sardonic silence in the presence of these insolent young springalds as he would certainly have done at the Tassel, he contented himself with asking them if they’d heard why it was that the French knights had so few horses.

Both the lads turned quickly to him then; and having secured their attention he explained that several hundreds of their horses had died at sea from lack of water.

Elphin shuddered. His imagination pictured the heavy bodies of these dead and dying animals as they were thrown to the fishes; and he suddenly found himself yielding to a dark and chilly doubt as to whether he would, after all, lift up his voice in London-town.

“What do you think,” he enquired, “has become of those terrible looking men we saw on those ships? You don’t suppose they’ve landed, do you, and gone off by some long detour to intercept us?”

Iago gave his friend a quick glance. It was strange what practical thoughts could come into that girlish head!

But Master Sparrow re-assured them both. “English sailors,” he said, “never go far from their ships. Besides, gentlemen, not even the crews of fifty ships would dare to attack a whole army.”

Pondering on the peculiarities of English sailors, Iago decided that it would certainly be with a Welsh crew that he would sail to discover Prince Madoc’s continent and the hidden retreats of its eager princesses.

“How did the Black Knight come to be left so entirely alone, Master Sparrow?” Elphin now enquired. As he spoke he cast round the neighbouring hills the glance of a seasoned campaigner. He hadn’t missed his friend’s surprised look, and his tone was now the tone of one man with another, in the presence of a well-meaning but totally inexperienced youth.

The ex-herdsman of the Tassel found this question entirely to his taste. “These French gentry,” he explained, “are as different from ours as ours are from the English. Their chief desire is to win personal glory by performing some startling feat of arms. The Black Knight was alone for the simplest of all reasons: because he wanted to be alone. Nobody knew — neither Owen nor the others — what he was up to; and so of course they couldn’t—”

“But I have often heard you say, Master Sparrow,” Iago broke in, and there was a contrariness in his voice that made the herdsman’s fingers itch to give those little shining black eyes a resounding buffet, “that all gentry are the same; and that our campaign is as much to liberate the common people of England as the common—"

But the malicious lad now scrambled to his feet quite as precipitately as his listeners. None of the three, as they stretched out their legs in the sweet-scented bracken, watching at their ease the stirring spectacle before them and listening to the Welsh horns and the French trumpets, had noticed the approach from their rear of a little group of Harlech guards.

Well known to them all, these stealthy new-comers hesitated not to enhance the shock they gave them by considerable merriment at their expense; and thus when, under instructions from the Prince, our three friends were gathered into the Ardudwy contingent not far from his own person, and falling into their places were swept forward in the general advance, Elphin at any rate was aware of a dull throbbing bruise in the depths of his self-esteem which considerably spoilt the excitement he felt at having at last really and truly started on this historic, this memorable, this longed-for march to London.

As may be imagined, the various disturbing episodes, some romantic and marvellous, some shocking and painful, which that great march evoked, obliterated by degrees the youth's chagrin at having led — for in his heart he knew that he was the first to run — that panic-flight from those ships.

It took some days, all the same, to free his mind from that awe-inspiring sight. He may, he thought, have a little exaggerated the ogrish ferocity of the sailors, for of course they were too far-off for him to see their faces; but there must have been something weird and unnatural about them, or Master Sparrow and Iago wouldn't have run, too.

Hadn't Rhisiart told him a terrifying tale once, in their Snowdon fortress, about the great enchanter Gwydion ap Don calling up from the abyss a fleet that was pure illusion to over-awe the crafty Arianrod? Elphin remembered how Rhisiart had pinched his arm as he told him this story and how he'd said to himself, even while the tears filled his eyes, that the pain of the pinching was nothing to the awfulness of the vision described.

But if Elphin's feeling about the ships gradually died away as they marched, Iago's memories of the bwthyn of Tŷ-uwch-y-Llyn and those curls that were "rather chestnut than black" grew more and more obsessing.

Iago found that it was pain to him even so much as to speak to any red-haired Welshman in their troop because it brought back to his mind the red hairs that grew between the eyebrows of Twm-o'-Bryn; hairs that had presented themselves to his attention when he had almost decided that it wasn't necessary to have a purpose quite as clear-cut as that which suited such an unusual character as Rhisiart. "We can't all be Rhisiarts," he had said to himself on that occasion, with Olwen's dainty chin already between his finger and thumb.

But it was all spoilt by that whoreson foxy nose, with the red hairs above it, sniffing round the house. So absorbed in these thoughts did Iago become that Elphin decided again and again, as their victorious advance led them through many famous places, that when he returned to Harlech he would relate to Luned the whole engaging story of their boyish friend's initiation into the joys and pains of love.

"She'll have her child by then — our child!" he would say to himself; and he even went so far, when necessity compelled him to fall out from the ranks, as to fit the words "our child" to a wistful little ditty full of the old Welsh cynghanedd, or alliteration.

This production, which he kept scrupulously from Iago, who was naturally too young to associate romance with children, he would hum to a tune of his own; until the love of Luned and Elphin took the place, in many a border forest, of the bird-songs that had died away in that summer-heat.

The further he went from Harlech the easier he found it to thrust from his mind the teasing doubts of his paternity.

He would tell himself again and again that the importance of all those physical details, so distasteful to his nature, those details about which the dead Sir Rawlff so loved to discourse, was probably greatly exaggerated.

The most memorable pause the allied army made ere it left the confines of Wales was at Caerleon-upon-Usk. Elphin was moved more than he expected, when lingering behind the Prince’s guard he watched the impassioned ardour with which the French knights — mounted on Welsh ponies and cursing themselves for letting their own good steeds perish at sea — contemplated the famous earth-works where Arthur held his Jousts and his Round Table. Several of the foreign gentlemen displayed as lively an interest in our romantic-looking youth as they did in Arthur’s Table, but Elphin astonished his ambitious friend by the cold civility with which he received these flattering overtures.

Both he and Iago paid a dutiful visit to the grave of John ap Hywel in the precincts of the Abbey of Llantarnam; and as the two lads knelt side by side before that new tomb, as yet unmarked by any head-stone, they both thought of Rhisiart and the Maid, and prayed ardently for their safety, whether in this world or the next.

If Iago was surprised at his friend’s reception of the courtly interest taken in him by several famous French knights, Elphin in his turn was amazed by the deep abstraction that fell upon Iago when they were ferried across the tidal Usk and scrambled up its muddy banks. Not a word could he get from the boy on this point, not even when they were well away from that fatal river; and if the one lad was kept in ignorance of the birth-song to Luned’s offspring, the other certainly never knew of the deep, tearless heart-cries that went up from those mud-banks: “Rhisiart! Clerk Rhisiart! What has become of thee? Rhisiart, greatest and wisest of men, where is thy proud soul now?"

Perhaps the most glorious moment for both the young men was when this great host of Welshmen and Frenchmen entered in triumph the outskirts of the City of Hereford. With a grand fanfare of trumpets they marched in, and in one of the outlying parish-churches the longed-for deliverance from the usurping House of Lancaster was intoned by various rebellious priests. The leading clergy, the Bishop among them, had already fled to join the royal forces in Worcester; while from the ramparts of the impregnable Old Town, with its towering Norman cathedral and castellated keep, Owen and Robert de la Heuze wisely turned away. They were anxious to reach Worcester before Henry's shire-levies had time to assemble; and they were reluctant to waste their strength in a tedious siege merely for the satisfaction of hearing Mass in a Cathedral.

"Well, we are in England at last, lads," Owen cried, as he rode past them one morning, a day or two later, in his daily inspection of his Welsh forces, "but we must see to it we don't leave our bones in England! That might suit our ladies in Harlech — eh? — ha? — better than it suits us!"

"What made him say that, do you think?" said Elphin to his friend when the Prince had ridden on. "Doesn't that seem to you rather an odd thing to say? About our leaving our bones, and our ladies being glad? I tell you, Iago, I don't like his having said that! There's something funny about it — and his voice — didn't you notice his voice, how unnatural it sounded?"

Iago shifted his spear from his left to his right shoulder, and surveyed his friend across its polished shaft. Elphin had never carried a spear in his life, and now as a Court Herald he would be indefinitely excused from carrying one; but the down-right soldier-tone, so blunt and unaffected, assumed by Iago, simply because of that spear, had been irritating him all that morning as they marched together. The fruit-orchards of Worcestershire, with their blue hazy distances and their windless foregrounds of quivering heat-waves, seemed to be absorbing Iago’s attention to the destruction of all serious conversation; and to this remark about the Prince’s unnatural excitement, and his strange quip about bones and ladies, he returned no reply at all.

Elphin glanced at the stocky figure at his side, plodding along with that great spear over his shoulder. He himself felt tired and sad. There had been little resistance so far to the advance of the allies; but he couldn’t get out of his head one Worcestershire hamlet where requisitioning had been opposed, and where they had left behind them blackened ruins, unburied bodies, wailing and cursing, and cries to heaven for vengeance.

One horrible sight he had seen, a dead woman with a living child at her breast; and he found himself tormented by the thought that whenever in future he worked at his favourite subject of a unicorn surrounded by thousands of flowers, some devil would force him to depict that woman in place of an idealized Luned!

They were following an old Roman road now and the horizon was misty with heat and each step they made sank in heavy dust. Elphin began to find Iago’s way of making a cheerful little skip or hop every few steps almost more than he could bear. His friend’s manner of breathing annoyed him too. Iago seemed to delight in breathing as loudly as possible and making whistling sounds as he went along.

“How can he go on staring in front of him,” Elphin thought, “when there’s nothing but dull lines of mud-coloured clouds over there; and nothing between them and this dusty road except a welter of blue heat? He marches along like an animal; yes, like a beast! I’ve often seen horses and cows stare in front of them just as he does. That’s where I’m going to suffer, being with Iago; and I know, when the order comes to rest, he'll just sleep like a log!

"What can he see in this dull flat country to make him whistle? I have to have some real scenery, romantic, exciting, distinguished, like our mountains and moors, before I can invent my heraldic symbols and compose my cynghaneddion."

Meanwhile Owen, riding now by the side of Robert de la Heuze, and listening to the Frenchman's elaborate plans for their strategy when they encountered the King's army, was giving way, at the back of his mind, to a discouragement profounder than he had ever known. What he now felt was even worse than what he'd suffered when he first heard of his brother's death. How was he to feed this great army advancing daily into a hostile country? The villagers, as it moved, kept driving their herds further and further afield, and butchering and burying what they couldn't drive off; and when he did meet Henry's forces face to face, and the grand encounter of his life did happen, what were his chances of a crushing victory?

The Frenchman at his side kept talking of the necessity of dividing their troops before the shock came. "We needn't," the man was assuring him now, "take any measures till our scouts bring us word he's within a few miles. Then all our mounted men must make an extensive detour and get behind him. That's the great thing, Sire! I've learnt it from a thousand historic campaigns. Without it there's no science of war at all, though there may be plenty of bloody skirmishes. We must take them in the rear, Sire. The whole art of strategy lies there. The rear, the rear! That puts it in a nutshell."

And Robert de la Heuze caused his heavy charger, one of the few that had survived the voyage, to caracole like a filly.

"That's exactly where it does put it," thought Owen savagely. "In a nutshell of neat words! But it would put us on spikes on London Bridge. Divide? Mother of God! And your French knights, I suppose, would be the mounted ones! A grand detour you'd make through country you're absolutely ignorant of; and can't I see my Welshmen's faces when they watch you prancing off!"

They presented a curious contrast, these two leaders, as they rode at the head of their motley host. Owen had given up, since meeting his allies, the modern Continental way of cutting his locks. Some deep instinct in him, perchance going back to the days when they buried Bran the Blessed's head in London, with its face turned to France, not as a friend but as an enemy, had effected a singular change in that portion of a man's life-illusion — and, as we know, this was a large portion in Owen's case — wherein his mood is reflected in his regard for, or disregard of, his personal appearance. This was indeed, and all the Prince's body-guard noticed it, the first time in his life that he had ever neglected to comb his beard or to trim his hair.

They noticed too, and Elphin regarded this with romantic delight, that since he'd left Harlech he'd ceased bearing on his arms the four black lions of Gwynedd, and in their place had substituted, and Elphin believed he'd found these arms in that ancient Caerleon Abbey, a shield and breast-plate and golden helm that bore the mystical red dragon of the old gwledig or chief ruler of Britain.

He rode a tall, gaunt white horse and carried a lance of a totally different kind from those carried by the French knights, much heavier in its shaft and with a head of bronze in place of steel. He still wore his famous flamingo-feather, but in the retaking of Merlin's citadel at Carmarthen half of this airy plume had been torn away, with the result that the golden circlet fastened round the golden helm — the metal of the one being very pale and of the other very glistering and burnished — carried with it, combined with the tangled forks of his now quite grey beard, an almost Arthurian look.

The man had grown much older and much sterner, and in the presence of these lively French nobles he had an expression that was almost ravaged, an expression as of one who was outliving his heart.

Robert de la Heuze, on the contrary, riding a dusky-coloured Arab charger that was all curves and curvettings and archings and prancings, was a swarthy little man with a bristling moustache and restless black eyes whose shield and pennon and horse's trappings were covered with such complicated armorial symbols that he resembled a figure from one of the newest stained-glass windows in some seignorial chapel of Auxerrois or Blois.

Owen kept inclining his massive head and golden helm towards the lively gentleman, who apparently was completely satisfied with the impression his strategic plans were making on this courtly revenant from the Round Table, but the thoughts that revolved beneath that torn feather and pallid circlet were wistful and sad.

The Prince was recalling the day he had ridden from Glyndyfrdwy to Mathrafal with his devoted Rhisiart behind him and little Efa on the back of his saddle; and he was thinking of other things too as he kept up his, "Yes, my dear Baron; yes, yes! Vous avez des desseins à outrance. You are a born Belisaire, my dear Baron! You invent such super-plans that I can hardly keep pace with you. Yes, of course. Ma foi! I never thought of that. Of course we must — Well, I shall give your words the most grateful and careful consideration!" He was thinking for example of that tombless grave of the Abbot of Caerleon. Aye! if he only had John ap Hywel by his side today! How that swarthy face would burn, and how that plain Welsh accent would ring out, in protest against all this fantastical guerre gauloise!

“What a fool I was,” he thought, “not to have realized how it would be between my mountaineers and these flowers of chivalry.”

He sighed bitterly into his untrimmed beard, as, bending his head to learn yet more about the art of campaigning in enemy territory, he decided that Robert de la Heuze had the expression of a one-eyed rat, licking its whiskers before gnawing through the final barrier to a well-stocked granary!

The truth was that there had always lain in Owen’s nature a vein of the arbitrary and the incalculable. He “followed his demon” in the old irrational sense of trusting the impulses and urges that came from the depths of his being rather than any rational motive.

Well might his body-guard from Ardudwy and his picked band of troopers from Edeyrnion wonder when they saw their leader, who had always been so punctilious in his courtly attire, revert to this primitive mode.

But they loved him for it! It pleased them more than anything he could have done. It fell in exactly with their own instinctive reaction from these sophisticated French gentlemen.

But Owen’s sadness had other causes than mere contrariness. For one thing, he had never felt more lonely. His Meifod friend had left him. His brother was dead. Rhisiart and the Maid were lost. Catharine was absorbed in her children, Meredith in his bride. And for another thing, unless he consented to take the advice of his ally and sack every town through which they passed he was at a loss to see what would happen when their supplies were exhausted.

Nor was the French force composed, as he’d hoped it would be, of a vast host of light-armed, quickly moving soldiers, against whose advance, till they reached London, all resistance would be impossible.

The new tactics of young Prince Hal, under the competent, unromantic leadership of his English captains, had shown fatally enough how a country should be invaded; and yet here were these proud fantastical knights, just like the ones he had defeated at Bryn Glas, planning the campaign as if it were a war against unarmed serfs instead of against the stout yeomen of the shires!

How sure he had felt of ultimate victory as he marched by Rhys Gethin's side over the mountains before that successful battle!

Where had he made his first mistake? Where had the tide begun to turn against him? The men behind him, Welsh and French alike, felt exultant and elated today. He alone was sad. And the mere fact that he, the leader, was the only one distrustful of the event, just when outwardly his fortunes were at their highest peak — how like fate it was!

Yes, he had had his dark moods before; but he had never felt quite as he did now. Something about the fact that he was staking everything on one grand throw of the dice deepened his congenital fatalism; and he began to be aware, too, of another curious psychic oppression.

He had never — not even when he served in the late King's wars — been at the head of such a host; and there came over him, from the very weight of his responsibility, from the very immensity of the mass of human emotions behind him, a feeling that no "tricks" with his individual soul, no tapping of supernatural powers in his own mind, could affect the practical issue. He might never submit to Hal Bolingbroke, nor to young Harry either, but what of Wales?

He felt just then like the only powerful swimmer on a ship doomed to sink. "Where did I make my mistake?" he kept asking himself; and as he struggled to find an answer he could only see the peaked wizard's cap and long ebony wand of the unconscionable Hopkin. "But that's absurd," he thought. “I was only playing with that old idiot’s predictions. I never really took them seriously.”

And then, all in a moment, he made up his mind where he had blundered. It was in that thrice-accurst “Tripartite Indenture”! But even that was not an isolated event. It had its own train of secret causes, one of which was his alliance with the Percies; and, by Our Lady, another was his marrying Catharine to that man! What he ought to have done after Bryn Glas was to have drawn back into Snowdon, left the Barons in their border-castles, and made an offensive and defensive alliance, not with the enemies of England, but with the crafty King himself!

They had now arrived at the summit of a small eminence; and he was disturbed in his ponderings by a change in the tone of his companion, and by the Frenchman’s suddenly fixing his one eye upon him with an exultant gleam and pointing with the end of his lance to a large compact village that lay, with a church in its centre, in the peaceful valley beneath them.

There was a considerable area of arable land about this village, land that was now composed of stubble-fields, upon which, as they looked down on them from above, the sun shone in a rich-golden haze.

The disturbing thought crossed Owen’s mind at that moment, as he encountered the Baron’s excited gaze, that one-eyed men were the cause of all his troubles! He suddenly felt an unholy pleasure in the Scab’s being safely under the sod and a shameless wish that his present companion had perished with the noble Patrouillart. “Yes,” he thought, “one-eyed men are my danger. If you were dead, you vicious little rat, I might have a chance still!”

He lifted his helmet from his forehead and wiped away the sweat, trying in vain to follow what the other was saying. “Sparrow may be right,” he thought. “There may be a rising of the peasants. But that young Harry’s my danger. He takes after his great-grandfather. Oh, Patrouillart, Patrouillart, why did you go and get killed? You're the one we'll need when we're face to face with that young fox! I'd like to see you challenge him to a single combat!" And as he stared at the golden stubble-fields the old French proverb came into his head: "In the kingdom of the blind the one-eyed man is king — Au royaume des aveugles les borgnes sont rois!" But he fell, after that, as he brushed a cloud of summer flies from his horse's neck with the helm he still held in his hand, into a daze of wonder as he thought what a maniac for glory and honour the deceased Patrouillart was. "There's no soil in the world," he thought, "like France for breeding such men. They die for honour as trout for flies! And yet you're a Frenchman, too, you one-eyed rat!"

At that moment, without any warning, his consciousness of the passing of time began to grow blurred. He recognized the sensation at once and knew what it portended. It was the usual prelude to what Rhisiart called one of his "attacks." He had taken off his helmet and held it in his hands and he now balanced it on his saddle-bow before him and looked round. Yes! There were those two lads. What a Providence at the particular moment! He heard his own voice calling, "Elphin! Iago!" just as a man might hear himself calling "Help! Help!" if he were drowning at sea.

Both the boys came running; and at the same instant, with a regular tourney-clatter and a jingling of accoutrements, the whole band of Frenchmen rode up. Robert le Borgne, after a quick glance at Owen and his attendants, advanced to meet the new arrivals. He had seen this happen to the Prince before; and the two lads didn't fail to mark the satisfaction with which he welcomed his compatriots, pointing his sword first at the helpless village below and then at the motionless figure on the white horse.

Meanwhile our two young friends, as they supported their chieftain, conversed in awed whispers across his horse's back. "A person can't," Elphin explained to Iago, "don the dragon of Uther without something happening. But I'm glad he did it, because it means we'll reach London and I'll proclaim him on Tower Hill, but it's a terrific strain for him. You heard what Master Sparrow said about his vomiting every night when the army-watchman calls twelve? Well! that's how it is! You remember what that monk said at Llantarnam — about Merlin in the shape of a pig-dealer conversing with him as he watched his arms by the Abbot's grave? Well! a man can't be visited by Merlin in these modern times without suffering for it."

In reply to his friend, Iago whispered that he'd heard at school about some ancient general who would remain for hours in the middle of a battle standing on one leg.

"But look, look! What are those French soldiers doing? They're entering the village without orders! Where's Master Sparrow? What's become of Master Don of Kidwelly?"

Elphin looked; and as he looked he became so agitated that his hands shook as he pressed them against the Prince's golden armour. "They're going to burn the whole place!" he thought.

But Iago went on. "They're going to loot every house down there! Elphin, look! This is a real war. This is a real — There! Did you hear that?"

But Elphin couldn't look and he longed to stop his ears. He thought of Luned. He thought of his parents in Edeyrnion. And then, as yells and cries increased and the smell of burning rose from the foot of the hill and he tried to harden his heart, fumbling with the Prince's accoutrements, he suddenly recalled a terrifying scene in the great hall at Snowdon. "Iago! Iago!" he whispered, fearful lest le Borgne should hear him, “he’s got on Eliseg’s belt and Eliseg’s sword!”

But Iago, who had less of the Prince’s weight to support, and was wholly absorbed in the confusion below, answered roughly, not troubling what he said, “The more fool he! Isn’t the bronze lance enough? Look! Look! This is real war. We’re seeing a real battle! Look! It’s burning! It’s burning! Can’t you smell the burning? Look, Elphin! Why don’t you look? They’re dragging some prisoners up the hill. But if Elphin hadn’t been supporting the Prince he would certainly have put his hands to his ears and shut his eyes. The only comfort he got as he countered the chieftain’s massive weight with all the strength of his thin arms was to rub his throbbing forehead against the handle of the bronze sword, and to shuffle his feet, in their leather thongs, between a clump of knapweed and a mole-hill to where his heels could touch the bronze spear.

Robert de la Heuze and his group of knights were watching the scene beneath them with as much interest as Iago. They had by this time grown used to these “attacks” of their formidable ally; but never before had the Prince become hors de combat at so convenient a moment as this! They decided at once to give him no time to shake off this providential seizure. The plundering of a place like this, lying amid its overflowing granaries like a rustic queen among her golden locks, was too tempting.

And the Prince sat on, motionless and still, supported by his pages on his white horse, with his shining helmet on the saddle before him, and the dragon pennon of his antique lance trailing amid the yellow hawkweed.

Nor was Iago mistaken about the prisoners. The three chief men of the village they were: Father Bertram, the Priest; old Sir Andrew Courtyce, the Justice of the Peace; and Master Staniforth, the Tanner; and as they were dragged before le Borgne, with their hands tied behind them, to be questioned brutally and cruelly, they stared with wonder at this bare-headed figure on his tall horse, his forked beard flowing down over his breast-plate, his dragon-helm clasped between his motionless hands, and his lance-point resting among the flowers.

"Everything, from every barn in the place, Master Justice," Robert de la Heuze was saying, while his confreres with gleaming teeth and shining eyes swore their confirmation of these wholesale words; "and everything from your good larder, Father, and everything from your rich store-house, Master Staniforth. And what's more, you three gentlemen must guide our men from house to house — we shall send our wagons — and you must give us — that goes without saying — everything in your stables. And you, Father, must bring us all your church-plate; and you, Master Justice, must open your chests to a learned clerk we'll be sending; and especially we shall require any letters you may of late have received from your pretended lord, Henry of Lancaster, showing the disposition of his forces; and further we shall require—"

All this was spoken in tolerable English but was accompanied by so much ferocity from le Borgne's single eye that each of the worthy men he was addressing felt that the worst was still unsaid.

"And what," replied old Sir Andrew, "will follow, if we refuse these monstrous demands, unheard of by the Law of Nations?"

"In the Holy name of Christ and His Mother," broke in Father Bertram, "I, God's humble priest, refuse, here and now — whatever follows!"

"And I am with you, Father," added Master Staniforth, struggling to loosen the cords that bound his hands, "and in the name of King Harry I protest—"

"What will happen, do you ask?" cried Robert le Borgne. The droit de guerre will happen. And you know what that means! There won't be a house, there won’t be a woman — there! My worthy friends, you’re too late already! You should have agreed at once; and not put us to the trouble of all this. À la guerre comme à la guerre! Our brave archers from Auvergne I perceive have taken things into their own hands! Here, Raoul, Sebastien, Jacquot! Take these men and keep them close — close I say! — till we’ve finished with their larders and their—”

It was now plain enough that it was hot only the Frenchmen from Auvergne who had anticipated the droit de guerre referred to by le Borgne; for clouds of black smoke were beginning to roll over the roofs of the village, and presently there reached that hilltop from the heart of the smoke one single piercing feminine scream that had a blood-curdling effect not only upon Elphin and Iago but upon many other young Welshmen who were within hearing, and who, though reckless enough in their own way, had not until now been permitted the privilege of witnessing Continental warfare.

“My girl! My girl! Devils! Oh devils! stop! stop! I’m coming, my child; your father’s coming! Let me go, I say! Devils! Oh devils!”

The desperate yells and savage struggles of Staniforth, the Tanner, were seconded in a yet more effective way by old Sir Andrew, who, when there arose a new series of feminine screams, not so piercing perhaps, but even more heart-rending, hesitated not to use both head and feet in a furious attempt to escape; and this he did with such unexpected alacrity that, bound though he was, the fellow who was holding him was laid by the heels; and since nothing more than a brutal laugh from between the teeth of le Borgne followed him down the hill, his hoarse shouts of “Nell! Nell! Wait, wait, you devils!” weren’t silenced till they were lost in the tumult below.

Aroused at last to what was going on, Glendower’s wits returned to him as fully armed as were his powerful hands. In an instant he took in the whole situation, and it was with wildly-beating hearts that both his boyish attendants rushed, tumbling and leaping, after the flying hooves of the white charger; and as the Prince, thundering out his commands, rode down the hill at break-neck speed into the smoke of the burning village, he was followed by a crowd of Welsh troopers.

Whatever the campaign may have gained in material supplies by the plunder of this place, as the march towards London was resumed, both our young friends agreed, as they discussed the episode during their evening bivouac, that nothing would ever really heal the rift that had yawned that day amid the smoke and the looting and the treatment of the women between the Welsh and their Continental allies. The lads had caught enough of the foreigners' fury at having their droit de guerre plucked away from under their very beards to realize that nothing but some resounding triumph over the Usurper would really unite them again. "It's London or nothing now, Iago!" Elphin assured his friend, as they shared in the chilly dews of the August twilight the last of the Turkish sweet-meats with which Luned had provided them.

"I tell you, Owen had to prick one of those lecherous devils with the point of his lance three or four times before he'd stop his game; and the woman he'd got down was no daisy neither! She was as old as Lady Mortimer, and she'd more children than she has; for I saw them myself beating at the fellow with their fists when their mother was giving up.

"But Owen would soon have done more than prick that itching rogue; and you should have seen how he treated the woman when the man had gone. He lifted her up and dried her eyes as if she'd been Lady Mortimer! And she was an ugly wench, too. If that bronze-head had been sharper — whew, lad! how he'd have made that son of a whore skip! Shall I tell you something else, Iago?"

“No, for Jesus’s sake! Can’t you see I’m saying my prayers?”

“You don’t often do that, Iago! It’s because of today you’re doing it. I’m older than you; and, as I’ve told you before, women—”

“If you say another word—”

“I know what you’re thinking. You’re thinking of that girl. There! Did you hear? That was a fox! I didn’t know they had foxes here. Mary, Joseph, how cold it is in England! Lie closer, Iago — closer! closer! — like you did last night.”

But if this youthful pair, about whose safety the ladies of Harlech had plagued the Prince for days before he set out, were uneasy that evening, the Prince himself was more than uneasy. He had come to le Borgne’s tent to discuss their approaching encounter with the royal troops, and as he looked about him he decided that no painted window in any French cathedral could be more resplendent in armorial bearings than this knightly pavilion.

“They’ll undoubtedly come out of Worcester to attack us, Sire,” asseverated le Borgne. “Our prisoners confessed as much in my hearing.”

In the depths of his heart Owen had an instinct that the two Henries would not come out; but so painful was it to him to contemplate repetition of those droit de guerre scenes in a crowded town that he automatically suppressed this premonition.

“But of course if they don’t come out,” muttered the French leader in a lower tone, “though we have no siege-engines, I have Gascon troops here who’d stand on one another’s shoulders and fight like a pack of demons for the chance of a gala night of looting and raping in an English city!”

It seems to a superficial eye as though the whole course of human history often depends on the turn of a hair, on the tilt of an eyelid, on the fall of a feather; but to a more philosophical mind these trifles are only the instruments of what we call fate or destiny, a force for which in our nescience we have no adequate name.

Had Owen at that moment heard the words of his ally, uttered in that lower tone, it is probable enough that his pride in his Welsh followers would have relucted at their being regarded as less daring than le Borgne's Gascons. Providence however — to use the popular term — saw fit just then to incarnate itself in an extremely blood-thirsty gnat whose attack upon the Prince's face was so fierce that it caused him to leap from his seat with an oath, an oath that completely drowned his companion's words.

The crucial proposal passed therefore unheard; while le Borgne's pride in his own certainty that the King would come out forbade its repetition. In one sense thousands of lives depended upon the fact that from its shelter beneath a painted shield this ferocious insect attacked the Frenchman's guest; but in a deeper sense we may conjecture that if the gnat had failed its purpose fate would have found some other instrument, no less trifling, to carry out its shameless purpose of allowing Henry of Lancaster to die in his bed.

Yes, there come moments, even in the decisions of commanders of such a host as this, when a pressure, light as the impalpable air and ubiquitous as grains of sand before an invisible wind, urges the course of events in a certain direction, a direction either contrary to, or favourable to, drastic action.

The anxiety of a Worcestershire gnat to taste Welsh blood was only one manifestation of the impalpable force that was exercising its pressure upon these two men. To a superstitious mind it might almost have seemed as if the dead bones of King John, repentant for the injuries which during their life they had inflicted on that monarch's people, were projecting some numbing and drugging spell upon those who were conspiring against the walls that guarded his tomb.

At any rate as Owen lay that night upon a heap of rugs in his own tent, listening to the sounds his horse was making outside, he thought how strange had been the way he'd interfered with le Borgne's treatment of those villagers. In his young days, he thought, he had never felt such squeamishness.

"Something's come over me," he said to himself, "but what it is — Dewi Sant! I don't know! I feel as if Bolingbroke and I were tilting at each other in one of Richard's fancy tourneys. I feel as if even the crown in London wasn't worth—"

He hoisted himself up and listened intently to his horse; and there seemed to him something more real about the way it was cropping the grass out there than about all this marching and counter-marching; yes! more real, and with more life in it!

To whatever curious conclusion, however, the sacking and burning of a Worcestershire village in his march upon London might lead the eccentric mind of the Welsh leader, it was he, and not his one-eyed tutor in modern strategy, who finally got the allied army safely encamped at Woodbury Hill in the parish of Great Witley, over against the ancient city where lay the bones of the destroyer of Mathrafal.

Into Worcester itself the Usurper had already hurried; hurried with that amazing speed which was his chief characteristic as a warrior, and the summons had gone out to all the surrounding shires to rally to his support. Luckily for the burgesses of Worcester, and for their wives and daughters if le Borgne had his way, the two Henries, the father advancing from the south and the son retreating from Hereford, got safe within the walls of the city before the allied army reached Great Witley.

There was a grassy valley between Woodbury Camp and the walls of Worcester, and for over a week Owen behaved, as the scholarly Rhisiart would certainly have observed if Exeter College possessed that particular Homeric passage among its Latin translations, like Achilles sulking in his tent.

It was indeed the most miserable stretch of days that the Welsh Prince had known since he was a little child in the time of the Black Death, more than half a century ago. It made little difference that in his meticulous analysis of events he was unable to include the gnat. His conclusions were correct enough without that officious insect. His one chance of victory, he told himself, would have been to storm the walls of the city in overwhelming numbers the moment they reached the spot. It was too late now, with the sturdy shire-men gathering from all sides and his supplies failing. Why hadn't he stormed the city at once? He knew very well why he hadn't, though he shirked telling himself so in plain words. The savagery he'd seen in the burning of that unlucky village had bruised something in the depths of his nature; and it was this bruise, though he dodged it and avoided facing it, that had covered up that road, when they reached the cross-ways of their fate, with an impenetrable darkness.

They had far outnumbered the King's troops at first, though they didn't now. Why hadn't the French knights themselves insisted on storming the city without delay? Ah! for a very simple reason. For all their talk of strategy they were just medieval adventurers. A campaign to them meant tilting chivalrously against armed equals in the field, while they lived mercilessly upon the country they were invading.

But Owen couldn't keep his imagination from following the road he hadn't followed. The old bearded chieftain as he sulked in his tent caught himself in fantastic tales about taking both the Henries prisoner, and demanding as their ransom the crown of England. But it was all over now; and in his heart he knew it. It would be fortunate if he got his Welshmen safe back across the border without any appalling catastrophe.

One night he awoke just before dawn, for it was a peculiarity, a cynneddf, with all the descendants of Griffith ap Madoc to get their best inspirations at that hour, and he had a vision of besieging the King and his heir, however long the siege might last, till he starved them out. But not for long did that vision last. What of his own supplies? And what of the shire-levies in his rear? No, it was over! His chance had been given him; and something in his own nature had balked. He thrust his hand under his pillow of rugs and touched the rusty bronze that had been the death of that old peace-maker of Dinas Bran; and as he did so the impression came over him out of that vast stillness, a stillness unbroken even by a sentry's tread, that he and his people could afford to wait, could afford to wait till long after his bones were dust and Henry's bones were dust. He knew how his own soul could escape, escape without looting cities and ravishing women.

And was the soul of his people, the oldest of all the races where the sun sank into the sea, less able to wait than the soul of its leader? Well! his allies had had their taste of their droit de guerre; and he would leave them a day or two more to enjoy their chivalrous feats of arms in this play-acting tourney-ground of theirs between camp and city!

And then God give him the grace to get his great army back safe into Wales! So be it. At any rate there'd he no wailing and weeping in Edeyrnion and Ardudwy, in Gwent and Morgannwg, for Welsh corpses left to English crows!

He drew his hand away from old Adda's death-weapon and stretched out his arm so as to feel the central support of his tent, from which, suspended by a nail, hung that queer fragment of ink-black leather, ornamented with golden studs, that he'd been taught from his infancy to call "Eliseg's belt". Merely to touch this ancient object — and how well he knew its cold, damp, slippery texture, like the skin of some extinct amphibian! — was a comfort just then, and he felt happier as he pulled up the bed-cover.

"Three-score years I've lived, come Michaelmas," he thought. "And who'll remember me in three-score years to come? Well, we've certainly killed some Englishmen in these fantastical single combats. Like the old Knights Templar tilting with Saracens, they are; and how the Frenchmen love them! Mary! Joseph! And no wonder they love them! King Hal hasn't any such champions. A dozen English knights killed in a couple of days! Well! They'll have some pretty tales to tell when they get back to France; but all the tilting of all King Charles' court won't get us to London. Too many long-bows, too many yeomen! Aye, Master Sparrow, and where's your peasants' revolt now?"

He let his head sink back, thrust his fingers beneath his grey beard and carefully spread it out, as if over the edge of a shroud, above the blanket he'd pulled up to his chin.

So untrimmed had he let his hair grow that this beard of his could scarcely be called a forked beard any more. It was just any old man's beard; and as he lay on his back Owen felt as if he himself were any old man, "feeling," as they say, "his age." But the folds of his tent hung open about the width of a man's hand, and between them he could catch a glimpse of two small stars belonging to one of those northern constellations from which Ffraid ferch Gloyw had predicted that he would fail in arms but triumph in spirit.

Revealed between the hangings of his tent, with nothing but blue-black space above and beneath them, they seemed to him like the eyes of Destiny watching to see what he would do in the hour of his defeat.

"What did Arthur do to the Twrch Trwyth?" he said to himself. "There's a smell of the mud of the Severn upon the air. It must come up with the dawn when the tide draws back." And without a movement, save only the movement of his breath, he defied those small intent watchful eyes. "Eyes of Twrch Trwyth," he said to himself. "Pig of Hell," he said to himself, "Arthur drove you down the Severn into the deep sea!"

And it was brought about at that moment by the power to which some give the name of "chance" that a cloud swam across those glittering pinpricks in the dome of immensity; and the immediate effect of this was to cause an indescribable relaxing of the tension of the man's brain and at the same time to apply to his consciousness a gentle pressure, light as the fanning of a butterfly's wing, a pressure towards the slippery water-chute of sleep. But, ere he slept, memory after memory crossed the swaying lightship of his mind. He remembered the very occasion, on a sweltering August day, when Ffraid ferch Gloyw had uttered her enigmatic prediction. "Over your body, Cousin Owen," she had said, "our people will pass to their triumph; but it will be a triumph in the House of Saturn, not in the House of Mars."

And then he forgot Ffraid ferch Gloyw, and across his closed eyelids floated the image of Rhisiart's narrow Norman skull, as the lad's lips sucked at his arrow-wound. "I've dragged you all down," he thought, "and we sink together — so many — so many down the tide into the deep sea. But over us — over us—"

If the Prince himself found it hard, after all his clear realistic analysis, to understand why he hadn't risked everything in one grand fling, and hurled his ten thousand Welshmen and his two thousand Frenchmen against the walls of Worcester, it was much harder for Rhisiart and Master Brut to comprehend the cause of his unexpected retreat.

They knew of course in their room in the Bishop's prison what the allies could only guess at, namely the small number of men that made up the royal garrison. The younger Henry was more alarmed than he allowed his father to see when he welcomed the King into the city. He'd hoped for an army; but the Ruler of England had only his private guard, and a handful of horsemen he'd picked up as he rode through Oxford.

But the walls of the old city were strong, its gates massive, and it was unlikely that Owen and his Frenchmen had brought any siege furniture with them. Scaling-ladders, catapults, and assault-platforms, not to speak of the new ordnance inventions for explosive cannonading, were awkward things to convey through a hostile country.

And every day that passed — every hour even — was so much gain to the English. The thing that puzzled Prince Henry was that the enemy made no attempt to surround the city. The gates to the east, the roads from the east, were never in any danger; and it wasn't long before considerable bodies of shire-yeomen, already summoned post-haste by the King from every county through which he'd passed, began pouring into the town.

To an enterprising strategist like the younger Henry it seemed hardly short of a miracle when instead of either attacking the city or surrounding it the allied army contented itself with occupying an impregnable position on Woodbury Hill.

"They act as if we were the aggressors and they the defenders," Prince Hal told his father; but the weary old campaigner only replied caustically that all wise leaders were "defenders," unless like Hotspur they preferred to die in their glory.

At this the long white face of the young Prince had flushed; and after muttering something about badgers and mole-runs he enquired how many more men from the shires they must await before assaulting Woodbury Hill.

"There'll be no assault of Woodbury Hill while I'm in Worcester," the King had said; "and what's more, Hal, if you ride down again into that valley, I'll send you home with letters to the Parliament."

"But their tourney-tricks, Sire, their prancing tourney-tricks! And we not able to find one knight—"

"After to-morrow, Hal," said the King, "no one shall go down that hill."

"And let those popinjays wave their lances at us, and call us—"

"Hal, Hal! What has come over you? Ask Cousin York, ask Captain Shirley, whether, when a host like that is deliberately starving itself instead of attacking, there's any reason to throw away loyal men's lives for nothing. Let 'em tilt against the walls! Let 'em make their jongleur ditties for their ladies! What's the matter with you, Hal? I'll be thinking soon that all your Welsh victories came by accident — as indeed — God help me! — all the victories I've ever seen have come. Shut the gates, lad, and man the walls. Our good Commons will soon be voting their thanks again to the most puissant and renowned Prince, Harry of Monmouth!

"And remember this, boy, for the day when I'm gone. If you invade France, as these men are invading England — yes! and march into Paris with twice as many men — you'll never win. Sooner or later, out you'll go! Don't you see, boy, that the Lord himself is fighting for us against Sisera? Any morning now we may wake up and find them gone. Let those Frenchmen tilt against each other! Shut the gates, shut the gates. Let them tilt against the walls! Woodbury Hill will soon be as bare as a tennis-ball! Never mind their tilting, Hal. Let them play, let them play! We'll to business."

But the King was almost alone in all the City of Worcester to take this view of the situation. The people crowded into the churches. Monstrous images of Glendower, as a Devil with horns, were burnt in the squares.

Wild rumours spread through the streets of horrible cruelties habitually practised by the Welsh.

But there was a minority who held the view that since there’d been no attempt to stop the influx of loyal yeomen from the neighbouring shires it was clear that the number of the enemy had been ridiculously exaggerated. ’Twould make a bad impression upon the country, these hot-heads argued, if the King of England let himself be shut up in a walled town while a party of French courtiers and a rabble of Welsh serfs made sport of him in the heart of his own kingdom!

Prince Hal always spoke too freely in the taverns, and since there was a group of lively young squires who followed him everywhere, the rumour quickly spread through the town that though the King was sick and troubled with superstitious fears the Prince would soon on his own authority be making a desperate sortie upon Glendower’s camp. Nor were there lacking plenty of tale-bearers to make trouble between the two Henries; and as is usual in such cases the elder man completely misunderstood what was in the mind of his son.

And if his father misunderstood him, his tavern-cronies did so still more. As a matter of fact the daring young warrior had worked out a shrewd and startling plan of campaign, including a pretended frontal attack, followed by a pretended retreat and a second devastating sortie while the escape of the huge disorganized host was cut off by the best long-bows in the kingdom!

And this soldierly plan of his might have resulted, so his best captains, Crosby and Shirley, argued, in the death or capture of Glendower: had it not been that in his pique at the King’s tone towards him he let it all evaporate in the fumes of the city’s wine-shops.

It may be well imagined what wild stories of all that was occurring around them reached Rhisiart and Master Brut. The Bishop’s Palace was miles outside the city walls, but the Bishop’s prison where they were held was in the old castle keep, and had a moat around it. Only a couple of days before the allies moved their camp from Woodbury Hill and began their orderly but melancholy retreat, the unfortunate prisoners were discussing their chances of rescue with unusual fervour; but had Elphin and Iago seen their former friends at this moment they would have been hard put to it to know them as the same men.

They possessed only one suit of outer garments between them. And today it was Rhisiart’s turn to wear these rags of his old scholar’s suit. He himself had grown a straggly beard as black as his hollow eyes; and the effect of this, combined with the dark dishevelled locks that hung down over his ears, gave to his narrow face and drooping moustache a desolate dignity that would have broken the heart of Lady Mortimer. Master Brut, on the contrary, had persuaded their jailer’s child to steal for him a pair of scissors: and with this — though unable to shave — he had managed to reduce his beard to the limits of a hairy fringe round his smooth moon-face. This hairy fringe did, however, and in a very curious way, alter the man’s whole look. The Lollard’s left arm had been broken, and only hastily and improperly set, so that often, though not continuously, it caused him considerable pain, especially since he had had to have it bound tight to his waist with a strip of his shirt.

The two friends were securely though not heavily manacled and they had plenty of bread and water and even sometimes, when their jailer was in a good mood, a cup of wine and a fragment of meat. There was no latrine in the Bishop’s prison; but as the chamber was an extensive one, and they were not chained to the wall, they were spared any intolerable unpleasantness.

Master Brut's books had been taken from him. But their jailer, who couldn't read himself but who had an avid thirst for the sort of knowledge that comes from sensational chronicles, soon acquired the habit of bringing into their chamber various roughly-copied parchments describing the most blood-curdling of recent events, richly interspersed with pleasant though incredible marvels. These it was the privilege of our prisoners to read aloud by turns, a thing that Walter Brut did as eloquently as if in the presence of a crowded congregation of Gospel-men; while Clerk Rhisiart did it in a high-pitched, mock-judicial manner that had the double effect of relieving his own feelings and impressing the jailer with awe and reverence in the presence of such forensic power.

On this particular morning the prisoners were sitting opposite each other on wooden stools, with a third stool between them on which were the remains of two half-loaves of bread and two earthenware mugs of water. The Lollard had drawn on this third stool, with his unhurt hand and a burnt stick, a map of Woodbury Hill in its relation to the city walls, and it was at this map that the two men were now earnestly gazing.

"One thing is certain," said Rhisiart. "Owen'll never retreat, now he has once made the plunge! Besides, he must have an enormous army" — here he groaned and made an impatient movement on his stool; for he had a wound in his hip, which, though it had ostensibly healed, gave him now and again a lively twinge. Though he kept it to himself, for he knew his trouble was a pin's prick compared with what his friend endured from his broken arm, Rhisiart had come to indulge a morbid fantasy that his wound was a malevolent entity to whom had been given the power to plague him. He even went so far in his secret mind as to baptize this enemy with a Christian name. He called him "Sele" in honour of the Lord of Nannau.

"Even discounting Master Giggleswick's dramatic turn," he continued, when "Sele's" twinges diminished, "we can't put the allied army at less than twelve thousand men. Of course what I would do myself if I were Owen would be to pass by Worcester altogether, and rush forward by forced marches, living on the country as best I could, till I reached London. I'd dodge Warwick and Oxford and Banbury, too. In fact I wouldn't bother what towns or castles I left behind me. I'd get to London if I had no sleep for a week!"

His friend smiled and, having erased a section of his map with a crumb of bread, proceeded with calm deliberation, still smiling, to flick this missile out of their open window, where, falling into the Bishop's moat, it was instantaneously devoured by a watchful carp. It had been a natural custom for nearly a thousand years for the Bishop's prisoners to throw scraps to his carp. The Bishop in the time of King Stephen used to throw the prisoners themselves to these plump fish; and ever since his day the more waggish of his successors would exchange with their chaplains every Friday a somewhat lurid but entirely ecclesiastical jest about this custom, in which the Latin for corpses and the Latin for nourishment were felicitously sprinkled with parsley and washed down with Malmsey wine.

"Rhisiart!"

"Yes, Walter."

"Do you remember that story about Pharaoh's two servants in prison?"

Rhisiart sighed, uttered a curse under his breath, and, as he had done a thousand times since they'd been together, swore affectionately that he remembered the story well.

"You'll be pardoned, but I shall be burnt," said Master Brut in a decided voice, "but I wish, before they separate us, which may happen any day now, that you'd admit," and he put his finger upon a particular place in his charcoal map, “that I was right and you were wrong as to the position of Woodbury Hill. That child assured me the wind’s in the west; and you know how clearly we’ve heard the French trumpets today. Well! that means — you’re not looking, Rhisiart! Yes, there — just there! there’s been no interference with the English yeomen coming in. That child said they’ve been pouring in through what she called ‘East Gate’ for the last two days. Owen isn’t besieging the city. But neither has he left the city behind! He’s challenging them to battle from a position chosen by himself. If the two Henries are clever enough to wait behind their walls, and if Owen has encamped as I’ve got him here” — and moving a piece of crust to a black spot in the surface of the stool between them, he showed it complacently to his friend— “there’ll have to be a battle, or—”

“Or what?” sighed Rhisiart wearily, for as generally happened when the Lollard discoursed on his map his mind was reverting to Tegolin.

“Or he’ll have to retreat!”

This did arouse the man in black tatters; and he gazed with consternation at the unruffled countenance of the man in white rags. He did indeed sit up with such a start at the word “retreat” that he was forced to utter a sharp cry as “Sele” took the opportunity of giving him a twinge.

“He’ll never do that!” and Rhisiart’s voice rose as it used to do when he was disputing in his room at Oxford. The Lollard smiled and rubbed at his map with his piece of crust.

“Jesus Christ!” shouted Clerk Rhisiart. “I believe you’d sooner be right in your whoreson opinion than see the red dragon waving over Worcester gate!”

But before that day was over our two friends had been reduced to a graver mood. Their jailer, for one thing, had brought into their room an appalling account of the recent burning of a Lollard, when Prince Hal, still too young to understand such things, had had the heretic removed from the flames to give him a last chance of recanting, but had been forced by the Archbishop to see the already blackened body thrust back there again. They had also received a startling visit from Mad Huw bringing the news from Tegolin that she herself had obtained permission from the Bishop to have a brief interview with her husband after sunset that night.

This wasn't the first time Clerk Rhisiart had been allowed to see his wife who was now lodged by judicial consent in the house of the famous Worcester armourer, Master Dickon Shore. Room had been found in the same kindly quarters for the Mad Friar; but it had recently become doubtful whether this privilege would be continued — and for a sufficient reason.

The truth was, the poor Franciscan's mania had suffered a disconcerting change. Something about the present appearance of Rhisiart, with his straggling black beard, his tangled elflocks, and his hollow eyes, had so worked on the Grey Friar that he got it lodged in his brain that the prisoner in the Bishop's prison was none other than King Richard himself. Both Tegolin in the armourer's house and Rhisiart in the castle keep had done their utmost to disabuse the poor man of this new illusion; but Mad Huw had received so many shocks of late that his feelings had been driven inward; and though he no longer burst out into fits of wild excitement his mania in this new secretive and hidden form was less than ever open to reason.

The interview between Rhisiart and his young wife had been timed to coincide with a final examination of Master Brut before the Bishops of Worcester and Hereford. The latter magnate, fleeing from his residence on the Wye at Glendower's approach, was delighted beyond measure to find the heretic who had so cleverly escaped him five years before safe in the power of his fellow-prelate. Indeed, like Pilate and Herod with another Prisoner, the two pontifical inquisitors, who before this had been inordinately jealous of each other, became, from this day on, close friends.

Nothing is a stronger bond, whether with time-serving prelates or with murderous footpads, than the sharing of a guilty conscience, and for several nights after dealing with the Lollard both ecclesiastics slept a sounder and less troubled sleep than they had done since they broke their vows to King Richard.

It had been by Master Shore's influence with Prince Hal that this particular interview between husband and wife had been permitted; and it was by the influence of the rich armourer's largesse that the jailer had gone a step further in locking them up alone.

Master Shore, though not a Lollard himself, was an easy man where religion was concerned, and a good friend of both Sir John Oldcastle and the youthful Prince. He might indeed — as far as the taverns of the city went — have been called a boon companion of these two. He was a widower with no official feminine dependent save his small daughter Julietta, between whom and little Nance, the jailer's offspring, there existed a childish friendship.

Julietta was ten and Nance a year older; but when Julietta came to play with Nance in the castle garden it was always she who took the lead in their games. Mad Huw had hardly appeared upon the scene than he won both the little girls' hearts, and the children would listen to him for hours as he would tell — with many mysterious hints as to Rhisiart's identity — how kind the renowned captain, Lord Grey of Codnor had been to them all, and how he had despatched them, as prisoners of the Church, under the escort of his own guard, to be judged by the Bishop of Worcester.

"He must have guessed who He was," the Grey Friar would whisper at this point, as the children made him tell them the story for the twentieth time, “and he knew he had to be tender to the Mistress and her poor Friar for His sake!”

But it was only when the two little girls were alone that Julietta explained to the awestruck Nance how it was that the beautiful lady and the holy man had come to their house.

“I know, for I heard Sir John ask Father to take them. Sir John laughed a great deal; and Father looked like he does when he sends me to bed because a lady’s coming to supper with him.”

“One’s white and one’s black,” Nance would reply when Julietta pressed her with questions about the two prisoners. “But sometimes the angel one’s black and the devil one’s white. I like the angel one best because he’s like my Spanish doll. I lent him my scissors to cut off his beard and I never laughed once when he did it. They both want sewing up; but they haven’t got no one to sew them up.”

On one unfortunate occasion when Julietta broached the subject as to what was going to happen to her friend’s angel and devil, little Nance began to cry.

“They’re going — to put — my one,” she sobbed, “into the fire — because he won’t say his Ave Maria. Father told me that — when I wouldn’t say mine because there was onion in my broth! I hate onion, don’t you?”

It was curious how the relations between Rhisiart and Tegolin remained unchanged after all they had experienced since they’d been married. She’d brought needle and thread with her, and though after they’d hugged each other he wanted her to sit on his knee she insisted on kneeling by his side and doing at once, as fast as her fingers would work, what little Nance had called “sewing him up.”

While she stitched she talked to him gravely and quietly, just as she’d done so many times when he was unhappy about Catharine or about his prestige with Owen; while Rhisiart, watching her with his mournful eyes through his tangled hair, thought how much more precious she was to him now than that Midsummer Day so long ago when they slept together under his sheepskin.

“I wish I’d put something,” he suddenly burst out, “if it were only a heap of stones — on his grave!”

“But you did — you did, Rhisiart! You put your dagger into the earth. I can see how its handle looked now, all dripping with the rain! That made a cross; and a cross is better than any stones.”

“But he wouldn’t know it was a cross! He’d think I’d just forgotten. He’d think I’d be coming back for it. And I never have gone back! Besides, anyone seeing it there would steal it. They couldn’t steal a heap of stones. How long do you think his skin will stay — like it was —?”

Tegolin thrust her needle through the piece of his shirt she was mending, and leaving the thread swaying there between them, like a gossamer across a narrow lane, possessed herself of his hand and pressed it to her lips.

“He had some happy days,” she said gently, “before he died. He was the least tired of all of us when we first saw the Usk. Think, Rhisiart, how fast he trotted down that hill. Everything on his back rattled, he went so fast!”

Rhisiart sighed and repeated secretly, not caring that even Tegolin should know what he was doing, a solemn prayer for the soul of Griffin the piebald.

She went on with her sewing again then; and the flesh of her rounded arm, as he hung his head above it as it drew the thread, smelt so sweet to him that he thought in his heart: “Would it spoil it all for her if I lifted her up from her knees?”

But he didn’t dare to do this. Nor was it only for fear of breaking her thread that he refrained. Upon his long thin features and emaciated cheeks there had come to be imprinted, during this fatal summer, lines of tenderness, such as his face had never displayed before. So he confined himself to caressing with the tips of his fingers the warmth and softness of her neck.

Lightly up and down, and cross-wise again, his fingers moved beneath her chin; and he thought in his heart: “I feel as if I’d lived with her for years; and yet I feel as if I’d only found her tonight!”

But he had been holding her in his arms — and the pain that it had given his wounded side to do so had been an excruciating sweetness to him, like a pain that passion demands ere it can reach its furthest tidal-mark — when at last with a long-drawn sob of weakness he let her sit down on the Lollard’s stool beside him and allowed his hand to sink heavily on her lap.

“Gwion Bach—”

“Yes, Tegolin ferch Rheinalt.”

“Do you know what I’ve brought for you?”

His expression at that moment was so like his look, when he used to await her decision about Catharine or the Prince or Mad Huw, that her eyes filled with tears.

But she drew from her bosom a tiny phial, which she had fastened round her neck by a long black ribbon, and without drawing its silver stopper held it out to him. He surveyed it with widely-staring eyes.

The Bishop’s prison was well lighted. Earlier Bishops had no doubt found it advisable to throw into relief under unusually strong illumination the faces of their victims when the necessity for calling back to the One Fold the perilous reasonings of the human mind made the infliction of pain indispensable.

“What is it?” he asked in an awed whisper.

"Death," the girl whispered. "Master Shore sent me to an alchemist's to get a sleeping draught for Julietta when the child was sick; and I gave the man — well never mind what I gave him. But he gave me this. It's the surest and quickest there is. It's only like water to look at. I had to buy this phial from him too. He was poor. He was grasping. But he swore, by the heart of Mary, that this was certain death. 'Death in thirty ticks of a French clock,' he said. And he said he could be hanged for giving it to me. Smell it, Rhisiart! It hasn't any smell at all."

Rhisiart took the thing from her, lifted the stopper, and bent his Norman nose over it, snuffing vigorously.

"Does it taste as little as it smells?" he asked her, still holding the little bottle to his nostrils and staring at her above it with feverish eyes.

"The man swore it had no taste at all and no colour at all. He said it could be put into water or wine or milk or anything and the person would be dead in thirty ticks of a French clock."

Rhisiart replaced the stopper, laid the phial on its side on the third stool, and asked her with a certain irritation in his tone why it had to be a French clock. "Can't we even take poison in our own way?" he said.

Tegolin flushed and tears of vexation came into her eyes. It was only a trifle; but since, as a woman would, she had repeated the shopman's exact words though there was no particular significance in them, there was something annoying in being caught up in a casual phrase like this.

Instead of dropping the topic Rhisiart must needs go on harping on it. The unspoken dread of their separation that lay at the bottom of "the lake of his heart" like a drowned animal in a sack sent up these bubbles of contradiction.

But she had something else in her mind to say to him, something that lay as heavy in her consciousness as an infant within a womb; but it was so hard a thing to say that she was now struggling with the temptation to leave it unsaid just five minutes longer, while he went on being cantankerous about the French clock just as he'd been about the way she wore her page's dress on that long ago Midsummer Day when she rode to Glyndyfrdwy on Griffin's back.

"Put it away!" she burst out, pointing at the phial. "For Mary's sake put it in your belt! It'll go in there, won't it? It must go in there!"

Since he still remained inert and motionless, just staring at her with an expression as if he had to make sure that another Rhisiart, already in a different world, was correctly imitating him, she snatched at the phial herself and tearing open the shirt she'd been mending, squeezed the thing impulsively between his body and his belt.

What she did was painful to Rhisiart in every conceivable way. It caused him anguish in his wounded side. It gave him the sensation that he was her helpless infant rather than her equal mate, and it seemed to emphasize their parting in a manner that was like a push down a precipice.

But the hurt look in his eyes, together with that very emanation of outraged childishness which his whole attitude betrayed, reminded her so irresistibly of the Rhisiart she had loved in secret in those early days that she flung her arms round his neck and, desperately clinging to him, gasped out a spasmodic succession of endearing words.

But she quickly saw how weak he was — far weaker than she had expected — and she realized too, for he could no longer conceal it, how vicious was the pain in his hip. Quickly she let him go. Quickly she made him lie down on his bed of straw; and while the tears trickled from her cheeks upon his beard she flung herself down by his side and, stroking his face, whispered half-inaudible murmurs of love into his ears.

"Don't look at me while I tell you something, Rhisiart," she said at last, after they had lain together in silence while time flowed over them as if it were made of something lighter than air and swifter than thought. "Shut your eyes, my only love, while I tell you what I have to tell you."

Rhisiart needed not her fingers pressed on his eyelids to make him obey her now. He felt weary of everything in the world except her presence. He wished in his heart that she would tell him nothing; that she would but shut her eyes too so that they might sleep side by side forever.

But by slow degrees her terrible words, each one sounding like a moaning plant torn up by the roots, pierced his drugged intelligence. It was about Master Shore she was speaking; and she told him that the armourer was a great favourite with the young Prince, that no one in the kingdom, save Sir John Oldcastle, had more influence with him. She told him that the man was a widower and had grown enamoured of her; that she herself felt no repulsion for him, and did feel considerable gratitude. She told him that Julietta had come to cling to her as to a mother, that she felt sorry for both father and child; and finally that the man had sworn by the heart of Mary that if she did consent to live with him he could obtain from Prince Hal, not a complete pardon, for the connection with Glendower was too public, but a mitigation of the sentence from death on the scaffold to imprisonment in the Tower of London.

All this she told him in a flat, even voice, and very rapidly. It was a voice Rhisiart had never heard from her till once or twice of late he had heard her say her beads aloud. And when she'd finished she still kept the fingers of both her hands pressed upon his closed eyelids. She was crouching above him now, with one of her knees on the straw of his bed and one on the flagstones; and as she bowed over him, the bodkin that held her braid about her head became unloosened, and the familiar coils slithered down like a living serpent across his face.

The touch of her hair, with its familiar fragrance, sent a sharp shudder through his frame, while its fall caused her to liberate his eyes from their enforced blindness. Then it became Tegolin's destiny to stare without blinking — for she'd always been one for straight and steady looks — into the eyes of the person to whom she had just offered the supreme test, the most crucial that a girl can put to a man, namely whether he considered his life more important than her honour.

Rhisiart lay without a movement; you would almost have thought without a breath. She felt as if his eyes were swimming like dark fish steadily, irresistibly, through wave after wave of her secret being.

Without removing her own eyes she now rose slowly, lifting one knee from the stones and the other from the straw; and even in the tension of that worst moment retaining such calm of nature that the curious thought flitted across her mind: "Do nuns have straw to kneel on, like cows in a shed?"

But she rose to her full height now, lifting her hands to her head to coil up her braid. To do this she removed another bodkin, and, because her fingers were busy, held it in her mouth till its time had come, staring at Rhisiart from above the tightened lips out of which it protruded. She had thrown her mantle aside when she first entered, and her pale blue gown, caught up below her breasts by a gold band, displayed to their best advantage her soft white throat and rounded arms, and even those tiny freckles on her skin of which Glyn Dŵr had made so much.

But though the eyes of these two were searching each others' souls like divers in deep seas, they both remained absolutely ignorant of what the other was thinking. So little did Rhisiart understand his wife that he hadn't the faintest suspicion that this whole tale of hers was retrospect, and she had already saved him from being hung, drawn, and quartered by going up into the armourer’s bed.

And if it was no more possible for Rhisiart to imagine his wife’s lying to him than it was possible for him to imagine her naked in bed with a man he’d never seen, it was unthinkable to Tegolin that a Norman Welsh gentleman, who had been to Oxford, and whom she herself had seen advancing on his fantastic horse in front of a line of arrows pointed at his heart, would be able to fish up from the shifting sands of moral casuistry a sufficient reason for the sacrifice of honour to life.

She had expected a violent refusal and a pitiful struggle between them. What she hadn’t realized was how far below all casuistry he had sunk in his weakness.

Tegolin was a warm-blooded girl, and she never had been a girl of morbidly virginal shrinkings. But save for her romantic idealizing of the Friar she had given herself to Rhisiart, body, soul, and spirit, to such an absolute tune that it would have been hard to make another woman — even Lady Mortimer — understand what she felt when she climbed those stairs to the armourer’s open door.

The worthy man had rallied her the next morning about the candlegrease with which the stairs were sprinkled; but she didn’t confess to him how many times she had descended, before the final blind rush that took her to the top.

But the truth was that Rhisiart, from the first time they met had been conscious of something in Tegolin that was stronger than himself; and upon this stronger power he had always unscrupulously leaned. And this leaning upon her had reached a sort of culminating ecstasy as he longed just now, in his weakness and his pain, to go to sleep forever upon her breast.

Thus when she talked of “giving herself” to armourer Shore, this “giving herself didn’t call up any image of his actual Tegolin, with her red braid pressed between her white shoulders and a strange bed, submitting to the final outrage. It rather called up a comfortable vision of Master Dickon’s hearth with a great bowl of venison stew — for the Lollard and he had been vying with each other lately in the images created by hunger — and with the lively Julietta, of whom he’d heard Nance talk, keeping a place for him too at the table; and only a dim benevolent cloudy blur, resembling God the Father, to show that Tegolin had “given herself” to anyone.

It was the weakness of his famished body that formed these dishonorable visions; and it was the escape from the barrels of tar and the red-hot prongs, and from the time it took to get it done, for he’d seen it at Hereford as a child, that made him sink into her strength as a tired seagull into an ocean-wave.

And as he looked at this beautiful being upon whom his life depended, and who was prepared to give him his life, he felt as if he were absolved by those soft breasts and those white arms from the whole burden of choice, from the necessity of any decision at all! A deep in-sucking tide of infantile gratitude drew all the manliness out of him; while the expression in his eyes made so great a contrast to his hollow, emaciated cheeks, his straggly beard, his pinched hawk-nose, his narrow forehead, that the girl began to feel as if a Rhisiart, younger even than the one who had allowed her to kiss his crusader’s sword and had teased her about her page’s dagger, was begging her to take him on her lap, to hold him to her breast, to save him from the wolves!

Without a quiver of his mouth or a movement of his manacled limbs, the big tears of absolute weakness began to form in his eyes and to trickle down upon his beard; and she knew that whether he understood or not the price she'd paid he accepted the life she'd given him.

Two days later Master Dickon Shore was seated with Sir John Oldcastle in the snug inner sanctum of the Rose and Crown talking of the unexpected retreat of the allied army from Woodbury Hill, when their host, with the self-conscious lack of ceremony that the Prince insisted upon, announced the presence of the heir to the throne. "Let him in then, you whoreson herald of woe!" roared Sir John. "Let the sweet lad in, without making such faces! And bring some of that Lacrima Christi of yours he praised the other night, and — mark you, Martin Glum! — write it down to me this time — dost hear? Master Shore and I aren't like those whoresons they tell of who tap royalty and hiss treason! Let the boy in, and then open a bottle of Lacrima Christi and keep both Hal and the wine from these burning logs. He brings news, or I'm a Polack! Put a chair for him away from the fire. His blood tingles enough as it is; keep that wine cool till he calls for it."

Dickon Shore, who was a man of caution, nodded significantly at his knightly friend when Martin was gone. "It'll be as I said," he remarked. "He wants to rush you off in pursuit of those French prancers and their barefoot Merlins! But beware of the old fox when you run with the young one! Well, well. A word in the nick is snuff for the wick! The Lord gives and the King takes. He may bring news; but I can tell you what he won't bring; he won't bring the head of Owen Glendourdy; and that's all I'd thank him for!"

"Let him—" But there was no need to ask their landlord to "let him", for Prince Henry came bursting in in a state of intense nervous excitement. There was a peculiar vein of the neurotic in the whole Lancastrian House. It showed itself in Henry the Fourth both outwardly and inwardly: outwardly in his desperate forced marches and inwardly in his religious superstition. No captain could get his men quicker from one end of England to another.

Since Harold Godwinson there'd never been such an adept in the rapid movement of troops. But Harold understood the Welsh as Henry never did. Henry's invasions were the laughing stock of that nation, while Harold penetrated even into the fastnesses of Snowdon.

The Prince entered the room dressed in full armour. There were drops of sweat on his long white face and burning fever-spots on his cheeks. His hazel eyes, which were not unlike his father's, gleamed with a consuming excitement, and his mouth above his narrow pointed chin was twisted awry, and even when he ceased speaking his thin lips kept up a queer twitching. Sir John and Master Shore had often been put to it, as they discussed the Prince, to account for this twitching; while the whores of the house, Madge Howlet and Bess Bolt, who were both girls of some poetic imagination, indulged in quite fanciful comparisons. Madge maintained that when he spoke it was like a moor-fowl crossing a stream: "The ripples go on spreading after the bird's flown!" Bess had a less homely comparison. She said it was like seeing an echo. "His lips," she assured them, "echo every word he utters, only without a sound!"

As Sir John and Master Shore now rose to greet Prince Henry, they did so with an anxious exchange of glances, the burly knight's ruddy cheeks distorting themselves like a face in a concave mirror, while the armourer's visage paled a shade or two, like a flagon of wine suddenly diluted with water.

Prince Hal addressed them as if they had been twice as far away as they were. "To horse, to horse, Sir John!" he cried. "I stopped at your lodgings. Your man is here with your harness. Not a moment to spare! Off you ride with orders from me to Codnor, to Grendor, to Talbot — Mother of God! to any man of them! orders to Beelzebub — as long as you get out of here with a whole skin! The Archbishop's arrived — hot on the trail of heretics.

He's with my father now. He's going to burn and burn and burn! That young stiver of Lollardry we took along with Glendower's Secretary is to suffer tomorrow. They're already piling up the bonfire in the market, and the next thing will be my father's warrant to have you taken! I'll ride with you for a mile or two— 'after Glendower' we'll tell the guard at the gate; and you, Dickon — you, Dickon — he paused while his lips moved in that same silent twitching that Madge and Bess had noticed even while he was making free with them— "and you, Dickon, had better get your wench's husband out of that place at once and pack him off to London."

He paused and bit his lip. It was clear to his friends that there was something on his mind more personal than Sir John's escape. "I've been talking," he said, "to the Archbishop. He thinks my father won't live many years longer. He thinks this worrying about his soul will kill him. He's very bad today." Two or three seconds passed while he thought how bad the King was. Then he began again. "The Archbishop says that when — that when my father's gone — I ought to invade France and end all this. He says I have a claim — a very good claim." And he began pacing the room in his clanging armour with the springy step of a young player at quarter-staff.

"Take Tom Crosby and his whole company — Here! I'll give you the order in writing — Martin! I say! Martin! No! By Crish! I've no time for liquour. Take the stuff away and give it to the wenches! — and bring me a tablet. Let Crosby put the fellow in the Tower along with Glendower's son."

While Prince Hal with ostentatious penmanship — for the bravest Prince in Christendom was prouder of his clerkly ability than of his prowess in arms — was laboriously inditing his commands "To our trusty and redoubtable captain, Master Thomas Crosby," the most perturbed personage in the Rose and Crown was certainly its landlord. This careful man saw the best customers he was ever likely to get in his lifetime dispersing like swallows in September. His only comfort lay in the thought that even if the Prince did call for Madge or Bess again the girls were such poor judges of wine that he would never know what had been substituted for his royal bounty.

At the very moment when Prince Hal was laboriously displaying his clerkly gifts at the Sign of the Rose and Crown, Rhisiart and Master Brut were having a poignant discussion in their spacious prison-house. They had come to understand each other with an understanding deeper than that of brothers; and their love had grown so diffused as to spread through them like the sap in the kindred branches of one tree-root.

When they had first got fond of each other at Glyndyfrdwy and Dinas Bran the relation between them was crude enough. Master Brut was a religious prig in those days and our friend Rhisiart a romantic egoist; but after all they had gone through, these peculiarities had been so modified and mellowed that in addition to the Lollard's indulgence to his friend's touchy pride, Rhisiart's maturer interest in religion endowed their friendship with many tender refinements.

In their earlier relation the boyish conceit of the young Oxford student had obscured what might be called the feminine element in his soul; but, as their love deepened, this element grew more and more apparent, until today, as they talked together about life and death, it was the man whose beard had been untouched by little Nance's scissors who played the woman's part, while the soul of the soft-cheeked Lollard showed itself both in its weakness and its strength to be masculine through and through.

The golden August sunshine, as heavy and mellow within their prison-chamber as it was outside, threw upon every object in that large, low room a peculiar kind of glory. But to Rhisiart's nerves there was something malign and dreadful about this reddish glow, especially when it fell upon an enormous life-size crucifix which occupied the middle of the wall opposite the door.

This great crucifix, which extended practically from ceiling to floor, hung at right angles to the window on one side, and on the other to that portion of their chamber which had been perforce converted into a latrine. The heavy sunshine had a curious effect on the facial expression of this hanging figure; converting the pain it was suffering into an unearthly desire to inflict pain upon the enemies of God. The words “And many are called but few are chosen,” together with the words “Wailing and gnashing of teeth,” were what to Master Brut at any rate this object represented. But in the downright virile manner of a sturdy Wycliffite he hesitated not to utter rough and even gross ribaldries in the presence of this dreadful figure, comparing it very unfavourably with what he assured his excitable friend was the real Saviour of the world, whose form emerged, like a blessed Jinn, out of the unsealed bottle of the original Greek.

The agitated sympathy of Rhisiart, who to do him justice forgot his own trouble in the worse horror that over-hung his friend, had the opposite effect from that his wife’s presence had had upon himself. It simply steadied the man’s courage. But Rhisiart found it impossible to take in the full import of Tegolin’s words. In his feverish weakness he kept thinking of Mortimer and Catharine; but there was nothing in him now of the jealous realism of a grown man’s natural emotion towards this shadowy Master Shore by whom she was to be dishonoured and he was to be rescued.

One thing puzzled him. Why, if he were not to be executed, had his wife brought him that little phial? He had been vividly aware of it, all these two long nights and days since her visit, pressing against his side; but a deep instinct, totally beyond any rational explanation, had caused him to say nothing to his friend of this death-bearing draught "clear and tasteless as water."

What amazed him about Master Brut was the way in which the man kept reverting to that revolting description of a fellow Lollard's burning which their illiterate jailor had made them read aloud.

"I know," Master Brut was saying now, after expressing what was to Rhisiart an incomprehensible concern as to the fate of "that damned Ruthin witch," "I know I shall lose my mind in the flames. But I've decided to cry, 'Jesus! Jesus!' — and that isn't you" — and he made a profane gesture towards the figure hanging above them— "as long as I don't go mad with pain. And my idea is" — and a look so curious crossed his smooth round face that it made Rhisiart think of the smile of the Man in the Moon— "that even if I do go mad, I mean if I become nothing but a blindly-shrieking pain, I shall mechanically, if you know what I mean, go on with that same cry."

This was too much for Rhisiart and he stumbled to his feet. He had been lying on his straw bed most of the day. Indeed, ever since Tegolin had lain down there by his side his bed had grown precious to him. He had caught on that occasion the shape of certain particular pieces of straw that were larger than the rest and had the empty husks of wheat still adhering to them; and these he had avoided disturbing, fearful lest they should be crushed or lost among the rest in their special position against the wall.

But he scrambled to his feet now, and shuffling up to his friend, whose turn it was that day to wear their only suit of clothes, he hugged him to his heart. "You'll — turn — me — into — a whoreson heretic soon!" he groaned as he hugged him; and to the end of his days he never forgot the grotesque expression of shy embarrassment that distorted that smooth countenance. How was it, he wondered, that a man who was going to be burnt alive could feel such discomfort, such embarrassment, such obvious misgiving, at being passionately embraced?

But what was that? Hurriedly they drew apart, both praying they would see the face of little Nance. But it was her father; and never had Master Giggleswick, since they'd first been brought here, showed so much agitation. To their amazement he waved them aside and, going hurriedly towards their extempore latrine, began fumigating it with burning charcoal, sprinkled with incense, that he was carrying in a brazier.

"The King is coming!" he muttered presently, turning towards them a face out of the midst of his fumes that was a convulsed image of horrified awe. "The Archbishop arrived this morning and they're both coming to see you. The King is in one of his moods."

"What do you mean, his moods?" asked Rhisiart.

The man stared at him in astonishment. Then a look of anger crossed his visage. "You'd be in a mood I reckon; if you hadn't slept for nigh a week!"

The Lollard's round face assumed once more the accustomed mask of patient placidity that his friend's burst of womanish emotion had disturbed.

"There's a stake being set up in Market Square," said Master Giggleswick, giving them a look of terrified commiseration, "and a scaffold, too." And with these words he went on resolutely swinging his censer above their piled-up excrement.

When he was gone, the Lollard shuffled over to Rhisiart and offered his unhurt arm to help him to rise. Neither of them could move faster than this awkward shuffle, for their ankles were bound by short chains about a foot long; but Master Brut helped the younger man to reach his accustomed stool, and then sitting down by his side began picking up with his finger and thumb various fragments of bread with which, on the stool that served as their table, he had been showing how the land lay between Glendower's camp and London.

"Jesus! Jesus! Jesus!" Rhisiart caught him muttering, as he mechanically placed some of these fragments in his mouth and flicked others, in little neat pellets, against the legs of that oppressive and inquisitorial crucifix.

"He's thinking what he'll do," Rhisiart said to himself, "when the pain's unbearable."

And then he noticed that their jailer, in his fumblings with his brazier, had dropped upon the floor that filthy bit of parchment containing the lurid popular account of the burning of the last London heretic. He prayed Master Brut wouldn't notice it lying there. And then he began comparing — and he was pleased with himself for having such thoughts which he felt were worthy of an imprisoned diplomatist — what they'd been hearing of the casual ways of Henry's "entourage" with the stately formality of Owen's court. "And how different must be," he said to himself, "this 'mood' they talk of, compared with those strange trances of Owen's. Everybody seems to understand the caprices of this King; whereas I've lived with our Prince all these years and he's as mysterious to me as he was at the beginning!"

Presently, as he watched the Lollard obliterating his map, Rhisiart found himself trembling. "It's not the prongs and pitch this time," he thought. "It's seeing the King!" And in spite of himself the old traditional Norman respect for his feudal sovereign made him straighten his body as he turned his head towards the door. There! Voices and steps were now audible outside. The two men's eyes met; and to Rhisiart's relief his friend ceased muttering the name of his Saviour and remarked quite calmly: "I don't want you to intervene, dear lad, whatever the Archbishop says to me, or I to him. Do you understand?" Rhisiart had only time to nod when the door was flung open.

Both the prisoners rose to their feet and made the best obeisance they could, considering their chains. Behind the King and the Archbishop there entered, along with the jailer, a grotesquely-attired dwarf, and behind the dwarf, evidently uneasy, evidently disobeying his Master's command, a small white greyhound. Our friends had been told of this white dog who belonged to a breed brought from abroad by John of Gaunt; and little Nance had often talked to them about the dwarf, who, derisively called Hercule, was a privileged creature in the royal camp, as well as in Henry's lodge at Berkhampstead.

The Archbishop was dressed in the plain garb of a monk, and after acknowledging the two prisoners' genuflexion, he fell back with priestly propriety, leaving the situation in the hands of the temporal ruler of the realm.

Rhisiart was startled beyond all expectation by the appearance of England's monarch. The words of the jailer: "If you hadn't slept for nigh a week!" returned to his mind. To say he was shocked would be a mild expression of what he felt. He had heard rumours about Henry's strange illness, which some said was a form of leprosy, but the haggard and disfigured features that now regarded him with an expression of intolerable nervous tension from under their helmet — for this Prince when once he took the field rarely removed his armour — horrified him so much that in spite of his prejudice, and in spite of his loyalty to Wales, he felt a pang of painful pity.

Henry of Lancaster had an extremely long face like his eldest son, but there the resemblance between them ended; for Prince Hal's physiognomy conveyed a sense of vigorous and lively youth, whereas the King's countenance was haggard with premature old age.

As Henry looked round him now, after giving a hurried glance at his prisoners, Rhisiart made no attempt to conceal either his student's interest in an unhappy man or his inherited respect for England's monarch.

The King certainly had an eye of terrifying authority. Indeed the first impression our friend got of him was as startling as it was horrible. The man made him actually think of a corpse, in the early stages of decomposition, tottering under a suit of glittering steel. "I can understand the Battle of Shrewsbury now," he thought. And he had reason for the thought; for the energy that emanated from this sick and world-weary man was overpowering.

But if Rhisiart caught the unconquerable vitality of the English King, Master Brut, who, as we know, was more of a psychologist, detected at once the man's spiritual secret, the secret that was like a charnel-house rat gnawing at the tissues of his soul. "He's got a devil," said the Wycliffite to himself, "and its name is Remorse. And only the words of the living Jesus, not you, you monstrous parody!" — and the bold blasphemer made a motion in his mouth that brought his saliva to the tip of his tongue— "will ever cast that devil out!"

As for the Archbishop, upon whose face Rhisiart now turned his attention, no emotion that he called up could possibly be associated with pity. Nevertheless, none could deny that the successor of Anselm and Becket was a handsome old priest. But had a child made a comic picture of everything most antipathetic to childhood, this crafty and cruel face — like that of a horrible old woman employed in the punishment of whores — would have been that picture.

It was the face of the eternal Enemy of Freedom from the foundation of the world. His features struck our friend as being entirely composed of sinister and enigmatic curves. His massive nose resembled the bulb of an evil plant, while over his almost invisible eyes that seemed to be perpetually sucking at the nerve-centres of heretics there hung heavily-curved folds. These folds were repeated below his eyes, and hung suspended there like fungus growths beneath wood-pecker holes. His cheeks, his forehead, his chin — all were a series of equivocal curves. There wasn't, our friend hurriedly decided, from the top of that shaven poll to the bottom of that shaven jowl, one single honest straight line!

"You don't happen to know, Master Secretary," began the King, addressing Rhisiart, "how many Welsh gentlemen of any note or quality were with Glendourdy on Woodbury Hill?"

"No, Sire," replied our friend looking straight at the distressed and restless eyes which rested on him only for a moment as they turned from the greyhound to the dwarf and back again to the greyhound.

"Have you any idea how long this foolish rebellion is likely to last?"

"No, Sire."

"About how many men could Glendourdy count on if we ourselves were to march into this unhappy country to restore order?"

Rhisiart began to take heart. If there was anything, as we know, that he prided himself upon, it was his legal acumen. The only doubt in his mind was whether it was better to emphasize or to disparage the Welsh powers of resistance. He knew well that the one thing Owen wasn't afraid of was a formal invasion by the King in person. "It's just what he wants," he said to himself, as he pretended to be undergoing a painful mental struggle as to whether or not to betray his master.

He hurriedly decided that the larger Owen's forces were, the more likely was it that the King would come.

"I believe, Sire," he replied with gloomy intensity, as if the words were drawn out of him by the presence of a scaffold, "that the person your royal question refers to could raise at a pinch about twenty thousand spears.”

Master Brut couldn’t resist a gasp of astonishment, which wasn’t lost upon the Archbishop; but at this moment the entrance of a couple of soldiers with chairs that resembled judgment-seats for both Church and State postponed any comment he might have made.

If it was a relief to the prisoners to have their judges seated it was a positive joy to the dwarf and the dog. The sinking down of that troubled figure, in his unadorned breast-plate and polished greaves — for Henry, out of a deliberate and shrewd policy, wore the royal arms only on state occasions — proved too tempting an opportunity to be resisted by these devoted adherents.

Dressed entirely in blood-red the little Hercule held in his hand an enormous wooden sword, the tip of which, painted an ominous blood colour, he now proceeded to use as a jumping-pole, and began hopping about the chamber, ostentatiously approaching the Archbishop, and then, with no less fantastic ostentation, hopping away from him in pretended panic.

Master Giggleswick, without waiting a sign from Henry, had seen fit, in his discomfort and uneasiness, to take himself off along with the soldiers, so that the King and the Primate were now seated alone before their prisoners; while round and about them, and round and about the men in chains, who stood together in the fumes left by the brazier, hopped the restless Hercule, his proceedings resembling, had the frowning crucifix possessed the power of vision, the antics of a blood-red flea.

“What in your own opinion, young man,” began Henry again, “was the motive of these unhappy rebels in advancing so far into our realm? Surely they didn’t—”

"The King of France with thousands of his men," chanted Hercule, pausing for a second as he leant on his wooden sword, "climbed up the hill and then climbed down again!" And immediately afterwards in a low wistful voice: "You are sad, Sire Gossip, you are sad."

"We are sad," said the King, smiling at him and glancing meaningfully at the Archbishop. But the effect of this smile was to throw into such appalling relief the ravages of his strange disease that the dwarf skipped away with a gnat-like wail.

"I thought you were!" he shrilled with an hysterical scream. And then he went off hopping again, repeating in a weird crescendo: "I thought you were! I thought you were! I thought you were!"

It was at this point that the Archbishop intervened. "With your permission, my royal son," he began; and Rhisiart noticed that he didn't use his lips to speak. Indeed he seemed to have no lips. His cheeks had the power of folding themselves, without the mediation of lips, into the in-drawn orifice of the mouth out of which the words came.

"With my royal son's permission I should like to say one word to you, Master Walter Brut of Lyde in the County of Hereford." As he spoke he made a slight movement of his fingers upwards as if in an automatic blessing; but as soon as they reached the height of the cross on his stomach he projected two of them — and they were the whitest and most shapely hands our friend had ever seen — in the manner of a pair of horns towards Master Brut. This gesture terrified Rhisiart on behalf of his friend more than if he'd rolled out over the Lollard's head a volley of priestly curses.

"I wish the King to hear me offer you, my unhappy son, a last opportunity to reconcile yourself with the Church of Christ. Are you still obstinate in your blasphemous opinion that the Sacred Element used in Holy Mass is not the living Body of the—"

But Rhisiart couldn’t help intervening at this solemn point. “Oh, my Lord Archbishop!” he cried eagerly. “My friend has often said to me, while he’s been reading the Scriptures, that the centre of the Catholic Faith lies in the Holy Mass. I can testify, my Lord, from the bottom of my heart, that no one has ever attended Mass more reverently than Master Brut, or has lived a more good, a more kind, a more unselfish life!”

The Prelate’s eyes, as he heard this startling suggestion that mere human goodness could counterbalance an improper view of the Blessed Sacrament, sank so deep under the curves of his eyelids that their cavities came to resemble those round holes of in-sucking sand made by sea-worms.

“Do you still adhere, Master Brut, to your blasphemous opinion?” he said, taking no more notice of Rhisiart than he did of the antics of Hercule the dwarf.

“1 do, my Lord,” replied the Lollard calmly.

That the reply was much more satisfactory to the zealous supporter of the statute De Heretico Comburendo than would have been any tendency in Master Brut to recant was proved by the triumphant tone in which the Prelate now addressed the world-weary monarch, the droop of whose ravaged face against the metallic edge of his gorget suggested a longing rather to sleep forever himself than to vex the sleep of others.

“You see how it is, Sire!” he said loudly, while Henry gave a queer galvanic jerk as if he’d been pricked by a bodkin. “The same conceited tone, the same air of self-righteousness, the same contempt for tradition and authority! It was a happy day for the Church, Sire, when you were crowned King; and since the King rests on the Church, and the Church rests on God, you may be sure that our dear young Prince will live to walk in your steps; and his son to walk in his. I can see before me, Sire, your son’s son — a third Henry of Lancaster — reigning over a kingdom, Sire, wherein all heresy and all treason and all rebellion, together with all the malice of man’s wicked mind, have been crushed out!”

The Archbishop was not one for impulsive gestures. He moved his eyes without moving his head. He moved his hands without moving his arms. He moved his fingers without moving his hands. But when he uttered the syllables “crushed out!” he placed one clenched fist upon the other in his capacious lap, and as though they were “the upper and the nether millstone” of the Scriptures, he caused them to rotate, not rapidly, but quietly, slowly, irresistibly, as if they were crushing by leisurely progression the reckless soul of Master Wycliffe to powder.

As if mesmerized by this visual exhibition of the Mill of God to which it was his task to lend his weight, the King turned to the Lollard, and it seemed as if his words had no personal feeling behind them at all. He made a weary motion with his hand for both the prisoners to come nearer as he began to speak; and Rhisiart, who experienced a childish fascination for the patches of repulsive scurf that disfigured the royal features, felt as if they, and not the man behind them, were uttering judgment. “You have heard what the Archbishop has said, young man, and you’ll be wise to spend your last night on earth in remorse for your sin, for your most grievous sin, against the Laws of our Realm, against the Religion once for all delivered to the Saints and against the Vicar of Christ. We condemn your body to be burnt with fire until it is utterly consumed; and as for your unhappy soul, if the pang of — the pangs of—” But at that point there was a complete change in his intonation, and he uttered the word “remorse” with such a ghastly emphasis, and fell into such a strange muse the moment it had been uttered, that the dwarf who had been watching him intently came with three long hops to his feet, and crouching down there set up a moan like the howl of a dog.

“Hercule,” murmured the King, “Hercule.” His voice was so tender that the men in chains exchanged a quick glance and a longing to fall at the side of the dwarf and clasp the knees of a prince who could speak like that passed through both their minds.

But the small creature had scrambled to his feet again. “Sire Gossip?” he cried. “Can you answer a riddle?”

“Put it to us first,” said the King; and Rhisiart had a vision of this corpse in armour clinging to the jests of his fool as he swung above a dizzy gulf.

The dwarf picked up his wooden sword and after several attempts managed to insert it so firmly and deeply between two of the flagstones that he could play the acrobat upon it and with one hand on its cross-hilt could dangle his legs and point his finger at the seated churchman.

“Why, Sire Gossip, is an archbishop like a grid-iron?”

There was a jingle of chains as both the prisoners drew a step nearer. They all became aware now of excited voices outside the door and some kind of violent altercation. But Henry took no notice of this; and the Archbishop, though he moved his eyes and clasped his fingers, remained immobile.

It was clear to Rhisiart that the more his fool made sport of the Archbishop the easier it was for the King to forget his need for sleep. “His piety’s all politics,” thought our friend. “He’s got Richard on his brain as badly as Mad Huw; but he can forget all when Hercule’s at his tricks.”

“Why a grid-iron?” asked Henry softly, giving his chair a jerk so that he had his back to the crucifix and his face to the dwarf.

“Because,” began Hercule, who now bore a striking resemblance to a monkey on a pole, “because—”

But there he stopped, for the King had swung round towards Rhisiart. “As for you,” he burst out, turning his sick man’s gaze upon our astonished friend, “you may thank our good Dickon, and not us, that we’ve decided on the Tower for you, and with a whole skin!”

“Sire Gossip?”

“Well, Hercule?”

“An Archbishop is like a grid-iron because so much good gospel meat goes in red, and comes out—”

But the door was flung open at this point, and Jailer Giggleswick appeared, clinging desperately to the excited form of none other than Mad Huw.

“What’s this?” cried Henry angrily, struggling to his feet with his hand on the hilt of his sword. “I told you we were to be left alone. By my father’s soul, Master Jailer—”

But no sooner had Mad Huw set eyes on the angry monarch, now standing close to the figure in chains, who to the Friar’s demented fancy was no other than the dead Richard, than he shook off the hands of Master Giggleswick, glanced with a Welsh Franciscan’s contempt at the Archbishop, and, after inclining his head humbly and reverently in the direction of Rhisiart, began to pour forth a torrent of prophetic eloquence.

As Rhisiart had long ago discovered, there was a magnetic hypnotism about Mad Huw, when he let himself go, at once so tender and so terrifying that few hearers were able to do anything but hold their peace in awestruck silence.

“What will they do now?” our friend thought, glancing from the King to the Prelate.

But the Archbishop did nothing; though his eyes moved in his motionless head towards the troubled monarch and gave him one penetrating glance. Then they turned to their contemplation of the feet of the crucifix.

The white dog, after sniffing at the Friar's legs, settled himself on his thin haunches, and watched him intently, his delicate pointed head drooping a little to one side. "He acts," thought our friend, "as if it were Saint Francis himself."

But the Lollard had eyes for nobody but the King. He seemed to forget that this conscience-stricken figure had just condemned him to be burnt. The pathologist in him was touched to the quick; and well it might be. The extraordinary thing was that in his self-lacerating mood Henry was exerting his own powerful will to draw the speaker on.

An appalling reciprocity rose up in that Worcestershire prison between Richard's murderer and Richard's idolater. The same superstitious mania in the monarch that made him helpless in the Prelate's hands made him equally helpless before his accuser. And mingled with this nervous confederacy in his own indictment, there was, as both dog and dwarf seemed perfectly to understand, a malicious satisfaction in the discomfort which the Friar's words must needs be causing the Archbishop. That portly figure in the monk's garb, however, gave neither to Henry nor to Hercule the least sign of being disconcerted. All he did, while Mad Huw's words rang through the prison, was to assist the King to sink once more, with a dull metallic tinkle of his heavy armour, into the chair he'd vacated; but this done he quietly resumed his own seat, folded his hands in his lap, and fixing his eyes on the crucifix above him assumed the expression of inscrutable piety with which in his cathedral throne he was accustomed to await the close of some prolonged anthem.

The door of the Bishop's prison had been left open; and poor Master Giggleswick, whom Providence had intended rather for the role of a town-crier than a jailer, now beheld — as the last straw to his shame — the fair head of little Nance, accompanied by the fairer head of Julietta, peeping in with spell-bound curiosity!

Frantically the good man gesticulated to the children to go away, but instead of obeying him, for they were both the motherless darlings of indulgent men, they sidled into the room, and stood there, hand in hand, staring with delighted awe at the King, at the prisoners, and above all at the gesticulating Friar.

Rhisiart kept saying to himself: “Why doesn’t he stop predicting these woes for the House of Lancaster and say a word for Walter here?” He glanced at his friend. Was the man praying for a miracle under his breath? Was he anticipating his struggles, his pain, his cries of “Jesus”? He himself shook off as if it were a mortal sin the stir of sweetness in the depths of his nature at his escape from the prongs and the pitch. The thought came to him: “Mightn’t the sick King, in his present remorseful mood, cheat the Archbishop in return for some real information about Wales and its Prince?” And then he had a diplomatic afterthought: “Couldn’t I buy Walter’s pardon by inventing a master-secret that would do Owen no harm and cause this sick King intense satisfaction?”

But what a man Walter was! Why wouldn’t he let a person catch his eye? Was he fearful of anyone, even the friend of his heart, peering through the bloody sweat of his soul into the pain-dance within?

But what was this? The astonishing man was actually watching Hercule with lively interest — and, by Jesus, if he wasn’t smiling! No, no, no — this smile of Walter Brut’s, and how it had baffled him from their first encounter! rising to the surface just now, just when Tegolin — no! he refused to think of it! — it was too much. It made him angry. It almost made him hate the fellow. Oh blast, oh damn this skipping red flea! What was the whoreson up to now, just when the whirling predictions of the Friar were warning that corpse in armour that nothing, nothing he could do, could conquer the Welsh nation?

But it wasn't only to Rhisiart that Hercule's behaviour seemed inexplicable. Little Nance and Julietta were staring at him in an ecstasy. Indeed it looked as if they would soon be clapping their hands! What he was pretending to do was to catch in his cupped fingers the prophetic words that issued from the mouth of the Friar and then to convey them in that same imaginary receptacle to the abstracted Archbishop, and having made as if he'd emptied them there like burning coals, to go skipping back to Mad Huw where he held out his hands as if to obtain another handful of these scoriac words.

In this performance, to the children's delight, and apparently not to the King's displeasure, the butterfly-like little dog took a lively part, leaping up at the dwarf and exhibiting a moving vignette in scarlet and snow-white!

Had Elphin been there he would doubtless have caught the full effect of this weird picture, sketched by the heraldic artist, chance, for his masters, the fleeting hours; but, as it was, the particular way the sun shone across the chamber, making the King's steel armour gleam like glass and throwing into ghastly relief the yellow sores and grey scurf upon his ravaged face while it caused the grime upon the unwashed skin of the two prisoners to be transformed into beaten gold, found no human eye to note it. Master Brut had never been one for aesthetic effects; and though he might smile at the antics of a little white dog, his friend knew well what must be going on in his mind — the chain — the stake — the writhing flesh.

And all for what? All that one handsome old monk, without a straight line in his face, should get the Holy Father's blessing upon the House of Lancaster!

“Oh Richard, oh my Saint!” Mad Huw was intoning again; and Rhisiart began to feel that there was no parallel, in philosophy, or law, or politics, for the situation he was now compelled to confront. It was the monarch’s business to stop the Friar; and yet all he’d done was to make a signal to the jailer to let the man alone! He must be getting some monstrous satisfaction from having his tormented conscience objectified in the cries of a madman.

Meanwhile the wretched Giggleswick, helplessly watching those little girls at the door, made up his mind that he would resign his job and sweep the streets before he ran the risk of another scene like that.

But it wasn’t over yet; for though something, some psychic emanation from his victim-accomplice, had in a curious way muted the Friar’s tone, both the dwarf and the dog knew what the King was suffering. They had indeed been, so to speak, inside his nerves to a degree forbidden to any human creature and they knew that the man was approaching the verge of an hysterical outburst. They were unable to stop this outburst; but they could show what they felt by anticipating it. And this they did with a wild rush, leaping to his side, crouching at his feet and setting up simultaneously such a heart-rending howl of pitiful sympathy that the children fled, the Archbishop changed the position of his fingers, and Mad Huw, pointing at the crucifix, upon which the sun was certainly playing curious tricks, murmured in an awestruck and hoarse voice: “Who has done this? Who has put horns upon Christ’s head?”

This final word was too much for the over-wrought King. Rising from his chair, while his emotion caused several dark blood-drops to appear amid the sores on his face, he moved a step or two towards the Friar, and very quietly, while the terrified jailer shut his eyes and the Archbishop changed the position of his feet, uttered the surprising words: “It’s sleep you want, Brother Friar. Let’s go and look for it together, Brother. It’s sleep we all want. Richard has it. Hotspur has it. The Duke, my father, has it. Hercule and Seamew will have it tonight. He," and he made a gesture towards the Lollard, "will have it tomorrow. But who will give it to Henry of Hereford, Brother? To Henry of Lancaster, Brother? To Henry of England, Brother? Give me sleep, I pray thee — a feather of it, a grain of it — one little tiny fly's head of it, Brother! Sleep's an easy thing to find. It's cheaper than ale. It's commoner than bread. Sleep's everywhere; isn't it, Brother? Isn't it, Grey Brother? Sleep's as wide as the air, as deep as the sea! What have they done then with poor Harry's sleep? The King's tired, Brother. A man can't live and be as tired as the King. You're all my subjects! Aren't you my subjects? Then I command you — on your allegiance" — here the wretched man shook Mad Huw frantically by the arm— "go, hunt, look about, search! Say it's the King who sends; say it's the King who must know, and by night-fall too, who it is who's hoarding all the sleep in the world! Go and look, I tell ye! There must be somebody who's stolen the King's sleep!

"You there! Crosby! Denton! Talbot! Send out, and hunt him down! He's stolen the King's sleep and hidden it in a little hole! Yes, yes, good Seamew! Fetch it! Fetch it! Fetch it! Fetch it!" All this while the little white dog was leaping up at his master and pawing at his armour, as if he were fain to find his hurt and lick it.

As for Hercule, he seemed set upon one thing only — to break his wooden sword! With his foot upon it, groaning and panting, he had already broken it into three pieces; but the wood near the handle was too much for him. Like a child with a baffling toy he now began furiously beating it against the wall. Nobody else dared to stir or to speak. The Archbishop had gone as far as to thrust his hand into his habit to find his beads. But evidently fancying that the eyes of all Christendom were upon him, he let it remain there, and contented himself with a murmured "Miserere nobis!"

But there must have been something in the outstretched hand with which Mad Huw now boldly touched the sick monarch that carried a healing power. And the little dog at last succeeded in doing what it wanted to do. Its wordless distress reached the man's heart; and Henry took it up into his arms.

It was the turn of the two prisoners now to receive a shock; and a shock that they alone in all that place could receive. His hated enemy's remorse had done for the Friar what neither Tegolin nor Rhisiart had been able to do. To say that he no longer confused Rhisiart with King Richard would be going too far; but that Henry's hysterical outburst had restored to the former his association with Glyn Dŵr was proved by the calm and collected manner in which he now begged his life of the King. "The lad's no Lollard," he said. "He's a good lad and a true Catholic. He has been—"

The way in which the King interrupted him — though since Seamew was licking his master's face the prisoners heard nothing — must have satisfied the Friar, for he now was seen to make the sign of the cross over both monarch and dog; and the prisoners clearly heard him utter the words, and utter them in a tone of the most convincing authority: "Tonight, at least, Henry of Lancaster, Saint Francis will give you sleep."

Rhisiart's mind at that moment became so absorbed in an internal struggle of his own that what went on before him grew suddenly indistinct. He felt faint and dizzy with standing so long, so much so that it was almost with a tearful relief that he took the support of the arm his friend now offered him; but it was the contest in his mind, not the hurting of his wound, or even the danger of that old "blackness" overtaking him, that made him respond to Mad Huw with hardly a sign, when the jailer, mentally withdrawing his resolve to change his occupation, hustled the Friar away.

Yes, our friend was thinking of that little phial of death, "colourless as water and tasteless as air". Mightn't he have desperate need of it if they decided after they got him into the Tower to extract some real information from him about Owen and about Wales? But what of Walter? Nothing they could do in the Tower could be worse than what Walter was to suffer — and suffer tomorrow!

But had he a right to give away what Tegolin had brought him? Dewi Sant! but he was past thinking of that. His mind gave a queer jump, as if the pit of his stomach had become a single pulse of horror.

So this is what it had come to. There was no other way. Obscure memories of Roman and Greek heroes rose up in his mind.

But he felt anything but heroic. He felt odiously calm and clever. He felt as though he were the incarnation of cold-blooded practical common-sense. Was there any way he could dodge this calm, clear-headed, inevitable decision? No, there was no way. Walter would never kill himself and so — yes, he must do it. He loved him; and he must do it. "Thank God," he thought, "I'm an unscrupulous Catholic and not a fussy gospel-man!"

And then quite suddenly the old "blackness" did sweep over his wits. He seemed to see them chaining his friend to the stake— "Walter!"

When his consciousness returned he found himself alone with his friend. The Lollard's round moon-face was bending over him as he lay on his straw bed. And the man was actually looking happy because he'd opened his eyes. Christ! This was rather a moment to look happy when you couldn't open your eyes. When you'd never open your eyes again. But the jailer must have come and gone, and brought them their bread and water. There was the pitcher; there were their two mugs; all just as usual! There was the stool they used for a table.

And he found that he'd absolutely made up his mind. He must have made it up while the "blackness" was on him. Yes, his brain had never been clearer. And not for nothing had he his mother's unscrupulous Norman wits. He called up the image of his mother. Lady Montfoison! Well, at any rate, she wouldn't hesitate. Walter had to die anyhow; and he'd die now without ever knowing. Yes, yes — but he must do quickly what he had to do.

"Shall I bring you your supper, laddie?" It was Walter's voice — just his ordinary, kind, even voice. How he would hear it when he was in the Tower with Griffith ab Owen!

He pretended that he could only answer faintly. God! He felt strength enough to shout the place down. "Bring — the — whole — thing — over — here, my dear," he whispered. "We'll have our — our last supper."

The Lollard turned his back and began his jangling shuffle towards the bread and water. In a second Rhisiart extracted the phial, tried its stopper and held it under his rags. How slow the man was! He found it necessary to shut his eyes. Those slow, awkward movements were maddening. And what if — doing all this with his one hand — he dropped and broke the pitcher! Oh, he would never be able to carry that precious water balanced on that ricketty stool! But there! — he'd done it at last; and the stool, with their mugs and their half-loaves, rested safely by his side.

"Get — your — stool!" he whispered, with the air of a man who might faint again at any moment

Shuffle — shuffle — shuffle] How cleverly he'd managed! He felt so pleased with himself that he even took the time to kiss his hand to that familiar back as he poured out the water into their two glasses and emptied the phial into the one further from his bed.

Having replaced the little empty bottle in his belt he took the precaution to possess himself of his own mug. But he didn't lift it to his lips. He waited. Here was his friend jangling back; and clutching his mug he closed his eyes.

At last the man was seated opposite him and he could breathe freely. Not quite freely, all the same; for there was an odd sensation in his throat. He felt as if he were the one going to escape the Archbishop. "What shall we drink to?" he found himself saying in a loud and resonant voice; not at all the voice of a man who at any moment might faint away. Oh, the whoreson fool he was! He should have whispered that; for the innocent eyes opposite him opened wide.

"To Owen!" he murmured as quietly and as naturally as he could; and he lifted his mug. But his heart was shouting. Surely Walter must hear his heart. "Drink — drink — drink — drink!" thundered his heart, as if they were both inside the great horologe, invented by that Glastonbury monk, when it was striking the hour! There! the hand that he knew so well — every line and mark on it! — had taken the mug — was raising it — had raised it — to his lips— "Hail Mary! Hail Mary! Hail Mary!"— "tasteless as water". Drain it, for Christ's sake! No! no! Don't look at me over the rim, like children do! Don't—"

"To our wives!" And the Lollard put down the mug — empty. "I've been wondering," he said, "how soon a person faints with the pain; and whether —" He stopped suddenly, evidently mistaking the expression on his friend's face for unbearable fellow-feeling. "How selfish I am!" he cried, and stretched out his arm across the stool. But their fingers had barely touched when the man's face, body, limbs drew in upon themselves, self-locked in a deadly, constricting, stiffening spasm. Up, up his figure rose, as if there were a galvanic propulsion beneath it, and for one tick of that time-clock, inside of which Rhisiart, like the Glastonbury monk's automaton, was empty of all feeling, the convulsed form balanced itself on his toes; and then, for Master Brut died as erect as if he had been chained to a stake, it fell forward across the stool and across Rhisiart's knees.

When Master Giggleswick entered the prison at midnight along with the executioner whose official duty it was to measure his victim for the iron band that was to encircle his waist, they found both prisoners extended on the same bed; but thanks to the precautions taken in Worcester that the Bishops might see the faces of their victims, the place was so easily lit up that it was soon clear that only one of them was enjoying that temporary cessation of consciousness that Mad Huw had promised the King. The other was in a deeper sleep.

For a short while, as the two men questioned him, it seemed as though a danger, quite unforeseen by our astute friend, was on the verge of arising; namely, the suspicion that there had been a quarrel in the prison; but so free from any bruise was the Lollard's corpse, and so realistic was the survivor's account of the shocking access of panic-stricken blasphemy that had resulted in this providential stroke, that the worst our friend had to endure were the long-winded accounts of similar incidents in that place exchanged between the two cronies.

"Well, Master Clerk, I'll be getting home," remarked the executioner at last, "and you, Ned, I can see are ready for Mother Goose's feathers. Give my love to London-town, Master, and accept a good Christian's congratulation! Of course, as a professional man — which is, as you might say, a good Christian writ backwards" — and the fellow gave Rhisiart an indescribable leer that was at once sympathetic and avaricious— "a man might complain, and Ned here knows it well, at having to rise with the cock to take down an unblooded scaffold and as pretty a pile of dry withies as this town has ever seen. But, as I've always said, 'tis the hand that signs the warrant, not the hand that piles the faggots, that keeps the smell of the burning in his beard."

Well, they were gone now; and Rhisiart, who never analysed his feelings, was quite unconscious of anything ironic in the fact that, as he lay with his arm across the body of the man he'd killed, his mind fretted so much because he'd lacked the silver groat that, as "a Christian writ backwards," the executioner had evidently expected; or that he was so worried because he had only these rags — even if he carried off their single outer garment — to ride in to London.

With his head full of the groat he hadn't possessed and of this problem of his rags, he kept staring at that monstrous crucifix, till, like a forest-ranger hanging dead hawks in sight of a heronry, he left these annoyances suspended on those wounded feet; and fumbling with his hot fingers till he got hold of the icy hand by his side, he began at last to think of Master Brut. But, really and truly, there was nothing to think about. He had met him by chance; he had killed him by intention; and let fate be the arbiter! What he really felt was that Master Brut had gone off altogether, goodness knows where, but very far away!

This ice-cold flesh he touched had no connection with his familiar friend. As for Walter's soul being in danger, it no more crossed his mind than it crossed his mind to regret killing him. The only positive feeling was a deep complacent malicious satisfaction at having robbed the Archbishop of at least one man's weight of protracted pain!

But though his emotions seemed to have grown as dead and numb as the ice-cold fingers he continued to clutch, there was one problem, as he heard the watchman beyond the moat calling the hours, round which his mind hovered like a tethered and blinded falcon.

“He must have quarrelled with the French,” he said to himself. “It was too splendid a chance for him not to have taken it! He could have burned the gates, sacked the town and captured both the Henries! He could have done it after the second day he camped on Woodbury Hill. Later than that I doubt it. From what Nance said, the shire-men were—”

But the affection that had grown up between Master Giggleswick’s little maid and Walter called his thoughts off that speculation as if it had been a bell-buoy.

The jailer had left several well-oiled torches burning in their sconces and this illumination inside his room made it hard for him to see the stars outside; especially since the flamboyant end-of-the-century window that recent episcopal taste had inserted was partly concealed by the projecting crucifix; and the law of association of ideas made it impossible for him to see the feet of this figure without thinking of the executioner’s groat-less face and of his own ride to London in rags.

Between the numbness of his heart and the number of things he had to avoid thinking Rhisiart must have slept again; for when he was next aware of the “realities”, as we call them, of this somewhat limited dimension of life, he was offered two noteworthy phenomena.

For one thing the light of dawn was endowing the torch-flames with that peculiarly mystic and consecrated effect that any Promethean light displays when it humbles itself before the presence of the sun; and for another thing, from the dead body at his side there now emanated, faintly but unmistakeably, unlike any other smell in the world, the dreadful sweetness of human mortality. He found also that in his sleep his friend’s fingers had so stiffened about his own that it needed an effort to disengage his hand. Scrambling over the stiff form at his side he got out of bed.

But he was shocked to see that neither of the men who’d examined the corpse had thought of closing its eyes or its mouth. It was too late now to do either of these things decently; but while he did what he could he kept murmuring aloud: “Don’t’ee mind, Walter; don’t’ee mind, Walter dear!”

He was thus engaged when he heard voices and steps outside, and then the noise of the key in the door. He sat down on the bed, one hand straightening the edge of the blanket he’d pulled over his friend’s chin, the other making sure that the empty phial was safe back in his belt. He must have appeared a sorry spectacle to the persons who now entered, with his black elf-locks, his ragged beard, his staring eyes.

But the Rhisiart inside these appearances was the same sagacious disciple of the diplomatic Master Young, now my Lord Bishop of Bangor, as he was when he helped that worthy to keep his seat on the piebald back of Griffin. This he showed by the dignified and self-possessed manner in which, with a polite apology for not rising, he received his visitor.

The gentleman who entered was as striking a figure as he was a completely unknown one. Master Giggleswick, who ushered him in, came straight to his prisoner and kneeling down without ceremony proceeded to free him from his fetters. Once more our friend had to go through the indignity of having nothing to offer the man save his hand to shake; and he felt convinced that the hasty glance which Master Giggleswick threw upon the dead said in plain words: “If you’d been alive there’d have been at least a gold noble forthcoming!”

Little Nance, whom her father now left behind as he went out, showed more interest in the newcomer than in her late friend’s survivor; but this interest Rhisiart soon began to share. The gentleman was carrying a large bundle; but he laid this down on the chair recently occupied by the King and proceeded to introduce himself.

“Palamedes Playter, of the County of Suffolk,” he announced with an inclination of his whole body; “Knight of St. John and officer of the King’s Guard, and, if I may add, the sworn and devoted servant of the beautiful Lady Tegolin. The Lady Tegolin has sent me,” he went on, “to bring you these clothes; and to tell you that she has had permission to bid you farewell; and will very shortly be here in person. Captain Crosby, whom in my military capacity I serve, is, I have to inform you, already mounted, his charger stamping, his men cursing, his banner raised. It is my privilege to invite you, with this little lady’s leave, to put on without further delay the — the contents of this poor bundle.”

“Please give me your rose!” This request was made in quite an impassioned tone by little Nance, whose cheeks were flushed, her blue eyes wild with excitement, and both her small hands clutching one of the Knight of St. John’s elaborate sleeves.

Rhisiart stood up, made the sign of the cross over the Lollard’s half-closed eyes, and shuffling with his feet, as if the irons were still about his ankles, bowed to Sir Palamedes and advanced to the chair that held the bundle.

But lively as was his interest in his own new attire he couldn’t help pausing to take in the fantastical garb of the gentleman from Suffolk. Sir Palamedes wore the most elaborately upturned shoes our friend had ever seen on human feet. His hosen reached upward from these shoes to the joint of his groin and were so tight in their fit and so thin in their texture that every muscle of his limbs was visible. “What a dancer he’d make!” thought Rhisiart.

The colour of Sir Palamedes’ hose was pale blue, his sleeves were silver edged with black; and his tunic was so short that though his codpiece was punctiliously treated according to the dictates of the most exquisite modesty, it is likely enough that Father Pascentius would have found his attire a flagrant example of the degeneracy of the age. He wore his hair rather after the Italian than the French manner, cut much lower behind the neck, for instance, than was the fashion at the French court; and treated as if for hair to curl, even with the smallest ripple, was a barbarous lapse from gentility.

He held a small hunting cap in his hand whose wild goose feather tickled little Nance’s bare arms as she clung to his sleeve; but what so attracted the child’s notice was a fresh white rose of rare beauty which he had pinned to his tightly-fitting embroidered collar. He smiled at Rhisiart over the little girl’s head now; and our friend, who was standing awkwardly before the bundle with his feet wide apart — exactly as they would have been had the chain been still there — was conscious of something about him that reminded him of the glimpse he’d had at Oxford of the Emperor Manuel.

“You must give me a red one in exchange,” said the Knight of St. John, tossing down his cap and unpinning the flower from his throat; and then, while little Nance frowned in bewilderment, he raised her chin with the tip of a finger and kissed her on the lips.

The child, having obtained her desired treasure, became so occupied with the task of fixing it to full effect upon her small person that the two men took the opportunity of opening the bundle; and before Nance had succeeded in discovering even the palest reflection of the white rose among the sinister objects in the room, our friend found himself, with the deft help of Tegolin’s messenger, dressed in a becoming black suit, with the professional velvet pouch suspended from his belt, of a well-to-do Student of Civil Law.

Drawing together the chairs left by the royal attendants the two men now fell into a friendly talk, and Rhisiart learned that it was from Constantinople that his new acquaintance's ancestors drew their paternal lineage.

"Tell me, Master Secretary, the young man enquired, delicately altering with a couple of pointed fingernails the outline of his smooth brown hair across his unwrinkled forehead, "what you think is going to be the end of this Welsh war. I was a lad when it began — is it five years ago? — but I begin to grow weary of it. It seems to me that all it does is to deprive both our nations of their bravest spirits, and to hasten our good King's end by rushing him about in these mad campaigns."

"That's what Owen's son, Meredith, thinks!" cried Rhisiart — delighted to find himself discussing state-affairs again with a person of the great world— "but you must remember that even if the war were brought to an end by a peace satisfactory to both sides, the trouble's certain to break forth again in another reign — I beg your pardon! — I mean under a different King of England."

"But what in your opinion," repeated Sir Palamedes, "would bring this unhappy struggle to a satisfactory close?"

Rhisiart gazed at the man's fantastical attire and at the mournful negligent brown eyes that were fixed upon him and a curious irritation seized him. What right had these elegant triflers — endearing though they were — to speak in this airy tone of matters that needed the experienced brains of the greatest statesmen? "Oh, if only," he thought, "I were back again in Harlech in the full confidence of our Prince."

Under his tangled locks his narrow face contracted into an intense faraway gaze, and the vision of an independent Wales with a well-directed chancery-court issuing orders to competent captains, compared with whom poor impetuous Rhys Gethin was a mere outlaw, flitted across his mind.

But the sallow oval face of the gentleman whose ancestors came from Constantinople wore such a mocking expression, and had by nature such wantonly-lifted eyebrows, that, as our friend caught the man's eye, everything came back to him. He became aware of the smell of mortality from the bed behind him. He remembered that he was to say goodbye to Tegolin. And with a spasm of pain that until now he had held at bay the price of his escape from the scaffold clutched at his heart.

Thus when his wife did come and, by the tact of the Knight of St. John who carried Nance and her rose away, he and she were left alone, he broke down completely.

"Don't, Rhisiart, don't, don't!" she cried, as he clung to her like a sobbing child, his head buried in her bosom. "Oh my only love," she murmured, her own eyes as dry as if all the fountains of tears had been drained away into that Worcester river, "don't, don't be like this! Rhisiart, Rhisiart, lift up your head and look at me! This may be — oh, we don't know when — and I want you to be — I want to look at you, Rhisiart!"

But he still went on sobbing. And he couldn't have told her why he sobbed, why he let himself go like this, or the indescribable relief it was! But it was as if the breasts he clung to had been the breasts that had nourished him as a child. To them his sobs told everything: told how he came to Wales on Griffin; told how he had planted his crusader's sword in the earth, how he had ridden between the spears and the bows, how he had served the Prince, how he had lost Catharine, how he had killed his only friend, how he ought never, never, never to have let her save him like this!

But he was wasting these unreturning moments. In the warmth of her breast he was forgetting everything, forgetting what he had to say, what she had to say, forgetting that it was the end, that it was the last time.

And the man who resembled the Emperor Manuel was already knocking at the door, and he hadn't even spoken to her, he hadn't even looked at her, and their time was over.

“Kiss me, Rhisiart”

Who had said that to him before?; and he hadn’t done it; and he didn’t do it now. He just clung to her, seeing only deep, lovely, infinite darkness, feeling only deep, sweet, infinite release.

But the knocking at the door had changed its character now. It had grown loud and violent. Captain Crosby had come himself, furious, relentless, impatient. Tegolin tore herself from him; thrust him back, for he had no strength left, into the chair that was full of his rags, and going over to the bed bent low down above it, and pressed her dry eyes and her cold mouth upon the face of the corpse. She did this on an impulse she couldn’t have explained. It was as though from the weakness and the unreality of life she turned for help to the strength and the reality of death. Life gives a fictitious warmth to the poor thin covering of a living skull; but when our lips touch the ice damp of a dead face we know by the feel of that skin, which we recognize now for the first time to be what it is, that this cast-off shell, this husk of matter, this puppet of shame, this moment of corruption, has no connection at all with the indestructible spirit we have lived with and have loved.

But it was, on this occasion, from what had perished, not from what survived, that Tegolin drew strength. She used the body of this heretic as priests used the relics of their saints.

“Rhisiart,” she said, coming back to him, collapsed upon his cast-off rags and breathing the long gasping breaths of a man who has sobbed his heart out, “Rhisiart, will — you — remember this?”

He gave her a desperate look out of his dark blurred eyes and formed his lips into a whispered consent.

But speaking quite quietly, almost as if she were speaking to herself, “I am going to the church by the East Gate now,” she said, “to pray for his soul. Whatever happens to us to the end of our lives, I want you to remember that you’re with me — alive or dead — and I’m with you. Will you remember this, Gwion Bach?”

This time he made his reply clear and distinct and in the Welsh tongue; and she, going to the door, with her head held high and without turning again, called to the men outside to enter.

XXI. DIFANCOLL

ONE WILD AUTUMN day towards the middle of November, in the year of Our Lord fourteen hundred and sixteen, the youthful parish-priest, newly appointed to the village of Corwen in the district of Edeyrnion, was seated in the commodious entrance-room of his school-house, occupied with his solitary pupil.

By an arrangement between the Bishop of St. Asaph and the Abbot of Valle Crucis the old ecclesiastical domicile attached to the Church of St. Sulien had been recently converted into a local College for the training of such lads of the neighbourhood as were anxious to enter the priesthood; but it had not been till the general amnesty proclaimed by the young King that these spiritual authorities had come to an agreement as to the most fitting candidate for the directorship of this new institution.

How far the Father they had finally appointed would be able to fulfil the chief requirement of the post — namely the recruiting for the Church of promising and clever pupils — remained still to be seen; for the boy he was at this moment teaching was his own ward-in-chancery, whom he had brought with him little more than a month ago when he took possession of the newly-erected “College.”

“You’ve forgotten what you promised, Father!” the boy in question was now protesting in an injured voice, as yet another page of the great illuminated volume before him was turned over.

“It’s you who’ve forgotten what I told you, Rhisiart,” said the other gently, laying his hand on the page to prevent the child’s closing it.

“That you painted this one, Father, like you did the last?”

The youthful priest smiled. “Well, I did, as it happens, paint this one too; but it wasn’t of that I was thinking. Don’t you remember what I told you about the great Doctor Pascentius, how he bequeathed this book to the Abbey on condition that I might use it? It was the Doctor on whose grave — what did I tell you, Rhisiart? — your godfather planted that cress.”

The boy’s eyes lit up with interest now. As long as the Father told him stories about the great Commentary he was quite happy. It was when he had to follow the book’s contents that life seemed to lose its savour.

“Wasn’t it he who made them open the castle gates,” cried the child eagerly, “when Owen cut off the head of Rhys Ddu of Cardigan?”

“Cut off his head? How can you say such things? Rhys Ddu lived till six years ago! He wasn’t taken till Owen’s last campaign; and you know when that was because I’ve often told you how old you were then.”

“How old was I?”

“Rhisiart! Think a little. I told you how to remember. It was when I took you to see old Glew the Gryd, who died in his sleep with his axe under his pillow.”

“I’ll be thirteen at the end of this month.”

“Well?”

“Seven! Seven! Seven!”

“That’s the lad! And when were you born?”

“I was born two years after the Great Comet,” repeated the boy in a dull mechanical voice, as if by constant repetition the words had lost all meaning for him. “My father was a brave English gentleman. My mother was a beautiful Welsh lady. I was born in wedlock. I’m an orphan of good family; and I’m the ward of Father Sulien. You weren’t christened Sulien, though!” he added in a more interested tone. “Your name was—”

But at that the Director of the College of Corwen closed the great Commentary himself; and did so with a display of emotion that overwhelmed the boy.

"If you ever say that again, Rhisiart—"

But it was clear from the tears in the lad's eyes, and the passionate quiver in his voice as he expressed his repentance, that a repetition of this lapse would be unintentional if it did occur.

Father Sulien softened at once. "My name in this earthly world died, Rhisiart dear. That's what you must say to yourself. And you must think of it as a secret between us. Do you see, my child? A deep secret."

The word "secret" caused the boy to snatch at his friend's hand and kiss it devotedly, as if sealing a memorable conspiracy.

"Is the man who said he was my godfather coming again today?" he asked, glancing first at the closed work on Saint Thomas, and then at the window.

The Head of the new College looked steadily at his only pupil. "They're all coming today," he said gravely, "and this time you must be a real gentleman and as polite to Lord Talbot and to Meredith ab Owen as you were to Master Rhisiart."

"Can Lord Talbot and Meredith ab Owen talk Latin like my godfather?"

"They've no need to, little son. Talbot's a soldier of the King, and Meredith ab Owen is on the King's business. Your godfather's a great Doctor of Law. It's his profession to talk Latin."

"He can write Latin too, when he wants to, as easily as Welsh or English!"

Father Sulien sighed. It was one of his constant humiliations that in their lessons together he found this writing of Latin almost as difficult as his pupil did.

A priest's life had many advantages over a herald's, but it had its disadvantages too; and one of the worst of these was the Church's mania for Latin.

"Master Rhisiart's the cleverest man in Wales and Scotland and France!" declared that gentleman's namesake roundly.

The Father made no attempt to deny this; but as if anxious that proficiency in Latin shouldn't retain the sole place of honour in his pupil's mind he asked him if he'd remembered during Mass to pray for Iago ap Cynan, the famous sailor, whose ship, following the traditional direction taken by Prince Madoc, hadn't been heard of since the spring.

"I can see you forgot, lad;" and he added sadly, thinking how foolish it was to try to convey to another human creature all those imponderable touches and colours and lights and shadows that go to make up a living person we ourselves have loved: "It was Iago who brought me that icon from Cyprus which I have above my bed."

Rhisiart made no comment upon this. He had come to know too well the particular vistas of memory that made the Father sad, and he had learnt caution. "Shall I go and see if there's anybody in the church?" he asked a moment later.

The ex-herald's mind came back to Corwen with a jerk, came back to it from a castle-turret overlooking the sea, where its owner was pensively rocking an infant's cradle with a baby girl in it, a girl whose features were the living image of Iago ap Cynan.

"Yes, yes! Run off and count them, lad! If there are more than half a dozen we'll chant the office in the Lady chapel."

He stood at the window, watching the boy thread his way through the graves till he reached the cross on the Druid Stone. "There!" he said to himself. “That’s what he always does! And I’ve told him a hundred times to wait till he’s in the church!”

The slender little figure had indeed paused at the great circular stone and had gravely dipped his fingers in one of its hollows and had touched his forehead with the rainwater it contained.

“What makes him do that?” thought the Father, as he watched the boy disappear into the church. “Children are funny creatures. You can’t tell what they get into their heads.”

But the boy came flying back in great excitement to say that there were several English soldiers in the church. “And all Mother Mali’s maids from the Inn are there too, and Mistress Gwerfil’s there, and Sir Hugo’s man from Gwerclas. I say, Father, you don’t think it’s possible there’s any news of him — to bring such a crowd?”

The priest shook his head. “I should have heard, sonny — I should have heard. If Meredith ab Owen knew anything I should have heard yesterday. You don’t think he’d let Talbot’s men find him before his own son, do you?”

Rhisiart bowed to the wisdom of his superior; but in his own heart he thought: “If the Father would only let me do what I want, I’d be the one to find him!”

But neither the priest nor his pupil, when their psalms were said and their talk with the Inn maids and with Mistress Gwerfil and with the man from Gwerclas was over, had found out any new clue to the hiding-place of the lost hero.

“In my opinion,” the man from Gwerclas had dogmatically announced, “he’s not in the north at all. And Sir Hugo agrees with me. Sir Hugo thinks he’s hidden in the Forests of Tywyn, where the foresters and swineherds were always loyal to him.”

"He's with Lady Scudamore in Herefordshire," affirmed Mistress Gwerfil. "There are no two opinions about it. That's why he married his girls off as he did — every one of them to some great English lord!"

Talbot's soldiers declared that he'd been dead and buried for four years. One of them went so far as to declare that he'd seen his grave in Bangor Cathedral.

It was only Mistress Mali's maids — Myfanwy Goch and Mair Wen — who dared to uphold the view of the common folk of Edeyrnion in the presence of all these competent authorities, the view that Owen ap Griffith Fychan was playing chess with King Arthur in the heart of Mynydd-y-Gaer. The girls first only giggled when Sir Hugo's man rallied them on this wild fancy; but upon being ordered by Mistress Mali to tell Mistress Gwerfil what they'd told her, they declared that they'd picked up a white knight and a red knight in a cornfield at the foot of Mynydd-y-Gaer.

There was such rude hilarity among Talbot's soldiers at this substantial evidence that Father Sulien gave his blessing to the ladies and led Rhisiart away; but the little boy was so bitterly reluctant to leave such an exciting discussion that the gentle-hearted priest suggested that since his visitors weren't expected till the evening they should then and there ascend the famous hill themselves. "We shan't find any chessmen, I'm afraid," he said. "But we may see the beacon fire on Bryn Saith Marchog. Do you remember why they always light a bonfire there at this season?"

But Rhisiart refused to search his brain at that moment for anything so remote as the Seven Horsemen.

The priest had to return to the "College" to change his clothes; and while dutifully helping him in this process the boy suddenly dropped the garment he was holding and stared at a carved chest by the side of the fireplace in a self-forgetting reverie.

"What is it, lad?"

"You know what you said you'd do next time we went up Mynydd-y-Gaer?"

Father Sulien followed the boy's gaze. "I know — I know!" he replied with obvious distress. "I've been thinking of that myself. It certainly is the place for reading it. It's a great, great secret: and you ought to open it far away from everybody. I wish the Hermit still lived up there so that we could open it in his cell."

Rhisiart's eyes flashed. "The — Hermit — does — live — there — still," he whispered solemnly.

Father Sulien stared at him in amazement, one arm thrust into his priest's under-coat, and the other hanging loose in his white shirt. "What's that you're saying?"

"He does live there still!"

The Head of the new College hurriedly finished dressing. Then, all prepared for their walk, he looked round for his house key, found it, together with a stout staff, which latter however he laid down as soon as he'd taken it up, and moving to the chest at which Rhisiart had been staring, removed from above it several parchment scripts, and proceeded to lift its heavy lid.

Rhisiart had an opportunity now of showing both his breeding and his training. He took full advantage of it. He remained absolutely motionless; displaying no curiosity as to the contents of the receptacle his guardian was ransacking, making no attempt to approach it, no sound to interrupt its exploration.

At last the priest turned to him, holding up a small leather case. "I oughtn't to have left it there," he said, "with the lid unlocked. Think if robbers had got in! But there it is. It's yours now. May I keep it for you till we're at the top of Mynydd-y-Gaer?"

The boy was too excited to utter a word. He nodded gravely, staring at the priest as he carefully concealed the leather object in an inner pocket. The word "robbers" had had an electric effect on him and had caused so many thrilling images to rush through his brain that his curiosity about the contents of the case receded for a time.

For some reason the occasion seemed a suitable one for asking a question that had been on the tip of his tongue ever since they'd come to the College.

"The last Corwen priest," he remarked, "was a Father Sulien, too. How was that?"

His friend smiled and drew a deep breath. "But I must find out," he said to himself, "how he knew about the Hermit."

"Whose church is it?" he enquired of the boy.

"St. Sulien's."

"Well then, what better name could any priest have?"

"For luck?"

"For luck — if you like, little son. But now I've answered your question, won't you tell me how you knew that the Gaer Hermit was still there?"

"Myfanwy told me — but I knew before that!"

The Father wisely decided that this wasn't the moment for disparaging the talk of Mistress Mali's maids.

"Before that? Dewi Sant! And what other fairy told you?"

The boy frowned. "Nobody told me," he said. "I can see his fire up there, from the top of Pen-y-Pigyn."

Once again the Father showed a discretion belonging rather to the court than the cloister; and he asked no question as to how it was that his ward should be exploring the rocky eminence above the village at an hour when it was dark enough to perceive a fire across the valley.

"Well — off we go!" he said; and then, glancing at the slender figure before him: "Get your leather jacket," he commanded. "It'll be chilly up there."

Rhisiart scowled, and used under his breath an improper expression, learned this time not from Myfanwy but from Mistress Mali herself. But he went off to their sleeping-room at the back of the College, and soon returned, sulkily pulling on the detested garment.

"When did Meredith ab Owen and Master Rhisiart say they'd come tonight?" the priest asked his companion as they crossed the wooden bridge over the swollen Dee. "After dark, Father."

"That's what I thought. I asked to make sure."

"And my godfather said you weren't to keep dinner for them, because they would leave their horses and have their dinner at the forester's house in Carrog."

But the Director of the College was still uneasy. "What if they come earlier than they said, and find the place locked?"

"They'll go to the inn, like they did last time. My godfather" — this was added with profound complacency— "drinks five beakers of Malmsey before he gets drunk."

"There's not much that goes on at the Inn, young man," thought Father Sulien, "that you don't know!"

Their path became steeper after crossing the river; and burdened by his winter coat the little boy began to flag. To distract him from the effort he was making, our friend the ex-herald — who well knew how exhausted the body can get when the spirit has gone too far ahead — plunged without preface into one of his interminable tales of the recent war.

“The question was, of course, how long we could hold out after the meat was gone. But Aberystwyth is as strong as Harlech. Its walls, lad — aye! aye! you should see how thick they are! And you must remember, child, Prince Henry had the Duke of York with him, as well as such captains as Talbot, Carew, Audley, and Grendor. Yes, and there was Sir John Oldcastle, too! But they could do nothing, for all their cannonading, but starve us out. Oh yes! I forgot about their getting the Chancellor of Oxford University. It was he, really — Courtenay was his name — who thought of the terms of the truce. We were to have a six weeks’ armistice; and then Owen was to have a week; the last week in October it was, and weather just like this! He was in the north, they say, somewhere round here, in Edeyrnion. And if he didn’t come in that week’s time, we were to give up the castle and do homage to—”

“You’ve forgotten about Rhys Ddu!”

How well the boy knew every word of this tale! He must have heard it so often that it had become his; but it was clear it didn’t come to life for him, didn’t take on flesh and blood for him, unless the Father related it. Only it must be related without the least change! It must be a reality independent of the relater and not to be tampered with by any human agency.

Father Sulien admitted that he’d reached the point in the story where a description of the strength and courage of Rhys the Black was called for. But he forgot that he’d never explained to the boy that when Chancellor Young, Owen’s Bishop of Bangor, sailed for France in the company of John Hanmer — and as far as he knew they were still in Paris after all these years — Rhys Ddu of Ceredigion had no one to counsel him; and if anyone had ever needed wise advice it was this brave but short-sighted warrior!

Rhisiart knew everything about Rhys the Black. He knew the particular way a single lock of hair fell across his forehead; he knew the rough, abrupt, careless manner of his speech; he knew the tears that would always come into his eyes when he spoke of “little Lu”; for our friend Elphin, for all his priestly anonymity, had remained an artist in verbal draftsmanship. The one thing his guardian had never disclosed to him before was the warrior’s helplessness when Owen’s Chancellor sailed for France.

This addition to the story was at once a painful shock to Rhisiart and a thrilling vista of new conceptions. The boy began to look so white, and so hot in his leather coat, that Father Sulien, who was quick as a woman in his perception of such things, made him sit on a mossy stone to rest, while he himself, leaning over the wall at his side, surveyed the undulating landscape below them.

“Owen had substituted Master Young for Master Byford as Bishop of Bangor,” he explained wearily, as his eye followed the recession of bare, round, grassy hills that flanked the entrance to the Vale of Clwyd. “But the Holy Father soon afterwards appointed a man of his own choice, a simple parish priest like me, whose name was Benedict Nicholls. He was the priest of a village in Dorset no bigger than Corwen — Stourbridge it was, or Stalbridge — and he proved in many ways a better—”

But whatever the Rector of Stalbridge may have proved in the registry of Bangor he proved infinitely wearisome to the small figure seated on the stone.

“Go on,” he interrupted, “to when you were eating dogs’ flesh, and to when the English were feasting over their fires, and when you heard them singing The Rose of Northumberland, and to when it was beginning to get dark, and to when you heard Owen’s trumpets far away in the woods and saw his men come rushing down from the mountains, and to when he swore he would cut off Rhys Ddu’s head if you didn’t open the gates, and to when the English marched off when they knew he had come, and to when you had meat and wine again, and to when Owen was — why are you laughing at me, Father?"

"I'm not laughing, my son."

"Why are you screwing up your mouth like that then?"

"I was thinking, Rhisiart."

"What about, Father?"

"Just thinking — that's all."

"I know what it was! It was about Owen's other castle being taken. Why don't you ever tell me more about that?"

The once youngest of court heralds certainly looked at that moment the saddest of parish-priests. Scene after tragic scene flashed with piteous rapidity through his mind as the child's figure melted under his fixed stare. He saw the wasted form of Sir Edmund and his hollow eyes, as he lay dying in his turret, looking over the English camp, over the English ships, to that far-off horizon of the sea, where the Birds of Rhiannon had sunk into silence forever. He heard the voice of the Arglwyddes weeping and refusing to be comforted. He saw the calm tragic eyes of Lady Mortimer, as she gave up to his care this same little boy whose form in his leather-coat was now the mirror of all this.

He saw the tender-hearted captain from Taunton who had sworn by Saint Mary of Glastonbury that he would save Luned and her child. He saw the looks of excited pleasure — yes! actually of pleasure — with which Mistress Brut of Lyde greeted the besiegers.

He was standing with the little Rhisiart outside the walls on that terrible day, wrapped in a cloak to hide the "lions rampant" on his tunic, when he saw what looked like the body of a large doll fall from the ramparts upon the rocks beyond him. He daren't attract notice by making a move at once from the buttress that concealed him, but he knew in his heart what had happened. Many a time had he heard Mistress Sibli swear in her wild fits that no English soldier should touch the true love of Rhisiart ab Owen; and later, when he did examine the dwarf's corpse he found that her tiny body, under her clothes, was wound about with parchments bearing Rhisiart's script.

While these memories were racing through Father Sulien's brain, his pupil had risen to his feet.

"There, there!" the boy now cried in a shrill voice. "Do you see, Father? There's his fire!"

The young priest looked in the direction indicated. Yes! In the autumn greyness there certainly was — rising unmistakeably from the crest of Mynydd-y-Gaer under the great prehistoric wall — a thin wisp of smoke.

The wild hope rushed through the ex-herald's heart that it might be his destiny and none other's, led by the instinct of the man's own grandson, to discover the lost hero! He snatched up his stick, took the boy's hand in his excitement and led the way, with rapid youthful steps, up the steep face of the aboriginal mygedorth, or fortress.

They climbed so fast, and both their hearts were beating so fast, that their first vision of the Hermit's fire, and of what else was there, was a blurred and confused one.

"There are two Hermits!" cried the boy. "No! only one — no! It's not a man at all — look, Father! It's only a rock!"

There was no need to conjure Father Sulien to look. His very soul was in his eyes. Was it a rock? It was rounder, smoother, less jagged, than any part of that ruined wall he had ever seen up there. But there certainly was a fire; and it was against red flames in that grey mist and greyer masonry that the round stone, so like a human head, projected.

If it was the Hermit, he must be seated with his back to them facing the fire. Whether rock or man, the figure they were approaching wasn't only motionless, it was very upright. How could a living man, even a man about whom such awestruck rumours had been circulating through all Edeyrnion, have a head like a great smooth, round granite ball, balanced on a pedestal?

But Rhisiart suddenly jerked at his friend's hand; and not content with that, tugged at his arm till he got the priest's head low enough — in spite of the gusts of wind that seemed to be sweeping round the Gaer like supernatural sentries — to be able to whisper in his ear.

"It's the Hermit!" he whispered. "It is, it is! I know by his bald head. Myfanwy told me about his head. It's as bald as a stone!"

The Hermit must have been deaf as well as bald; for he permitted the intruders to approach so near that they were compelled for very reverence to stand as motionless as he was sitting.

But Father Sulien felt ashamed to be caught spying upon a holy man; and incontinently he lifted up his voice. "The Lord be with thee!" he cried above the whistling of the wind.

"And with thy spirit," answered the figure at the fire, rising to his feet and facing them.

Rhisiart's fingers tightened upon the hand he held. Myfanwy had never told him that the Hermit was a giant! As for Father Sulien he felt like one to whom it is permitted to be present at the Resurrection from the Dead.

Edeyrnion was his native district and Powys Fadog his tribal talaith, or province. His ancestral home, the Gruc, or "the Mound", was even now facing the risen Hermit across the valley; but twenty years had passed since he had served the Arglwyddes at Glyndyfrdwy and he was now a stranger in the place. As preceptor of the newly-established College he held a position that repelled local confidence and gossip.

It flashed through his mind now: "I'm the one single man in Corwen who didn't know that you were the Hermit!"

"Mother of God!" cried the giant limping towards them. And to Rhisiart's complete astonishment, there was the holy man hugging and kissing the priest!

"It's little Elphin turned monk! It's our baby herald turned shaveling!"

"Master Broch, oh, Master Broch!" and the young preceptor's cheeks under the Hermit's kisses grew wet and hot. "Who — would — have — thought," he panted, as all the old days rushed back under this overpowering hug, "that we should — meet — here?"

While the two men were thus greeting each other, Rhisiart was aware of a desire to sink into the earth. He was used to being corrected; he was used to being punished but he had never before, in all his experience of life, been ignored. But as he surveyed the slender form of Father Sulien almost disappearing in the huge embrace of this Cawr-y-Gaer, this giant of the prehistoric mygedorth, it was precisely to this condition it was now his destiny to come. He was ignored to such a tune that he became non-existent. Where a minute or two ago two persons had been spying upon a third person there were only two persons left; and he, the centre person, wasn't one of them.

His short upper-lip, drawn back a little from his teeth in the true Mortimer manner, quivered violently.

Faint memories of the bald giant began to slide back into his own mind; but they were too vague to restore him to his self-respect; and in any case, between the shaven head and the bald head, one had totally forgotten him and the other considered him as nothing. Hurt to the heart, the little boy shut his eyes and endeavoured to call up the narrow face and hooked nose of his godfather. To him at least, he would always exist. No apparition from the dead would make his godfather forget him.

“Didn’t I see someone with you just now, Master Broch?” asked Father Sulien as they seated themselves by the fire and the Gaer Giant began pouring out wine into leaden mugs to warm and balancing a row of Spanish chestnuts on a half-burnt furze-root.

Broch chuckled. “Quick as ever with your eyes, Father Elphin! Yes, you did; and if our little master here would run away as far as that firwood and back, I’d tell ‘ee of somebody of whom many in these old islands would give—”

He had no need to finish the sentence. With burning tears in his eyes and without a glance at his guardian, Rhisiart scampered off, the flaps of his leather coat, which he had unlaced in the heat of the fire, flying behind him as he ran. When he came to the firwood he found it enclosed by a high fence; but by the simple method of removing his coat and leaving it on the larch needles that strewed the moss beneath this barrier, he was able to force himself between its planks.

Then, scrambling to his feet, he began pushing his way deep among the brown larches and the green pines, the latter scratching his face and hands, and the former leaving their needles in the creases of his tunic and even between his shirt and his skin.

At last he came to an open space in the wood where there was a great pile of loose stones. Even in the midst of his desolation and his outraged feelings he noticed that these stones had recently been moved; and it vaguely crossed his mind that it was odd that people should have been moving stones in the middle of a thick coppice.

But he was too young and too unhappy to give the phenomenon more than a passing glance, though what he saw might well have struck a boy’s mind as the sort of attempt to build a primitive “home” among the fir trees that a boy playing at being a hunted outlaw might with some difficulty and some industry have succeeded in constructing.

But what attracted his attention much more than this erection of stones was a clump of funguses growing on the northerly side of the enclosure. To these he now directed his steps; and falling down on his knees set himself to inhale their curious smell.

To do this was a more significant impulse of that small wounded heart than Father Sulien could possibly have understood. One of the things that the boy remembered most vividly of his childhood was a certain occasion when playing outside Harlech walls Lady Mortimer had scolded him for smelling funguses. He had vigorously protested; and during their altercation the Prince himself had approached and had expostulated with his daughter, justifying his grandson’s queer caprice.

The peculiar smell of funguses — especially the kind that grow under fir trees — always brought back this scene. He could see even now, as he scrabbled on his knees at the task of clearing away the larch-needles from these damp strange-smelling stalks, his grandfather’s forked beard and the band of gold round his forehead and the black lions on his breast-plate.

The Prince had launched out, in justification of his interference, into the tale of Gwydion the son of Don, and how by magic and sorcery, by hud and lledrith, this terrifying enchanter, whose memory still clings to the Milky Way above our heads and the wildest oracles of Taliesin under our feet, not only carried off the pigs of Annwn, but by his transformings of sea-sedge and fungus deceived and slew the mighty son of Annwn’s king.

The child never forgot the deep pity in the great man’s voice as he spoke of the victory of the magician from the north; and the smell of these particular funguses had become a secret passion with him ever since that day. It was almost as if, in his childish fashion, he dimly realized that everything in life is a symbol of the unseen and that the smell of funguses as much as anything else could be a writing on the wall.

"They sent me away," his heart kept repeating, as his face touched those chilly phantom-heads that were like things fallen from the moon. "They sent me away. I'm nothing to them. I'm nothing to anybody. They've sent me away."

He uttered this last lament aloud; and for a second he thought that some tremendous echo had caught up his moan and was repeating it, and the strange thing was that when he lifted his head and saw the tall tottering figure coming out of the wood towards him the remembered feelings of the child merged so completely into the present feelings of the boy that all fear, all amazement even, was swallowed up. A vast indescribable sense of refuge, of escape, of sanctuary, lifted him up and drew him forward; and long before he was in the Prince's arms his tears of desolation had been transformed, as if Gwydion's magic had been undone, as if the cold snouts of the recovered herds were all about him, as if the lost hero were alive again, into the sobs of one who out of a long darkness finds himself on the threshold of his home.

"They've sent me away," his grandfather repeated as he hugged Catharine's first-born to his heart. "They've sent both of us away; they've sent us all away."

Rhisiart could feel the old man's heart beating under Iolo Goch's chain-armour. But it was enough for him to catch the faint scent, bringing back all his childhood with it, like some far-flung aromatic incense, of the white beard that tickled his face; and he gave no heed to the murmured words that followed: "But — we — shall — all — come back — again."

Snow-white was the man's hair, for the Prince had endured so much and had wandered so far that he was prematurely old, but he had reverted to his former scrupulous tending of his person, and the forked beard was as meticulously trimmed as it used to be sixteen years ago, and the golden circlet round his forehead looked just as it had looked in the patriarchal days at Glyndyfrdwy, only the curls that fell around it were white instead of yellow.

Owen was bare-headed; and he wore the leather tunic, the leather belt, the leather bands twisted about his legs, of any ordinary farmworker; but the contrast between this simple rustic attire and the man's majestical lineaments enhanced his air of primeval dignity.

It may be imagined how tightly, as the Prince tottered slowly back to the men they had left, Rhisiart clung to his hand! The little boy had no fear that his grandfather would fail to take his part, whatever reception he got. It wasn't for that he clung to him. It was because he was home again, home with his lost parents. It was because he had got back his pride, his self-respect, his rightful place in the great, callous, hostile world.

"I mustn't call him grandfather," he was saying to himself, as the old man led him through a gate in the fence he had missed in his flight and told him to pick up his discarded jacket. "I must call him Sire."

"Sire!" he therefore began, and his voice had the proud confidence of one who is certain of the gravest attention. "Where hast thou" — he said "thou" rather than "you" from an instinct that the more formal pronoun went better with "Sire"— "been hiding from thy people all these years?"

Owen paused and leant heavily on the long shepherd's crook he was using as a staff. It was still light enough for him to see the child's features. "He's more like him than her," he thought. "Catharine's voice in a Mortimer body. 'Thy people' is Sir Edmund all over! She would have said 'from us.'

’Twas the Norman in him gave it that legal touch. He’s Rhisiart’s godson right enough!”

“Art thou the Hermit Myfanwy said lived in Mynydd-y-Gaer? Or is the bald giant the Hermit — Sire?”

The old man stroked the forks of his beard as he would have done twenty years ago. His infirmities had been so heavy on him of late that he rarely smiled; but he did smile now.

“Broch and I are both hermits, Rhisiart. But look, child! Do you see that?” As he spoke he pointed with his crook to a just perceptible curvature in the grass, like a magnified mole-run; only this particular ridge was covered with grass.

“I see it, Sire!”

“And you saw those stones in the wood?”

“Yes, Sire.”

He gazed at the boy intently, and as he did so a delicious shiver ran through Rhisiart’s veins. “It’s the secret! It’s the secret!” his heart cried. “He knows I can keep secrets!”

“Well,” murmured the old man hesitating; and it was almost as if he were thinking aloud. “I’ll be gone before winter, as far as I can go” — and Rhisiart thought he had never seen such a strange look in anybody’s face as his Prince had then— “and my son says Elliw can never have a child. It breaks the family law to tell you, little one, the law that’s come down among us ym Mhowys since Brochfael ab Eliseg, but I’m dying, and you’re my child’s son, and so I’ll tell you; and let it be on my own head. You must know that there are three hiding-places of our race that are indestructible and undiscoverable. One is under the mound at Glyndyfrdwy. One is under this fortress. And one is at Mathrafal. There were secret passages too; but most of these have fallen in and been lost. All these hiding-places and all these passages were dug by the ancient people conquered by Cunedda. Those ancient men were cunning in such digging, for they lived in underground dwellings. Iolo once told me — you've read his poems, I hope, Rhisiart? — that there was an entrance once to such a passage at Mathrafal but that when King John—"

"Mathrafal, Sire? Where is Mathrafal?" Now if Rhisiart ab Edmund was good at keeping secrets his power of discovering them was sorely limited by his years.

Here was a secret that he never found out to the end of his days — namely, that his grandfather's heart received a dagger's stab when he learnt that Catharine's first-born had never so much as heard of the royal Llys of his ancestors!

"Have you heard of the Halls of Cynddylan?" he enquired, not without an undertone of sad bitterness.

Rhisiart hastened to recite at random from the famous elegy in his best choirboy's voice. "Ystafell," he chanted; and he made a little stiff movement to illustrate abandonment to hopeless grief. This he did by lifting one thin arm till it was bent at right angles at the elbow; and at that point sawing the air with his hand, while his small fingers remained stiffly outstretched like the indignant claws of a cat when it has wetted its paw; "Ystafell Cynddylan" he intoned, exactly as the children in the monk's school at Valle Crucis were taught to chant.

"Ystafell Cynddylan," answered the echo; while the sound of his boyish voice went drifting down the valley, following the scanty wisps of smoke from the Hermit's fire, following the forlorn deciduous leaves as they were blown across the larches, following the tattered banners of the mist as they streamed over the twenty-thousand-years-old masonry of Mynydd-y-Gaer, carrying the dirge, "It is darkness to-night"— "Ys tywyll heno!" — carrying the undulant dirge for the children of Cyndrwyn— “for Cynan and Gwion and Gwyn” — over church, over college, over cross, over rain-soaked meadows, till it sank into the flowing of the dark water of Dyfrdwy, the divine water, where it disturbed the yellow-bellied salmon as they rested in the shallows, and troubled the white-breasted ouzels as they drooped their wings at the roots of the alders.

The effect of his grandson’s voice upon the old man — so young a voice and so sad a burden — was to make him murmur into his beard the dead-leaf moan of Llywarch Hen; but, digging his crook into the earth and leaning on Rhisiart’s shoulder, he shuffled on, and they were soon in the warmth of Broch’s furze-stalk fire.

“Room for Owen ap Griffith and Rhisiart ab Edmund!” laughed the giant. “Did you find each other where I predicted you would?”

But it was clear to the boy that Father Sulien was too shocked by the Prince’s state to join in any jest. He poured out wine for him at once, and both Broch and he made the old man as comfortable as they could, with his back against the foundations of some prehistoric guard-room, and the dead bracken piled up beneath him and about him.

But his comfort was short-lived, for the wine as it quickened his pulses brought on a horrible fit of coughing; which when once it had started seemed as if it would kill him before it ended.

When it did at last end, and the old Prince sank back exhausted against the wall, he began, in spite of the roaring bonfire before him, to shiver so pitiably with cold that Broch hurrying into his “hermit’s cave,” which was really the entrance to the secret passage of Cunedda’s mound-dwelling captives, brought out several Moorish rugs and also brought his Prince a flask of spirits so fiery that Owen choked and spluttered as he swallowed.

"How heavy these stones are!" cried Father Sulien presently, anxious to turn away their thoughts from topics gloomier and heavier than palaeolithic masonry.

As he spoke he made the gesture of weighing in his hand one of the smaller and rounder of the rain-washed pebbles about them. "Dewi Sant" he cried, "but it's as heavy as a thunderbolt!" This comparison of the Gaer-men's masonry to thunderbolts was highly agreeable to Rhisiart's mind; and sitting on his jacket instead of putting it on, for Broch's great bonfire warmed him through and through, he began throwing these meteoric objects into the blaze, an occupation that so absorbed him that the men fell to conversing together as if his presence were no more palpable than a small phantom-shape risen out of the mound-dwellers' passage behind them.

The giant's fiery cordial, whatever it may have been, soon loosened the old man's tongue, and the ex-herald, who asked questions that in former days he would never have dared to breathe to the wearer of four black lions rampant, listened to strange matters.

"How long, Sire, did you hold Davy Gam a prisoner?" was one of the least bold of these eager enquiries.

"Prisoner do you say, boy? Prisoner? Why I've never — No, my old friend" — this was to Broch who looked not a little uncomfortable— "I've never had a more faithful and devoted adherent!"

"But I heard he'd been ransomed, Sire, for two thousand marks!"

The great white head with the golden band amid its fleecy locks lifted itself erect with a leonine gesture. The old chieftain was clearly as proud of this singular prisoner's behaviour as of any triumph in his whole life. "You heard correctly, boy; you heard correctly. The worth of those marks — two thousand as you say — was brought to us in current coins of the realm of England and the realm of Castille, together with certain moneys of the Royaume de France."

"This was before he went to the French wars?"

"Naturally, boy, naturally. But look ye! This is the point; and I can only say it shows what can go on between two Welshmen when they're hunted like the Twrch Trwyth from one end of Wales to the other. Gam was ransomed, you say; and correctly you say it. He was ransomed. Those who brought it saw him lay it at my feet and saw him armed, unshackled, and free. But would the man leave me? No, my boy; no, my little priest. He wouldn't leave me! We used that money to hire safe and trustworthy labourers to open up the passage here. We worked at it for years, I tell you! Gam was as strong as a bear. I was strong myself then; and we had good faithful men to work for us. Some of them died in grievous pains rather than betray to these new Lords of Chirk and Ruthin and Castell Goch what we were about or who we were.

"There have been many staunch Edeyrnion farmers — yes! and many honest craftsmen too in Corwen and Carrog and Bonwm — who knew our hiding-place. Do'ee think one of them betrayed us? Not a one, my pretty boy-father, not a one! The story of Glyn Dŵr will be a story for all the Welshmen who come afterwards — to the end of time! And in no other land in the wide world save Wales could it have happened. That's what we Welshmen are! They may conquer us in arms, they may outwit us in trade, they may out-mode us in fashions of science and art. One thing they cannot do. They cannot catch our souls!"

"Sire!"

It was the shrill voice of little Rhisiart. The child had ceased for some time throwing thunderbolts into the fire; and now with his impassioned eyes fixed on his grandfather's face the secret of his swelling heart burst forth.

"If I say I won't do homage to King Harry, shall I be killed for the sake of Wales? I want to be killed for the sake of Wales!"

The Prince turned to Father Sulien. "Does he know who he is?"

Our priestly friend hesitated, glancing from the excitable old man to the excitable little boy with some apprehension.

"Do you know who you are?" he said at last in a low nervous voice.

A crafty look, more characteristic of Rhisiart ab Owen than of either Catharine or Sir Edmund, came into the boy's face.

"Will you read to the Prince," he said, addressing his tutor, "that letter you've got in the leather case?"

Though our ex-herald was not possessed of an exceptionally penetrating mind he gave his pupil a quick startled look. "He's opened that chest and read that letter!" he said to himself; and then as a second thought, "but after all it's his own property and she's dead now!"

Glyn Dŵr leaned forward with an expression of intense interest in his sunken sea-green eyes. "Read it, Elphin — Father Sulien, I mean. Is it from her? Is it from Lady Mortimer?"

"It's from my mother to me!" cried the little boy, leaping to his feet and standing by his tutor's elbow. His face gleamed with pride; and he glanced at the old Prince with a look of exultant complicity. His heart was bursting with indefinable emotion. He felt as though the words of this message from the dead isolated them from the others and bound them together forever.

The bald-headed giant stared unheeding at the wide landscape spread out before him. It had long ago become a necessity for him to detach himself from the old man's turbulent and multifarious moods; and this vast autumnal expanse of rolling hills, sweeping away in one direction towards Cadair Idris, and in the other towards Snowdon, and narrowing itself in the immediate vicinity, eastward to the valley of the Dee, and westward to the valley of the Clwyd, was just then peculiarly adapted to his habitual train of thought.

The blaze of their bonfire had created a circle of light and warmth in the midst of a segment of the earth's surface which at that hour seemed to be reverting to what it must have been when the old inhabitants of Mynydd-y-Gaer gazed across it, thousands upon thousands of years ago! Reverting, so it seemed to Broch, in his strange yearning for the impersonal, for the non-human, to the primal supremacy of the grey slate, so unique among terrestrial formations, that familiar landscape had become during the early weeks of this sad November intensely congenial to his mind. He liked the way the grey rocks alternated with the patches of pale stubble and red bracken. He liked the way the whole landscape seemed to converge at this season towards some austere rock-bound ideal of its own secret engendering. It gave him a grim pleasure to see the rounded grassy hills forming themselves, as they rose above the leafless tree-tops, into vast terraces of green stepping-stones, along which the majestical spirits of the past might move in tremendous procession towards the far-off mountain-peaks, where not only trees and grass would be left behind but all the turbulent human lives as well; lives that sought their nourishment and contended for their feverish masteries among the sheep and the cattle and the horses and the swine that fed upon the fatness of these less purified places.

It was only by moving a little distance out of the blaze that Broch was able just then to satisfy his insatiable longing for the calm of the inanimate; but when he did manage to get the fire-light out of his eyes he was rewarded by a cold deathly chill that came up the slopes of Mynydd-y-Gaer from the flooded river below and as it came precipitated itself into a clammy vapour that settled on his naked skull in minute drops, each drop a perfect microcosm of all that desolate and dehumanized world, of wet mists upon grey rocks, towards which his spirit yearned.

Meanwhile the Prince was listening to his daughter's letter. "To my grately loafed leetle boy," began Father Sulien in his resonant heraldic voice; and though a furious protest surged up in the old man's heart against this emphasis upon Catharine's lack of scholarship, it was so precious to him to hear the actual words she had set down that he restrained himself from interrupting.

As for Rhisiart, his original surprise that his mother should be less skilful than himself in the difficult art of writing had long ago been dulled by familiarity. Like the elder Rhisiart on the bloody field of Bryn Glas with a similar document he knew every syllable of this production so completely by heart that he had come to take its peculiarities for granted, very much as a lost fledgeling might take for granted some familiar hoarseness in its parent bird's distracted call.

"Thy father died by Our Lady's Mercy before our fall, which cannot be far off: or send his blessing he would. Be honour; be courage; me leetle boy; say thy prayers to thy Mother in Heaven and remember gentilhomme Toujours. Writ by me very hand in Castell Harlech. Trust God his Mother — C. M."

Father Sulien preserved a double professional aplomb while he read this letter, the aplomb of a court-herald and the aplomb of a parish priest; but the instant he concluded his task both these complacences fell away and he became once more the shy and sensitive youth with whom our friend Rhisiart had flirted when he first arrived at Glyndyfrdwy. And it was doubtless this relapse into the diffidence of a pageboy that suddenly made him unable to look at the aged Prince. But there is nothing like extreme physical suffering for the mitigation of the emotionally poignant; and the Prince had been afflicted of late by increasingly acute spasms of pain.

By a devotion of the commonalty of those parts unparalleled in the history of nations Glyn Dŵr’s incognito, if such it could be called, which was a secret only to his foes, had been scrupulously respected since he returned, for the last five years of his life, to his Powys-Fadog patrimony. The element of the supernatural, or, let us say, of popular terror of the supernatural, had doubtless played its part in this miracle of concealment; but without the man’s own incredible vitality the thing would have been impossible. It would have been impossible too if the Prince hadn’t from his earliest manhood made a cult of those queer fits or trances which Rhisiart used to all his “attacks”.

These he had developed to such a point during his years of difancoll, or “disappearance,” that neither Gam nor Broch had any compunction about leaving him, when such was their wisest move, in a condition to all appearance like that of a dead man, in the mound-dwellers’ hiding place beneath the mystic walls of Mynydd-y-Gaer. The danger that any enemy might light upon him in these prolonged trances had been reduced to a minimum by the traditions of the supernatural which surrounded this prehistoric camp.

No doubt even this accumulation of conspiring elements would have been insufficient to guard against the invasion of his Merlin-like esplumoir, if he hadn’t been the man he was; that is, if he hadn’t been one of those singular persons who appear only at rare intervals in our human tribes, and then only among those that have clung to the same foothold upon the surface of our planet from time immemorial.

Broch-o’-Meifod’s disconcerting wife had upbraided Owen as a “pure-blooded Brython”, and this may have been a legitimate accusation as far as his paternal ancestry was concerned; but as Catharine had instinctively felt in the Forests of Tywyn there was another strain in his blood, a strain that went back to those prehistoric "Lords of Annwn" beyond whose rumoured presence at the beginning the boldest speculation cannot pass.

It may well have been from his mother that Owen inherited not only those strange magnetic powers that made poor Davy Gam believe he could call up spirits from the deep, but also those more realistic and less spiritual endowments which enable their possessors to alternate so bewilderingly between hunting and being hunted.

In the legends of no other land do these weird pursuits of something that cannot be caught play such a part. After the spore of the Twrch Trwyth and behind the panting of the "Questing Beast" all Welsh history trails!

The very geography of the land and its climatic peculiarities, the very nature of its mountains and rivers, the very falling and lifting of the mists that waver above them, all lend themselves, to a degree unknown in any other earthly region, to what might be called the mythology of escape. This is the secret of the land. This is the secret of the people of the land. Other races love and hate, conquer and are conquered. This race avoids and evades, pursues and is pursued. Its soul is forever making a double flight. It flees into a circuitous Inward. It retreats into a circuitous Outward.

You cannot force it to love you or to hate you. You can only watch it escaping from you. Alone among nations it builds no monuments to its princes, no tombs to its prophets. Its past is its future, for it lives by memories and in advance it recedes. The greatest of its heroes have no graves, for they will come again. Indeed they have not died; they have only disappeared. They have only ceased for a while from hunting and being hunted; ceased for a while from their "longing" that the world which is should be transformed into Annwn — the world which is not — and yet was and shall be!

But just now it was his physical pain that deadened for the old man the poignancy of his daughter's broken words.

"Put it away," he said to Father Sulien; and then after a pause, during which he groaned several times and changed his position against the ruined wall, he commanded his grandson to come to him. Although his pain had muted his own response to the pathos of Catharine's letter, it had not hindered him from watching with close attention the boy's attitude to his mother's words. Nor had he failed to observe, for he had always been one to notice these little things, what an easy, give-and-take relationship existed between the priest and his pupil. He had noticed how spontaneously the boy had leaned against the Father, and how naturally and irritably he had shaken off the Father's hand from his waist as he listened, shaken it off as children do only when they take for granted the affection of the grown-up person they treat so touchily.

"Come here, Rhisiart!"

He was obeyed at once; and it was clear to Father Sulien that the child hadn't the least fear of his grandfather. All he seemed to feel was a proud and confident trust in the old man. The Prince made him stand between his leather-bound knees; and in that position laid his hands on his head till his outstretched fingers hid completely the boy's compact skull.

"May the blessing of the Holy Trinity," he prayed, "and the blessing of Our Lady, and the blessing of the Souls of all the Faithful Departed, be with thee, my little son."

After that, he made an effort to rise and it was evident to the young Father as he hastened to help him that he was in serious pain. For this he now apologized as the former herald supported him. "We've got many comforts in there," he explained in reply to the priest's anxiety; "Davy Gam made them for us. With Davy to help, and my own people, it's all been easy, and the years have passed, Elphin, the years have passed! Prince of Annwn I've become, they'd say in my mother's cantref. It's quite warm in there, Elphin, and we've plenty of light. She — and he glanced at Broch — would be content with her 'pure Brython' now. Prince of the mound-dwellers I am! Driven to earth, Elphin, driven to earth. Broch's my fire-lighter under there. Broch can chop wood faster than Davy. But Davy was a good log-man though he's dead and rotten now. He was as good a captain to the King as he was slave to me. Slave to a Prince, Elphin, and captain to a King! But he was a man-royal as a horse. Derfel's horse neighing for maidenheads was a whoreson nag compared with Davy.

"And now, dead and rotten, Elphin lad; dead and rotten in the French Wars!"

"My Prince!"

"Well, boy-Father?"

"Are you going to accept the King's pardon?"

Glyn Dŵr flung away the arm that was supporting him and rose to his full height. "Dare you say that to me?" His voice was so hoarse and threatening that Father Sulien drew back a step, while Rhisiart, who had been listening intently, yielded to a fury that corresponded with the old man's and actually struck his tutor with his fist.

"Forgive me, Sire!" the priest cried hastily. "Forgive me, Rhisiart ab Edmund!"

For a second it looked as if neither the grandfather nor the grandson would ever forgive him, as the child clutching at the Prince's belt and the Prince supporting himself against the child's shoulder glared side by side at him. But the sensitive ex-herald’s remorse was so plain that their anger subsided as quickly as it had flamed up.

“No, no, boy — but you meant no harm,” murmured the chieftain; and then to Rhisiart, while he allowed the repentant priest to take the fierce champion’s place, “Run and fetch Broch to me, sonny, will you? He’s had long enough with his mists and rocks; and I want to ask him something.”

They watched the boy scamper off to where the man’s gigantic figure rose out of the mist. “I — think — I would — like you,” whispered the Prince faintly, “to see — how — we — accept — King Harry’s pardon.”

“I am at your service, my Prince. Only as I shall meet both Meredith ab Owen and my Lord Talbot — yes, and Clerk Rhisiart, too! — at the College to-night, it would seem—”

But the approach of Broch and the child interrupted him. The giant saw at once that the old man was near the limit of his endurance and he said as much to the priest in no roundabout manner.

“How unfair he is!” thought Father Sulien. “He’s used to managing the Prince, and he’s a powerful man anyway. What does he think I could have done?”

“I — was — telling — the Father,” gasped Owen while between his words a spasm of pain forced him to cry out sharply— “that — I would — like him to bring — Catharine’s boy — to see how — how we receive our — pardon — from the House of — Lancaster.”

Broch-o’-Meifod shot at the nervous ex-herald a look of uncompromising indignation from within the folds of his leathery eye-sockets. “Do you wish them to come here, my Prince?” he asked, slipping his powerful arms round Owen’s tottering form.

Glyn Dŵr gasped something that the others couldn’t hear.

“The Prince says,” Broch interpreted, “that you’re to come up here with the gentlemen you speak of, tomorrow about noon. Let Meredith ab Owen bring his horn and he’s to blow the Mathrafal call — not the Powys-Fadog one — do you understand? — when you reach this spot.”

But though Father Sulien was a timid man and Broch-o’-Meifod, supporting his groaning master, was an awe-inspiring sight, the sense of duty in the young priest’s heart was stronger than his fear.

Coming up close to the two men, while Rhisiart watched his proceedings in astonishment, he whispered in Broch’s unsympathetic ear how he felt it would be deplorably unwise to give so young a boy the kind of shock he must necessarily receive from such a disturbing scene.

“One minute, my Prince, one minute!” grumbled the giant. “I’ve got to make this fool obey you!”

Saying this he gently lowered the old man, who had now quite collapsed in his arms, on the bed of bracken, and pushing the boy towards his grandfather incontinently seized Father Sulien with an ogre’s grip and led him some paces aside.

“Don’t’ee mind our ways, laddie,” he said in a totally different tone, when he saw how troubled the priest was. “My Lord and I understand each other — but we’ve had a queer life — too much for both of us this last year; and we’re both unstrung. He’s at the end, Elphin my lad. I do what I can, but he moans in the night for Davy. Davy loved him with a dog’s love — more than a man’s, I tell you, more than a man’s! He’s got this crazy rejection of the King’s pardon on his brain. He was always one for ceremonies and scenes — mad life-lover as he is! — and he’s bent on carrying through something — I can’t tell you what — I’m a simple man compared with him; and what’s more, little Father, he and I take different views on this whole business of being alive on the earth. I think we might just as well before we die, Scots and Welsh and English together, hold hands like the children at Martinmas Fair and dance round the fire with the old song of the baban being washed:

Cover your eyes and pinch your nose!
And tell me which way the water goes!

"I know what you feel about the child, little Father. But the child we've got to think of now is the one over there; and I tell you this rejection of the King's pardon is—"

He was interrupted by a long clear note on the wind, the sound of a hunting-horn in the valley, and the two men stared at each other. "Meredith ab Owen!" murmured the younger man; and then he hurriedly added: "I'll bring him, Master Broch, I'll bring him tomorrow. But you'll remember how young he is; and keep your—" The giant touched him on the arm. Rhisiart was at their side, his small face a white blur in the darkness.

"He's asleep," he whispered softly. "But he keeps lifting up his arm and dropping it; and pulling up his leg and stretching it out! I think the pain hurts him in his sleep."

The giant turned.

"I'll see to him," he said; and he made a sign for them to be gone. Then, while they hesitated, "You that way — I this way," he repeated, in a queer intonation that Father Sulien never forgot, "but the same wheel carries us round."

They had begun to move away when they heard him calling after them. "Tell my Lord Talbot," he cried, "that he must be the only Englishman here!"

Lord Talbot was at any rate "the only Englishman" among the group that gathered that night round Father Sulien's fire. The little Rhisiart clung so passionately to his godfather that the soft-hearted priest couldn't bring himself to send the boy to bed. “I’ll get him back to his proper routine,” he thought, “when it’s all over”; and then feeling ashamed of the sinister implication of this thought he substituted the mental phrase “when we’re alone together again.”

But it was a memorable evening for the little boy as he sat on his wooden stool in his black satin suit enjoying the Moorish sweet-meats that the great Doctor of Civil Law had brought for him from London.

The priest soon perceived that it was a wonderful comfort to Clerk Rhisiart to talk freely to the child about the death of his mother and sisters; while to the young Rhisiart — as the ex-herald shrewdly noted — the death in the Tower of Lady Mortimer and her little girls was just an exciting story. He was too young to remember them with any detailed vividness or to feel any tragic emotion about them; but he wasn’t too young to derive a proud and delicious satisfaction from its being his mother and his sisters to whom the great Lawyer referred with such dramatic respect.

Just three years had passed, the elder Rhisiart explained, since he had been honoured with the privilege of attending the dying lady. The King had been in her case more liberal than usual, he told them with a humorous glance at Lord Talbot, and after being released from the Tower she had received each year, at her lodgings in Westminster, a substantial sum for her maintenance.

“Is — my mother — buried with — my father?” interrupted the little boy, jerking himself along the floor, with the aid of his own legs as well as those of his stool, till he was close to his godfather’s chair.

The great Doctor of Law continued for a few minutes describing minutely to the rest of the company how Lady Mortimer and her little girls — one of them named Bridget — were buried in Swithin’s Church; but when he’d finished he turned with the gravest politeness to the child at his side and explained that it had been at his own advice that Lady Mortimer had decided to lie in St. Swithin's Church rather than be conveyed to Montgomery to rest by her husband.

"Your mother died of the Plague, Rhisiart ab Edmund" — and his voice changed its tone as he bent down over the child— "and your sisters too; and there were" — he drew a deep breath— "there were difficulties about their interment."

At this point he seemed to forget the boy's presence altogether in his self-complacent memory of a fascinating legal problem; for he lifted his head and addressed the whole company in resonant professional tones. "By the mercy of God I was able to exercise a little pressure upon the Rector of St. Swithin's, owing to certain legal help I'd had the privilege of giving to the King's Council on the complicated problem of the — well! to tell you the truth — of the Salic Law."

To Father Sulien's horror the little Rhisiart leapt to his feet at this. "Haven't I some claim," he cried in a voice that rang through the chamber, "to my father's estates?"

Lord Talbot began fidgetting uneasily in the great carved chair in which, as the King's Special Messenger, the ex-herald had placed him. He was a lean, weather-beaten gentleman, taciturn in speech, reserved in manner, and with something about his build and expression that brought irresistibly to the young priest's mind an image of the animal known in heraldic language as the Wyvern.

The uneasy creaking of the chair of the King's emissary caused a faint smile to flicker across the face of Meredith ab Owen, who all this while had been staring into the fire as if he saw depicted there some faraway scene completely different from that which was now working itself out before him.

The scene he beheld was indeed one that rarely left his troubled memory. It was of his little Elliw mounted on her Cardigan pony, with the aged Angharad in a litter by her side, driving away the seagulls from a ghastly relic set up there in the eyes of all, whereon a few bleached hairs waving in the wind beneath a human skull were all that was left of the once majestic coal-black beard of Rhys Ddu of Tywyn.

But the great Doctor of Law turned his long thin face, with its hooked nose and drooping white moustache, towards his fellow-ambassador. Then he surveyed his excited godson; and his expressive countenance took on a look of such formidable judicial authority that both the heavy-lidded Wyvern stare of Lord Talbot and the proudly-lit Mortimer gaze of young Rhisiart were compelled to give him their full awe-struck attention.

"Oh, if only Iago were here!" thought their priestly host. "How he would be impressed by this learned Judge."

"The puissant House of Lancaster," announced the elder Rhisiart in measured tones, "whose present representative is our mighty and merciful Lord, King Henry, has, I am sorry to say, many reasons for regarding the Mortimers with less than confident trust. Renowned through Christendom for his clemency to the conquered, our God-appointed Sovereign of the Realm of England, France, and Ireland is bound in the interest of both his Welsh and English commonalty to weigh with studious caution those spontaneous impulses of magnanimity towards the ancient Border Houses to which his natural instinct predisposes him.

"You must remember, dear child" — and though he addressed the puzzled boy beside him his hawk's eye was fixed on Talbot— "that the elder branch of your renowned father's family is at the present moment more than suspected of making various claims that are inconsistent with that Established Royal Succession upon which the peace of our two nations depends.”

Having made this resounding declaration, which echoed through the new College with as many hollow reverberations as it did through the head of the institution’s single pupil, the learned Judge stretched his hand to the refectory table and possessed himself of his goblet of hot spiced wine.

Over the brim of his silver mug, as he raised it to his lips, he contemplated his godson, and although no one knew it but himself a sharp pang shot through his heart when the younger Rhisiart, quite as much hurt as he was puzzled, deliberately left his side and crossed over to Meredith ab Owen.

Meredith received him tenderly and put his arm round his waist as the boy settled himself on the edge of his uncle’s chair. “That’s right, lad, that’s right,” he murmured softly, “Aunt Lu is sure to ask me how you’ve grown and what books you read nowadays. We hoped once you’d have a new little cousin, but Our Lady hasn’t yet—”

And then again, as had been happening so often to him of late, the child became aware that the thoughts of his uncle, like all these other men’s thoughts, were only waiting to leave him in the lurch, only waiting to float away, like the ravens that so often hovered over his head on Pen-y-Pigyn after leading him by their repeated croakings to fancy they had some oracular message to deliver.

He began to experience a feeling he had come to know so well that it presented itself to his mind as a necessary aspect of life, as something that life could not be conceived without.

It was the feeling that there wasn’t, really and truly, one single human being in the whole world who would care if he were dead, or would care if he ran away to sea, like Iago ap Cynan!

And they were all the same. Father Sulien had let him stay up; but he might just as well be in bed! He really had thought Judge Rhisiart would be different. That’s why he’d asked him about the Mortimer estates. He never expected that all he would get from him would be a speech about the Lancastrian Succession.

And now no sooner had Meredith begun to tell him that Aunt Elliw might still give him a new cousin than his uncle’s arm grew limp and lax about his waist, and the man stared in front of him, apparently forgetting that there was such a person in the world as Rhisiart ab Edmund.

It was lucky that he had sat up so much later than his usual time; for sleepiness was the one thing that could make a man not care whether he was in the world or not.

But how clever uncle Meredith was! How could he know, and that too without being told, that anyone wanted to go to sleep? But here he was letting a person slide down upon his lap. And here he was changing his position in his arm-chair so that a person’s head had something to rest against.

“I believe,” said Meredith ab Owen presently, turning his head towards their host, but taking care not to disturb his sleeping nephew, “that there’s some disturbance going on in the churchyard.”

They all listened intently.

“Yes, you’d better see to it, Father — or, if you’ll take the child, I will.”

The head of the College for the Priesthood put down his cup of wine and rose unwillingly to his feet. He knew, better than any of his visitors, how many disturbances could occur in that consecrated enclosure, due to its proximity to the Inn, such as it were wisest to allow to die down of themselves!

But he snatched up his clerical traveller's cloak, wrapped it untidily and anyhow about his shoulders, and let himself out.

The second he was gone, for Rhisiart Junior was lost to the world and all his claims upon it, the three men began talking quick and fast. "It's Sparrow's revolt," sighed Meredith.

"I'm afraid that's what it is," agreed the Judge. "What'll you do, my Lord, if his peasants have managed to capture Dinas Bran? Denis has but a handful of men, and the walls are so ruinous that his only chance, in my view, would be to rush them down before they got to the top of the hill."

In the absence of their heraldic priest there was nobody to notice the Wyvern-like contortion of the leathery visage of the King's Pardon Bearer.

"I wish to God we'd heard nothing about it," Talbot groaned. "'Tis a Fitz-Alan affair, or a Charlton affair. 'Twould never have happened if the King's orders had been obeyed."

Meredith's eyebrows twitched and he tried to turn towards the window. Very gently he moved his limbs, for they were growing stiff under the boy's weight.

"What were the King's orders?" he asked wearily. "Do you know, Judge? Some greater folly still, I warrant!"

The grey-headed Rhisiart looked at his friend's swarthy face and the lock of black hair that fell across his brow; and there rushed through his mind a vivid memory of a scene in Glyndyfrdwy sixteen years ago when Master Brut and himself admitted this evasive spectator of human unwisdom into their youthful counsels. "Oh, Walter, Walter," he thought, "how you'd smile to hear your innocent pupil in the gospels called 'Judge'!"

But after listening for a moment to the wind moaning in the new college-chimney, he glanced at the brightly-coloured tapestries that reflected the firelight, and tried to explain to the son of Glyn Dŵr the attempts that the youthful monarch was making to limit legally, and above all judicially, the arbitrary tyrannies of the great barons.

Meredith softly stroked with his fingertips the dusky head of the slumbering child. “But didn’t Master Sparrow,” he said, “marry one of old Broch’s daughters? He must be an unusual man to risk losing that snug Meifod mill for the sake of his former friends.”

“Once a peasant — always a peasant,” threw in Lord Talbot, “and what’s more, I’ll tell you this. The King’s policy of propitiating the burgesses at the expense of the rest of us will upset everything, I don’t blame this Master Sparrow of yours for making trouble! If he’s married a miller’s daughter he’s been able to see for himself the difference between a peasant and a tradesman. The Guilds and the Crafts and the Master-Merchants are the great ones today. And as long as the House of Lancaster’s on the throne they’ll be the ones. That’s what none of these whoreson pretenders have the wit to see. If I were a great-grandson of Edward I’d do what Richard did, flout the Guilds and the Crafts and the City of London, and pay court to the peasants!”

The Englishman’s words met with an unexpected response from Glyn Dŵr’s son. Indeed he cried “bravo!” with such lively conviction that the little Rhisiart on his lap waved one of his hands in the air.

But the grey-haired Doctor of Civil Law, who bore the courtesy title of “Judge”, though he wasn’t yet upon any circuit, showed by the expression upon his face what he thought of this chatter of ignorant neophytes. The nostrils of his great hooked nose quivered, his moustache twitched, a big vein in his neck expanded. “Sirs!” he burst out, and it was only the fact that his godson was asleep that prevented his voice assuming a tone more adapted to Westminster Hall than a priest’s refectory. “What neither you nor our good Master Sparrow understands is that the real Government of these Nations — I don't speak of France, because no sensible man — we're all friends here! — believes that the English Conquest will last like the Norman Conquest — the real Government, I say, of England and Wales is no longer a government of the Crown, or of the Barons, or of the Guilds, or of the Commonalty. It is a Government of—"

Our old friend's eyes were flashing so fiercely in the light of Father Sulien's candles that Talbot and Meredith exchanged whimsical glances. "Of the Church?" the latter interjected; but Judge Rhisiart swept this aside as dogmatically as Clerk Rhisiart would have done sixteen years ago.

"Of the Law!" he concluded in a tone worthy of Justinian. Whether the word "Law" roused to revolt the Mortimer blood in the younger Rhisiart or the blood of Catharine ferch Owen cannot be said, but it certainly wakened the child from his sleep. He opened his eyes, thrust aside his uncle's arm, and struggled to his feet.

"Where's the Father?" he asked in a querulous tone. "It must be time for me to say my prayers."

"Didn't I tell you, Judge?" sighed his uncle softly. "That's not the Crown or the Commonalty or the Law. That's — Mother of God! What's the matter, boy?"

The little Rhisiart was now standing where they could all see his face; and they all watched him in consternation. His eyes were wide; his mouth was open and twisted; his breath was coming in gasps. He was staring wildly at some point in the chamber that was mid-way between the window and the fire.

Meredith leapt to his feet. The elder Rhisiart clutched the arms of his chair. Lord Talbot muttered a blasphemous curse. But at that instant the old massive door that had belonged to the priest's house before the new college was built swung inwards, and Father Sulien appeared supporting a panic stricken, bare-legged young herdsman. Their appearance brought the boy to his senses in a moment. “Father!” he cried, rushing to his tutor and throwing himself weeping into his arms, “Oh Father! oh Father!”

“Give this man something to drink, my Masters,” said Father Sulien hastily; and then to the sobbing child: “What have they been doing to you, Rhisiart? What’s the matter with you? Come, come, come. If you’re a brave lad and can say your prayers I’ll stay with you till you’re in bed. Come, child! Come, my dear son.”

When the two of them had retired into their bedroom and both doors were shut, Meredith proceeded to obey the priest. He thrust the frightened and trembling youth into his own chair and poured him out a beaker of the spiced wine from the bowl on the hearth.

Talbot began questioning him at once; but Rhisiart intervened. “Let the fellow recover himself a bit. He’s all égaré. Il s’effraie de peu de chose.”

The three men, who were now all on their feet, moved together to the further side of the hearth and began discussing the little boy’s trouble. “The child saw something — that’s clear.”

“Not at all! Children are often like that when they’re suddenly waked.”

“No, no, he had some kind of vision. There’s no doubt of it. The question is, what was it he saw?”

It was Judge Rhisiart who at last drew up his chair close to the young herdsman. “I can’t help thinking,” he began, “that I’ve seen you before, my lad.”

“I don’t — know — Master. I’ve lived in these here parts all me life and I can’t exactly, if you understand me, recall what gentle-folk I have seen down St. Collen’s way; but I do seem to mind when I were a scrub—”

“By God, Meredith, I know him!” cried the Judge, forgetting both his dignity and his position in the wondrous sweetness of recalling the adventures of long-ago. "Tis the goose-boy I met on Midsummer Day, when with Tegolin and Mad Huw I was finding my way to Glyndyfrdwy! Listen, my lad, don't you remember, when you were little, being put once in charge of your sister's geese, and meeting some people with a beautiful horse, near St. Collen's Church — a horse of wonderful colours, a grand, tall, old horse, a law-abiding, obedient horse, the sort of horse that—"

But the young herdsman's shy face had lit up and he nodded vigorously. In some queer way the mere memory of Mad Huw's intervention on his behalf made him feel happier about his present situation. "Yes, sir, I do mind me of a strange Man of God," he declared hurriedly, speaking in Welsh and in the high-pitched accent of Powys Fadog, "who went about the land in them days. I were the only one that saw him close; to speak to — as you might say — and to touch his clothes. My dad wouldn't have been surprised if it 'tweren't King Richard himself. But it's the truth I'm telling'ee — I were little enough in them days but I talked to him, and touched him I did, with this very hand, same as I might touch you, sir!"

The learned lawyer from London fell into a muse as he stared at the world of memory behind the furtive eyes of this rustic lad. It was clear to him that in the passing of time the piebald horse, the geese, the girl, yes! and he himself had all sunk into oblivion — all been annihilated — while Mad Huw enjoyed a relative immortality. The warmth of the fire, together with the fumes of the spiced wine, soon created, now that his immediate fears were allayed, an irresistible tendency to nod on the part of the youth from the Llan of Saint Collen.

Nor were the three friends any longer in a mood to converse. Judge Rhisiart inserted the finger and thumb of his right hand into the capacious travelling-pouch that he wore beneath his stately velvet tunic. He saw the hilt of the dagger he'd thrust into the sod above the piebald horse; he saw the red braid of his wife and her lifted arms as she stood above him in the prison; he saw Mad Huw make the sign of the cross as he promised sleep to the sick King; and under his breath, while his fingers touched Tegolin's letter, he repeated the precise words that, if the saints were merciful, would take him to Worcester when this business of the pardon was done.

No lawyer in the kingdom had a better memory than Judge Rhisiart. But what puzzled him was Tegolin's fluency. He little knew how studiously she had shared all the lessons of their child. "I have been bereft," her letter ran, "of the kind friend you wot of. Julietta, dear my Lord, was wedded last Lammas Day to the worthy knight, Sir Palamedes. Brother Huw died a week after Master Shore; the one of a fever caught from the foul mud while fishing in the Severn, and the other from a surfeit of fish bred in the same. Our little Catharine can both read and write. Brother Huw taught her till within a few days of his death. Will you have time to see my poor mother? Dear my Lord, your last messenger reached me in four days. He says the roads are less dangerous than they were. I marked well what you said about my comeliness. Oh, Rhisiart, my dearest Rhisiart, what will you think when you see your Tegolin as she is? To her you will always be — Gwion Bach."

The Judge drew his fingers from his pouch and looked about him. There was a faint liturgical murmur from the room at the back. Father Sulien and the little Mortimer were evidently repeating the psalm for the night. What had the child seen? Well! Well! The visions of children are as hard to catch as the foam of the sea; and he had trained himself to avoid insoluble speculations. Let it go! And he set himself to ponder on an interview he'd had that morning with Father Rheinalt at Valle Crucis. The monk's sanctity, his guilelessness of heart and singleness of brain had overcome even Abbot Bevan's hostility; and the fierce old patriot had talked freely to his daughter's husband. And strange indeed was the tale Rhisiart heard!

The monk told him that Mistress Lowri was now obsessed by a morbid infatuation for Denis. Such was the peculiarity of her nature that ordinary love — as we say “natural” love — was impossible to her; and her mania now drove her to be the submissive and docile odalisque of the man who had brought her back to Dinas Bran. Every beat of the perilous perversity with which her veins pulsed had been quickened, the monk explained, into a new life by the thought of being Denis’ helpless slave.

Judge Rhisiart had found his interview with his wife’s father far less painful than he expected; but as he recalled it now, watching with half his consciousness Meredith’s melancholy broodings over the fire and Talbot’s dazed, wine-fuddled astonishment at their host’s tapestries, a dim mist-like feeling did fumble for entrance into his narrow skull that there were levels of human destiny totally outside his ken!

For all his learning in matters of law Judge Rhisiart was hardly more skilled in the perilous sphere of human aberrations than when he kissed the dwarf at the foot of the Ladies’ Tower; and he now began to feel obscurely uneasy as he thought of the sagacious legal questions he had presumed to put to Tegolin’s father.

But the monk had been strangely frank. He had even smiled once or twice at the questions put to him. He admitted freely that Mistress Lowri came frequently to the Abbey. He admitted that she forced him — in spite of the fact that she knew he loved her still — to listen to the wildest outpourings of her last obsession. He had gone so far — and that also with a smile that staggered his questioner — as actually to confess that in his love for this beautiful and tragic creature— “She’s simply a she-devil,” thought Judge Rhisiart — he had had to do penance for the fathomless pleasure that her coming to him gave him.

And the Judge, as he watched how the former goose-boy kept disturbing his own sleep by the noddings of his heavy head, recalled the gracious but jerky manner in which Abbot Bevan had entertained him.

“Walter, Walter!” thought the Judge. “How you’d have chuckled if you’d heard the way he told me about meeting Glyn Dŵr on the hill-side above the Abbey and assuring him — you may depend with his usual self-echoes — when the Prince commented on his early rising, that it was he who had risen too soon by a hundred years. But I certainly said a good word for Father Rheinalt! I’m glad I had the opportunity to do that; and I think I made the fellow open his eyes when I defended Welsh patriotism by appealing to the Abbot of Caerleon. How lucky I knew that Valle Crucis was one of the monasteries that applied for his canonization; even though it was, of course, for the sake of the Order.”

It was in the midst of thoughts like these — and indeed the Judge had begun to decide that, if he hadn’t accompanied Talbot, this ticklish business of the pardon would have been a complete fiasco — that a shock of supernatural terror, giving him the sensation of having his stomach plucked out of him in a rush of ice-cold air, forced him to jerk his chair backwards with such violence that both his companions leapt to their feet while the goose-man spilled his wine over the burning logs with a sound like the hissing of salamanders.

“My Prince, my Prince!” cried Judge Rhisiart. And he uttered this cry in such a tone that it made Meredith leap to the door, Talbot rush to the window, and Father Sulien, pallid and trembling, come flying out of his bedroom.

But, as we have already seen in the course of his turbulent career, Judge Rhisiart was always at his best when he was well pleased with himself. It was in disaster that his powers became less conspicuous. At this moment, with the news in his pocket of that providential catch of fish, his wits were as lively as the wits of Lady Montfoison when she paid her momentous visit to London to beg her "little monk's" release.

Probably in the whole history of Corwen, from the days when Mynydd-y-Gaer was the centre of its life, no man, woman, or child has ever been so little bouleversé by an apparition. Was it the mixture in his veins of Norman and Welsh blood — the former making him naturally sceptical, and the latter making him so addicted to marvels that they were no overpowering shock? Whatever it was, the change for the rest of them was amazing when the convulsed image of terror that had a second before confronted them was transformed into a narrow-faced, grey-haired gentleman, smiling at their concern, putting his own agitation to the most realistic account, and with the utmost nonchalance thrusting his arms into the sleeves of his travelling-cloak.

"I must have been cold, Father," he said lightly, "in spite of your good fire! Cold; I must have been cold." Then, nodding kindly at the timid goose-man who had made a motion to relinquish his seat, he proceeded to place his foot upon a brazen fire-dog, pulling up the skirt of his cloak as he did so, so as to keep its lining of rich grey vair from being scorched.

"It's an extraordinary thing, gentlemen," Judge Rhisiart now announced, including all his three friends in the same piercing gaze of his dark eyes, "how cold can affect the human body! And the cold here, of course, is something different from what it is in London. It's a more supernatural cold, if I can use such an expression."

His listeners didn't dare to exchange glances under the fierce stare he kept upon them.

But not one of them let him off.

"I've never seen your Honour so disturbed," hazarded Father Sulien.

"This whoreson cold of yours, Judge," remarked Lord Talbot, "seems to have affected your god-son too."

"What did you see, cousin?" Meredith asked him point-blank. "Was it my father?"

This made Rhisiart turn his hooked nose and flashing eyes upon the Prince's son; and the instant he did so Lord Talbot began whispering to the priest. There was a pause; during which the Judge collected his thoughts by taking in every detail of Meredith's appearance.

Elliw's husband had retained his dark locks untinged with grey. He was dressed in a tight-fitting black tunic with violet-coloured hosen and he carried in his silver belt not only the horn that had brought them down from Mynydd-y-Gaer but an exquisitely-mounted hunting knife in a purple sheath.

"It isn't sadness — not exactly sadness," thought Rhisiart. "I've never seen a human expression like it. He looks as if he knew the worst that could happen and was always cheerful when it didn't happen."

"Yes," he admitted gently, as if his scrutiny had taught him to hide nothing, "I did see the Prince. He was in chain-armour. His beard was white, but not unkempt. I suppose," he added turning to the priest, "our lad saw him too?"

Father Sulien nodded.

"Does this mean," broke in Talbot brusquely, "that Glendourdy's dead, and the King's pardon — wasted?"

His words instantaneously, without so much as the flicker of an eyelid between them, turned every Welshman present, including the goose-man who had understood the syllable "dead" though Talbot had spoken in French, into one single multiple personality. This composite Being withdrew, without a groan or a sigh, into a “secret passage” far deeper than that made by the mound-dwellers.

But Meredith smiled; and his smile caused Rhisiart to think of Sir Palamedes and his white rose.

“No, no, my father’s not dead.” He spoke with such conviction that the spell was broken and there were four separate Welshmen again, one of them a courtesy Judge of the King’s court; and though he couldn’t have explained it, a curious discomfort was lifted from Lord Talbot’s mind.

“I’m glad you say so!” he declared heartily. “It would have been a great pity if the pardon—”

He was interrupted by a series of heavy impatient blows at the door of the College.

The goose-man displayed extreme nervousness and looked wildly round the room as though seeking a hiding-place.

“It’s the Chirk men, Father — it’s the Chirk men, your Honour! They must have dragged him from the altar and killed him — and are now come for me!”

Father Sulien didn’t hesitate. “If you don’t make a sound so as to frighten the boy, you can go in there. Don’t go near the bed! Stand behind the door till I call you.”

He waited until all was silent in the College bedroom, then he flung the door open and three archers in the Fitz-Alan livery burst in dragging with them the redoubtable Master Sparrow. The peasants’ champion had only received a few scratches during the struggle to drag him from the church, but he was in a dangerous temper and indeed had no scruple in the presence of this notable company about denouncing his captors roundly.

“They’ve taken me from sanctuary, my Masters!” he shouted. “They’ve committed sacrilege, my Lords and Gentles! It’s Master Hardy who set them on — Master Hardy from Wessex. Yes it is, you Saxon pig!"

"One minute," began Judge Rhisiart, "let us get this clear. You are Master Hardy I presume?"

Never was there a more turbulent conflict of emotions on the face of an elderly bowman than those that contended with one another on the visage of the man from Wessex. "I be, Measter; but such a rogue as he baint to be found between Orkneys and Land's End. Hold him, mates! Hold him fast!" he added, addressing his companions; and then looking round stubbornly and sheepishly. "He's a desperate man, my Lords! He's a murderous and mutinous rebel, my Masters!"

"All lies! All lies! your Honour," cried Philip Sparrow appealing directly to Judge Rhisiart. "This man's the most vindictive and narrowminded liar in the kingdom. He knows as little of Shropshire as he does of Wales. He comes from a part of England that my wife says is still heathen!"

"Who is your wife?" enquired the Judge.

"Pardon me, Master Doctor, but you're asking what you must know already. My wife is Morg ferch Broch and our child John is heir to Meifod mill."

"He's a traitor to the King, my Lords," cried the man from Wessex, appealing to Lord Talbot. "We caught him in the act of stirring up the people. He's a cunning trouble-maker!"

"If this is true, Judge," threw in Talbot, "they were in the right of it. Many a time have I seen men dragged from sanctuary when—"

"They were not right!" cried Father Sulien indignantly. "As God is above the King, so the Church is above" — he caught himself up— "above all temporal power."

Judge Rhisiart turned again to the man from Wessex. "What were you going to do with him?"

“With thee’s permission, Measter” — it was clear that Master Hardy was less impressed by the furred robe than a Shropshire herdsman would have been— “us be teakin’ of ‘un to Chirk.”

“You’ll never take me there! — not alive!” panted Master Sparrow.

“Is your charge,” enquired Judge Rhisiart, “that he’s an agitator against the King made on account of his saying in public that Owen Glyn Dŵr, formerly called Prince of Wales, will return and claim his rights?”

The Wessex man’s eyes gleamed with unappeasable hatred and he fell at once into the trap prepared for him by our crafty friend.

“Eees, Measter,” he blurted out, “He do say and he do swear to all and sundry that this here conjuring devil, this here Measter Glendourdy, when ‘un do coom back, wull cut the weasand of every rich man in our wold island!”

The Judge looked significantly at Father Sulien.

“Kindly make a note for us, will you, Father, of the declaration just uttered.”

Father Sulien hurried off to get his tablets and pen; and, on his return, fell to jotting down as fast as he could the churning torrent of hatred that burst forth from the old Wessex archer. For sixteen long years had this avenging wrath burned unappeased in the man’s soul, burned there since in the banquet-hall of Dinas Bran he had seen Glendower’s arrow pierce the throat of his girl’s dad.

It was by one of those queer lapses of memory that are totally unaccountable that Rhisiart didn’t recognize this fellow, while the goose-man’s lineaments, which were those of a child at that time, came back to him so vividly.

It had begun by this time to dawn on the political wits of Master Sparrow that this Welsh Judge and this Welsh priest were up to something in his favour, so that, though the pain it cost him was great, he restrained himself from hotly declaring that the peasants' rising for which he'd been agitating was entirely un-racial.

For the thousandth time in his life he told himself that "gentlemen" were the same all the world over, and that it wouldn't be till there was found some way to unite the gwerin, the common people of every race, that their tricks would be ended.

At this moment, however, these "tricks" were being exercised in his favour; and because life had grown sweeter to him of late, and to be dragged to Chirk meant death, he held his peace.

"A Wyvern! A Wyvern!" thought our heraldic priest, as he glanced at the leathery countenance of Lord Talbot, who, with Glyn Dŵr's pardon in his pocket, was evidently hesitating as to his proper course of action.

There was indeed a serious conflict going on at that moment in this great Englishman's mind. "Oh these curst border-barons!" he thought, "it's just like them to hunt their rebels and pursue their private quarrels when the King has all he can do to hold his own across the Channel. You look as sturdy a rogue as ever I've seen, Master what's-your-name. But — nom de Diable! — how am I to persuade the arch-devil to accept the King's grace when these fool-barons go on hunting his nameless devilkins? God help me! I'm loth to let you go free, Master Obstinate, with your sulky airs; but I'm the King's representative here, and no Fitz-Alan or Charlton shall over-ride me with their hired bravos!"

With all this, and more than this, in his mind, the conqueror of Harlech turned sternly upon the devoted exile from Wessex and made it clear to him that the King's present purpose was propitiation, not punishment. "Leave the fellow here," he said, "and off with you to the Inn. Here's a couple of silver groats for your charges — which is more," he muttered to himself, as the indignant archer withdrew with his companions, “than any Fitz-Alan has ever given a man in my service for a night’s tippling!”

The early hours of the following day seemed deliberately conspiring, as the dying Prince sat by a fire of furze-stalks at the entrance to his hiding-place, to give him, as far as the elements were concerned, the right conditions for the ceremony he had planned. Broch and he had already broken their fast in their usual manner, drinking mead and eating cheese, and the Prince was wondering, as he sat there, from what direction his death-stroke would descend. He knew his hour was near; though whether his death would come from his heart, which had been his most menacing trouble of late, or from his lungs, which had been racking him all this damp autumn with exhausing spasms of coughing, or from what one Edeyrnion “conjurer” had diagnosed as a cancer in his stomach, troubled him not a whit.

It was a comfort to him, rather than the reverse, that his gigantic vitality should be thus beseiged from three directions at the same time. It removed those teasing speculations, always so fretting to an insatiable life-lover, as to whether if he’d taken this or that precaution all might yet have been well! If Death’s legions were scrambling over his defences from three sides at once it was clear that what was coming upon him came, as Homer would say, “according to Fate,” and not “contrary to Fate.”

This confluence of a triad of enemies closing in became something larger and more majestical than any one of them could possibly have been alone. In itself the growth in his stomach might be un-malignant, the cough that was wearing him out merely bronchial, and his heart trouble not of a deadly kind. But for their attack to be as simultaneous as this, Death must have got fate and chance and the will of the gods, all, all, all, as his irresistible allies!

The secret of the mound-dwellers' chamber at Mynydd-y-Gaer, handed down from father to son among the descendants of King Eliseg, just as it had been handed down to Eliseg himself, must now, the Prince decided, be lost forever — lost as he himself must be lost! Dead was his son Griffith who knew it. Dead was Davy Gam who knew it.

It would be against the whole nature of old Broch or of young Meredith to reveal what he wished should be concealed; and with them the secret would perish!

He was seated now in a comfortable old-man's chair covered with soft deer-skin; and his seat was so arranged that he could see the far-receding convolutions of the sacred river, twisting and coiling — as though its very flowing were a symbol of the Mystic Serpent of the mound-dwellers — towards Valle Crucis and Dinas Bran and the Shrines of St. Collen and St. Tysilio.

On his left, however, he could see the entrance to the well-kept "secret" of the long line of his ancestors. The chamber which served as a porch to the mound-dwellers' passage was a wide, low, rock-hewn cavern, with nothing of interest in it save a roughly-carved stone object in its centre; and even this at a first glance might have been taken, so confused were the markings on it, for a natural product of some remote glacial or volcanic antiquity.

A careful scrutiny would, however, have revealed that some of these markings were the runic straight lines of "Ogam," the Druidic alphabet, others criss-cross ribbon-patterns, like the intertwining of flattened-out snake-skins, others clumsily-carved reproductions of the foliated festoons of classic ornament; while various mediaeval attempts had obviously been more recently made to turn the thing into a Christian altar by the superimposition of dagger-like crosses.

An altar of some sort it may well have been, a relic perhaps of a race, of a religion, earlier than the mound-dwellers, and the portion of this stone palimpsest which had most arrested Owen’s attention, when as the heir of his House he had first seen it, was a crudely-shaped coil of mouldings at the back of the stone bearing a vague resemblance to the head of a serpent.

One thing had always struck Glyn Dŵr’s mind about this queer piece of antiquity; namely that there was no scooped-out hollow for blood! At the present moment, when the Prince turned his eyes in this direction, what he saw was the enormous figure of Broch-o’-Meifod, upon whose broad back the late November sun threw a long straight beam, causing the single axe which he still carried in his belt to gape and glow like a bleeding wound in his side.

Broch was busy just then replacing one of the small wooden wheels Davy Gam had fixed to a species of truck, by means of which that “slave of the spirits” had carried furze-stalks up the hill’s side.

“Broch!”

“Yes, my Prince.”

“Are you still sceptical of what I told you last night?”

The giant groaned, straightened his back, propped up the truck with its row of rattling wheels against one of the posts of the chamber, and coming to Owen’s side stretched himself out on a heap of straw. If they hadn’t been a pair of old countrymen, long accustomed to such bivouac blazes, there would have been a danger from sparks. As it was they both quickly measured in their minds the distance between the fire and the straw.

“I told you you’d tire yourself,” said the Prince querulously. “I wish you’d let that thing alone. It won’t have any more journeys to make! You’ll be at Meifod and I’ll be under the sod.”

With his eyes half shut and the sun turning his bald head into a great lump of gold, the giant was silent for a minute. Then he remarked obstinately, “I’m not going to meddle with fate, Owen ap Griffith Fychan. If you think I intend to help you to die, much as I want you dead, you’re mightily mistaken. I wouldn’t do it, even if by the lifting of a finger I could annihilate you without a second’s pain! I tell you it’s contrary to my whole nature to kill a man, except in battle, before he reaches his allotted destiny.”

Owen looked down at him lying there on the straw, and as he looked he pondered, and as he pondered he stroked first one and then the other of the forks of his snow-white beard.

“Broch, old friend.”

“Say on, my Prince.”

“Why did you say just now you wanted me dead? So that you can go back to Morg ferch Lug?”

“Of course! You’re my other self, Prince; but Morg’s myself. But there’s another reason too.”

“What’s that, Broch?”

“I don’t like pain. I never have, and I never will! I accept life and I accept death; but I don’t accept pain!”

“But we have to, Broch, we have to!”

“Oh, of course! In that sense we have to — I mean we have to get through it somehow, as best we can. But in the case of life and death it’s much more than just going through them! It’s making them part of us, it’s becoming part of them! I refuse to become part of pain. And I want you dead because when you’re dead I shall have you without your pain.”

“Have I showed it so much then? I was under the impression—”

Broch sat up and looked him in the face, and for some minutes the consciousness in the colourless orbs of the one lost itself in the consciousness behind the sea-green orbs of the other.

"Do you think, Prince," the giant burst out, "that I don't know every pulse and twitch and twinge of your old, soft, corrugated face? You don't have to wince and squirm and wriggle, you don't have to groan and squeal for me to know when the pain-devil's in possession! You can endure about twenty times what most of us can. But it's not a question of enduring. You can't share your elixir vitae when the pain-demon's draining it. Yes! you may sit there, stroking your old beard and looking like King Arthur; but I know very well, though you got over your coughing-fit pretty cleverly just now, and though you managed to do nothing but grind your teeth when your heart nearly stopped before dawn, I know very well, even as you're looking at me now — I know it by a pulse in your cheek — that your cancer, or whatever it is, is at this very second hurting you so much that the only strength left in you is just enough to play the dying actor with picking fingers. You're like a figure in a Martinmas Show, Owen ap Griffith Fychan, turning your head and smiling at the people, while inside of you the sawdust's already burning!

"Yes, you may smile and smile, dear my Prince; but if I didn't know that it was your destiny to hug your old life-bride till the death-rattle shakes you both, I'd — I'd use my last axe on you!"

Owen left stroking his beard, and slipped his fingers under his tunic till they reached the place where his cancer hurt him. At this spot, by long working at it, he had weakened and bent one of the links in Iolo's chain-armour. "'Twould be a pity to do that, Broch," he said, "before I find out whether any of them saw me last night."

The giant struggled to his feet and stood before his friend, literally swaying with wrath. "So you're at those old tricks again, are you? Isn't it enough to be torturing me with your endurance that you must go and paint your twitching face on the air of poor Elphin's College for God knows how many generations? Saw you? I pray to God they didn't see you! Why can't you spend your time getting used to being dead, Owen ap Griffith Fychan, instead of trying to break the only merciful law in the universe?"

The Prince grasped the arms of his chair and leaned forward a little, looking up at the unwieldy form above him with a majestically secretive smile. "I've got another trick, too," he whispered hoarsely. "I've been practising it ever since" — he turned his hands against his ribs and forced his knuckles into his side while his words came in gasps— "ever since Davy went away. Come nearer, Broch, nearer! I want to tell you."

Broch-o'-Meifod knelt down, so that his great shoulders hid the whole perspective of the flowing of the Dee, while his bald head hid half the wooded slopes above it.

"Let's have the worst," he murmured grimly. "I suppose you're plotting to give that horrible phantom of yours some sort of monstrous longevity. You say you saw your son in that room of Elphin's. That's no proof; for you knew he was there. You must give me better proof than that, my Prince."

Owen shut his eyes and spoke very slowly. "I — saw — my — grandson."

The bald head came nearer him. "Tell me, Owen ap Griffith Fychan, what's the use of all this? You saw your son. You saw your grandson. It's like a rhyme my girls used to sing when they played hide-and-seek.

"Tysilio sat on Tysilio's throne: His son and his grandson were all alone: Cry spy and catch me before I'm home!"

"He wasn't — in his bed — he was — on Meredith's knee — and I saw — Clerk Rhisiart."

"My Prince, my Prince—"

The man’s voice was so troubled that Owen opened his eyes. Then very feebly he raised his fingers from his side and stretching out his arm drew his friend’s head towards him and kissed him on the forehead.

The giant scrambled to his feet with a groan and went back to his heap of straw.

“Before I die,” and Owen spoke more rapidly and firmly, now that the bald head was further off, “I shall take my soul and mix it with all this” — and he waved his hand towards the horizon— “so that every Welshman from Ruthin to Llan Collen and from Carrog to Lake Tegid shall feel me in his bones.”

“My Prince—” began the other, still in the same troubled tone.

And it gradually dawned on Glyn Dŵr that Broch-o’-Meifod was afraid for his sanity. This was more vexing to the old man’s mind than any attitude his friend could possibly have taken. Hurriedly he tried to reassure him. “I must make this clear,” he thought. “If once I make him understand me he’ll see what I’m going to do.”

“Listen, Broch,” he said. “If, by sinking into Glyndyfrdwy and Dyffryn Clwyd and into all the land of Edeyrnion, I increase rather than lessen my power, why shouldn’t the whole race of Welshmen increase its power by sinking inwards, rather than by winning external victories?”

“It’s power, my Prince? Do you say it’s power?”

“It’s life, it’s life, Broch! Why shouldn’t we be the one single race — along with the Jews, of course! — who win by losing? Hopkin prophesied that a Welshman would be crowned King in London; and you remember Crach’s prediction about the Tudors of Môn? Well, my friend! Listen to your old Owen prophesying to a different tune.”

He leaned forward as he spoke, bolt upright against the sun-rays, and Broch was impressed once more, as he had been several times of late, by the fact that the old man’s sea-green eyes hardly blinked at all as they faced the sun. They even seemed in his excitement to gain more colour and more depth from the blaze they encountered, as if there existed between those eyes and that great furnace of light some fabulous reciprocity!

“Never mind,” he went on, “whether I sent my soul to the College last night or not. That’s not important. That’s nothing! What I’m doing now, and doing all the while, even when the pain’s at its worst, is what all Welshmen can do who’ve got the least drop of what your Morg calls the ancient people’s blood in their veins; sink, that’s to say, into the ‘Secret Passage’ of our race.” He paused, and fumbling among the folds of the deerskin, between his wasted flanks and the back of his chair, he lugged out a leather-bound parchment book.

“I’ve found several passages here,” he announced; and his tone was so youthful that Broch suppressed the groan of weariness with which as a rule he listened to his chief’s obscure renderings of yet more obscure rhymes, “that bear out exactly what I mean. No! you needn’t make that face! I’m only going to read you what Taliesin says happens to us Welshmen when we sink down into our spirit, down below all these wars. Listen now; and if you don’t like the word ‘God,’ you old Death-worshipper, you can substitute Annwn. When I read ‘God’ I read ‘Life’ not ‘Death,’ as you’re sick of my telling you! But I’m talking of our people now, not only of you and me! One minute — here it is — just this, Broch darling, and then I’ll stop. He’s talking of our people — three, five, seven centuries hence.”

He held up the book against the light, so that all Broch could see of his head was the gold band around it, a band that at that moment shone as bright as the great Bard’s own “shining brow”. There certainly had been little need to warn the husband of Morg ferch Lug that the word “God” was to be taken in some special sense. If the strange words held any piety at all it was clearly a piety that might have come up from the bottom of the Atlantic!

A weleist darogan dofydd?
Hast thou seen the prophecy of the Lord?
Buddyant uffern Ef dillyngwys.
Hell's prey He hath set free.
Y thwryf kaethnawt Ef kynnullwysl
Its captive host He hath gathered together!

The final words of this singular chant, especially the words uffern and kaethnawt, "hell" and "captive," the old man intoned as if they were part of some liturgy of the lost Atlantis.

Broch was sulky with him for dragging in that book just then. He was sulky with him for raising his voice and getting excited. "He could spit blood at any second!" Broch thought. But those words of Taliesin seemed to shake off, as Glyn Dŵr hurled them over Edeyrnion, everything that was weak and hopeless. They seemed to Broch just then to take to themselves quadruple wings and to become like flying fortresses of eternal escape, wind-blown bastions of the sort of refuge suggested by the old Brythonic words, Mygedorth and Pedryollt, that a travelling scholar once told him had been stolen from the ancient people.

The Prince himself seemed to be staring after the words he'd uttered, as if they'd been emanations from the peaks of Snowdon or had come up the salt estuary out of the open sea, and were returning whence they came. But he had replaced the book in the folds of the deer-skin and was speaking quite gently and reasonably now.

"Don't misunderstand me, Broch. I know how right our old Abbot was when he cursed us as a race for our tipsiness and amorousness. Le Borgne was astonished when he found we'd more bastards in Gwynedd and Powys than in all the Provinces of the Seine! But I'm not talking about our vices or our virtues. I'm talking about our souls. And I tell you this, old death-lover; our souls from the beginning have been" — here he was taken with a spasm of pain so acute that it distorted his face and caused him to jerk and twist in his chair, as if he'd been a great bearded fish that some devil-fisherman had hooked with a double barb; but pressing the links of Iolo's mail-shirt against his side with one hand, with the other he waved back his friend— "have been," and his voice seemed to shake the pain from it as Lleu-Llaw-Gyffes shook the rotting flesh from his eagle-bones, "have been able to escape into Annwn, into — into the" — his voice seemed shot like a quivering bolt from his jerking body; and Broch felt it whizz past his bald skull, as if it had been aimed straight at the sun— "into the world outside the world!"

The spasm subsiding, he sank back gasping, both arms hanging down on each side of his chair, like useless oars in a tide too strong for them, but he had something else he was trying to say, and Broch restrained himself from touching him. "Tell Morg," he murmured, "that I've got the — the blood — of the ancient people — in my veins — the people we conquered, as the Saxons did us, and the Normans them. It's the voice, tell her, of the ancient people that spoke through me just now — when I said — not by the sword but by the — by the—" But a horrible paroxysm of coughing seized him then, and staggering to his feet he clutched his friend's arm, while with bowed head and with blood and phlegm pouring from his mouth, he set himself to endure, while thought, feeling, identity were momently lost in the down-sucking drag and drain of unconscious matter.

But it was over at last; and the first thing the Prince did when he recovered was to inform his friend that he was worried by the fate of Griffith Llwyd, his ancient bard. "You heard what that man said, Broch?

That he's at the Tassel, and they're using him for money? Oh Broch, Broch! And I can do nothing — and he the bard of my house! He's a bad poet, I know, a tricky modern poet; but he's like a baby in any rogue's hands and as proud as the devil! Oh, Broch, to think of him at the Tassel; and so old — old and helpless!"

The giant muttered something about going down there himself one night; but he could see from the tears on his master's cheeks that he took such talk as of no value.

But what a beautiful November day! And how peaceful the two of them could have been if Owen's mania for this accurst ceremony hadn't spoilt it. Broch himself detested all ceremonies; and yet it was his destiny under the Prince's peevish instruction to do just the very things for which nature and inclination had most unfitted him.

It had especially pleased Glyn Dŵr that the prehistoric mound-dwellers' altar possessed no hollow place for blood; but it made the tips of Broch's great fingers tickle with nervous tension when it became his destiny to prop up and balance beneath those serpent-coils an appropriate selection of inflammable sticks and twigs. When their preparations were complete, and they had eaten their second meal, and had piled up such a fire that it became necessary to remove their heap of straw to a safer distance, the Prince fell, as was always happening in a moment of rest, into a heart-rending coughing-fit.

So violent was it that when it was over he lay back in his chair so ghastly-white and motionless that his friend was driven to put his hand against Iolo's mail shirt. This gesture, however, so amused, so touched, so roused the Prince that, though his lips under his moustache scarcely moved, Broch could detect by the lines about his eyes that he was smiling.

"I must have a mighty heart," he whispered, without opening his eyes, "if you can — feel it through an iron shirt."

Broch begged him to let him take off this hidden armour once and for all, and his irritable refusal struck the Meifod giant as the most crazy of all his inconsistencies. "Who does he think's going to stab him in this precious ceremony of his? Lord Talbot? Clerk Rhisiart? Father Sulien?"

But after this period of prostration the Prince's irrepressible life-force began pouring into him again and he sat up in his chair. "Give me my mirror, Broch. Give me my comb."

The giant obeyed him; but the weight of the polished metal, and the effort it required to use the comb, were beyond his strength; and his friend was forced in his blundering fashion — and it was the first time they had come to this — to attempt it for him; with the result that there were bitter tears in the Prince's eyes, and both objects were flung away.

"Sit down, for God's sake, man; and let me talk to you! If this goes on you'll have to do more than curl my beard!"

With the patient bald head obediently bent forward, like a great fossilized shell, Glyn Dŵr now began a series of detailed instructions. He told his friend he wished his body to be taken to Mynydd-y-Gaer and there burnt. "If you can't get a blaze hot enough to do it in twelve hours, Broch, there'll be the spine and the shanks and the skull and hands left; but the flesh'll be off them. They'll be just bones. And I want you to break these in pieces with your axe, and strew them — little pieces mind! — round the walls of the Gaer. But I want you to keep back a handful, say half-a-dozen bits; and of bone, remember, not cinders. Have you caught the drift of what I'm saying?"

Broch made a sound that resembled the noise of his wife's millwheel. "Drift, eh? It'll be you who'll be drifting off in smoke, Owen ap Griffith

Fychan, while I'm doing what you're telling me! But go on, for Christ's sake! This is just what I was wanting to know."

Owen tried to localize in his mind the mischief that was causing the Fisher-King's hook to tug at his vitals. He felt if only he could communicate to what Gam used to call his "spirits" exactly where the trouble lay, these powers could deal with it. But he had to content himself with feeling his soul to be a twisting and curling feather, lying on the lid of a cauldron of pain.

While he spoke to Broch the feather rose and fluttered a little above them both. "I'd like you to take a bone or two — just a few, Broch! — and go down to Corwen where there's that cross in the centre of the Druid mill-stone. Go on some dark night, Broch. Give yourself plenty of time. But take a spade with you and a mattock. Dig a hole — no bigger than a rabbit's — under the stone. Dig till you're below the centre of the stone and below the pillar of the cross; and there leave what you've got in your hand! Spit on them first, Broch old friend. They'll rest the better for that. And then back with the earth-mould and stamp it down! Afterwards will come the hardest part of it — and perhaps you'd better get little Elphin to help. For I want you to put grass-sods where you've disturbed the earth; so that only you, or only you and that boy-priest, will know there are bones under the stone.

"Trust nobody, Broch — do you understand? — who isn't entire Welsh! What happens to my flesh'll be the secret of Mynydd-y-Gaer; what happens to my bones'll be the secret of Broch-o'-Meifod; what happens to my soul" — and a light came into the old man's glaucous eyes that was boyish in its roguery— "we'll leave to the little priest of the College; but what happens to my spirit will be the secret of all entire Welshmen to the end of the—" Here he was taken with a spasm of pain of a new kind; of a kind that made it necessary for him to slide down from his chair upon the ground; and as he twisted there, like a king-salmon with a spear through him, he got his foot-stool under his belly; and this, for some reason, mightily eased him. In fact it eased him so much that he commanded his friend to let him lie; and Broch noted that though at first he scrabbled in the ground with his fingers, a second later, after he'd got the stool under him, he lay without a movement.

"That Cross in Corwen," Broch heard him mutter, in a voice to which the nearness of the earth to his mouth gave a low rumbling tone, like the sound of a bumble-bee in a broken ram's horn, "has the same snake's skin ornament as our mound-dwellers' altar — a mat of flattened out snake-skins it is, woven like a basket. The sort of mat it is that the Berbers in Marakesh sit cross-legged on, and are transported whither they will!

"Iolo — used to say — can you hear me — Broch? — that it was 'Mercian' — and not Welsh at all — but — but what do you — think, Broch?"

He was silent after that; and the bald-headed giant, who was now on his hands and knees by his side, was fain to place his head against his head to catch the sound of his breathing.

"Mercian!" the giant groaned in his heart, "Mercian, Persian, Tertian! O these life-lovers, these life-lovers!" Then after a pause Broch scrambled to his feet. "He's asleep," he said to himself. "He's worn-out with his pain and his fancies."

But glancing at the long diminishing perspective of the road that led towards Corwen he perceived afar off three men and a child approaching. "I'll have to rouse him," he said to himself. "He'll be furious else. Oh these ceremonies, these ceremonies!"

But such was the Prince's supernatural vitality that even this brief surcease of pain gave him renewed spirit.

“Come, Broch,” he cried unexpectedly, after the giant had carried his chair up the couple of stone steps in front of the altar, “let’s cross our water, as Tudor and I used to do, when we vowed to be friends forever.”

Broch-o’-Meifod had no scruple about obeying him; and the two elderly chieftains proceeded, solemnly and deliberately, to invoke the friends of their childhood in the manner suggested.

“How Morg would laugh!” thought Broch-o’-Meifod; and he recalled innumerable cases in their life together when he and his water-sprite wife had shocked their “pure Brython” neighbours by their aboriginal unfastidiousness. “They don’t understand,” he said to himself, as he resettled Owen in his chair — and his “they” applied to the Brythons and the Goidels as much as to the Normans and the Saxons— “what we ancient people know right well, that it’s only by accepting the maggots and the rats and the gob and the spue” — he was talking to himself in Welsh now— “and all the other ‘after-births’ of Nature that this ‘spirit’ they talk about can float clear away.”

“Are they near, Broch? Go and look once more! Tell me when they’ve got to the wooden bridge.”

Broch came to announce that they were even then crossing the wooden bridge.

“Listen, my friend!”

“I am listening, my Prince.”

“Do’ee know what I’ll do? I’ll make Rhisiart throw his King’s pardon into the fire.”

Broch lost his temper completely at this; and the outburst that followed had behind it all the suppressed irritation of their long clash of opposite temperaments. The giant never forgot how the Prince opened his sea-green eyes; opened them till they were, as children say, “wide as saucers,” under these unexpected reproaches.

And well might the old man open his eyes, for Broch at that moment was a disturbing sight. In the course of his incoherent outpouring, the bald head kept wagging from side to side and the enormous body kept swaying backwards and forwards; both body and head being composed, as Owen gazed up at them in the sunshine, of dazzling surfaces and dusky shadows.

Broch was trying to explain to the incorrigible old rebel that this whole business of burning the King’s pardon on the mound-dwellers’ altar was a ridiculous hocus-pocus.

“All this race-ritual’s just child’s play!” he shouted. “Life goes on being swallowed up in death; and death goes on spawning new life; and the reality is hidden by their struggle. What you’ve done all your days is to fight death; and the more you fight death the stronger death grows! You’ll make Clerk Rhisiart skip, you will! You’ll make the King’s messenger stare! You’ll turn young Elphin from priest to herald again, you will! You’ll make little Mortimer clap his hands! You’ll love, you’ll hate, you’ll laugh, you’ll cry, you’ll make Gam your slave and Rhisiart drink your blood! I — I — It’s — it’s — it’s more of life and love than I can bear! I—” and then, without a pause, and still muttering something that Owen couldn’t catch by reason of a noise that reached him like the sobbing of a wounded Behemoth, Broch collapsed towards him, whether to strike him or to embrace him the Prince never knew, for at that moment there resounded a familiar voice from the ruined courtyard outside, the voice of a priest and yet the voice of a herald.

Both the men became their natural selves in the beat of a pulse. Morg ferch Lug would certainly have clapped her hands at the sight and cried aloud: “The ancient people! The ancient people!” For thus, and in that manner and no otherwise, would the aboriginals of Mynydd-y-Gaer have dropped their quarrels and "touched wood" at the approach of the invader with "the pitiless bronze".

Experienced courtiers as they both were, Father Sulien and Judge Rhisiart wouldn't allow either the little Mortimer or Lord Talbot to advance a step — though they must all have heard the giant's incoherences — until Meredith ap Owen's hunting-horn had been, duly sounded.

"Get the torches lighted! Get your axe handy, in case the Sais — get the mead out and the flagon — the stirrup-cup, Broch, the stirrup-cup, not the loving-cup!"

When the Prince had settled himself in his chair, which now stood upon the dais with its back to the altar, he glanced first over his left and then over his right shoulder to make sure that the torches were properly burning in their iron sconces.

"They'll think he's as sound as a bell," said Broch to himself, "but the pain's got him again. He's making faces."

"The most worthy and worshipful Knight Gilbert, Lord Talbot of Goodrich!" Father Sulien was now announcing; for the temptation to unfrock himself in the presence of that prehistoric altar and that Arthur-like figure was too much for him.

The little Rhisiart clung to the Judge's hand while the conqueror of Harlech — looking to Elphin at that second so like a Wyvern that it would have seemed quite natural if he'd carried the royal pardon in his mouth — made a brusque soldier's bow and paused in extreme discomfort.

Seasoned warrior as he was, and battered campaigner, he now most heartily cursed King Hal for sending him on this fool's errand. He'd seen too many Welsh patriots, too many French prisoners, too many ambassadors from Scotland, not to feel convinced, as soon as he set eyes on that forked beard and that weird altar, that he had landed himself in a ridiculously false position.

“The devil fly away with you all!” he cried in his heart; and he tried to catch Judge Rhisiart’s eye with a suggestion that it was desirable they should not offer the pardon.

But Meredith was too quick for him. Risking his father’s anger, he respectfully but boldly climbed upon the dais, advanced to the old Prince, and kneeling on one knee kissed his hand.

Owen was just then, though he concealed it from all but Broch, suffering abominable pain. His forces were so absorbed in simple endurance that there was scarce any magnetic quicksilver left over with which to force to a conclusion the startling anticlimax upon which he had set his heart. All he had strength to do was to enquire of his son, in a tone that had more courtesy than feeling in it, about the Lady Elliw.

Now it had happened that since the execution of her father, little Lu had been subject to many wild fancies; and one of her fancies was that Owen himself, and not the King at all, was responsible for Rhys Ddu’s death. Instantly aware therefore, though the pain he was enduring caused a curious-tasting foam to burst in minute bubbles between his lips, that he had blundered in some way and hurt Meredith’s feelings, the Prince laid his hand tenderly on his son’s wrist and pulled him towards him so that he could whisper in his ear.

He soon allowed him to rise erect after that; but they all noticed that the two of them never again completely lost hold of each other. They didn’t exchange another word, nor did so much as a look pass between them, but such was their electric affinity that Broch as he observed them felt as if all that was needed to give them the power of thinking in common was that they should be, or at least their clothes should be, in some kind of physical contact.

Owen's pain lessened now; and though this lessening was accompanied by a new interior sensation that made the old man say to himself, "I know what that means. That means I'm done for," the relief to him was incredible. So intense was it that he began to feel happier than he had felt for months. It was as if his body, having received its journey-money from death, had made a present of it to his mind. He felt a sudden glow of affection towards this whole little group of people; especially towards the two Rhisiarts, whom he beckoned to come nearer.

Catharine's child, however, seemed curiously unwilling to release the Judge's hand. There was something about that pair of torches throwing weird shadows upon those serpentine coils — for Broch had by this time shut out almost all the light of day — that troubled the boy's mind; and he felt, without knowing why, the unnatural vibration of his grandfather's mood. The serpent-coils were very roughly carved; but one of the effects of this blend of torchlight with faint daylight was to give them a resemblance to the curves of a feminine body.

With the instinct of courtier rather than priest, Father Sulien now approached their Wyvern-like guest, who kept looking round him in sullen uneasiness, and began thanking him for his chivalrous behaviour to Mistress Luned on the occasion of the taking of Harlech. Whether it was the curves of those prehistoric mouldings or whether some primitive matriarchal aura emanated from that bloodless altar, it now became the destiny of all of them to think of the women of their lives.

The younger Rhisiart thought of his mother. The Judge thought of Tegolin. Meredith thought of Elliw. And it wasn't long before the Prince himself, in his mood of unnatural elation, followed Father Sulien's lead and began thanking Lord Talbot with grave dignity for the consideration he had displayed towards the Arglwyddes.

"I believe," he said mischievously, yielding still further to the hypnotic influence that was affecting them all, "that this old-fashioned welcome we're giving to the ambassador from London would have been more acceptable to him if our beautiful cousin, Mistress Lowri from Dinas Bran, had been able to be present. It is," he went on, and his voice began to assume such an unusual tone that Broch, who all this while had been idly lighting the twigs of furze-stalks and extinguishing them as soon as he'd lighted them, advanced a step or two towards him, "it is, I think, a recognized fact that our women of Wales have always — have always—"

He ceased abruptly; and there ensued a scene that not one of those present was able to forget. Supported on one side by Broch and on the other by Meredith, Owen rose slowly, painfully, menacingly, to his feet.

"It is, therefore," he gasped, "in the name of Arianrod ferch Don, in the name of Branwen ferch Llyr, in the name of — of — of—" Here his words became incoherent, like the falling of winged creatures, blind with blood; but some of those present thought they heard Catharine's name, others Tegolin's. All of them, save the little Rhisiart who had hidden his face in the Judge's furred sleeve, felt as they gazed at that uplifted white beard that they had suddenly come close to a crack in the visible; a crack through which the invisible was blowing an ice-cold blast on its phantom horn.

But Owen was now standing erect; and with outstretched arm was beckoning to Judge Rhisiart.

The Judge seemed to know what he meant; for gently disengaging himself from the little boy, who promptly clapped his hands to his face and began silently weeping, he moved across to Talbot, took from him the King’s pardon, and with this in his hand gravely and deliberately ascended the steps.

But the Prince, supported by Meredith and Broch, made no sign that he had seen him, and acted now as if he were pushing away with that outstretched arm something different from the King’s pardon.

Meanwhile Judge Rhisiart paused quite naturally, as if he were certain of receiving further orders; while swinging from the parchment roll in his hand there swayed to and fro a massive seal. The tension in that low-roofed chamber of the ancient people grew almost intolerable. And it was suddenly accentuated by a curious convulsive jerk that Owen gave; a jerk that flung back his head so far that the forked white beard concealed his face.

At last, just as Rhisiart was saying to himself, “The blackness — the blackness,” and, after that, as if he’d been a youth again at the foot of Dinas Bran, “I want to suck out the poison,” there came a voice that reached them all.

To Father Sulien, who had laid his hand upon the shoulder of the little boy, it didn’t seem to come from the Prince at all, but to Talbot it did, and to Judge Rhisiart it certainly did.

But Glyn Dŵr still had his arm outstretched. “Prince of Powys — Prince of Gwynedd — Prince of Wales—” and then in a tone that made the boy stop crying and made even Lord Talbot cross himself, “Prince of Annwn!”

A deep silence followed and Father Sulien said to himself: “He was dead before he spoke. A spirit spoke through him. They’re holding up a dead weight now.”

If they were, Broch-o’-Meifod was powerful enough to do his part with one hand while with the other he deliberately removed one of the torches from its iron sconce and set light to the dry furze-stalks on the altar. These instantaneously burst into flame; and as the flames rose Judge Rhisiart was aware of an irresistible compulsion.

Lifting the hand that held the pardon high above his head, he flung it lightly, easily, and without effort into the heart of the fire.

“Where is my godfather, and Lord Talbot?” enquired the little Rhisiart of the priest, some ten minutes later, as they took the road to Corwen.

“God knows,” was Father Sulien’s answer. “God have mercy on us all, and forgive our sins — our most grievous sins.”

The gentlemen in question who had mysteriously hung back, so as to separate themselves from the child and his guardian, were now settling together a nice point of honour; and settling it in a manner that would have seemed strangely fantastic to the two Welshmen they’d left with the dead Prince on the top of Mynydd-y-Gaer.

Rhisiart was, as we know, only half a Welshman, and what Welsh blood he had was less mixed than his princely cousin’s. It was, therefore, with complete understanding that he recognized his fellow-ambassador’s duty to exact from his person at the point of some equal weapon the blood-debt he owed to their royal master. He was too proud to plead — as he might well have done — that the force which compelled him to burn King Henry’s seal had been a supernatural one — but all the same his was the lighter heart of the two when he faced his scrupulous opponent in an already darkening llannerch or clearing, among the gorse bushes.

Talbot gave him the choice of the pair of daggers he always wore and which, when meticulously measured, proved of the same length; and the fact that his challenge was understood and accepted banished in a moment from the great captain’s mind all personal feeling.

The matter could only sink into oblivion, however, after the insult to their sovereign had been atoned for in at least a few drops of blood, and he felt a glow of chivalrous admiration as well as satisfaction when the Judge hung his vair-lined mantle upon a gorse-bush.

But his complacency turned to surprise, and his surprise to gravity, when he found that the river-mist which accentuated the November twilight instead of bewildering his antagonist seemed to endow him with the eye of a lynx.

Though one of the best soldiers of his age as a strategist and commander, Lord Talbot was not only an elderly man but somewhat stiff of his joints.

Had the contest been with swords, our friend the Judge, whose life had been for the last ten years entirely pacific, would have been at the other's mercy; but a dagger is, of all weapons, as even women are aware, the least professional and certainly the least exacting of any special technical skill.

Thus, though Rhisiart's muscles had grown slack from want of exercise, the two men were on fairly equal terms; and for several moments, as they circled round each other and dodged and parried and shuffled this way and that in the growing dusk, there was no sign that any furred or feathered identity in the vicinity felt that instinctive premonition which we may assume most creatures of the earth feel when some tragic shedding of blood is imminent.

Something, however, about his cousin's death had revived in the Judge's nature that old romantic spirit that had driven him to leave Oxford; and the fact that this lean, wizened, war-battered veteran, whose artful attacks and well-counterfeited retreats showed a long experience of sword-play, wasn't only far less sharp-sighted than himself but was clearly playing with him and trying to draw his blood in some un-vital spot threw him into that vein of exultant alertness that he had displayed when he saved Owen from Gam's knife.

"I'll teach you to play with me!" he thought; and taking advantage of a yet darker cloud of mist rising from the river he made use, in one swift, well-timed rush, of his more flexible limbs, closed with the man, and pierced his dagger-hand with a neat downward stroke.

That was the end of it; and it was to the tune of what would have struck Broch-o'-Meifod as the silliest fol-de-rol of fantastical courtesy that the two gentlemen embraced each other and the rebellious lawyer's silken handkerchief was produced to staunch the flow of loyal blood.

"What in God's name, man," enquired Lord Talbot as, the matter of the pardon thus chivalrously if not amicably settled, they took the road to the forester's house where they'd left their horses, "did you cry out as you leapt at me like that?"

Our friend's cheeks flushed hot in the chilly darkness; for well he recalled the scandalous lapse from all the rules of the "Court of Love" of which he'd been guilty. In his excitement he had outrageously and harshly mixed together the musical syllables of Catharine's and Tegolin's names!

But not for nothing was he the son of the wittiest romancer in Hereford; and it was entirely in the spirit of Lady Montfoison that he gravely invented a paramour in Eastcheap whose name was as unusual as her appearance was bewitching.

Both the men fell silent after that; the indiscriminate charms of Dame "Catholin" having whirled their thoughts away, down secret passages as strange and as well-concealed as any in Powys Fadog.

Judge Rhisiart's mind went back to the first time he trod this road between Glyndyfrdwy and the Church of St. Collen. The figure of Tegolin returned to him as she looked when mounted on Griffin with Mad Huw by her side. Again and again he slipped his fingers under his fur robe, as if only by the actual feel of her letter could he realize that ere a week was over they would be together again!

But the thoughts of even the most honourable of lovers are wayward and shameless; for, as he went along in peaceful amity with the man who had captured Harlech, the image of Catharine as he had first seen her in that robe of glittering pali took the place of the pitiful prisoner in the Tower and the care-worn matron in that sad lodging on Ludgate Hill.

How could he have mixed up the names of the two loves of his life in that victory-cry with which he had, for all he knew, cut forever the fighting sinews of the best swordhand in England?

Women were so separate from each other, dead or alive! He had loved two of them and lost them both. But one was found again. And now that he was on his way to her, why should his mind keep reverting to the other?

"Would it be like this," he thought, "if they weren't Welsh? Why did he call out to those great dead ones at the last? But mine were his, and his were mine — Catharine and Tegolin, Tegolin and Catharine — and that day I drank his blood, and today I've drawn his enemy's."

That same enemy began indeed to feel a little uneasy just then as to the amount of blood he had drawn, for as he crooked the tips of his fingers so as to touch the Judge's handkerchief he found that the blood had already soaked through. He was puzzled by the abstracted silence which had fallen upon his late adversary. All he could make out of Rhisiart's profile in the darkness was his hooked nose; but as he glanced at the grizzled blur that represented his eyebrows and at the second blur that represented his moustache he received the impression that the great lawyer was walking with his eyes shut and mumbling to himself as he walked.

The truth was that our friend was wrestling with a problem for the solution of which neither Nature nor Providence had provided him with any clue. There was something, he pondered, about the mysterious beauty of a certain smile, of which all Welsh women seemed to have the secret, that suggested a common origin. Could it be that that was why Owen, while he thought of. Catharine and Tegolin, cried out the names of Branwen and Arianrod? Were the women of Wales, in their closer affinity with the original "Mothers," possessed of some love-charm, especially revealed in their smiling, that the younger races of the world had lost?

Both the wayfarers were relieved when at the village of Carrog they were able to mount their horses; but Talbot's attendants had been directed to await them at the Tassel, and with his hurt hand the Englishman had to ride with caution.

By the time they approached the spot where, sixteen years ago, Rhisiart and Tegolin and Mad Huw had enjoyed their meal of Midsummer cakes, the wind had risen behind them, and the air had grown chill with a vague prescience of snow.

Rhisiart noticed that his companion had begun to sway wearily and painfully in his saddle, once or twice raising his wounded hand to his lips and perceptibly shivering as the chilly gusts whistled about them and whirled the dead leaves round their horses' hooves.

So warm was his own blood and so sweet to him was the thought that his face was already set towards Worcester that when Talbot confessed that the blood had soaked through the handkerchief and was dripping from his hand, and that he felt a whoreson chill in his bones, he stealthily changed the hiding-place of Tegolin's letter, and with that to warm his own blood, snatched off his fur robe and wrapping it round the other's shoulders kept their horses neck to neck, while with his free hand he steadied the swaying form of his friend.

Thus they went along; Rhisiart repeating a few “Mary, Josephs” and a few “Hail Marys”, but concentrating his invocation upon the soul of his friend Walter, whom, combustible heretic though he was, he’d privately and unofficially canonized. But whether it was the Mother of God or the noble husband of that witch of Ruthin, our friend felt an imperative necessity to pray to some super-human power that night.

“Oh soul of Mad Huw!” was his final ejaculation, “for mercy’s sake, let’s get to the Tassel before he collapses!” But having relieved his feelings by these impulses of piety he fell to meditating upon his favourite topic. It was his turn now to feel the snowy wind, but in spite of his impatience to reach the Inn he suddenly felt inexpressibly happy. He was far too cold to analyse these feelings, nor in any case was the process of mental analysis one of his strong points; but he was just then seized with a new kind of exhilaration that had nothing to do with the sight of the Tassel’s lights ahead, nor with the letter in his pocket.

It may seem natural enough that when a Judge of the Realm feels a stir of pleasure in his vitals it should have to do with the idea of universal justice.

But Rhisiart was still — though indirectly — harping upon the pardon he had burnt. “The Law,” he assured himself, “is above all this race enmity and all these national contests. The Law is beyond all religions, all governments, all races, all peoples, all languages. The Law represents the human race; and is the voice of our common humanity. A time will come when it won’t be any more a case of Welshman against Englishman, or Frenchman against Spaniard, or Hungarian against Bohemian. It’ll be a case of universal Justice and the power and authority of universal Law!”

With this triumph of justice whirling through his brain and his wife’s love-letter pressing against his ribs Rhisiart’s spirits rose so high that they shook off, as if they were nothing, the various untoward events in his exciting life. The chief of these events was the fact that Griffin died by violence rather than of old age.

Thinking of Griffin, as with the familiar sound of the murmur of the Dee in his ears, they approached the Tassel, Judge Rhisiart was seized — it was probably the effect of the smell of the Tassel-stables — with a vivid sense of the presence of his old horse just behind him.

Risking the discomfiture of Lord Talbot he swung round, mechanically extending his free hand. He touched no warm piebald back; but, for all that, Griffin was there, and not only Griffin. Clear before him under the northern constellations rose as of old, magical and majestic the towers of Dinas Bran; and he couldn't help muttering a sort of prayer for that tormented spirit still enclosed in its walls who had fed with such deadly sweetness the "insect" within him.

He thought of Griffin again that night as he went round with a lantern to the Tassel stables to make sure that their horses would be fit for the morrow's journey. They were to ride together as far as Hereford; and Rhisiart had the mischievous intention of leaving the famous soldier under Lady Montfoison's care, secretly hoping that the man's nationwide renown as the conqueror of Harlech would so fascinate my lady that Monsieur's nose — if nothing more — would be put out of joint.

What with warm cordials and home-made ointments Lord Talbot's spirits soon returned to him that night; and indeed it wasn't long before the gallant soldier, looking anything but heraldic as the avaricious landlord plied him with expensive liquor, was all for exchanging bawdy ditties with anything that could breathe, from the great Tassel sow to the old blind falcon.

Rhisiart, however, in his black fireside suit and buck-skin slippers, was in no vein for such frivolities. He was in a curious mood that night, a mood in which the romantic feelings of youth seemed to blend with the fantastic intimations of old age. All the wine he drank turned to tender retrospect and all the mead to vague reverie.

But in the end he became restless; and the figure of the Prince, with his outstretched hand rejecting the pardon, and his voice, if it were his voice, calling to him from another world, began to trouble his mind.

In his lordly tipsiness Talbot took no more notice of the old landlord of the Tassel than if he'd been an ale-drawer at an Eastcheap tavern but the Judge couldn't help recalling Master Sparrow's indictment of this smug rogue, when, sixteen years ago, he and the Abbot forded the Dee.

The landlord's dame was just such another, with her pinched mouth and snatching eye; and remembering how these people had catered for Owen's enemies in those old days it sickened him that such rats should be prospering still when the lion lay dead.

His disgust quickened to wrath before midnight came. Talbot showed no inclination to go to bed; nor, as long as these wretches laughed at his drunken tales, did he seem to care who or what they were. When he became too fuddled to proceed with his own follies, however, what must they do but use another device to keep him drinking.

The Judge fancied he caught them muttering a name familiar to him, and — nom de Dieu! — if they weren't hauling into the room a great antique harp, and along with it, borne in a chair by two servingmen, none other than a ghastly simulacrum of his old acquaintance, Griffith Llwyd ap Dafydd ab Einion, whose voice he had last heard fourteen years before on the night of the comet.

If the old Bard had looked to him on that occasion like a withered grasshopper, he struck him now as something even less human. What was visible of his face was of the colour of ivory; but so preposterously had they allowed his hair to grow that when he was first carried in, and placed in the centre of the room, our friend was uncertain which was the front and which was the back of that pinkish skull covered with silky locks.

Subsequent enquiries revealed the fact that these miserly wretches had taken advantage of the immense age and failing intelligence of Owen's Bard to enrich themselves at his expense while pretending to offer him a charitable asylum.

That they would eventually have to bury him at their own charges didn't deter them. Old men had many infirmities; and when no device — and they spared few — could make him perform, there would be no necessity for further outlay.

The woman did have a few instinctive qualms that night about the attitude which the restless gentleman in black might take; but the man scoffed at her fears. Her feminine foresight proved, however, to be completely justified; for when their visitors left they not only carried away the ancient harpist but left behind a disturbing document; a document which was declared, though nobody at the Tassel could read it, to be a Summons to appear in the Shrewsbury court in the following spring, to answer a charge of so dark a character that apparently it could be expressed only in the Latin tongue.

But if the Judge suffered while he watched the soul of this lamentable cadaver being summoned by repulsive threats and vulgar entreaties to return to earth from its happy euthanasia, when at last with pains like the pains of a frozen creature brought back to life old Griffith Llwyd lifted up his croaking voice and plucked at the strings, the sight became intolerable.

He left the chamber while the old man was still playing, and ascended the stairs to his bedroom. Here, walking impatiently to the window, he could still hear from the floor below the sound of the harp-playing and even the old cracked voice accompanying it; both harp and voice, though all the Tassel was listening with a silent unspoken dread, became, when he reached the window and leaned out of it in the starlit night, something more than the evocation of a pantaloon-Samson, making sport for the enemies of his Lord. Those broken harp-notes and that old cracked voice became indeed a true death-dirge, a real marwnad, for a sovereign prince of the Cymru.

For there in the northern sky, beyond St. Collen and Glyndyfrdwy and Carrog, where he knew Mynydd-y-Gaer must be, there was a red light in the sky; and Rhisiart knew that this red light came from Glyn Dŵr's funeral-pyre.

And as he gazed at this light in the sky and listened to those pitiful notes he realized how he had loved what was dissolving in that red light. Faint was the light in the sky, but fainter still were the tones — like sounds from the other side of Lethe — of the old man's playing.

And very slowly a portion of Judge Rhisiart's consciousness that was neither his love nor his intelligence began to respond to that faint glow and those feeble sounds. Owen's body was dust; but a light came out of that dust. The tormented wraith of the old Bard made those strings weep; but the weeping was not the weeping of despair.

Rhisiart leant out of the window, staring at the glow in the sky while the harp-tones sank to a dull repetition, the heavy breathing of a dying man, whose consciousness, like the fin of a fish in shallow water, is already in another.

Why did Owen call himself Prince of Annwn? And Rhisiart suddenly thought of Modry, and how she would talk sometimes of what she called "the harrowing of Annwn" by King Arthur. While Owen lived, there had always been something about him that for a narrow legal skull was hard to understand; but this dull thrumming of the strings and this fading glow in the sky were like a simple childish hand copying the Commentary of some planetary Pascentius.

And he felt that no success or prosperity, no crashing disaster or devastating ruin, would henceforth ever make him forget he was a Welshman or that he knew with Welsh knowledge that the things which are seen are unessential compared with the things that are unseen. And he put it to himself, quaintly and characteristically in his secret colloquy with that red glow and those notes' dying-fall, that he was drawing up a new "Tripartite Indenture" between his soul and the soul of his master! And indeed for the rest of his days it was remarked of Judge Rhisiart, by foes as well as by friends, that it was to the overtones and undertones in a human controversy, to the pitiful prejudices which qualify and complicate a clash of opposed interests, rather than to the more obvious causes of quarrel that as an interpreter of the law he gave the most patient and most penetrating consideration.

It was not till the grey dawn, cold and sad, and full of the weariness of the outer spaces, began to fall upon Mynydd-y-Gaer that Meredith bade farewell to Broch and proceeded to descend the bracken-covered slopes that led to the forester's house in Carrog.

The giant had assured him that he could follow without assistance on the ensuing night all the Prince's instructions about the "handful of bones" to be buried beneath that strangely-shaped pillar, by some called a cross, and certainly bearing a Cross on its side, that rose from the centre of the Druid stone in the churchyard of Corwen.

Meredith had left his horse, as had the others, at the forester's house, and he was impatient to be gone. He had indeed a difficult quest in view — nothing less than an attempt to persuade a pro-English cousin of Rhys Ddu's, to whom the Tywyn estates had fallen, to hand over to Elliw and himself at a substantial price — for the man never came near the place — the ancient dwelling and its immediate surroundings.

Whether he could persuade little Lu to leave the vicinity of that ghastly spike on London Bridge which still supported a human skull, he doubted; but he played with the hope, since he had himself received the King's pardon, of obtaining permission to convey that sacred relic to its old Cardigan home.

Troubled were his thoughts as he descended that long dark slope in the grey dawn. Should he, or should he not, visit for the last time the blackened ruins of Glyndyfrdwy? Should he, or should he not, put his ear to that great stone placed by his father's grandfather at the entrance to their family-mound? Probably it was overgrown now with grass and ferns. Perhaps the very site of it was obscure, if not lost forever. Aye! but how well he remembered little Catharine stealing down that long corridor, past the Saracen's chamber, to listen to those strange sounds! Did anyone ever go there now to listen? Did the spirits of the dead themselves die as the world rolled on? No! he would let it go. He would ride due south; first along Lake Tegid, then over the mountains — straight to the Forests of Tywyn.

It was very dark still beneath his feet. He had to move cautiously because of thorn-stumps and furze-stalks and rabbit holes. But when he lifted his head, there was the eastern sky beyond Dinas Bran growing already golden! He couldn't distinguish the castle itself yet. But it had been always like that. Rising as it did at the valley's entrance, that ramparted hill-top ought to have been seen from many a hill above Corwen. But it rarely was! Indeed he himself had seen it only once from here. And yet it was there all the time. But the puzzle was to disentangle it from the Eglwyseg Rocks that rose behind it. Bran the Blessed! How characteristic of that Deus

Semi-Mortuus that his dwelling should be visible and yet invisible — a true open secret of "the Glen of the Divine Water"!

Aye! How many human feet had come down this hill since the days when the people of Mynydd-y-Gaer waited for that golden light! All gone — gone as his father was gone. What a man Broch-o'-Meifod was! None but he could have done what he'd done all that interminable night. But that body in the fire. The fire licking it before devouring it. The fire — but he must get certain sights, visible through those red flames, out of his mind now. Life had to be lived. A person had to go on. To force yourself to enjoy endurance — that was the pleasure of life!

Yes, you must bear the day's burden, thankful when the day ended. Yes! certain things had to be forgotten, else the sad play couldn't proceed; but the dead needn't be forgotten — they couldn't be. They were in us! While we lived our half-life, they lived their half-life. Dark, dark, dark — the life of the living, the life of the dead! And how dark it was underfoot! But the East was transforming itself now into receding gulfs of golden light. It was as if some huge planetary portcullis had been lifted, and the base-court of the Infinite exposed to view! Night and dawn! So the cycle revolved, so the wheel turned.

Yes, he was beginning already to forget "certain things"! Oh blessed, oh divine forgetfulness! Forgetfulness was greater than that dawn in the sky, than this darkness under his feet. Into this darkness his father had gone, and was there still; so that henceforth when either of the two twilights covered the earth — for the night blotted out all but itself! — he would find him.

But comfort from that golden light was an illusion. He knew that well enough. And yet he was comforted! What was it about such golden transparency that drew the soul out of its body and carried it down such an infinite regression!

Illusion! Illusion! But why should man be so made that the mere sensation of the boundless in this particular depth of transparent gold should have such an effect? The effect was upon him now; and what did he know? Perhaps the effect was nearer the truth than the cause! His path now led him through a small group of fir trees; and he was just emerging into the open again when he suddenly stopped, awestruck and spell-bound.

Absolutely motionless — with its head lifted as it sniffed the dawn air — there stood before him on an isolated rock a magnificently-horned stag. Meredith was enough of his father's son to turn himself, in a single pulse-beat, into a figure of such immobility that the forward gestures of foot and hand with which he was advancing remained frozen in the very act. That horned head, dark against infinite golden space, stamped itself upon his mind forever. Years after, through all the Forests of Tywyn, his wife's people knew him, in their curious parlance, as yr Arglwydd heb saeth, "the arrowless Lord".

He waited there breathless, till, by its own volition, the creature bounded away; but, as he went on down the hill, there gathered in upon his interior vision, summoned by that stag, a random crowd of kindred impressions from the misty shores of memory. A broken grey wall with a solitary mountain ram nibbling the grass beneath it; the outstretched branch of a wayside pine upon which as a child walking with his father he had seen a great buzzard taking its rest, red-brown as the branch beneath its folded wings; the sight of the double peaks of Snowdon, Wyddfa, the nameless tomb, and Carnedd Llewelyn, as he caught them once, towering up, forty miles away, above a white sea of undulating fog; the leap of a salmon from the dark swirl of the Dee waters beneath Glyndyfrdwy; the wild "tu-whit' of the owl he used to hear from his nursery at Sycharth — all these things came now with a strange comfort upon him, and he thought: "Like us, like him, these creatures of our land rise up, live for their hour and pass away, but our land remains; and while our land remains, as the prophet said, our speech will remain, and with our speech our spirit.” Meredith moved more lightly after this, but it would have been impossible for him to explain to anybody — aye! not even to Elliw ferch Rhys — the real undertone of what he felt.

From his birth he had been without any illusions about human life. Neither the faith of the earlier times nor the Lollardry of his own modern world had ever affected him. When he was first seen as an infant Owen had cried aloud: “He’s a changeling! Look how triste his eyes are!” But though his eyes were triste it was Meredith’s cynneddf, or “peculiarity,” as both Rhisiart and Walter Brut had often observed, to possess the secret of smiling a strange secret smile that seemed to come from outside the whole visible world!

And now, as the sight of those majestic horns against the dawn brought back memory upon memory, he felt that each one of these images — else why in the confusion of his days had they remained? — was much more than an owl’s cry, a buzzard’s vigil, a salmon’s leap, a mountain’s summit above the mist. What were they, what did they have in them, that they could bring such comfort?

“It’s their impersonality,” he thought. “It’s the fact that they’re the visions of thousands of generations of men living in these hills. They’re mine; and they’re not mine! With a host of other, commoner, simpler things they’re the experiences of our people throughout the generations. Something stores them up; a spirit that is more than just ourselves; and each one of them brings more than we know to what that spirit stores up!”

But there came over him now a vision of Arthur’s ship Prydwen sailing between Hell and Heaven, and yet motionless in the depths of a single soul, its great dragon wings reflected in fathomless water!

"Oh, my father, my father! A greater Welshman has never been; but greater than your greatness—"

"What is that sad-faced man smiling for?" cried the oldest winged creature in Edeyrnion, the croaking raven of Llangar, to his aged mate, as they swooped down over Meredith's quickened steps.

"Nis gwn! I don't know! Nis gwn!' croaked the other; and as the pair rose on their heavy-flapping wings and sailed away eastward, mounting up in huge spiral circles higher and higher as they followed the river's flow, it seemed to the man watching them as if there were something in that vast broken landscape that had echoed that hollow answer in his ears as long as he could remember.

But the great birds soared on, heedless of the echoes; soared on till to Meredith's vision they were dots and specks in the remote distance. He knew not where they were flying. But in his thoughts they were flying over the rocky crest of the Berwyns; they were flying over the fallen roof-tree of Sycharth; they were flying towards the mounded turf and the scattered stones that were all that was left of Mathrafal.

THE END

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

EDWARD III HAD been King of England for half a century; and after his death Richard “the Redeless”, the son of the Black Prince, was crowned King. This was in 1377 when Richard was a boy of eleven. When he was sixteen he was married to Anne, sister to the King of Bohemia who was also the Holy Roman Emperor. Anne died childless in 1394, and two years later he married Isabella, daughter of Charles VI, King of France. “She was at the time,” says Wylie, “a girl of eight years old, but she was formally crowned at Westminster as Queen of England and lived with the King as his wife.” The King was beautiful, charming, wayward, moody; as unscrupulous as he was reckless. Being childless he declared his heir apparent to be Roger Mortimer, Earl of March, grandson of the third son of Edward III.

But in September 1399, exactly a year before the rising of Owen Glyn Dŵr in Wales — Henry Plantagenet, named Bolingbroke from his birthplace in Lincolnshire, with the consent of Parliament and the support of the Commons deposed “this second Absalom”, as the chronicler calls the ill-starred Richard, and usurped the throne under the title of Henry IV.

Henry was the son of John of Gaunt or Ghent, who was the fourth son of Edward III, so that the Mortimer claimant, descended from the third son, had the prior right; but at the critical juncture this Mortimer claim had fallen to a child. Shakespeare’s description of the forced abdication of the unhappy Richard follows the facts as closely as the laws of drama allow. Wylie quotes from the chronicler the actual words of Henry’s first speech from the throne:

“Syres, I thank yow, espirituelx and temporelx, and alle the estates of the lond, and I do yow to wyte that it ys nought my wil that no man think that by wey of conquest y wolde desherte any man of hys herritage, fraunchis, or other ryghtes that hem ought to have, ne put hym out of that he hath had in gode lawes of this reiaulme except hem that have ben ageyn the gode purpos and the commune profyte of the reiaulme.”

There is no doubt that Henry’s most formidable supporter in all this was Thomas Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, a personal friend of the Pope at Rome. And it was he who became the new King’s Chancellor.

The circumstances of Richard’s death, which probably took place in Pontefract Castle in 1400, remain obscure to this day. Our best historian of Henry’s reign, Mr. James Hamilton Wylie, thinks it probable that he was murdered and that the body subsequently displayed and buried in London was his body. According to one account Henry had him starved to death. According to another he died of voluntary starvation. In Shakespeare’s version, which came from a French source, where because of Richard’s young French Queen there was every reason for giving the fullest details of a revolting crime, a certain Sir Pierce of Exton was Henry’s tool.

All this happened sixteen years after John Wycliffe died in 1384. His writings and sermons were of so bold and revolutionary a character that they set the minds of thousands of people questioning not only the theological but the social and moral conventions of the time. To quote Wylie, “He opened a new well of authority in his translation of the Scriptures into English; and by his strictness of life, his courage, his subtlety in wit and argument, he set ablaze a fire in men’s minds that could not be put out.”

The word Lollard means “tares,” or dangerous weeds sown by the Devil; and “under the common name of ‘Lollards’ were gathered together every species of religious malcontent.”

Henry’s father, John of Gaunt, had been favorably disposed to the Lollards, but the extraordinary power the Archbishop exercised over Henry’s conscience turned the King into a religious persecutor.

On his accession to the throne Henry appointed Henry Percy, Earl of Northumberland, to the position of Constable of England. This office, after the Chancellorship now held by Archbishop Arundel, was far the most important in the kingdom.

The family of Percy was supreme in the North of England and the hereditary enemy of the kingdom of Scotland. It had received its lands from William the Conqueror; and Wylie describes the Earl — and the description includes his son, Henry Hotspur — in these words:

“In his own country his will was supreme. He lived apart from English life, keeping court at Bamborough, Warkworth, Newcastle, and Berwick; a border robber, holding his lands by his sword; rough and unlettered himself, he loved the flatteries of his own bards and rhymers; a bitter hater or a steady friend, generous and faithless, merciless and brave, a loyal Englishman, not from love to England, but from hatred to the Scot.”

The safest authority on the “documented” events of Owen Glyn Dŵr’s life is Sir John E. Lloyd, the historian of Wales. He speaks of Owen as a student of law at Westminster at the end of the reign of Edward III; and later as a knight-at-arms in the Irish and Scotch wars of Richard II. He was a middle-aged man between forty and fifty in 1400; and it seems clear that the immediate cause of his taking up arms was a quarrel with Reginald Grey, Lord of Ruthin. His friend, the poet Iolo Goch, has described in detail the quiet patriarchal life which he led in his Sycharth domain. His wife, Sir John Lloyd tells us, was the daughter of Sir David Hanmer, one of the most distinguished Welshmen of the day; who in 1383 was appointed a Judge in the Court of King’s Bench. The Hanmer family itself was of English origin, but had long been settled on the border and had intermarried with the Welsh. Sir John Lloyd seems to think it doubtful that Glyn Dŵr would have raised the standard of Welsh independence if he had not been so unfairly and unjustly treated in his fierce personal quarrel; but on the final page of his careful biography we come upon the following words, which may be taken as indicating the position Glyn Dŵr holds, not only in the popular legends of Wales, but in the mind of a trained and judicious modern historian.

“He stands alone among the great figures in Welsh history in that no bard attempted to sing his elegy. This we must attribute, not merely to the mystery which shrouded his end, but also to the belief that he had but disappeared, and would rise again in his wrath in the hour of his country’s sorest need.”

In considering, however, the full scope of Owen’s background — for as Shakespeare reminds us he was one of the most cultivated figures of his age — it is necessary to give a brief glance at the general condition of Europe and the western world at the beginning of the fifteenth century.

The period that formed the immediate background to the dramatic events related in this tale — 1400 to 1416 — saw the beginning of one of the most momentous and startling epochs of transition that the world has known: the transition from the more or less federated Christendom of the Middle Ages to the turbulent evolution of our modern sovereign states.

The fifteenth century, of which our story covers a little more than the first decade, witnessed the gradual rise of that individualistic spirit of commerce which did so much more than the religious Crusades of an earlier epoch to bring the far-flung continents of the world into relation with one another.

America seems to have been already discovered by the Norsemen, and according to Welsh tradition, rediscovered by Prince Madoc, the son of Owen Gwynedd of North Wales, who so successfully resisted the invasion of Henry II; but the adventures of its more “documented discoverers” were yet to come; and before these occurred the path of navigation was eastward rather than westward. After the Norsemen’s explorations and the more legendary voyages of the Welsh Prince, it was the new kingdom of Portugal that took the lead in these heroic if self-interested voyages; and in Portugal’s rise to sea-power the kings of England played no mean part. Portuguese navigators were, however, always more interested in reaching the East than the West Indies, but whatever Indies they aimed at it was Henry IV’s grandfather, Edward III, who by a royal proclamation commanded his subjects to abstain from all harm to the Portuguese; while only fifteen years before Owen Glendower’s rising an English army assisted in repelling from their commercial allies at Lisbon the peril of a Spanish invasion. A few years later King John of Portugal married Philippa, Henry IV’s sister, and what was called the Treaty of Windsor was signed between the two countries; after which, in the words of Mr. Saunderson, “the policy of Portugal was to maintain a close friendship with England and a cautious neutrality in Spanish affairs.”

At the time of Owen’s struggle for independence, however, it was the republic of Venice that dominated Europe’s eastern commerce and defended the trade-routes from the attacks of the Turks. At the very time when, according to my reading of his end, Owen was rejecting Henry’s pardon, Venice was defeating the Turks in the battle of Gallipoli. All this, it must be remembered, occurred more than half a century before the cessation of the wars between Castile and Aragon brought Spain to the front.

As for France, during Owen's struggle, in spite of the spiritual patriotism of her common people, she was passing through one of the most unhappy epochs in her history. Several of her provinces, including the famous towns of Calais and Bordeaux, were in the possession of the English, and she was not only constantly menaced by Burgundy, whose Duke exercised a feudal lordship over the riches of the Netherlands, but was weakened by quarrels between her own royal princes and by the intermittent mental prostration of her King Charles VI.

Russia had been overrun in the thirteenth century by hordes of Mongols under the Tatar conqueror, Genghis Khan, and not long before Glendower's revolt Moscow had been burned to the ground by one of this potentate's Mongolian successors.

This was the epoch that saw the rise to power of Poland as a formidable nation. It was 1410, when Owen's family had just been taken prisoner at the capture of Harlech, that there was fought one of the most bloody of all the battles of the early fifteenth century, in the marshes of Tannenberg. It was here that the Poles, aided by the Czechs, under their famous Prague leader, Ziska, and aided too by a vast host of Letts and Finns and Russians, defeated with a slaughter so horrible that all Europe was shocked and scandalized the powerful German Order of the Teutonic Knights. This defeat of a mediaeval religious order, designed to protect Christianity from the pagans, by the sovereign of an independent state, supported by formidable mercenaries, some baptized and some unbaptized, is as clear a symbol as we could find for the startling change that was passing over Europe in the beginning of the fifteenth century.

It seems that the Czech leader Ziska, who did most to crush the Teutonic Knights, used a novel military device that makes us think of what today are called "mechanized units"; for he invented "wagon-forts", or chariots linked together by strong iron chains. “These vehicles,” I quote Mr. Saunderson’s account of this famous battle, “were covered with steel or iron; and on each of them the best marksmen were placed next to the driver.” In addition to these “wagon-forts”, Ziska made use of the same sort of cannon and gunpowder with which Henry’s captains were eventually able to overcome the Welsh defenders of Harlech. Mediaeval swords and lances had already been outdated by the longbows of the yeomen, and the appearance of gunpowder was yet another milestone on the road along which Fate was marching.

As the religious feeling that had made an imponderable unity of Europe slackened, the spirit of national sovereignty grew stronger and less scrupulous. But the age of Owen Glendower was not only the age of the decline of feudalism; it was also the age of social upheavals. Wylie’s superb history points out that when Owen was a young man in the service of Richard II there were democratic popular risings in Ghent, in Languedoc, in Florence, in Paris and in Rouen. In England itself the House of Lancaster leaned more heavily upon popular support than any previous government. In a sense it might be said that Henry IV was the first of our Parliamentary kings. The middle class had supported him against Richard; and all through his reign the Mortimers represented, according to primogeniture, a nearer claim to the throne than his own. Indeed, it was the steady support of the merchants and yeomen of England that carried him through the almost incessant treacheries and troubles of that distracted time.

The King of England got his revenue partly from custom-duties on exports and imports, partly from direct taxation, and partly from his own great landed estates. The chief products exported from the country at that time were corn and honey and cloth and wool and sheepskins, along with salt and tin and lead. These products were sold to Lombard, Genoese, and Catalan traders. “Wool,” Wylie quotes from a contemporary, “was the sovereign merchandise and jewel of the realm.” A single sack of wool was worth from five to six pounds, each sack weighing twenty-six stone, fourteen pounds to the stone. From the earliest times, Wylie reminds us, the King claimed half a mark — six shillings and eight pence — on each sack exported. This claim was never disputed.

It is a queer and a significant thing how it was the Commons themselves who — as long as it could be done without being taxed for foreign wars — urged the King to violent patriotic measures. In earlier days all noble children in Britain were taught to speak French, but as the King and the Commons together began to encroach upon the ancient feudal courtesies, the emotion that we now call nationalistic began to take the place of the old crusading zeal and the old religious unity. The hatred formerly directed against infidels was now directed against aliens; Parliament itself was always taking the lead in this: violently petitioning the King to enter upon a serious campaign against the menace of resident foreigners. The Commons even went so far as to quarrel with the presence of foreign ladies in the Queen’s household; and a statute was passed forbidding the use of French in the law-courts.

In the year 1406, when the French fleet sailed to the help of Owen, the English King was sore put to it for funds. His resources were sufficient in peacetime; but it was different in time of war, and in 1406 things looked very dark for the House of Lancaster. “The country,” says Mr. Wylie, “seemed at a low ebb in all respects and the Commons began vehemently protesting. Poverty was everywhere. Merchants were ruined. The counties were drained of archers in this incessant warfare. The French were sailing up the Thames.” In this serious situation the Commons debated so long that their turbulent session received — as did another famous sitting two and a half centuries later — the name of “the Long Parliament”. They actually sat, though not continuously, for 158 days.

The Speaker of the House in this eventful year, when with the French to the south and the Welsh to the west the situation was so critical, was Sir John Tiptot of the county of Cambridge; and Parliament had never been bolder in the language it used. And well it might be. There was chaos in Ireland where many of the English settlers joined with the native Irish against the government. Ireland was at that time governed by a deputy of the King, but his writ didn’t extend beyond a narrow strip of country on the south and east coasts.

The native Irish of the north, west and centre did not recognize his authority. Owen must have heard rumours in his childhood of Edward Ill’s “Statutes of Kilkenny” whereby war with the natives was enjoined as a duty for the English colonists, and marriages between the two races were forbidden. But these statutes were constantly disregarded.

In addition to this chaos in Ireland there was no security upon the seas where piracy was plundering lawful trade. Things were so bad that the Commons spoke of the King “otherwise than they ought.” Peace, they declared, was what they wanted when they put him on the throne; but there had been nothing but ceaseless war. They demanded an account of all public moneys; and when they got the curt reply, “Kings don’t give account”, they answered, “Then their officers must!” In the end an agreement was drawn up between the King and his Council on the one hand, and the “Merchants of England”, on the other. The merchants, seamen, and shipowners were to put their ships at the disposal of the country, armed with 2000 fighting men to protect the sea. They insisted that all prizes taken should be theirs and should be dealt with by themselves.

Now it must not be forgotten that in the last decade of the fourteenth century and the first of the fifteenth the craft-guilds and trade-guilds were still the arteries of English life and kept the community sound and healthy. This remained true even after the exports and imports of the rich merchants had begun to inaugurate the rudiments of international capitalism. Each separate craft formed a fraternity of self-defence. During the years of Owen's retreat to the mountains of Snowdon and of his victory at Bryn Glas, the city of York alone, Wylie discovers, possessed no less than 96 organized trades.

In one important respect the age of Glendower resembled our own — in the extreme variety of its seasons. While Owen was fighting his final and tragic struggle there came, with the season of 1407-8, the worst winter for a hundred years. From December to March the country was covered with snow; and the merles, mavises, fieldfares, plovers died off by the thousands. The official scribe, Wylie tells us, "could make no entry in his register; for the ink froze on his 'pointel' at every second word; though he kept his little copper chafer beside his chair."

It was only a year after this in the early spring of 1409 that the famous schism between the Roman Pope and the Avignon Pope reached its culmination. The majority of the Cardinals decided to end the scandal by electing a third Pope. And the French Chancellor, Gerson, took the lead in this movement. Pope Benedict thereupon fled to Spanish protection at Perpignan, while Pope Gregory left Rome a penniless fugitive.

The mediaeval system of European life implied a loose kind of federation with the dual authority of Pope and Holy Roman Emperor at its head; and it is clearly a sign that this system had begun to break down, under the combined pressure of nationalism and free thought, that not only should there be three Popes in that fatal year, but two Holy Roman Emperors, in addition to the one in Constantinople.

If this revolutionary attempt to restore the dignity of the Papacy was a sign of the changing times, still more so was the remarkable intellectual movement of that epoch to which might almost be given the name of the "National Renaissance," as distinct from the better-known Classical Renaissance which came more than half a century later. If Glendower was a disciple of the Welsh bardic lore, Henry IV was no mean patron of national literature. Wylie reminds us that he had the friendship of the poet Gower, old and blind; and that not only did the dying Chaucer receive an annuity of 40 marks, but Thomas Hoccleve, then a young clerk in a government office, got a pension of 10 pounds for life.

Matters were complicated by the fact that a serious crack had yawned in the other unifying principle of Christendom, the Holy Roman Empire, the one about which Dante had been so eloquent. In Owen's time there were two claimants for this distinction, both of them "Kings of the Romans", namely the German Rupert, Duke of Bavaria and Count Palatine of the Rhine, and the Czech Wenceslaus, or Wenzel, King of Bohemia.

But a much more serious menace to the unity of Christendom than the existence of the rival Popes and rival Emperors was to be found in the growth of startlingly new religious opinions at home. Wycliffe had not been dead many years before his revolutionary doctrines spread like quicksilver among the more progressive spirits. Oxford was riddled with Lollardry, and boldly defied the authorities; while the movement grew so rapidly that the Archbishop initiated the notorious statute, De Heretico Comburendo—"concerning the suppression of heresy by fire".

And if this extraordinary epoch was characterized by individualism in religion and nationalism in politics it was remarkable for its unscrupulous diplomacy. One aspect of this particular unscrupulousness shocked certain minds, even then: the marriages of children for diplomatic reasons. Both Henry IV's little daughters were married — just as Owen's youngest daughter was — to further the political aims of their parents.

If the Middle Ages had been passionate and poetic, the fifteenth century was fantastic and bizarre. At the very time when so many Welsh students at Oxford were flocking to Owen's standard a rare and exciting personality arrived on a visit to England. This was Manuel II, Emperor of the East. Officially he came to beg the help of the western nations against the Turks who were besieging Constantinople; but actually his visit gave rise to a sequence of the most fantastical pageantry ever recorded. The day of the old authentic chivalry was over; but its ghost pranced and caracoled and jousted in a Masque of Death. Manuel came from the most romantic city in the world. The Welsh bards called the place Taprobane; and they felt that Manuel himself must have had some drops of Constantine the Great's Welsh blood in his veins.

In the East of Europe Christianity was at the time of our story fighting for its life against Islam. Asia Minor was lost to the Turks already, and their hosts were now gathering round the Bosphorus. In his desperation Manuel had made peace with the Pope of Rome, but only four years before Owen raised his standard at Glyndyfrdwy, Sultan Bajazet I crushed a vast Western army at the Battle of Nicopolis. Henry of Lancaster was actually present at this defeat and barely escaped with his life. As the danger grew greater year by year the Pope called upon Christendom to help with money if it could not do so with arms. Wylie tells us how there were mayor's funds and collecting boxes in all the English cities. After the first lull in the Welsh trouble, Henry — now the recognized monarch in Richard's place — subscribed a thousand pounds for the rescue of Constantinople. At the very time when Owen was taking prisoner Lord Grey of Ruthin, the Eastern Emperor was being feted in Paris like a creature from another world.

Meanwhile one old ferocious nomad easily accomplished what all the princes of Europe had been unable to do: “Timur the Lame,” or Tamberlaine the Great, made one of his famous mountains of human skulls out of the heads of the dreaded Turks. Having thus saved civilization, the godless old man promptly despatched letters to the King of England from Samarcand, begging English traders to visit his dominions and promising them protection from all interference.

The beginning of the fifteenth century may justly be described as an era of degenerate faith and degenerate chivalry. It was an age of unscrupulous individualism but also an age when national self-consciousness under independent rulers superseded the old feudal ideal of a united Christendom under Emperor and Pope. The dominant note of the epoch was what might be called the cynical use of the masks and symbols of lost ideals to advance shameless personal ends. A simple religious faith had “kept the strong in awe”, but the simplicity of that faith was gone; and as yet no secular moral public opinion showed any sign of taking its place. And the age of Owen Glendower had to get worse before it could get better.

In its strange recurring spirals of advance and retreat our tragic caravan of human progress was taking just then one of its most dangerous “horseshoe curves”.

It was an age of restless adventure rather than of practical achievement; an age of fancy and imagination and ideal passion. Orthodoxy burnt without conscience; and heresy blasphemed without decency. But those mysterious movements of destiny that neither the strong can retard, nor the crafty sidetrack, were at work all the while.

What happened, as we see it now, was what none of the parties concerned expected, hoped, or imagined. It was what Fate intended; and whether we force ourselves to "love" the issue, as Nietzsche does, or sink beneath it to the life within, as Blake does, we can at least in either case do as the blind bard in the Odyssey did and take all these things as having happened in their beauty and in their pain "that there might be a song for those who come after".

Porius (1951)

A ROMANCE OF THE DARK AGES

Porius: A Romance of the Dark Ages was first published by Macdonald & Company in London, England in 1951. Despite his long and successful career, Powys had difficulty finding publishers to release the book. Simon and Schuster, the company that had published most of his novels in America since Wolf Solent (1929) rejected it as did his frequent UK publisher, The Bodley Head, who insisted that the novel must be reduced by a third for them to even consider it. The author agreed to their demands, but he found their offer far too low, eventually agreeing a deal with Macdonald. In 2007, the complete version of the unabridged novel was finally restored and published by Duckworth Overlook. It is also the version presented in this collection.

The tale is set against the backdrop of Edeyrnion in North Wales over the course of eight days in October 499 AD. The central character, Porius, is the only son of Prince Einion of Edeyrnion and heir to his house of Cunedda. As the novel opens, the region is in turmoil as Roman hegemony has ended and competing tribes, groups and peoples vie for control and supremacy. Porius' father — a Romanised Brython — finds his rule under threat from the oppressed indigenous 'forest people', the Cewri — giants of the land — the Gywddyl-Ffichti and most alarmingly, the Saxons. Prince Einion joins forces with King Arthur and Merlin against the Saxons, while Porius commences his journey towards self-discovery and maturity. The novel is saturated with mythology and history, as the author explores clashes of religion and beliefs.

HISTORIC BACKGROUND TO THE YEAR OF GRACE A.D. 499

THERE APPEARS TO BE an absolute blank, as far as documentary evidence goes, with regard to the history of Britain itself from the middle of the fifth century, when St. Patrick lived and wrote his Confession and preached in Ireland from 433 to 460, to the middle of the sixth century, when Gildas wrote as a fugitive monk in Little Britain in Gaul, expressing as a pro-Roman his querulous indignation against his fellow countrymen in Britain and their princes and chieftains. It seems, therefore, highly probable that this historic blank, as far as written documents go, was filled by Arthur's powerful and prosperous rule, this lack of documentary history being itself evidence that for one generation at least matters in this island were well under control.

As to the continent of Europe, however, at this critical moment of world history, there was certainly no lack of historical documents or of varied and very detailed information. There had recently come, as the fifth century drew to its close, a curious lull in the more disturbing migratory movements of semi-barbarous races pushing one another westward across the rapidly collapsing framework of the Western Roman Empire whose centre was Rome herself. Huns, Vandals, Ostrogoths, Central Goths, along with their barbarous heroes, customs, superstitions, cults, rituals, religions, and all their weird deities, were at this strange moment in European history jostling, mingling, and contending, on tribal battlefields and in individual souls, with the old classical altars and their ghostly deities, now sinking into oblivion, on the one hand; while the new Christian faith, on the other hand, commanding people to adore what they had been burning, and to burn what they had been adoring, swept forward with a reckless fanaticism that seemed to have the very spirit of the life force behind its unconquerable desperation.

This end-of-the-century lull in the more savage continental fighting came with a perceptible lessening of the pressure of the migratory hordes moving from east to west, and although it undoubtedly had many economic and geographic causes that were entirely impersonal, there was one minor cause for this desirable settling down of the fierce central European races into the districts which, with a few notable exceptions, still boast their blood. This was the crafty personal diplomacy and wise political sagacity of Theodoric the Ostrogoth, who for thirty-three years, however much the Roman Senate might intrigue with the Eastern Emperor in Constantinople, ruled Italy from Ravenna with shrewdness and tact. And of Theodoric’s methods of ruling, and of reconciling, in a rough commonsense manner, the old decadent civilization with the young barbaric races, and both of them with the leaders of the new faith, we have plenty of documentary history; so much so, indeed, that it makes us feel as if our own island were indeed an Ultima Thule glimpsed darkly and dimly through the salt mists blown across the waves of the unharvested ocean, and over the grave of the Lost Atlantis.

There are for example two extremely cultivated classical letter writers, each of whom was full of a desire to impress posterity — as indeed they have done — with their original turns and twists of fancy as well as with their power of describing the troubles of wise rulers and the shameful peculiarities both of the viciously civilized world and its ferocious and barbarous invaders. One of these is Apollinaris Sidonius Modestus, Prefect of Rome and Bishop of Arverna, and the other is Cassiodorus, Theodoric’s classical secretary of state; and though the former probably died before the particular week in the last October of the fifth century which I have selected for the events recorded here, and the latter was probably a child at that time, both these literary personalities can, it seems to me, be legitimately drawn upon to aid the naturalness of our presentation without straining too far the verisimilitude of historic fact.

And, finally, as far as Boethius is concerned, who was born about 480 and was imprisoned and executed by Theodoric about 524, he would have been nearly twenty by the autumn of 499, and therefore it would have been quite natural that a scholarly Brythonic chieftain from North Wales visiting Rome should have made friends with such a brilliant youth, who only ten years later became a consul and a senator, and twenty years later was murdered by the Gothic ruler.

The local details of the Arthurian mission here described, and the particular debouching of the "Saeson" — the Saxons under Colgrim — into Edeyrnion, together with Arthur's forced march to head them off, might justly be called representative rather than historical: but Professor Ifor Williams, in his illuminating preface written in Welsh to the famous poem of Aneirin, puts the seal of his authority upon the following passage quoted from Roman Britain by Collingwood and Myres: "The Celtic tribes... had no horses that could carry a man in battle... the Saxon invaders were infantry fighting with spears and having little or no body-armour... against such an enemy a small force of ordinary Roman cavalry resolutely led must prove invincible." Both Welsh and English historians agree that it was in the sixth century, and against the sons of the invading King Ida of Northumbria, that Owain the son of Uryen of Rheged fought the battles celebrated later by Taliesin. The Picts (Ffichtiaid) and the Scots (Gwyddylaid) were the grand enemies of the Romanized Brythons in the province of North Wales known then, as it is known still, as Edeyrnion. The name Edeyrn is derived from the Roman name Eternus, and all Cunedda’s sons had similar Roman names; such as Tacitus, from which comes Tegid, the present name for Bala Lake, the Marianus, from which comes Merioneth, the present name of the county.

As we contemplate this historic background to the autumn of the last year of the fifth century, it is impossible not to think of the background of human life from which today we watch the first half of the twentieth century dissolve into its second half. As the old gods were departing then, so the old gods are departing now. And as the future was dark with the terrifying possibilities of human disaster then, so, today, are we confronted by the possibility of catastrophic world events compared with which those that Arthur and his counsellor and his horsemen contended against seem, as the Hebrew poet said, “a very little thing.”

CHAPTER I. The Watchtower

PORIUS STOOD UPON the low square tower above the southern gate of Mynydd-y-Gaer and looked down on the wide stretching valley below, a valley that was still covered by the aboriginal forest but which now bore the name Eternus or Edeyrn, the name of a favourite among the sons of the Brythonic chieftain Cunedda from whom Porius was the fifth in succession. “Eternus, Edernus, Edeyrn,” he was murmuring mechanically as he gazed down at that far-spread expanse of treetops. He was thinking of the pedantic way the old Roman, his mother’s father, from whom he had received his own name, would always catch them up over the pronunciation of such a word as “Eternus” and make them repeat it in the correct Roman manner.

It was on behalf of the elder Porius that he had to go down presently into that darkening forest and following the Path of the Dead that led to a prehistoric earth-work called y Grug or The Mound, bring back to Mynydd-y-Gaer, the hill fortress of their race, a pitcher of the holy water from the Fountain of Saint Julian, whose present guardian, the eccentric hermit Brother John, had been his friend from childhood.

The Mound on the way to the Fountain, with the Path of the Dead that led to it, had been an aboriginal burning-and-burying place; but the locality had been taken possession of several hundreds of years ago by a particularly ferocious clan of Gwyddyl-Ffichti, whose hold on the district had only been brought to an end a century ago by Porius’s own tribe led by the great Brythonic chieftain Cunedda.

For centuries had these Gwyddylaid, who intermarried with the Ffichti or Picts in a way the pure-blooded Brythons never did, been a menace to the peace imposed by Roman law. From very early days the forest people had found the Gwyddyl-Ffichti their worst plague. They had managed in their own mysterious fashion to survive the onslaughts of the Ffichtiaid taken alone.

But when these wild tribes joined forces with the Gwyddylaid, and together the two predatory races harassed them from both the west and the north, the forest people were constantly losing ground. The Roman invaders however allowed themselves to be propitiated into a haughty patience by these unconquerable yet unwarlike successors of the legendary giants who in the beginning possessed the land, though they rarely enrolled them in their legions as they were glad enough to enroll the warlike Brythonic Celts.

But the forest people, who were themselves Iberian wanderers from Africa, and who had been the first of all the tribes of men to intrude on the solitudes of the Ffichtiaid and the aboriginal giants, though they managed to propitiate the Romans, had always found it impossible to propitiate the Gwyddyl-Ffichti.

Not a tribe in all the long sequence of marauders who had invaded them proved to be such a menace. All but one of their immemorial devices for dealing with conquerors and oppressors failed them with these diabolical enemies. But this one device did not fail them; namely, their genius for thriving in inaccessible places and under lamentable conditions, and the art of emerging in secret and retreating in secret amid the impenetrable woods and mountains.

Yes, the Gwyddyl-Ffichti were the worst affliction they had ever suffered. Even the formidable survivors of Lost Atlantis, with their cult of the Great Serpent, even the mysterious race called Coranians who possessed some subhuman or superhuman power of gathering and exchanging news, and who swept across the country like a pestilence, were less destructive.

The Brythonic Celts rarely married with either the Gwyddyl-Ffichti or the forest people; but Porius's paternal great-grandfather, Edeyrn, had married an aboriginal giantess and thus had broken this racial taboo. His son Iddawc had broken it also and was called “the Apostate” for so doing. This latter had married a forest princess named Indeg who was descended from an Iberian royal house that receded into remote antiquity and had once ruled all the western lands from Marrakesh to Mona.

Porius himself, as he stood now motionless upon his tower, was not an exceptionally tall man. Indeed he was well under six feet. But his physical strength looked immense and was as a matter of fact even greater than it looked. His face was rugged rather than austere, striking rather than handsome, formidable rather than commanding.

It was late in the afternoon on the eighteenth of October in the year of Christ four hundred and ninety-nine that this only son of Einion ab Iddawc gazed down upon the valley from his watchtower over the gate.

Compared with the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, Porius's Brythonic Celts were now civilized and Romanized. Most of them were nominal Christians. A few were fanatical Christians. All of them were chivalrous and proud and revengeful.

It had indeed been their skill in modern warfare that had led one Roman magnate — some say none other than the great general Stilicho under the Emperor Theodosius — to promise their chief Cunedda a new realm, the most fertile between Uriconium and Mona, if he would consent to establish himself there in perpetuity and bring with him as settlers to this favoured but Gwyddylaid-infested spot a large colony of the more adventurous of his people.

Porius had recently passed an uneventful thirtieth birthday, but as he stared at the wide landscape before him he knew with every faculty of apprehension he possessed that he had reached the first great turning point in his life. Two disturbing pieces of news had reached him in the last twenty-four hours, either of them enough to break up more completely the order of his days than would have seemed possible a week ago. And the worst of it was that he had to take — for the first time in his life — full absolute solitary personal responsibility for a choice of action that would affect, and affect catastrophically, every person connected with him.

Thus as he pressed the front of his wrists against the high coping of the wide stone battlement and leaned forward in the posture of a raven contemplating a dizzy flight, he felt anything but at peace with an accepted destiny.

Full of troubled thoughts he gazed at that richly watered and verdurous valley. He stared at the dark heath-covered mountainous range guarding that valley's eastern approach. He stared at the leafy woods, forest piled above forest, that rose into the camp-entrenchments protecting that rich valley to the west. Anyone could see that the Romans had not deceived the Brythonic chief, but though the son of Cunedda had chosen his portion of the rich inheritance with a wise instinct, a Welsh chieftain's mind in the autumn of the year four hundred and ninety-nine had other cares than the sowing of barley or the pasturing of flocks. But Porius, preoccupied and perplexed as he was, was not oblivious of the landscape. As far as his vision could reach wound the serpentine curves of the sacred river, the river worshipped as a goddess still by many of the natives of that region. He could follow her course for nearly a score of miles; could follow it indeed until, dimmed by mist and obscured by distance, she was lost to sight between the descending ridges.

All along the banks of this mother of rivers, Dyfrdwy, Divine Water, stretched the fertile communal clearings of his family's domain. The furthest of these arable lands were visible to him now as dark ploughed-up patches of earth interspersed with stubble. The colour of this stubble under the afternoon's diffused light, for between the sky and the earth hung a film of floating vapour, was a colour to which Porius, even if he had had all his wits about him, could have given no name.

Compared with the dusky sepia-brown of the ploughed fields and the threatening greenish black of the timeless forest these far-off stubble fields showed almost white; but it was a whiteness that had nothing in it of the phantasmal or the unearthly — it was a friendly whiteness like the glint of silver at the mead-drinking he had just left.

And yet there was something else, something drawn from it or bestowed on it by the strangely steel-like surface of the river; something that might have suggested to a less troubled watcher the mother-of-pearl glimmerings in the hollow curves of some vast green-veined sea shell.

The remote uncertainty, however, of these shifting lights and attenuated contrasts vanished when Porius's gaze moved homeward, following the downstream flow of the river. What he saw then under the misty sky were things palpable and familiar. The eyeballs in his small yellowish green eyes had only to move the distance of the width of the smallest butterfly's antenna to bring back his vision from where the river lost itself beyond Lake Tegid to where, only a mile below his watchtower, it grew wide and noisy and shallow at the Ford of Mithras.

But no Mithraic raven or crow either from the fortress of Bran, though its wings bore it never so straight to its ael, or "goal," could have anticipated the speed with which his thoughts that afternoon — and they were neither particularly noble thoughts nor particularly sympathetic ones — followed and overtook his vision. His face wore the troubled expression of a young boy who has suddenly been thrust into a position of mature responsibility. He was surveying the township of Corwen now, with her Brythonic dwellings under the shadow of the high rocks, and her native huts under the lop-hewn oaks of what was left of the virgin forest.

Porius at one time had known both these civilized and these aboriginal dwellings in every smallest detail; for his foster-mother in whose abode, as behoved the son of a Brythonic chief, he had spent his boyhood, lived above the church of Saint Julian under one of those jagged rocks. Even now had a stranger questioned him about every building in sight he could have given some sort of answer; for though the town of Corwen had changed considerably, both in size and in civilization since, less than a hundred years ago, the great Pelagius came on his famous visit to the Fountain of Saint Julian, few erections whether of wood or stone lacked the curious distinguishing characteristics that marked the intense individuality of this part of North Wales.

Porius was facing due southwest from that squat tower above the Gaer gate, so that save for a few wooded hills that descended into the winding valleys beneath the Arenig Range and beneath Cader Idris there was no solid object between him as he stood there and the salt estuary that ran into the open sea.

It was one of those peculiar afternoons that arrive in late October or early November in this district and are entirely dominated by one natural phenomenon alone — the phenomenon of mist. Wavering and fluctuating in its advances and retreats and only tangible to the sensitive skin by a faint impact of wetness and chilliness the mist rises, it would appear, by its own volition, or by the will of the divine water, straight out of the river and, unaffected by wind or sun, assumes, weak creature as it is, the dominant and mastering control of a whole unreturning day. This rape of a day by the weakest of her children was more significant of that spot than any other of Nature’s methods.

The curious thing for our watcher above the gate about this particular October day in the last year of the fifth century was that the ambiguous colour assumed by those distant patches of stubble seemed to be slowly moving towards him, spreading up the slope of the sky with the persistence of a human presence.

It was a colour like that of an extremely pallid sunset and it was as if a segment of the western horizon had just now taken upon itself to anticipate the visual effect of the descent of the sun, only to do so in the reverse way, and were now retracing the sun’s declension and stealing up the firmament with the intention of reaching the zenith.

But the mist was already dimming it and would soon swallow it up. The mist had given and the mist would shortly take away. But if the peculiar colour that was now moving up the sky from those far-off stubble fields towards the watcher upon the gate was to be destroyed by the mist as it had been created by the mist, Porius himself, who had only just emerged from the low-roofed chambers and intricate stone corridors of Mynydd-y-Gaer, felt that a more arbitrary and more inscrutable power than any vapour between earth and heaven had risen from the stubble of the world’s past and was threatening not only his own future but the future of the two women who ruled his life.

His betrothed, who was also his cousin, was a special pet of the Three Aunties, as the forest people called the revered Modrybedd, his father’s aunts, who were the unmarried sisters of Indeg, Iddawc the Apostate’s wife; and since the girl’s father, Brochvael ab Iddawc, lived at a dwelling called Ty Cerrig in the direction of the Modrybedd’s forest palace she was constantly seeing them.

Alarch the Fair, who was at once Porius's aunt and foster-mother, was also the real mother of his cousin and closest friend, Rhun ap Gwrnach, but she and her husband were both dead, and Rhun now lived at the Gaer.

Porius was a man with an immense capacity for happiness but so far he was only beginning to adjust himself to certain contradictory strains in his blood that had worried and teased him from childhood.

One of his fixed ideas was that he was the kind of man to whom women could never be attracted and to whose opinions they never could pay attention. This self-distrust had undoubtedly something to do with his complete submission to the least wish, whim, caprice, or fancy of each of the two women of his manhood, that is to say, of his real mother the Lady of the Gaer, and of his betrothed, Morfydd ferch Brochvael.

Yes, the chief reason why, with so much massive egoism and so much sturdy power of enjoyment, he had had an uneasy life lay not in his nerves, which were unusually equable, but in his blood with its divided loyalties and contradictory traditions.

It was not that the Roman blood he inherited through his mother mixed badly with his Brythonic blood. Those two strains intermingled like wine and water, or honey and milk. The trouble with him, as with Einion his father, came from the aboriginal Berber blood that they derived from Indeg, the wife of Iddawc the Apostate, the elder sister of the Three Aunties.

The real prehistoric aboriginals of Wales were the legendary giants whose names still clung — and perhaps more than their names — to certain mountainous regions, but with the exception of the mysterious Ffichtiaid, of whom, before the Gwyddylaid intermarried with them, nothing is known, the natives of that part of Britain were the same evasive, imaginative, and unwarlike forest people who had found the giants here in the beginning, or imagined they found them, and had, so to say, played hide-and-seek with them ever since.

In their customs the forest people were totally different from both the Gwyddyl-Ffichti and the Brythons. In fact their whole way of life was non-Aryan and non-Celtic. It was communistic and matriarchal, tempered by the druidic magic that had reached them from the survivors of the lost continent of Atlantis.

Over the native quarter of Corwen, and over all the region west of the river extending to the fringes of the swamps and to the foothills of the mountains, the Three Modrybedd, colloquially known as the Three Aunties, exercised, like uncrowned princesses of a fallen dynasty, an occult, secretive, incalculable authority.

The more sophisticated of the Romanized Brythons, even among the descendants of Edeyrn the son of Cunedda, had now for several generations made a sort of aesthetic cult of the wildest superstitions of the forest people; till with Einion ab Iddawc, Porius's father, this cult became the one dominant passion of a humorous sceptic. But Einion's small princedom of Edeyrnion was but an epitome of what was going on throughout the whole of Britain. As long as Porius could remember, crisis had followed crisis, conspiracy conspiracy, feud feud, while the pirates from Germania were forever landing in fresh bands. After the death of his foster-mother and his return to the Gaer Porius's feelings had been constantly harrowed and his tact constantly put to the test by the bitter and complicated quarrels between his parents. His mother was a great-niece of Uthyr Pendragon, and consequently a cousin of the Emperor Arthur. Both she and the old Roman, her father, had been, ever since he grew to manhood, urging him to make a selection from their best fighting men and place them, along with his own strength and prestige, at the service of the emperor.

Porius’s father, on the contrary, whose authority as the hereditary head of their proud Brythonic tribe was absolute, forbade him to think of anything of the kind, and the Three Princesses threw the whole weight of their formidable if occult influence over the natives entirely on the chieftain’s side.

Their view was that the Emperor Arthur was himself half a Roman and that Porius and his contingent would only have to join his notorious Roman cavalry, which was always making wild rushes from one end of Britain to the other, leaving the Gwyddyl-Ffichti to emerge from concealment as soon as the noble horsemen had passed, and permitting the ships of the Saxons to sail on to a fresh attack on some other harbour town.

Porius’s betrothed, Morfydd ferch Brochvael, naturally took the view of the Three Princesses of Ogof-y-Gawr, the Giant’s Cave, and used all her power over him to undermine the influence of the Lady of Mynydd-y-Gaer. Self-distrustful in his devotion to these two resolute women, he was as candid and pliable in all matters of personal conduct as he was remote and detached in his secret thoughts. The shock to his whole nature of the death of his foster-mother who was the real mother of his only intimate friend, Rhun ap Gwrnach, had made his obedience to the woman who had given him birth resemble a lover’s loyalty to an unhappy and beautiful woman, rather than the familiar understanding of a son; and he was no sooner accepted as the betrothed of Morfydd than he began applying the same method of submissive obedience, tempered with inward reservations, to his ways with his betrothed.

Nor had these tendencies in him been decreased by his grown-up pity for both women, the elder of whom had been made unhappy by the constant infidelities of Einion ab Iddawc and the latter outraged and hurt in every nerve by the loss of her only brother. Einion ab Iddawc had always been as much of a puzzle to his only child as he had been a trial to the child's mother. The prince seemed to care for nothing but hunting and light-of-loves and listening to Indeg's three sisters talk of the heathen superstitions of their people.

By his light-of-loves and his drinking and even more by the devils and she-devils of the Three Aunties, Einion had driven his wife further and further into her only sanctuary, the unearthly piety and fanatical faith which she derived from Minnawc Gorsant, the inspired priest and actual builder with his own hands of the first Corwen church.

It was this priest with his spiritual threatenings and denunciation who had been the direct cause of the murder of Morfydd's brother. In fact Porius's whole life seemed fatally involved with this accursed ecclesiastic. Under the man's influence, combined with that of the incorrigible old Roman her father, who was a devoted Christian, the Lady of the Gaer had come to find in religion the only pleasure — save what the priest's own loyalty to her might mean — that she got out of life at all; while Morfydd could not endure the least reference to her brother's enemy. This meant that the two women of his life now rarely met. In fact he had had a painful struggle to prevent his betrothal being broken off because of Morvran ap Brochvael's death. It was only the unbreakable fraternal link between the chieftain and his brother that had saved the situation.

Having been a traveller in his time and a collector of rare books, Brochvael ab Iddawc had nothing mentally in common with his elder brother, but they were curiously attached to each other; and they both liked the idea of their only children being united. Morvran ap Brochvael had in real truth died a martyr to free thought, at any rate to the free expression of his godless thoughts, and Morfydd herself had always been his one intimate confidante. The murderous and superstitious riot, worked up by the priest, in which the young man had perished, had occurred among the more fanatical members of their own Brythonic tribe. The forest people had held quite aloof.

Nor would it ever have occurred if Brochvael ab Iddawc had not been too absorbed in his books, and Porius himself too absorbed in his own jealousy of the youth's influence over Morfydd, to notice what was going on.

As he now thought of the wretched boy's tragic end and of the priest who had caused it, he stared down on the fragmentary masonry of the unfinished church of Corwen with a cold and deadly anger. Up from the inmost recesses of his being surged the feeling, "I must escape once and for all from the religion of this man!" His small, deep-socketed, yellow-green eyes, eyes that when he was badgered became like the eyes of a badger or even a bear, gleamed dangerously from beneath his bristly eyebrows as he stared across the river at those heaps of piled-up stones below the rocky precipice.

"Those stones," he said to himself, "would look exactly the same from here — that is, from a mile away — if they were ruins! And ruins one day they will be — ruins and dust — dust and annihilation!"

As he went on staring at Saint Julian's unfinished walls, he began to fancy that he actually caught sight, for all it was a mile away, of that tucked-up monkish habit as the fellow clapped on slab after slab of calch, or whatever kind of mud it was, like a busy, stinging insect, for the daubing of his curst church. How sickening that their Brythonic-Roman township should be already baptized with a name put on it, as the forest people said, by a magic fate! Corwen, the "White Choir" — how he hated the word! The Ford of Mithras was what his foster-brother, Rhun ap Gwrnach, always called their town; but no one would have dared to speak of Mithras in his grandfather’s presence. The old Roman would have groaned if he’d heard that name and would have sighed and shaken his head and stared into vacancy, while his mother would have begged her son the moment they were alone to tell Rhun ap Gwrnach to keep Mithras to himself. “Your grandfather thinks,” she would have said, “that Mithras was the cause of the corruption of the empire.”

Porius had come out on the watchtower that evening while his father and the rest drank their mead to collect his thoughts a little before deciding on a course of action, for the two separate pieces of news that had just reached him might, he knew only too well, affect the whole of his life. Both pieces of news were indeed so serious that everything in him which dodged responsibility and shrank from drastic decision was tempted to postpone the moment of fatal choice. He took refuge now in this problem of naming places. “Some names,” he thought, “are beautifully congruous with what they depict; others are disjointed, arbitrary, accidental. What’s happening here is a struggle between two cohorts of invisible spirits; one trying to name our town by a heathen name and one by a Christian name.”

His thought seemed to merge itself in that colour moving up the sky. “It’ll be,” he said to himself, “the hut dwellers of the forest, not the house dwellers among those walls, who’ll give it the name that’ll last! And on what will their choice depend?” He shifted his position a little and looked north. Here he saw an undulating ridge of low mountains that rarely assumed any other colour than their own Special tint of dark blue, a ridge that bore the name of Moel y Famau, the Mountain of the Mothers!

“Not on Roman common sense,” he thought, “will the choice depend, nor on Brythonic romance; rather on fate and chance, rather on a mysterious magic in things, outside man’s control.”

He continued to stare at the mass of rough-hewn stone walls across the river as they lay in the peaceful hush of the long Brythonic dinner hour clustered beneath their protective precipice of steep and broken rocks, while he made out the familiar dwellings he knew so well. He found himself muttering, as he looked, a queer malediction under his breath, an ancient curse upon Gorsant the priest, a curse from which the passing of time had long since sucked out all intelligible meaning. He felt as he stared at those buildings as though he were looking at a deep-rooted island in the tossing ocean of time, and as though he couldn't look at it closely enough before his ship, with all her sails spread, had whirled him past!

A stranger suddenly emerging from the interior of this ancient hill fortress and finding himself confronted by the figure of Porius might well have cried in his heart: "What a Hercules of a man!" But had he proceeded, as Einion ab Iddawc's guests sometimes presumed to do, to try to draw out from this Hercules his views upon Constantinople and Rome, and upon the Saxon invaders, and upon the burning question of the great Monophysite Heresy, he would have had scant encouragement.

Plunged from infancy into the criss-cross eddies of racial and religious divergence, surrounded by mysterious treacheries, concealed hostilities, obscure conspiracies, the Herculean Porius had acquired an instinctive habit of sluggish and watchful reserve.

This reserve, which a slow-moving patience and phlegmatic caution had made so easy to him that it had become like a second nature, he kept up with his closest intimates. He kept it up with his betrothed, he kept it up with his mother, and as a rule he kept it up even with his foster-brother Rhun, who knew him better than anybody in the world except the old hermit of the Fountain. But below this reserve Porius's mind was the opposite of a sluggish one. It was abnormally restless. His nature was indeed singularly adapted — few of his generation more so — to the difficult exigencies of the year of grace, four hundred and ninety-nine.

His foster-brother Rhun, as far as he could tell, had not the faintest notion that his slow-moving massive strength — a strength for which he was as famous throughout Edeyrnion and Ardudwy as was his uncle Brochvael for a different cause throughout the book-markets of Gaul — concealed such an inquisitive, unquiet, sceptical intelligence; nor did Morfydd guess its existence, no! not even when, seated on his knee, she saw his small deep-set eyes change colour from grey-green to green and from green to the amber of a swollen torrent.

The truth — as he had once confessed to Brother John when the old man discoursed on his theory that their confused modern times produced a completely new type of human being — was that he had the physical characteristics of an easygoing giant whose consciousness had been invaded by an observant, evasive, and completely detached elf.

Easygoing? A sensation, as if an internal grimace of sardonic amusement were contracting the muscles of his stomach, passed through him, and he thought of the frequent occasions when he felt certain that he had inherited — and an instinct whispered to him through whom — at least a drop of the blood of the mysterious race whose habitations the forest people had discovered, and whose solitudes they had invaded. No! Not exactly, not precisely, "easygoing." At least he didn't feel like that now as he leaned on the rampart recalling scene by scene, encounter by encounter, face by face, the circumstances of Morvran ap Brochvael ab Iddawc's murder.

He felt as if — though it was a couple of miles — he actually could make out the familiar entrance to the Giant's Cave and see from where he stood the hollow stone the Three Aunties called "the stone of rebirth" and the other they called "the stone of sacrifice."

It was January, nine months ago, when Morvran was killed. Of the killing itself he knew nothing. It must have happened beyond the Swamp of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti.

But what he could vividly conjure up now was, one night, the man's mangled remains wailed over by the Three Princesses and then — another night — the three of them, the sacred Modrybedd — Esyllt, Erddud, and Tonwen — beautiful, desperate enchantresses, spectres with grey hair, bowing and swaying and murmuring unknown gibberish that might have been addressed to Satan, and the body of the dead gone, lost, vanished — the devil knew where — and those huge marks in the new-fallen snow that the forest people swore were gigantic footprints!

As Porius bent now over the rampart of his watchtower it seemed to him that the ghostly colour from those far-off stubble fields, which the grey shoulders of the mist had been carrying all that October afternoon, had been unloaded above those dwellings he knew so well, above the palace of the princesses, above the church of Christ, above the house of his betrothed, and hung suspended there, isolating from all the rest of the world those dwellings that in their harmonies and discords, in their manias and mysteries, made up the fatal ghost-bread of his life!

He was certainly in a queer mood that afternoon — and no wonder after those two pieces of news! In the power of his feelings — and he would have been puzzled to put into words exactly what he did feel — he set himself to imagine Morfydd transcribing some special Virgilian lines as she sat with her father among his books. Virgil had always been a favourite with her murdered brother, though neither he nor she had the absolute passion for learning that had made Brochvael ab Iddawc familiar to all the scholars of Gaul.

“I shall never be like Uncle Brochvael,” Porius said to himself, and he said it with a sigh of relief; for the idea of collecting books in Rome and Athens and Antioch, not to speak of the cities of southern Gaul, gave him at this moment an extremely uncomfortable feeling; a feeling as if his enormous strength — this strength which made him think of the giants of Cader Idris — were beginning to dry and rot and turn putrid and powdery, like the inside of swollen puffballs!

Something in his blood anyway, something that had remained un-Aryanized and un-Christianized suddenly began to cry out from the pit of his stomach. It cried out against these very decisions he had to make, yes! against these monstrous decisions, these blasphemous decisions, these decisions that descended to the very roots of his life. Why couldn’t he find ease for this cry of his giant’s blood by thinking of Morfydd? Her breasts were small but her hair was long; and it now occurred to him that the reason why he was so impressed by this particular colour in the sky was that under two conditions, under the condition of anger and the condition of weeping, there always occurred in the centre of her forehead, produced either by a suffusion of blood or a withdrawing of blood, a livid patch of just that precise tint.

Yes, it was when she was angry and when she began to weep that this dead stubble-field shadow made its appearance beneath her skin. Her eye sockets at these times seemed to increase in size and there would come into being round their edge, a dark recessive inward-curving ring like the circumference of a miniature crater out of the centre of which blazed her wrath.

And it was the same when her features distorted themselves into a pattern of heartbreaking quaintness when she was on the verge of tears. In both cases — such was her peculiarity — there shone forth this ivory frontlet between her arched eyebrows.

It was abundantly clear to him now why he had found this particular tint so irresistible. He had come to associate the poignancy of her abandonment to pity and wrath so completely with this particular token, that the sight of this stubble-field colour burdening the mist called up in him all those old familiar feelings with which since the days when she was five and Rhun was fifteen and he was ten he was wont to quiet her emotion.

Jesus Christ! But he had no decisions to make then! "I must go down and get hold of Rhun," he thought. "What the devil is keeping him? He can't be drinking."

But he felt reluctant to face the mead drinkers in the smoky hall. After the low-roofed chambers and stone corridors of the Gaer, the liberating obscurity of this immense catafalque of mist, as it went on unloading that ivory-coloured essence of ghostly corn as if it were the life sap of a dying goddess, though it did not heal his trouble nor solve his perplexity, gave him an inflow of strength from which he could draw enough force to get a certain humorous pleasure from the confused and conflicting currents of fate. Currents all the more disturbing since not only the issue of the crisis, but his own desire as to the issue, remained wavering and uncertain. "I can't wait for Rhun much longer," he said to himself, and then without warning he experienced the feeling that he had uttered those very same words before — he himself staring at a group of houses or at one single house while Rhun stared at a group of men or at one single man — and following this feeling as if it had all happened before, the thought came to him that it was as natural for Rhun to be a worshipper of the soldier's god Mithras, as it was for himself to have a secret sympathy with Auntie Tonwen's mania for propitiating their sacred river.

It was just as he left the banquet hall that he had noticed how his foster-brother was staring at their remarkable guest, the State Chronicler from Dyfed, whom the emperor had recently made Chief Narrator, or Henog, to his court, and commissioned to write the life of his philosopher and friend, the famous Myrddin Wyllt.

"Curse you, Rhun! I shan't wait for you much longer."

Rhun's interest in the long-lasting secret fraternity of warriors of every race and blood that had taken the Persian god as their saviour had of late — for some reason completely obscure to himself — profoundly irritated Porius.

Of one thing he was certain: there was nothing of the Roman orthodoxy of his grandfather about this annoyance. What it felt like was personal jealousy. But it was absurd to think he could be jealous of a Persian god. Besides —

In his irritation he half-resolved to descend the stair into the Gaer, get his spear and the water bottle, and set out. But even as he made his way to the north-west parapet of his watchtower he realized that the disturbing news he had received made it essential there should be two of them upon this particular quest, and almost essential that one of the two should be Rhun ap Gwrnach seeing that as a messenger he was twice as fast as any man of their tribe from Dinas Bran to Deganwy. But he moved all the same to the northwest rampart of the tower; and he had to move with some discretion, for it was just here where the stairway descended into the interior of the Gaer that the masonry of the platform round this descent was broken, loose, and uneven.

Arrived at this northwestern parapet, Porius surveyed the stretch of country now before him with an air that made him seem a different man. What in fact he now contemplated was a landscape associated in his mind with nothing but adventure and friendship. With this view before him he could forget all women and all gods.

To the west of the wide-stretching hills, covered with forests that rose like dusky waves in a billowy sea and swept the onlooker's imagination towards the mysterious mountain ranges that towered up, ridge by rocky ridge, to the high peaks of Eryri, lay the Fountain of Saint Julian — really a small lake — which was soon to be his goal.

Here abode Brother John, his friend and teacher from childhood; Brother John who himself had been the friend of a man who in his youth had been a disciple of the great Pelagius, condemned as a heretic by the Pope of Rome.

But whether gazing south or north, whether thinking of Brother John or playing with the vision of that ghost of the dead harvest, at the back of Porius's consciousness there always remained those two portentous pieces of news. Porius's father, the carefree irresponsible despot of their particular branch of the House of Cunedda, had of late enjoyed his eccentric life to such a tune that he had come to leave all the wartime precautions to the old Roman, his wife's father.

But though this old Patrician had his hand in most things there were certain administrative and executive matters that Einion ab Iddawc insisted should be attended to by the younger Porius and by nobody else.

Among these was the reception of important news brought by special watchers on all the borders of their province. This may have been a pathetically simple attempt of the Brythons to emulate those alarming intruders from the east called Coranians, who appear to have used the winds in their transmission of news.

It seems certain that the Gwyddyl-Ffichti knew nothing of this practise of border guards, though it was used against them; and the elder branch of the descendants of Cunedda, the ones who possessed Deganwy, never seem to have used it. The fact of Iddawc ab Edeyrn being himself the son of a daughter of the giants, and his own daring in marrying a native princess, had helped to accentuate this difference between the Edeyrnion branch of the family and the one that ruled over Deganwy.

Certain it is that at this particular moment of his life, aged thirty years and three weeks, the grandson of Iddawc the Apostate felt that neither the Brythonic nor the Roman strains in his blood had any real power over his destiny. It is probable too that neither of the women who dominated him would have had the least idea as to what he was thinking as he stood with his back to the descending steps and stared at the Swamp of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti and at the prehistoric avenue beyond it, called the Path of the Dead.

He was thinking that it would be a marvellous comfort if he could talk tonight to someone who really knew the best and the worst of him as Brother John alone knew these things.

"But I must tell Rhun," he said to himself. "Mithras or no Mithras, I must tell Rhun; for he'll have to go with me — he'll have to go with us."

Then all of a sudden, as happens with human consciousness when important decisions are being made, there occurred a vanishing away of the open space in the forest at which — with his small greenish yellow eyes screwed up — he had been gazing so long, and in its place rose the banquet hall of the Gaer and the image of his foster-brother moving to the side of the historian from the south, at whom he had been staring, and actually — the shy and awkward Rhun, grandson of a Greek freedman — entering into conversation with the State Chronicler from Dyfed, the newly appointed Henog to the Emperor Arthur.

Porius had been fascinated by this man from the first time he saw him, and though Sylvanus ap Bleheris had been with them now ever since the early summer, he found him just as difficult to understand and not at all less interesting than when he first appeared.

"He must have wanted to find out whether Rhun had heard of any new case of this Cader Idris business and have willed him to sit with him when the rest were drunk. I'm not going to worry about him tonight."

But Porius found it easier to call up the image of the emperor's Henog than to dismiss it when called up; and with that curious second consciousness that was always flapping its fantastic and reckless wings inside his muscular frame, while it watched with detached amusement his thoughts and sensations, he noted now how the autumnal forest before him with its varying shades where lay the Swamp of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti and the Path of the Dead, the whole of which had disappeared as he conjured up the scene between Rhun and the Henog, now began coming back; only coming back piecemeal and in arbitrary fragments, so that it was through an umbrageous mist of vegetation, out of which every now and then some particular oasis of familiar shape and colour would outline itself for a moment only to re-dissolve, that he pondered on the grey visage, the long pointed nose, and the warm black gown of the historian.

Nor was the forest, with its dissolving views of the Path of the Dead and the Swamp of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, content with carrying familiar fragments of its leafy reality into the midst of the wavering eidola of Porius's vision of the historian; it even invaded the phantasmagoric cloud of gods and devils and giants and magicians and monsters who, from the glimpses the Henog permitted of them, possessed congenial habitations within the man's extraordinarily shaped skull.

Porius had not been the only one of the family to fall under the spell of the Henog. It is true that the Lady of the Gaer and the elder Porius still held aloof, for Minnawc Gorsant, the priest, had interspersed his Masses all through that summer and autumn with the Church's fiercest denunciations of sorcery; but with Brochvael ab Iddawc the man had held long and intense colloquies from which Morfydd — presumably because they concerned the disappearance of her brother's body — was excluded.

With his hands on this northwestern parapet, Porius now squared his enormous shoulders and indulged himself to the limit in the sensation of possessing in his stupendous muscles — which still at thirty seemed gathering strength — the power of those prehistoric aboriginals.

It was known that the wife of the son of Cunedda, the mother of Iddawc the Apostate, was a giant-waif from Cader Idris. And it was not at all certain that this woman was the last of them.

Porius knew that after the vanishing of the mangled remains of Morvran, which had been the last of several such disappearances, his father had actually sent an expedition of youthful warriors to search all possible hiding places on the slopes of Cader Idris, in order to make sure that no scattered remnants of Gwyddyl-Ffichti, lurking in prehistoric caves and even in caverns beneath the mountain tarns, were responsible for this weird sequence of body-snatching.

Well! The shrewd chronicler from Dyfed had no doubt by this time heard every detail of the unhappy secrets of their House under the pretext of studying Brochvael ab Iddawc's books. He must have had long talks with Auntie Esyllt who probably told him how her niece Alarch ferch Iddawc had disgraced the family by marrying Gwrnach, the son of Agenor, a Greek slave. She must have told him too about his own betrothal to Morfydd and about the murder of Morvran and how the family was divided over the priest's having changed the name of their town from the Ford of Mithras to Corwen, the "White Choir."

What the man didn't hear from the Modrybedd he must have heard from the forest huts, for news could travel among them almost as quickly as it used to do among the old Coranians. The forest huts had kept alive for countless centuries a superstitious respect for the superhuman power of those original inhabitants of the mountain peaks.

No doubt the Three Aunties must have told the Henog about Gwrnach's Mithraic idolatry and how Rhun was secretly carrying it on. They must have explained how Gwrnach's father was a freed slave in the camp at Uriconium where Mithras was the recognized rival to Christ.

"Yes, that's what it is," he said to himself, as he stared at the distant clearing in the forest that marked the Path of the Dead. "The Henog is asking Rhun what he thinks about this disappearance of Morvran's body. God in Heaven! But I wish I'd followed Rhun's advice and burnt it to ashes whatever Morfydd said!"

And his mind reverted to an aspect of Rhun's character that had been puzzling him of late, namely, the motive that had induced this famous runner — for, like his father before him, Rhun with his Greek blood was the fleetest of all their tribe — to persuade Brother John of the Fount to teach him the actual words of that famous heretical chapter of the great Pelagius. What on earth was Mithras to Pelagius or Pelagius to Mithras? Did Rhun do it out of simple kindness to Brother John, knowing how the old man in his far-away boyhood had watched over Pelagius at the last?

And while the clearing in the forest before him, where the space between the oaks took on a paler green, returned to its proper three-dimensional substantiality and ceased to be an unreal, accidental assembling of meaningless colours and shapes, he began to murmur to himself a fragmentary sentence from the chapter in question which Auntie Esyllt had taught him as a child. "Neither Life nor Death nor Love nor Hate nor Angels nor Devils nor Mind nor Matter nor Present nor Past — No! nor even the Blessed Trinity Itself — has any power to meddle with the individual human will or to—" But at this point he was interrupted in his thoughts; and swinging round he found himself confronted by the head, the shoulders, the load the man was carrying, and finally by Rhun ap Gwrnach himself.

"Were you talking to the Henog?"

But Rhun returned him no answer. Always taciturn at a pinch, he was at this moment so heavily loaded with his own and Porius's belongings that he could only shuffle to the eastern parapet and deposit his burden on its broad flat stones. As he staggered past him Porius realized that he was extremely agitated. The blood seemed to be beating up behind his eyeballs, causing his eyes to lose all natural expression; while his breath seemed coming in laboured gasps like the gasps of a toad who has just managed to squeeze through an aperture too small for more than the tip of the tongue of the pursuing snake.

With a groan of relief he finally set down among the other things a large empty water vessel that had at one time possessed a strap for a man's shoulder. This was the old Porius's field-service flask, such as the legionaries quartered at Uriconium were accustomed to carry when on the march; and it was always this particular container that in his hygienic religiosity the old man used to keep filled from the Fountain of Saint Julian.

Having propped a heavy hunting spear against the parapet, and thrown down upon it two massive hunting knives, Rhun looked at his foster-brother in grim expectancy and with the expression of a grown man awaiting orders from a boy. Could their playmate Morfydd, for all three of them were grandchildren of Iddawc the Apostate, have seen them now, as Porius moved over to Rhun's side and turned his head to talk to him, she would certainly have been struck — as everybody in Edeyrnion was constantly being struck — by the surprising facial resemblance between them. They had the same brown hair, the same deep-set hollow eye sockets, the same heavy corrugated brows, the same small greenish yellow eyes. And they dressed in almost the same clothes. Each wore a long leather tunic gathered at the waist by a leather belt, and beneath it a soft, thick, woollen shirt. Each wore leather breeches above short woollen drawers. Each wore high deerskin boots.

One small difference in their attire was that Porius's belt was inlaid with calch lassar, the particular kind of blue enamel for which Britain had been famous all over Europe before the mania of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti for mother-of-pearl and the passion of the legionaries for bronze had discouraged this dainty trade.

Another difference was that Porius's cap was made of the skin of an almost extinct animal, an especial breed of oxen called ychen bannog who were held sacred to the gods until the Brythons came. To see the chief physical difference between them, however, Morfydd would have had to have perched herself on a fragment of wooden rail which still lingered by the staircase up which Rhun had just come.

Since her brother's death she had frequently reminded Porius of a wild bird caught in a cage; and she had always made him think of some sort of bird, especially when she balanced herself in perilous positions. It had been the swift feet and the pedantry of some literary centurion that gained for Rhun's grandfather, the Greek slave at Uriconium, an almost Homeric kudos at the Gaer; and the Greek's son by a native woman had won for his bride, the princesses' niece, on the strength of a memorable life-and-death race with certain Gwyddyl-Ffichti assassins.

Had Morfydd really at that moment been watching her two playmates she might well have had all manner of ambiguous thoughts about this startling resemblance. Was her betrothed's real mother actually this calm sad daughter of Porius Manlius of the great Manlian gens, this proud relative of the Emperor Arthur, now doomed to submit to the incalculable whims and manias of Einion ab Iddawc?

Porius and Rhun had been suckled at the same breast, the breast of the beautiful Alarch daughter of Iddawc, but that wouldn't make them alike! They both had the blood of Iddawc the Apostate — but that wouldn't make them alike!

Why were they so alike? Morfydd might well indeed have asked herself that disturbing question. She might well have wondered whether she would not sooner have been sister to them both rather than the bride of either!

Thus indeed might Porius's caged bird have wished as she looked at the two men; but there was no Morfydd just then, whether in the form of a bird or of any other creature, on the watchtower of Mynydd-y-Gaer on that eighteenth of October in the year four hundred and ninety-nine.

Having left behind them in a crack between two loose stones one of their heavy hunting knives, Rhun carrying Porius's spear and Porius carrying the sacred water bottle, the two men furtively set forth down the slope towards the river. Had the old Patrician at whose behest they were going to the Fount watched them then he might have been reminded of a pair of gladiators.

As soon however as they reached the river, Rhun ap Gwrnach burst out and revealed all that was worrying him. He spoke as impetuously as if he had been the one, and not Porius, who was five years the younger. He confessed that only half an hour ago, when the meal had ended and the drinking hardly begun, he had let their famous guest, the Silurian Henog, slip away unnoticed on one of his exploring excursions among the natives.

“And you see, Porius ab Einion, he’s never been out of this house before; never after the meal, never in the evening. And he’s on foot, and he’s got nobody with him, not even a dog. He’s got no weapon, and he has no more idea than a child of the risks he runs. Every man in the forest has heard of him. It may be safe for him to do this sort of thing down there in the south. But he should understand he’s in the north now. Our people here have guessed he’s writing a book; and you know yourself, Porius, how ticklish this whole matter of Cader Idris is. They say one thing among themselves” — he made a gesture towards the forest huts— “but when we try to meddle — I tell you there isn’t one of them, including the princesses, and you know what they are, who at this actual moment isn’t in league against us — whatever it is” — and Rhun threw a furtive look towards the portion of the horizon where the descent of the sun was concealed by the mist— “whatever it is that comes down from the Cader—”

But Porius interrupted him. “Which way did he go? Don’t you see, man, what it would mean for Father, for me, for all our people in Edeyrnion and Meirion and Ardudwy, if the Henog came to harm through us? Myrddin Wyllt would put upon us such a tynged as would turn us into foxes or beavers or badgers! The Henog’s writing a Vita Merlini by command of the emperor and I wouldn’t be surprised if Myrddin Wyllt himself wasn’t... Jesus, brother! the emperor would send his horsemen to destroy us, or he’d let loose on us all his prisoners to lay our tribe low, if any harm came to the Henog. Which way did he go? Which way? Which way? Which way?”

While he jerked out these words, for he had seized him by the wrist, Porius kept moving the man’s arm up and down as though it were a bell rope, and as though he were rending the air with peal after peal of warning clamour.

Under the propulsion of the appalling possibilities suggested by his cousin, Rhun now tore himself free and waving his spear towards the west, towards that Path of the Dead that led to the ancient burial mound, he set off at a run.

Porius pressed the palm of his right hand against the bone handle of the hunting knife in his belt to make sure it was safely there. Then he swung his right arm free, while with his left hand he clutched the neck of the water flask. He knew exactly whither the other was heading. How natural it seemed to be doing just what they were! He kept recalling as they ran how when he was a child of nine or ten, and Rhun a boy of fourteen or fifteen, he had followed him at just such a sudden impulse!

The two of them knew every wolf's track, every deer's trail, every rabbit run, every badger hole in the district. They didn't know the thickets and undergrowths and the swamps as well as the lads of the forest huts, but they knew the rock caves on the slopes of the mountains a good deal better. Superstitious horrors of an incredible kind, connected with the caves in those remote places, made all the native boys unwilling to leave the maternal shelter of the forest with its huge protective trees.

From the very beginning of human life in these places the giants of the mountains when famished for food must have descended upon the hut-dwellers of the plain. And they must have forced their way through the forest much as he himself was doing now!

He couldn't help envying the easy beauty of Rhun's stride. The man was thirty-five but his limbs had the suppleness and grace of a boy's and his running was crafty and professional too; for he soon curtailed his first impulsive rush and subsided into that same fast-swinging steady trot, reverting no doubt to the Greek athletes of the old time, as one of whom his father Gwrnach had won the princess.

But no movements of a perfect athlete could stop Porius's agitated thoughts from dancing their grotesque dance. How should he — that was the question — lay bare the drift of this huge tidal-wave of news to Rhun? It would certainly be more natural and probably much wiser to put the case to him before revealing anything to his mother or Morfydd. All that he had to decide rose before him now like the twin peaks of Eryri.

For some reason the fate of the Henog didn't trouble him greatly. He had faith in Rhun's instinct as to the fellow's movements; and the mere strain of his muscles and quickening of breath and blood had the effect of dulling his nervous apprehensions. Yes, the further Rhun led him in their pursuit of the man the further the man himself receded into the background. Besides the fellow was a Silurian and he'd never heard of a Venedotian — as his grandfather persisted in calling the natives of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy — being a match for a Silurian, armed or unarmed.

But where in the name of Jesus was he off to now? Rhun had suddenly lessened his pace and now after a second's hesitation had left the path they had been following, which itself was anything but an unbroken one, and plunged into the pathless undergrowth!

Porius followed him without question just as he used to do in the old carefree days before any of these appalling responsibilities and decisions had to be faced. He longed to ask his leader what plan, what purpose, what idea he was pursuing in this wild goose chase; but they were both so completely out of breath, and this new struggle of beating their way through the underbrush — Rhun with Porius's spear and Porius with his bare hand and his Roman bottle — was so absorbing that not so much as a groan, a sigh, a laugh, a chuckle, passed between them.

But the younger man wasn’t following blindly. He knew to a few hundred yards exactly where they were and he divined that his foster-brother was taking this particular short cut so as to come out suddenly and unforeseen, upon the Path of the Dead.

This Path of the Dead was a wide mid-forest avenue, arched by enormous oaks and criss-crossed by intersecting ways, each one of which led to some particular moss-covered mound, while the main avenue, starting from the oldest and largest of these, the one called y Grug, came to an end at the western entrance of Mynydd-y-Gaer. Though a heavily moving runner compared with Rhun, Porius was a good deal less incommoded by the underbrush through which he was being led.

This was only partly due to his being in the rear. It was due quite as much to his power of beating off the bushes and brambles and branches with a sort of automatic aplomb, as if he really were the prehistoric giant he loved to imagine himself, while he pondered with a perfectly detached intelligence on the method he would follow in unburdening his mind to Rhun.

After they’d been forcing their passage in this rough manner for about a quarter of an hour, Rhun himself suddenly stopped dead, and turning round laid his finger upon his lips; then he pressed forward again but at a very different speed and with very different movements. This time he was as careful as a cat stalking a bird not to break a stick or crack a twig or strike a branch with the point of his spear.

As he pushed aside a particularly large bramble that like a serpent with the spiked scales of a dragon had fixed its hold upon the trunk of an ash that was already the victim of a treacherous ivy bride, Porius, panting close at his heels and so near that he could smell the peculiar smell of his sweat which had always struck him as resembling the smell of certain kinds of woodsap, was suddenly aware of a most illuminating idea; the idea, namely, that this interest displayed by Rhun in the philosophy of Pelagius was due to the former's conviction that the logical issue of Pelagianism was the rejection of Christ in favour of Mithras.

All Edeyrnion knew that Rhun had inherited, along with his father's ferryboat, some idolatrous ritual at the Ford of Mithras, and that he had a real Mithraic shrine in what was known as the Cave of the Dog was generally believed. But Porius was as phlegmatic and cautious in action as he was rapid and reckless in thought; and he foresaw endless trouble in Mynydd-y-Gaer if he broke his habitual custom of submission to his mother and her Roman father, each of whom regarded Mithras as anathema.

Prince Einion on the other hand, as befitted a son of Iddawc the Apostate, took neither Christ nor Mithras seriously. In fact the only Immortal, save Dyfrdwy, the sacred river herself, to whom Einion ab Iddawc felt any personal attraction was the forest people's goddess, Ceridwen, whose bloodless worship Gorsant the priest believed he had quite eradicated.

If Morfydd could have seen the two playmates of her childhood now, she would certainly have been amazed and perhaps a little touched by the deadly and feline stealthiness of their progress through that undergrowth.

But it wasn't long before Porius heard a sound that caused him to accelerate his movements till he was at Rhun's side; and he was there just in time! Before them as they peered through the screen of a small sycamore's branches, whose enormous leaves were already brown and covered with curious fungoid spots — black as a scribe's ink, black as if some Henog among the satyrs had deliberately dropped them from an over-full pen — was the Path of the Dead.

Moss of various sorts was mingled here in the soft grass with meadow sorrel; and where the ground grew marshy there were patches of sedge and cotton grass.

The air of this late autumn afternoon was as full of softly drifting, lightly undulating waves of terrestrial coolness as it was open over their heads to the motionless spaces of the untroubled sky. Through the death-sweet odours of toadstools, rotten wood, and dying leaves, through the salt sweat that trickled from their foreheads and the salt blood that oozed from their scratches, through the receding shadows that lay upon them of moss-green intricacies and amber-brown vaultings, they were now aware of a sight such as neither of them had ever thought to see in this place.

Down the centre of the avenue, mounted on a stately white horse, richly harnessed with green and gold, himself in green and gold and holding a lance with a green-and-gold pennon, its silver handle balanced on his right stirrup and its sharp point metal-grey against mist-grey, gleaming high above his helm, rode a young horseman of the new Arthurian cavalry.

"Nama, Nama, Sebesio!" gasped Rhun. But none of the normal life stirrings in that place, least of all the little cloud of October midges that at that moment was moving in undulant curves round Porius's hereditary cap of extinct oxskin, showed the least sign of awe at the sound of those sacred syllables. Sacred indeed! For what the guardian of the Cave of the Dog had dared to blurt out in his excitement was nothing less than the awe-inspiring conclusion of the prehistoric Mithraic Mysteries.

These were words that neither Rhun himself, nor his father, nor even his Greek grandfather, could have interpreted. They were lost words of the priestcraft of ancient Persia; and as often happens at dramatic moments upon earth, these particular sounds, although charged in their long history with far more dramatic interest than the waylaying of a man on a white horse by a man carrying a spear, and a man carrying a water bottle, were no more just then than the fall of a leaf.

Everything else at that particular point in space and time, as the two men moved into the path of the one man, was a dramatic cause followed by a dramatic effect; but although in its long and magical existence the cry "Nama, Nama, Sebesio!" possessed ten thousand times more interest than anything that could possibly occur at this spot on the eighteenth of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, it was destined to dissolve into absolute annihilation without being understood by anyone, without making an impression on anything, without producing as much effect upon the course of events as the smallest of that crowd of midges.

"Jesus Christ!" exclaimed Porius, adding with the next breath, "but he's a pretty fellow!"

"Well, brother," he went on, without troubling either to lower his voice or to raise it, and speaking in the peculiar Edeyrnion dialect which must have been as obscure to this young rider as if it had been a continuation of that mystic litany from Persia, "will you hold his horse while I talk to him?"

Both the men advanced at once into the middle of the road, and the natural result followed. The white horse gave one startled swerve, reared high on her hind legs, and began beating the air with hooves that seemed as they flashed against the grey sky and the brown oaks to be forged out of pure silver. Rhun, always a fool with horses, could do nothing with this ramping centaur; so Porius went to his help, and partly by brute force and partly by the use of words so old that the forest people may have used them to tame the wild asses of Arabia, they got the white mare under control.

But the youthful rider who, to do him justice, had displayed no mean horsemanship, now became haughty and truculent addressing them as taeogion, or “low-born serfs,” and sternly commanding them to get out of his way.

“I — have,” he announced dramatically; and though his words would have been more effective if he hadn’t been forced to bend down while he spoke to adjust the strap of one of his stirrups, his tone wasn’t without a certain dignity, “I have a letter from the Emperor Arthur to Prince Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda and I should be obliged if instead of frightening my horse one of you would be good enough to guide me to your prince’s palace. They tell me it’s in a place called Mons Castrum, near the church of Sanctus Julianus.” He stopped speaking, evidently expecting instant obedience.

Rhun, who was holding one side of the white horse’s bit, looked at his foster-brother, who was holding the other, and saw him put the water bottle carefully on to the ground.

“Hang on to the horse!” cried Porius, and with a gesture as violent and abrupt as his face and temper were unperturbed, he flung up his arms sent the long lance spinning across the avenue, lifted the lad as a woman might shake the dust from a broom, and held him aloft in the air for all his kicking and struggling. He held him as a man might tease an infant without realizing that the child is angry.

He did notice, however, and failed not to put it to the lad’s credit, that in all this desperate waving and jerking of his arms and legs the rider never uttered a single audible sound. “He doesn’t call for help,” Porius thought, “because he doesn’t want to be seen in this position.”

“What shall I do with him?” he enquired of Rhun in a pondering voice; but, as he watched the young man’s contortions, which he did as calmly as if the abnormal muscles of somebody else’s arms were quivering with the strain, there shot into his head like a bolt from empty space the grating and hurting Homeric word "oiktistion" the extreme of pitifulness, and he saw in his mind a certain look come into Morfydd's face. It was the look that came into it once when, as she was teaching him the Greek letters from the Alexandrian scroll that was the chief treasure in her father's house, they came bolt upon that Scylla horror which the hero confessed was the most pitiable thing he saw "while he explored the paths of the sea."

Both his arms and his hands, as he thus held aloft the dumbly struggling youth, were now twitching and quivering with the effort, and though the idea did cross his mind of flinging him amid the branches of the nearest oak tree, he decided, though not in any reckless hurry and quite as if the sinews that seemed as if they would soon break were somebody else's, that he would replace him on the grass.

He proceeded to do this at once, and to do it too with the utmost care, treating the youth as tenderly as if he'd been an infant and he himself an absentminded but conscientious nurse.

Not content with this, as soon as he had set the rider on his feet, he went across to where the lad's lance still lay half-hidden in the heart of a holly bush, and returning with it handed it back. He noticed without surprise as he did this that Rhun, instead of scrupulously abstaining from the least glance at the dumb-founded boy, was watching him with a good deal of alert and concentrated attention. That he should do this produced in Porius quite a number of rather complicated feelings, one of which was pure irritation that Rhun should be free to satisfy a curiosity of which he was aware in himself but despised as a vulgar grossness that must be indignantly suppressed.

It was therefore with a vague abstracted look, a look that saw nothing, that he now approached the youth.

"Give me your letter," he said gently, speaking in the old-fashioned colloquial Latin which he had learnt as a child from Brother John of the Fount, and which was still used in most of the princes' courts and always at Caerleon and Caergwynt, but which the masses of the people couldn't understand.

"You needn't hesitate," he went on, "for to tell you the truth, I am Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc and I have a notion that the emperor's letter concerns me even more than it concerns the prince my father."

If it were the inherited drops of non-Aryan African blood in his veins that now caused Porius to leave that shame-stricken image of humiliation in green and gold, out of which he appeared to have conjured every vestige of self-respect, and go over to the lad's horse and begin talking to Rhun across the creature's neck, it was a delicacy that obviously didn't correspond to the kind of shame from which this lad suffered, for hearing a sound that made him return to his side Porius now found him fallen on his face on the ground and his whole body heaving with sobs.

"Disgraced! Disgraced! Disgraced!" was the only articulate word that Porius could catch when he stood over him and tried to console him.

At last the boy did lift his tear-blubbered face and heaving himself up by the palms of his hands, a gesture that gave him a very, very curious look. "False!" he cried, "false to my vows, to my race, to my emperor! How can I go back there? How can I look any of them in the face again? And so," he added after a deep-drawn breath, "and so you are Prince Porius. I've heard of your strength. We hear everything at court. The emperor himself told me about you. I was so — but I can never go back now! My life's ruined. You see yourself, Prince Porius, how it... is... with me! I don't know... what... I can do... or where... I can... go."

And with the palms of his hands still pressed against the damp earth his smooth face would have distorted itself into a new paroxysm of grief, if

Porius hadn't seized him by his arms and as calmly as when he hoisted him out of the saddle raised him to his feet and put his lance into his hands.

While doing this Porius found himself remembering how as a child he always got a peculiar thrill from playing with Morfydd's dolls, especially with a little boy doll called Morgan Tud, which was the name by which the Three Princesses always spoke of Pelagius. It was of Morgan Tud's wooden skull and of the monk's hood the Aunties had made for this philosophic cranium that he thought now as he straightened and tightened the leather straps of the great plumed helmet which the boy's frantic struggles when held aloft in the air, had disordered, loosened, and twisted awry.

"Give me the letter," he commanded; and the youth, completely in his power now, produced from between his steel breastplate and his silken tunic a small, compactly folded scroll of ivory-coloured parchment and placed it in Porius's hands, who hurriedly read it and refolding it returned it to him.

"What is your name, my soul?" he enquired, using the traditional Berber salutation which was as familiar in Dyfed as in Gwynedd.

The youth looked for advice toward his horse, but his glance only met the now totally abstracted and indifferent stare of the man who was holding it, while Porius, who had turned his head in the same direction, said to himself, "Rhun's wondering whether he'll coax me across his ferry tonight, after all this."

But aloud he said, addressing the discomforted lad, "You only have to follow this same path, without turning to right or left, whatever other ways you see, and you'll come to Mynydd-y-Gaer. When you get there, don't ask for my father, ask for my mother, the Princess Euronwy. Here! Take this knife and tell her I sent you! You needn't say a word about our encounter. Say your horse fell, if you like — I mean if you feel you want to say something. But tell her that it's possible I may stay the night with Brother John. By the way, has a Greek sea captain called Dion Dionides turned up at the Fount yet, a sailor from Constantinople?"

The young man nodded eagerly. "Yes, yes," he affirmed, "that's his name — Dion Dionides. He talks to Brother John all the time. The master absents himself when he talks."

Porius glanced quickly at his foster-brother. "And who may the master be?"

Proudly the boy answered, "Myrddin ap Morfryn alias Myrddin Wyllt alias Myrddin Ambrosius alias Myrddin Emrys." And the faintest flicker of a smile crossed the lad's face.

Porius's small yellow-green eyes lit up and his thick eyebrows moved downwards towards the bridge of his Roman nose. "What?" he cried. "Did you hear that, Rhun? Myrddin Wyllt's at the Fountain!"

"Ask him," returned Rhun, "whether the Henog of Dyfed's at the Fountain."

"God!" cried Porius, "I'd forgotten the Henog altogether!"

"Yes! yes! yes!" the youth declared. "He got there just before I started. I heard him beginning an argument with Dion Dionides just as I jumped on Gwylan's back."

"Well! Up you get on Gwylan's back again, sonny. But you haven't yet" — for the young knight had now mounted, lance and all, with a most correct and elegant leap into the saddle— "told me your name!"

"Mabsant ap Kaw, first cousin to the captain of the guard!"

And leaving this proud boast to diffuse itself among the same dying leaves and the same wet brambles and the same rain-filled hollows of black water that had been present at his despair, the youth made Gwylan leap over the moss-covered corpse of a fallen oak and with the pennon flying from his lance, and the plume from his helm, and the horse’s mane and tail lifted by the wind of his speed, he disappeared in the mist at a reckless gallop.

CHAPTER II. The Cave of Mithras

LEFT TO THEMSELVES Porius picked up his water bottle and sighed heavily. Then he instinctively clapped his hand on the empty sheath of his hunting knife. Watching him closely, Rhun did not miss this gesture. “You don’t want your spear, I suppose?” he enquired.

“No, no! You keep that. I’ll find something just as good in a minute. Well, Rhun, which way shall we go? But I don’t care! There’s no hurry now. He’ll tell them at home and they won’t expect us. The old man will have to wait for his holy water till tomorrow.”

He moved a step or two towards an extremely ancient tree which was bowed almost to the ground. It was an enormous willow and Porius had been mixing this tree with several of his recent thoughts. He now gave it a little more — though still by no means all — of his attention.

The tree had only a few gnarled and deformed branches left, and these had been so harassed by the constant blowing down the broad avenue of the prevailing wind, that is to say, of the southwest wind, that their topmost twigs had acquired the trick of brushing with their withered leaves the tree’s own exposed and elongated root which extended itself quite a little distance from the original spot where as a sapling five hundred years ago in the days of Tiberius Caesar it had commenced its life.

With his back to Rhun Porius began abstractedly searching for any single one among the smaller branches of this ancestor of the forest that could conceivably be broken off to serve as a weapon. Porius’s actions and gestures were often divided from his thoughts by a curious lacuna. It was as if his Herculean body had a life of its own, a life which its enormous animal strength was able to protect and cater for independently of his thoughts.

His self-consciousness was abnormally alert, but his actions seemed hardly to draw upon it at all. It was as if his powerful body had its own deliberate and massively simple method of rendering him humorously impervious to the complicated play of his self-conscious mind. Thus at this moment as he ponderingly fumbled among the mossy limbs of this bent old tree he realized that beneath this whole episode of Mabsant ap Kaw and his horse he was drawing nearer to the decision not only to tell Rhun his disturbing news but to celebrate its arrival by visiting the shrine of the Persian sun-god.

He knew well enough that both these actions threatened two out of the three great umbilical cords of his life upon earth, the link with his mother and the link with his religion; leaving only the third, the link with his country, unmenaced and inviolate.

What he was really telling himself now was that if he wanted Rhun's full sympathy at this crisis it was a cowardly holding back not to give the man's religion a fair and honourable trial.

"But I won't act upon any sudden impulse," he told himself, having quite forgotten his lack of a weapon as he turned slowly away from the tree that had been an acorn when Christ died, "I will leave it to chance."

The curious thing was that when he came back to his foster-brother's side he never said to him: "We'll go by way of the river." He said nothing at all; neither did Rhun say anything. They simply re-entered the forest and again went through the wearisome effort of forcing a path for themselves through the thick brushwood.

But when at length they were once more on the river's bank Porius fell into a vein of thought that was as natural to him as it was to let his body go its own way and follow, apparently, its own animal sagacity. In this mood his mind seemed to detach itself a stage further, detach itself in fact from the intuitive purpose of his inmost being, and contemplate both that crafty entity and its secret intention with a good deal of amusement.

“There’s no necessity for crossing the Ford of Mithras,” his amused mind mocked, “since Saint Julian’s Fount is on this side. But sooner than not cross you’d pretend to be mad and make out that only Mithras could heal you!”

The grotesque pranks he’d have to play before Rhun’s astonished eyes ere that simple warrior grasped his condition struck him as a quaint fact. He noticed too as they leisurely followed the upstream flow of the river that his own silence was answered by a corresponding silence.

“He must be aware,” Porius thought, “that I’m in a reckless and dangerous mood. I wonder if Mithras has, like Christ, some particular curse for an ‘unpardonable sin’? Would it be such a sin to gaze at the Mysteries in a mocking and unbelieving mood?”

He was now between Rhun and the river as they walked in silence and he could not help observing all the casual bits of wood that were carried upon the tide, and he noticed that one of these fragments must have been part of a hen roost, for it was still grey with the droppings of the fowls, droppings that the purifying element was now carrying from an unknown homestead to an unknown destination.

The river was swollen by recent rains, and it was a peculiarity of the Dee to be extremely sensitive to any increase in its volume. By a single night’s rain its speed was increased from a scarcely perceptible current to a rapid and swirling torrent. There was still enough light in the sky to cause the surface of the river between the darkening banks to assume that strange metallic glint of a phantasmal whiteness which is the final response, whether caught upon pool or puddle or lake or pond or ditch or fen or moat or marsh, of the most receptive and evasive of all the elements to the most aggressive and emphatic of all — the farewell of water fading out of the fire of day.

"I like this time of twilight down here by the river," Porius said suddenly. "In the forest things are a bit too treacherous at this hour; and on the mountain you're always staring at the sky and watching for falling stars. Besides, the river seems more conscious of your existence than the woods and precipices. Brother John thinks it's a pity we don't go on worshipping the river as a symbol of the Mother of God. He swears he knows several people in the forest huts who do do this just as they did in the olden days. Do you know, Rhun, I believe you're much more of a Roman than I am! If I hadn't known your mother as well as I did I should never have believed she was Indeg's daughter; and I have an idea that the Three Modrybedd — certainly Auntie Esyllt — felt as I do! She was certainly the most beautiful woman I've ever seen, and though the Three Aunties are the Three Aunties and — well! you know what they are—"

Rhun looked him up and down with a flicker of something quizzical in his expression. "She couldn't have been very Roman," he remarked, "if she was your father's sister."

Rhun's tone was affectionately rallying, but Porius blushed in the darkness and decided to leave his tongue's misbegotten offspring where it fell, rather than make matters worse by picking it up.

"It's strange," he went on, "that this actual water that you and I know so well and in which we've caught so many salmon, was really worshipped by our grandmother Indeg" — he caught himself up, feeling he was still on dangerous ground; then plunged on with a rush— "worshipped, I mean, not merely as a symbol of the Blessed Virgin, but as" — once more he stopped, and then blurted out— "as a Divine Being in Herself!"

Rhun swung round, and both the men stood motionless for a moment, their heavy features taking on a wavering, fluctuating, and shapeless indistinctness, as if the twilight were adjusting its own special masks of protective vapour to their human lineaments.

"Do you remember," said Rhun abruptly, "how we used to wonder what my mother and your father really believed? We used to watch them when your mother and Porius Manlius were chanting the responses at Mass as if they would willingly die for their faith. And you always used to ask me to tell you about our grandmother's death when Porius Manlius brought your mother from Uriconium to be married to the prince, and about Porius Manlius insulting my father and calling him 'Graeculus' and about the Three Aunties refusing to come up to the Gaer till Porius Manlius had apologized. What you always wanted me to tell you, and what my mother could always keep you quiet by making me tell you, was about Porius Manlius throwing his father's sword into the river when Auntie Esyllt said that Bendigeitfran and Ceridwen were as worthy to be worshipped as any Catholic saint, and that Bendigeitfran was both a saint and a giant, and that Ceridwen — just as Brother John says about this water — was the original of the Blessed Mary."

"No, no! Not the original!" cried Porius. "I remember the whole thing! Your mother used to sing a lullaby about Ceridwen which brought in the Blessed Virgin but as somebody quite different! It was a sort of dialogue between the two."

"Can you still repeat it?" enquired Rhun. "Do you remember it?"

Remember it! Did Rhun know the crucial effect of that question? He must — and yet he couldn't! It was over that lullaby that he and Morfydd's brother had had their worst quarrel, the quarrel when Morfydd took her brother's side.

Like a blood-red flame, rushing from one inflammable stubble field to another, the possessive instinct in him, which as a rule was slower and more lethargic than in most human beings, flared up so violently that he actually shivered, and as he did so he reached a momentous conclusion. He decided that if he left his home to plunge into the great world he would make Morfydd marry him at once and take her with him! Yes! If he left his mother she must leave her father.

And he reached another decision also; namely, that here and now and at this very spot, with the river that the Three Aunties worshipped as a goddess flowing within a foot of their feet, he would tell Rhun what had happened. Remember the lullaby? He would remember everything they looked at now: that half-drowned alder branch, those half-submerged stone steps, that floating log, that grey boulder, that pallor of the swift current.

"I've got some news for you, brother." He had never called him that before — not in that way, hurriedly, naturally, spontaneously, and yet with a curious solemnity. He noticed that Rhun, instead of looking at him, lowered his head and pressed the butt end of the hunting spear against an alder root.

"Two messengers have come," Porius went on, "and I've got to decide what to do before I see Einion ab Iddawc or my mother." He paused for a second, expecting Rhun to lift his head, but the man only went on prodding the alder root with the handle of the spear. "I've got to decide what to do," he went on, "before we get to the Fountain tonight."

"You have decided," said Rhun in a curiously quiet and restrained voice.

"Yes, that's true. I have decided. Why shouldn't I? You've no idea I suppose what I've decided?"

Still Rhun didn't look up. Still he prodded the alder root with the spear. Then he did murmur something; but it seemed addressed rather to the river than to the man at his side.

"What did you say?"

"Only that I have an idea."

Porius opened his mouth and drew a deep breath. "Jesus! You have, have you? And what is it then?"

"You are going to marry."

"Rhun!"

"You are going to marry Morfydd."

The first thing Porius felt when these startling words set out on their wingless flight through the seven heavens towards the empyrean, was a tremor of anger, and anger too that he couldn't explain. Why in the name of Jesus did the extremely natural fact that the lifelong comrade he'd just that moment addressed as "brother" should have guessed that he had decided within that very hour to transform his betrothal into marriage send a stampede of angry humours through his veins? Hitherto he had always resigned himself to the arbitrary, intense, magnetic, fanciful, super-tragic moods of Morfydd, and it had never entered his head to think of himself as deciding anything where she was concerned.

He had derived a curious satisfaction from the sensation of feeling himself a helpless ship between the wind of his mother's will and the tide of his girl's will, a ship with slack sails or stretched sails, as it happened, but always caused by those contradictory forces. This submissiveness to the elements, however, did not mean he could respond with agreeable reciprocity when the son of a "Graeculus" predicted which way those winds and tides were going to carry him.

Thus it was brought about that the laconic brevity of Porius's long-pondered announcements to the man he'd just called "brother" was stiffened into a tone with which it is hard to imagine even one of the old historic members of the gens Manlius finding any fault. He bluntly told Rhun that he had received a letter from the Emperor Arthur, who was encamped outside Caergwynt, and that he had decided to join him in the winter campaign. There had also been forwarded to him, he told Rhun, a letter from Constantinople, signed by both the Emperor Anastasius and the Patriarch Macedonius asking that a mission from Britain should be sent at once to reopen the ancient Pelagian controversy with the intention of anathematizing the Pope of Rome for his confirmation of his predecessor's arbitrary and unjust condemnation of a Christian philosopher.

"I shall only remain with Arthur till the spring," he said. "The invaders seem to be falling to pieces. There'll be few of them left in Britain by the spring. Of course, more of them may land and the fortunes of war — you know how it is — may change many times before this island is at peace again, as it was before the Coranians came, and before the remnant from Atlantis came, and before we came, and before the Romans came!"

He paused for a moment, changed the water bottle from his right to his left hand, and glanced anxiously at his foster-brother's face. But these two grandsons of Iddawc the Apostate, though different in everything else, were curiously alike in the slow and sluggish manner in which their thoughts and feelings affected their facial expressions. It was as if an immense gap existed between their minds and those appendages of our flesh and blood which express what is within our minds.

Thus it was in an ordinary and dispassionate voice, though perhaps in a tone pitched a little lower than usual, that Rhun enquired whether he intended to take his wife to the emperor's camp at Caergwynt, and whether when the campaign was over he would proceed alone to Constantinople.

"Alone?" repeated Porius, and his voice as he pronounced these two syllables had something coldly aloof in it and also something dull, mechanical, impersonal, as if Rhun had asked him whether a modern Greek vessel had the same high poop that the ancient ones appear to have had.

"I mean," explained Rhun, "will you take your wife everywhere?"

Porius turned his head to the river and made no reply. His irrational anger had died down completely, but the feeling that had taken its place was, as far as his own ease of mind went, more disagreeable than anger. He felt as he often did under some outburst from Morfydd, the cause of which was entirely obscure to him but which doggedly and obstinately he attributed to her unhappiness about her brother.

One of his most characteristic mental peculiarities was to visualize every dramatic occasion or crisis or even personality that crossed his mind in terms of some particular physical sensation. The more constantly the particular thought or speculation or personality came into his brain, the more definite grew the physical impression that some mysterious mental process, quite apart from his will, had been slowly evoking, solidifying, stereotyping upon his consciousness.

This impression had always some curious connection of its own with the thought or circumstance it represented. But this connection would have been hopelessly obscure to anyone but Porius himself, so entirely had it been substituted for the thing it represented and so arbitrary were the impressions of scents and sounds and forms and colours that composed it. It became, in fact, an absolutely grotesque ritualistic symbol; a species of Nama, Nama, Sebesio in the sphere of the visible and the tactile.

As we have already had occasion to note in connection with that peculiar stubble field yellow whose voyage up the sky had so fascinated him as he looked down upon Minnawc Gorsant's new church, Porius's symbol for his girl's anger was identical with his symbol for her pitiful and fantastical crying fits. But the image that had begun to trouble him now, and which was at present much more nebulous than it would doubtless grow to be as time went on, didn't represent Morfydd alone. It represented the deadly subterranean struggle between Morfydd and his mother, and though it was at this moment somewhat blurred its main tendency of development, the entelecheia, so to say, of its future stereotyped existence was very unpleasant indeed.

Translated into anybody else's terms of visualization it might have been called disgusting. To him it was horrible.

As has been already hinted Porius and Rhun resembled each other in more things than their rugged countenances and greenish eyes. They both could think better and come to wiser conclusions when they were on the move, but to express or to exchange ideas their bodies had to be at rest.

With Rhun's words: "Will you take your wife everywhere?" hovering around them, like the last autumnal choir of small gnats, they both had instinctively sought to escape from the fatality of their dangerous thoughts by a pause in physical movement. Porius rested his left hand against the trunk of an alder, while Rhun leaned his whole weight so heavily on the long spear he was carrying that though it was the wooden shaft and not the steel head that was pointing downwards he caused it to sink half a foot into the earth.

The river still carried a weird metallic gleam upon its surface, and the effect of this gleam upon the two men's senses was to accentuate the inner excitement they were both feeling. The whiteness of the river seemed to Porius at that moment in its livid forlornness to be the acme and epitome of desolation. It suggested lost battles and the blood-frozen corpses of innumerable dead men. It suggested that just beyond the horizon lay the walls of deserted cities and the chilly wharves of ruined harbours, where great ships lay waterlogged and dismasted upon mud banks that were phosphorescent with the whiteness of death.

The river that was worshipped as an immortal by living persons within a few miles from where they stood, gurgled and sucked and oozed and rippled and sighed, just as it had done when those strange ships, thousands of years ago, brought the remnant from the lost continent of Atlantis to its mouth.

It seemed struggling now in its incomprehensible murmurings to reveal to each of these two men that it was folly to try to understand each other's secret souls.

But they scarcely heard the river. Each was absorbed in his own thoughts; thoughts in which, just because they were living souls, there could be no sharing.

But suddenly Porius burst out abruptly, "Is it true that when Pelagius lay dying at Saint Julian's Fountain the Derwydd came out and was seen by seven men and two women, and that there is a Derwydd still alive hidden somewhere in the forest huts?"

Had the young rider upon the white horse, who at this moment was blowing his horn before the western gate of Mynydd-y-Gaer, been watching the heavy faces of these two grandsons of Iddawc he would have noticed a look of strange complicity exchanged between them, and he would have heard Rhun reply, as if in response to a ritualistic catechism: "It is beyond all doubt that the Derwydd came out; and none can deny that he was baptized by Pelagius at the Fountain of Saint Julian confessing his sins and acknowledging the Blessed Trinity."

Each of the men gave a long sigh of relief after this, and Porius gravely admitted that he had been waiting ever since the celebration of his birthday a month ago to find out whether Rhun, as one of the descendants of Princess Indeg, had been initiated into the great family secret of the Modrybedd, namely, that there still existed, somewhere among the forest huts, an authentic soothsayer of the ancient philosophy, a man skilled in all the magical arts and all the metaphysical doctrines of the prehistoric, druidic tradition.

"No one after this," Porius remarked, "can call us a babbling and boastful race like the Gwyddyl-Ffichti."

Rhun thrust his hand into a deep receptacle inside his tunic which served as a hunter's pocket and stared whimsically at the young chieftain.

"You'd never guess what I've got here!" he muttered with an odd sort of shamefaced pride.

"Your fire-lighter?"

"Yes, but something else too!" He kept his hand and his wrist hidden while he spoke. "Have you ever seen a Phrygian cap?"

Porius stared at him. "Was that what you clapped on your head when Auntie Esyllt showed you the marks in the snow after the disappearance of Morvran's body?"

Rhun nodded. "I don't want," he said, "to be superstitious; but my father — and this cap was his — said a person could get supernatural help in his struggle against evil if he had his god's token with him."

"Evil?" echoed the other. "But didn't the Aunties think that this abduction of the dead—"

He broke off and changed his tone. “But don’t let’s begin all that again, Rhun! I never really believed it was a giant’s footprint, and even if it was — but I must say this, Rhun, you make me think of Porius Manlius when you talk like that about the struggle against evil. I don’t see things in that light, and never shall. Do you mean that all the evil is on the side of these curst pirates, and all the good on the side of that young braggart on the white horse?”

His foster-brother’s retort to this was to produce the cap in question and shamelessly exchange it for the one already on his head, placing this latter where the other had been. Porius experienced anything but a superstitious feeling as he beheld this sight. He experienced a lively sense of the comic. The massive profile of his foster-brother under this extremely foreign and rather effeminate headgear looked absolutely grotesque. But he didn’t miss the rapid passing across that familiar face so grotesquely surmounted of a pathetic flicker of pain at the mockery it seemed to feel must be there, even though its owner tried so steadfastly to conceal it.

Porius meanwhile went on with his own thoughts on this matter of good and evil and on the striking resemblance between his grandfather’s attitude to Christ and Rhun’s to Mithras.

“May I ask you one thing more, Porius ab Einion?” enquired the troubled face under the Phrygian cap.

The younger man nodded emphatically.

“How long have you been sure that Minnawc Gorsant knows about Gogfran Derwydd being in the forest? I saw Gorsant that night — you remember — and he spoke to me afterwards. I suppose he’s working up the people as he did against Morvran?”

Both the men instinctively and automatically threw rapid glances round them to make sure they were not overheard or overlooked. Then Porius said, speaking in a low voice, as if hosts of Coranian listeners were in league with the priest of the new religion: "Yes, you've got it, Rhun! He has been at that same game. In all his recent harangues down there, and I've been to most of them with my mother, he has cursed Gogfran Derwydd — not directly you must understand; for he is too clever, even in the wicked fury of his damned orations, to give away all he knows, but indirectly, appealing to the popular fear of the vengeance of Christ upon our cattle and crops. He has troubled my mother already; I could see that well enough. And now the same old set among the Gosgordd, and they're some of our best fighters, are longing to hunt down like a wolf this enemy of Christ."

Rhun scowled. "But Pelagius baptized this druid's father. Do you know what he said, this old fanatic of the Trinity? He said the whole druid system came to this island, and from us to Iwerdon and Gaul, from Plato's lost continent of Atlantis. Think of that! Do you remember how Morfydd and Morvran used to paint the capital letters in Uncle's Timaeus? I wonder he let them do it, for it came from Gaul. It's one of the books given him by that Bishop of Arverne. But you know what Morfydd is over old books!"

The other looked across the river. "I wonder," Porius thought, "why it is that whenever I talk of Morfydd's knowing Latin or Greek Rhun gets angry. And yet she never teases him like she does me about his ignorance. It's because she's a woman. He doesn't like her knowing Greek and Latin. That's the religion of Mithras — to keep them ignorant! Oh, I know you, my angry friend! You'll end by being exactly like Porius Manlius. There's evil in books. There's the devil in them. And good soldiers of Christ and Mithras must keep the devil out of the hands of women and children!"

Rhun's face did certainly look dark and menacing at that moment, but perhaps the Phrygian cap created this expression. But what a queer thing in him it was to put on this extraordinary object in the open air, where there was no shrine, no ritual, no image; nothing but the flowing river! What a queer person Rhun was! He seemed to be muttering something now, and his eyes were staring into vacancy.

“He’s still angry with me,” thought Porius, “because I like women to learn Greek. But how simple he is! It’s easy to read his thoughts. Jesus Christ! Why does he wear that thing on his head?”

But suddenly in a low, hollow, monotonous voice, a voice that seemed as if it were not his own at all, Rhun began reciting that familiar chapter he had made Brother John help him to learn by heart from the last book written by Pelagius.

“He’s doing this,” thought Porius, “for some odd reason of his own. But I’m not going to bother about his reason. Pelagius is always Pelagius.”

Thus thinking, he gave himself up to the calm liberation of that familiar eloquence. He had come for many years to associate the great Brythonic heretic with what he well knew was his whole nature’s mature revolt against the combined authority of his mother and grandfather.

This revolt had been steadily growing in him ever since he returned as a grown man from the episcopal school beyond the Mountain of the Mothers. Nor had his friend Brother John done anything to hinder it.

There had been times when he regarded this secret revolt in the simple light of a temptation of the devil. There had been times when he regarded it as a sort of championship of his wayward and impious father.

Now, however, he felt differently towards it; and the longer he listened to Rhun’s monotonous intoning, the more differently he felt. He felt that this whole eventful day had in some strange manner been under the guidance of Pelagius. And it was on behalf of Pelagius that he and Morfydd would set sail for Constantinople when the Saxons were driven out!

The spirit of the liberty of every separate human soul seemed issuing from that simple mask beneath the Phrygian cap. And the fading white light upon the river that swept past them became to him now like something that was dying.

But what was dying was a false conscience, the pallid burden of that unreal imperative which had been pressing so long like a numbing vapour upon the free pulses of his life. And though his mind was full of Pelagius he found it wandering from his foster-brother’s actual words. He had indeed observed a peculiar fact about Rhun’s tone; namely, that it lacked all warmth of conviction. It was like a monotonous wafture of lukewarm air produced — for it would be improper to say created — by a colossal fan in the hands of a slave who himself got no refreshment from the stimulus he evoked.

But although Porius permitted the words of Pelagius thus rendered to be rather a musical accompaniment to thought than an originator of it, it mustn’t be supposed that he wasn’t thinking about the ideas of Pelagius, for he was thinking hard. The abysmal gulf between this British philosopher’s view of the Christian religion and the orthodox Roman one had been the chief theological topic at his school beyond the mountains, and he was familiar with every argument for and against the great Pelagian affirmation of the essential goodness of man’s nature; and consequent upon this of the primal part played by the human will in the historic march of fate.

And thus the monotonous rain of these dangerous words, falling from Rhun’s uncommitted lips, wrought upon him like the immersion of sun-dried seaweed in a rock pool by a high-water tide. His thoughts renewed themselves, expanded their cramped tendrils, glowed richly coral-red in their ancient sun-spawned freshness; while a spiritual bubble of interior excitement, drawn from the pool of his nethermost being that had been gathering in his soul all that day, floated off into the twilight.

Yes, he was capable now of defying his mother, capable now of challenging the Roman Porius, capable now of thwarting the ferocious Gorsant! He knew by a curious and rather paradoxical sign that he had made that day the most important decision of his life; by the fact, namely, that he felt in no immediate hurry to do any of the things he had decided to do! He felt in no hurry to join the emperor's forces. He felt in no hurry to sail for Constantinople. He felt in no hurry to marry Morfydd.

The devilish pain of having to decide was over. The earthquakes and forest fires of his mental revolution were over. From the simple skull under the Phrygian cap the oracle had spoken. What he had to do now if he were to alter his vessel's course with any real success was to throw oil on the water as he turned his rudder; or, if he came to the conclusion that he must steer for the magic mountain isle Auntie Tonwen was always talking about, take all possible measures to cover his track, not only from the dwellers on the coast but from the wild creatures on the peak.

Under the recoil from this double decision, his mind, like a released string when the shaft has left the bow, relaxed itself in a sudden physical movement.

He removed his hand from the trunk of the tree and picked up the old Roman's water jug. "We must be stirring!" he brought out. "Brother John's not one for late suppers."

Rhun's monologue ceased abruptly. Had there been light enough to see the man's features Porius would have detected the shock to his pride that these careless words produced. Rhun did mutter something, and Porius fancied it to be the word "ansyberwyd." If it really were that particular word it was a reproach to him such as was not often brought against the son of a chieftain of the House of Cunedda. It hinted at a discourtesy as meaningless to a stranger as it would have been significant to any Brython between Deganwy and Uriconium!

But the grandson of the Greek slave plucked the handle of the long hunting spear from between a serpentine alder root and a patch of withered grass and moved forward without another word.

Porius who saw his broad shoulders outlined against the west, felt conscious, as he also advanced, of two conflicting emotions. He felt that he had behaved badly to his friend, but he also — he couldn't tell why — felt a curious animal-like rage against him. Nothing would have pleased him more at that moment than to have a wrestling match with Rhun! There was something about that peaked Persian cap, combined with the dutiful and meticulous care with which he carried the precious hunting spear, that gave the younger man such a longing to squeeze that solid backbone and feel those lithe limbs struggling helplessly in his grasp, that perhaps it was fortunate that not only were their hands so full but the river path was so narrow that it became necessary as they quickened their steps to walk in single file.

What Porius really felt, as his mind began to work upon the eccentricity of his mood, was a longing to dig his chin into the muscular back before him, a longing that was accentuated by an odd feeling of their physical resemblance to each other.

By degrees, however, he became certain that Rhun had forgiven him his ansyberwyd and that under the influence of the gathering darkness his mind had wandered down long vistas of secret cogitation. The thought meanwhile entered his own head that had an ambuscade of Gwyddyl-Ffichti suddenly leapt upon them and flashed a blazing torch in their faces, the immediate assumption of these reckless savages would have been that the victims of their attack, though of unequal age, were sons of the same mother.

From now on no further word passed between them till they reached the Ford of Mithras where once -more they found themselves standing side by side. Here they both stared at the river.

For his part Porius couldn’t help noticing how the massive paving stones of the ancient highway between Uriconium and Mona were as little worn by the three hundred years of the rule of Rome as the water of the goddess river was affected by the purgings and baptisms of the two hundred years of the rule of Christ.

It had been for the more convenient fording of the stream at this point, so the older Porius had always told them, that a very special road-building cohort of a foreign legion from Libya had paved just here the river’s stony bed.

As they stood now however on the extreme edge of the western bank it became evident that the recent rains had so deepened the water and increased its speed that to cross the Ford tonight would mean either swimming or making use of the ferryboat.

This boat or barge, an ungainly flat-bottomed conveyance, capable of transporting a couple of horses as well as a couple of horsemen, was drawn up on the bank and fastened to the trunk of a large alder. On special feast days when pilgrims to Saint Julian’s Fountain gathered in considerable numbers here it was Rhun’s task to play the ferryman, but though the eighteenth of October in the year of Christ four hundred and ninety-nine was no feast day, Porius now beheld his foster-brother calmly proceeding to unloose the boat.

“What are you doing?” he asked. “Are you expecting anyone?”

"I won't keep you a moment, Porius ab Einion — I can hear Drudwyn howling."

Porius stared at the opposite bank listening. Yes, he too could catch the low unmistakable moan of a large dog.

"Is he tied up?" he asked stupidly. He felt vexed at this delay. But Rhun's hound was well known at the Gaer and he made no protest, nor did it cross his mind to let the man fetch his dog alone.

As he stepped into the flat-bottomed unbenched boat and watched his foster-brother pick up the bargepole it crossed his mind that here he was yielding again to the same queer compulsion that had dominated him all that eventful day!

On the surface of things this weakness of his, this dodging of finalities and drastic issues, this avoidance of decisions, this gaining time at all costs, this policy of drift, made him ashamed of himself. But below the surface it exhilarated him with a curious interior exultation!

Superficially he felt irritable and teased by this delay. Superficially the last thing he wanted was to he ferried due east when the object of their excursion lay due west. But below the surface all was different. For one thing, Drudwyn's pitiful moan seemed lifted up on a higher-pitched key than his memory of this noble dog's deep chest altogether justified.

"Something unusual is worrying him," he told himself as the sound rose higher above the sucking and gurgling of the swollen tide. "But what the devil," he asked himself, as his companion's Phrygian cap stood out in singular relief against the dark upward slope of the opposite bank, "does he think he can make me do? Partake of the Mithraic Sacrament? Become a believer in the Mithraic gulf between good and evil?"

Throwing down his pole and jumping out of the boat with more alacrity than he had shown all that evening, Rhun now twisted the rope round the nearest post of the little landing stage and without a glance behind him began calling his dog by name and clambering up the steep incline.

Porius followed him at a more leisurely pace. He began to experience a sudden impact of the most confused emotions. One dark thread among these, more definite than the rest, was the Pelagian idea, whether drawn from his father's discourses over the mead, or from Brother John's memories, or from Rhun's recent recitation, that a man should allow no preconception of any kind, consecrated or unconsecrated, to come between his soul and its instinctive striving.

Thus as he followed his foster-brother to the entrance of what from his childhood up he had taken for a spacious cave, the obscure compulsion springing from the doctrine of Minnawc Gorsant's most hated heretic gradually assumed the weight of an overwhelming impulse.

What if he were really to defy the devil and actually dare to follow this principle of emancipation? He noted that since he had last ascended this slope, somebody — probably his foster-brother — had unearthed, exposed, and cleaned from moss and rubble the old Roman steps made by the engineer brigade of the foreign legion at Uriconium.

Rhun had hastily preceded him, calling reassuringly to his dog as he approached the Cave, but at its threshold he turned and shouted down to him, using tones more authoritative than the young chieftain was accustomed to hear, bidding him wait outside the entrance till he re-emerged.

Never in afterlife did he forget the strange moments that followed. Arrived at the stone platform in front of the Cave he became aware of a dim, rich, flickering glow within its recesses, from the depth of which he could hear his foster-brother's voice speaking caressingly to Drudwyn.

But he turned his back upon all this, and meticulously doubling the folds of his tunic between his haunches and the stone platform, he sat down on the Roman steps and stared at the river. Every now and then a flickering glow from the fire in the Cave behind him threw a faint just-discernible bronze-coloured lustre upon the rocks and tree trunks between him and the river.

But these intermittent gleams grew moment by moment less and less. Indeed before five minutes had passed the only vestige of light to be seen was the pallid reflection of the chilly western sky lingering on the surface of the water. Emphasized thus in its undying flow, the essential being of the sacred river seemed to rise up before him out of the hollow reservoir of the twilight, and for the second time that evening he thought of the vanished generations who had actually worshipped that gliding flood of divine water, eternally the same and yet eternally different, as befitted an immortal who was also a woman.

All manner of broken fragments of childish memories floated up towards him, this and that half-furtive allusion from the lips of the old wives his foster-mother used to collect round her, dark secretive hints from many a devil-ridden old gossip, caught as they hummed over their three-legged iron cauldrons on their sooty hearths, each cauldron, Auntie Tonwen used to say, with its own special kind of wicked-innocent bubbles; and each bubble with its own prophetic vision of the expanding world before it burst and its own moon-ring of floating scum thereafter.

And in his mind, as his eye followed a particular white patch of drifting foam, there rose up the mocking words of his evasive father jeering and jibing and flouting, as was his wont, the whole consistory of gods, great and little, and along with them all the equivocal hosts of the air, all the Elementals, Tenebrions, and Numina, all the mediators between heaven and earth!

Well! There was no need to invoke his father now or his father's levities. It was the great Pelagius who had liberated him, and Pelagius to the end had called himself a Christian. But what was the real meaning of the growing exultation he had been feeling all that afternoon, mounting and mounting and giving him so strange a sense of inward liberation? It came from Pelagius. He recognized that clearly enough, and now as he stared at the white foam on the river's surface he thought he knew just what it was! It was the idea that each solitary individual man had the power, from the very start of his conscious life, not so much by his will, for that was coerced by other wills, but by his free imagination, by the stories he told himself, to create his future.

Chance was always interfering, of course, but there was no hereditary curse descending upon him from Adam. He wasn't separated from God by any fatal predestination. But if Pelagius were right about the natural goodness of man, didn't that cut away the very root of Christianity, leaving its sacraments floating on the water of life like weeds without stalks?

All his thoughts just then seemed to take shapes that were prompted by the flow of the water before him, and it occurred to him that it might be possible that Christianity could survive without any root in the riverbed if the stalks were long enough; or still more if the stalks produced floating roots of their own.

One thing was certain. It was impossible that the feeling which had been growing upon him all that day meant nothing at all. He would find out what it meant! Well, one thing he had found out already. It meant the end of his unquestioning docility towards his mother and old Porius! But it meant much more than that. He felt sad rather than exultant at separating himself, even if it were only in his own mind, from that fine old Roman, to separate himself in so great a matter from a man he reverenced as much as he did his namesake, Porius Manlius, the man who had always taken him on his knees at the tribal banquets when his mother left the hall and his father was drunk — was this a cause for joy?

Why then had he this delicious quiver of excitement, different from anything he'd ever felt before? It seemed to him now that a faint murmuring sound was issuing from the Cave, interrupted at broken intervals by the unmistakable whining of the dog.

"What does Rhun think I am?" he said to himself. And then without any obvious cause he turned his head to what he supposed was the south, from where he sat, and called up the idea of his father. Why was it that it was always in this way that he thought of his father? He never used any of the usual endearing or even respectful appellations for him, and the odd thing was that wherever he himself might be when he formulated the idea of his father it was always to the south, and always in the same fantastic and arbitrary way as upon the southern horizon, that he saw what might be described as the man's exteriorized soul.

It had been on one of the many occasions when Einion ab Iddawc was discussing Rhun's mania for Mithras that this symbol of him had had its birth. The man over there had been dipping his drinking cup into the mead bowl, thrusting its silver brim between the little islands of dusky-coloured scum formed by the tiny grains of indissoluble spice that floated on the surface of the bowl, and there had trickled down the side of the cup a little yellow stream whose final drops, as the cup was lifted to the man's lips, shone in the firelight like beads of gold. Strange that until this moment Porius had never thought of asking himself why it was that his father, the man over there, should always be represented in his mind by golden drops issuing from a shapeless blur of vapour in the southern sky.

Now that he had thought of it, he realized that all the dominant urges and master influences of his interior life had come to take for him some material form or shape; not an intelligibly symbolic shape or a shape as he could have described to another person without being thought mad, but rather some accidental, chance-bestowed pattern of form and colour that in itself was quite meaningless and very often absurd.

Staring at the river below him now, and listening to that liturgical murmur from the Cave, a murmur that seemed, as it rose and sank, to be the very voice of the reddish gleam that was now flickering upon the little landing stage where their boat was straining at its rope, Porius couldn't help reverting to that old problem he had so often discussed with Brother John as to whether it was the actual river itself, the flowing continuity of the rushing volume of its swollen waters, that his aboriginal ancestors had worshipped, or whether they had visualized in their prayers the human lineaments of the great River-Mother.

He himself had come to visualize a form even more grotesque than the one which an unpredictable association had substituted for the bodily image of his father, for he thought of her in a manner that had originally been suggested by one particular stretch of flowing water, in which, from the vantage ground of a certain grassy slope below the Gaer, he was wont to see the reflected image of a dead alder stump, a stump whose natural bifurcation, worked upon by time and overgrown with moss, had acquired a startling resemblance to the flanks of a gigantic woman.

In the process of the years, however, this watery image had lost all connection with the rest of its body, all connection with anything intelligible, human or otherwise, and had become a simple blur of dusky opacity in a liquid medium, a blur that carried no more rational significance than a chance colour blot upon a disfigured manuscript.

"Porius ab Einion!" The voice of his foster-brother reaching him just at that moment when the surface shapes and formless patterns on the river tide, fluctuating and retroverting in that fabulous light, had thrown a curious spell over him, startled our friend not a little. Just because he was startled he instantaneously became irritable, and for a perceptible moment he neither stirred nor replied.

"Porius ab Einion!" repeated the voice. Even then the young chieftain made no move. It was not till Rhun's fourth appeal — an appeal now that had a touch of anger in it — that he got up and swinging the empty water bottle as violently as if it were an enemy's head, he hurried to the Cave's mouth.

Rhun presented a strange appearance to his foster-brother's unsympathetic stare. He still wore the same woollen cap, but he had turned up one of its folds, the one above his eyes, and by the blaze of a small torch he held in his left hand — his right was clutching the collar of the now furiously barking dog — Porius made out upon this fold of the cap a crudely embroidered image of a lion's head.

"Quiet, Drudwyn! Take his collar a moment, Porius ab Einion!"

Porius set down his water jug on the pavement and irritably obeyed him. The dog stopped barking the moment he felt the young chief's knuckles against the back of his neck. He clearly felt it to be his duty to challenge any approach to the Cave, but if his master saw fit — since the worship of Mithras included the sun-god's dog — to hand him over as a hostage to alien piety he was prepared to resign himself.

With his fingers therefore in the collar of Rhun's fellow priest, Porius addressed the strange figure before him in a grumbling protest. "I don't see —” he began. And then, “What’s all this?” he demanded hoarsely, clearing his throat with a rough cough, for the other’s torch filled his throat with bitter smoke.

“I won’t hurt you, I won’t hurt you, I won’t hurt you, Porius ab Einion. It’s only — it’s only this — I want you to taste something.”

“All right, man! I’ll taste it! I’ll taste anything. Only you must be quick! Is it a drug you’ve been concocting all this time? Here — give it me — I’m in the mood for experiments tonight — only if it goes to my head you’ll be responsible — but for God’s sake be quick! We should look silly if all Brother John’s visitors had gone to bed when we got there. So this is why you recited Pelagius! You thought he’d make me — But bring out your Persian drug. I’ll swallow it if it kills me!”.

He could see Rhun’s eyes staring at him in amazement through the heavy smoke of the torch, and the thought crossed his mind: “He’s a true priest — first through the ear, then through the nostrils. It only needs the mouth—”

But excited though he was, Porius had never felt greater possession of himself. His excitement was both real and unreal. It was completely genuine and yet entirely superficial. It was like a fretful vapour of steam floating upon a wave of quicksilver. It stirred his nerves to such a tune that he made Drudwyn utter a high-pitched puzzled protest as he tightened his knuckles under the dog’s collar.

And yet in his mind he saw the whole occasion and everything connected with it under a light that was cold, clear, and humorously uncompromising. And the queer thing about it was the rapidity with which a critical map of all that day’s happenings unrolled itself before him. Every stretch, every stage, every section, every vista, every slope, every level, every perspective of his experience that day seemed etched by a dagger’s point upon a screen of wax.

It was natural that his map of the day's events should be crudely symbolic. Nor did he see anything strange in the fact that as the colour yellow was always connected with his father it should be connected also — though this was a different shade of yellow — with that moving mist that had fed on the stubble field. He had often been struck by the contrast between his heavy muscles and the will-o'-the-wisp thoughts that were always rushing through his skull, and now that the bittersweet smoke of this ritual torch was invading all the interstices of his brain, he was compelled to notice that the influence of Pelagius — for he discounted Rhun's military Mithras as completely as he discounted the elder Porius's militant Christ — gave him no clue as to how he was going to free himself from the influences of his two women.

As the smoke penetrated his brain, and his knuckles pressed still harder against Drudwyn's neck, he felt as though he were furtively, secretively, maliciously, snuffing up the intoxicating fumes of the wicked rapture of being for the first time in his life absolutely and uncompromisingly himself alone!

"Is this," he said to himself, "what Mithras felt after he'd killed his Bull? But don't you be afraid" — he was apostrophizing now that golden blur on the southern skyline— "nothing's going to keep me back henceforth from following my own will! I'm your son still, you over there, and I'm only playing with them."

And suddenly to the very tune with which Rhun's mother, the beautiful Alarch, used to sing him to sleep at her breast and which she used to call her "baby-devil's lullaby," he began humming audibly to this same Alarch's son: "playing with them — playing with them — only a game we're playing with them!"

Something in the expression on Porius's face as it hung in front of him in the glow of the smoking torch brought Rhun's purpose, whatever it may have been, to a temporary pause.

Drudwyn seemed aware of this, for he lifted his head and gazed at his master in puzzled expectancy. The tension of his outstretched neck suggested to Porius that at any moment he might give vent to the high-pitched wailing sound with which that particular breed of dogs responds to certain crises. The creature had been evidently expecting a word, a sign, a signal — if not a catastrophic event of some sort. And this had not come. Whether it was that the physical pressure of that stiffened throat under his fingers was communicating some secret knowledge shared between dogs and men before religion separated them, or whether he was tapping the long-suppressed nervous excitement in himself, Porius experienced at this moment such an overbrimming dynamic charge of magnetic power, and yet of power completely under control, that he found himself uttering words in his foster-brother's ear that astonished himself by their intense low-voiced authority.

"Pelagius," he heard himself saying, "is our only real druid today. He alone liberates us. He alone sets us free. And upon freedom to imagine, freedom to wish, freedom to imagine that what we wish comes true, is our soul nourished. Our soul is the flowing of a pure river with the yellow light of enjoyment upon it, a river that flows from the past into the future, a river that creates the future by wishing it, by imagining it, by creating a... a tynged for it!" He had meant to say "fate" or "fortune", in the Roman style used by his grandfather, but the Brythonic word had leapt to his lips. "This," he went on, speaking more slowly now and in a lower tone, "may be a temple of fire; but it will be by water we'll escape from it — in — the — end. But give me your Sacrament, brother. Let it be a covenant between us. Put up your torch, brother, and give me your Sacrament.”

“You shall have it! Let the dog go.”

Porius removed his hand, and the white hound with a choking bark bounded to his master’s side, while Rhun himself, placing the now flaring and spluttering torch in an iron sconce on the wall, began searching for something in the darkness at the back of the Cave.

“Fool! Fool! Fool! Fool!” groaned Porius to himself, for no sooner had Rhun moved away and the hound after him than a singular reaction against his own solemn words took possession of him. He was indeed seized by a sensation he had experienced once or twice before since his return from the Bishop’s School on the other side of the Mountain of the Mothers; the feeling, namely, that this whole business of disputing with Rhun or with the old Porius or with his mother or with Morfydd or indeed with anybody about life and philosophy and religion was absurdly useless.

“Rhun!” he called out, staring at the obscure play of shadows in the rear of the Cave, but not moving from his position under the smoking torch. “Rhun ap Gwrnach! Come back! Come back here!” But the Mithras worshipper was silent, and not a single sound, not even the familiar panting from Drudwyn’s massive chest, broke the stillness of the place. All three of them might have been entombed in the bowels of the earth.

The old feeling of irritation against Rhun rose again within him. Had he worked himself up to the pitch of solemnly asking for a heathen sacrament from a high priest at a high altar, only to be kept waiting on the fussy pleasure of a madman in a dark cave?

“Come back, Rhun!” he yelled again, and after an unpleasant pause during which he tried to suppress an ignoble Brythonic pride that placed his foster-brother in a different category from the son of the chief of their tribe, he decided to break this Mithras covenant when the man came back.

“I won’t hurt his feelings,” he thought, “but there’s a moment when you can do a thing and there’s a moment when you can’t do a thing.”

“Rhun!” Again complete silence. But by this time his discomfort was causing him such throbs of humiliation that he could no longer restrain himself. There had flashed through his mind an incident from the past when he was a boy of ten and Rhun a lad of fifteen, and when in the midst of a game of hide-and-seek his companion had slipped out of his hiding place in a clump of bushes and had run, as only Rhun could run, in an unseen circle and had done it so stealthily as to be able to emerge suddenly from behind him and snatch him up in his arms.

The overwhelming shock of this and its backwash of devastating shame had made him so beside himself with blind rage that twisting round in his captor’s hands, he had beaten with his clenched fist so violently on the boy’s mouth that he had cut his antagonist’s lip and his own hand. He had never forgotten the feeling of that wet mouth nor the salt taste of the boy’s blood as in his own pain he licked his knuckles. It was in the very spirit of that old childish desperation that he now permitted himself to cry out at the top of his voice: “I was only fooling you, Rhun! Don’t disturb your Persian devil!”

A silence so ghastly in its indrawn absoluteness followed this brutal blasphemy that Porius himself shivered as the echo kept repeating itself: “Pers —— ian Dev —— il! Pers —— ian Devil!” until it seemed as if it would never die away; until it seemed as if it had become a living and hideous entity, the red mouth and wet nostrils of a great wounded Bull that went butting and bellowing into the bowels of the earth!

And there arose a necessity for Porius that he should listen intently to his own words in this terrible recession so that he might be sure they died away only because of the distance! He knew what must never be allowed to die away. He fancied he heard echoes from the bowels of the earth that really did sound like the bellowing of a bull. Well! The Mithraic Bull might bellow and bleed till it broke the adamantine chain of Time and Space; the important thing was that the human imagination that defied it, the human imagination that defied not only it, not only the Bull and the Slayer of the Bull, but the Crucified and the Slayer of the Crucified, yea! and all the God-Bearers and all the God-Slayers from the beginning of the world unto this hour, should never be robbed of its power to tell itself other stories, and thus create a different future.

But at this crucial moment, as the torch which Rhun had placed against the wall spluttered and grew dim, Porius had a physical shock that was quite different from the reverberation or cessation of any echo. This was the sudden impact of the cold nose of Drudwyn pressed against his hand.

Simultaneously with this it struck him that he was no longer carrying the water bottle. “I must have put it down somewhere,” he thought. “Now where the devil did I put it down?” And then, simply because of the fumbling movements he was making as he caressed the dog’s head, he discovered that his hand was trembling.

It was at this moment of all moments that he suddenly heard Rhun’s voice whispering to him! Not a sound of his approach had he caught, and even now it was of a voice rather than of a presence that he was so startlingly conscious. This low-pitched, deep-throated whisper produced in him the queerest feeling. It was a whisper of irresistible command, not an appeal, not an entreaty. “Taste and see,” whispered Rhun. And it was as if an oracle had spoken out of the heart of Matter itself.

That one of these men was the only son of the chief of his tribe and the other the grandson of a slave made no difference. “Nama, Nama, Sebesio,” was clearly an incantation which suffered no barriers to separate it from its object. It was also an oracle that could draw — with the help of a little honey and, in spite of the darkness, of cedarwood-scented smoke — the tip of a human tongue from between human lips.

Porius indeed on this occasion had hardly moved his head when Rhun’s forearm — and how damp and cold his foster-brother’s flesh was! — brushed his chin, and his mouth came into contact with the rim of some sort of bowl, beaker, goblet, cup, or chalice.

In telling Morfydd of all this later he tantalized and annoyed the girl by delaying so long over the question, which struck her as trifling, as to how it was that he came to know by the mere touch of his lips that this cup or chalice was not only of gold but was of extraordinary antiquity.

“I’m sure it was used,” he assured her, “by some pater sacrorum of the Mithras cult who had come with the legion from the east.” What he didn’t attempt to explain to her, and it was probably her instinct that he was keeping something back that made her angry, was the fact that the hot, thick, sticky substance that he was now licking with an eager tongue, and of which honey, but not ordinary honey, was the chief ingredient, had a queerly startling effect upon his sex-feelings. No, to the end of their days he never told Morfydd.

How could he possibly explain to such a girl that the mere impact of that cup whose rim, so he said to himself, must have touched the lips of thousands upon thousands of dedicated warriors, had the long-descended power of taking the deliciousness of sex sweetness from the soft limbs of women and transferring it to the inhuman but immortal elements? Still less would it have been possible to explain to a girl brought up on Homer that with that taste there came to him the feeling that the whole difference between good and evil was connected with some obscure struggle between man and woman.

What he did tell her, and tedious and tantalizing she found them in her longing to know what happened next, were the names of the flowers from which he decided by its smell the honey must have been made!

At the moment however he just blindly imbibed that sweetness and snuffed up that fragrance and he was further aware as he licked his lips that the dog was doing the same.

“So dogs and men are treated alike,” he thought, “in Rhun’s religion. I like that anyway; and I’m sure—”

But he could never remember — no! not for Morfydd or anybody else! — what it was he was sure of; for it was at that point his foster-brother now uttered the great mystic words: “Accepto te sacratus, corax, miles, leo, perses!” And as the grandson of the Greek slave thus made a metechontes, or “participant,” of the son of his prince, Porius couldn’t help noticing that for all the austere anti-feminism of the man’s idea, his tone had the same rich, lilting, ecstatic, African softness of the tone of the people of the forest huts when the priest made them chant the responses to his new god in his new church.

But not yet was the great Mithraic mystery over for him; for as he swallowed the sweetness that still clung to his tongue, and as the dog licked the fingers with which he caressed him, he began to be aware that his foster-brother had produced from about his person his specially contrived fire-lighter of iron and flint, together with an inflammably oiled wick that had been his pride since his boyhood, and was now deliberately proceeding to illumine a small oil lamp that stood upon a flat stone in an alcove in the wall. Behind and above the lamp — for the alcove was only about three feet square — Porius caught a glimpse of two small ivory and gold statuettes, neither of them more than six inches high, and he also beheld, ere in no more than a couple of minutes the light was blown out, his foster-brother on his knees before this shrine and tapping with the front of his skull a rough and jagged stone that jutted out from the wall below the two images.

Porius had just time to notice that one of these figures representing the roughly moulded body of an infant wearing the Phrygian cap, and rising waist-high out of a rock, bore the inscription "Ave Invictus," while the other, a naked man with a lion's head and a snake twisted round his body, carried in large clear Greek letters the single word "Cronos."

Having muttered some inarticulate mumblings as he blew out the lamp Rhun had now moved to the further side of the Cave and Porius as he looked about him discovered to his relief that his own shameless detachment hadn't left him, but that he was still following the motions of his companion with an uncommitted alertness. Since tapping with his skull on that jagged stone Rhun had been seized by a taciturn energy. He began hurrying from spot to spot in the hollow darkness making rapid preparations for leaving both his dog and his god to a lonely night. He handed Porius the water flask and himself began the ticklish process of relighting the burnt-out torch in the wall by the aid of his precious contrivance.

What Porius now began to discover as he watched him was that both the god of eternity embraced by a serpent and the bull-slaying sun god rising from a rock left his religious sense completely cold.

But they touched another chord and for the first time in his life he felt a protective warmth for the Isle of Britain and a longing to try his strength against these Colgrims and Baldulfs and Cheldrics from Germania. It had never struck him before that the persistent struggle of the Romanized Arthur to free the whole island from these pirates was any concern of his. He had never doubted the emperor's power to get the intruders out, but then the emperor himself and all his famous horsemen seemed to his mind much more Roman than Brythonic.

"I can't understand it," he said to himself. "No, I can't understand it!" Mentally he surveyed the incomprehensible thing, and as it was with persons, so it was with ideas. He saw his mental dilemma as a grotesque blur of incongruous shapes and obscure colours.

What he couldn't understand was that this Mithraic experience though leaving his religious sense cold made him want to drive Colgrim and Baldulf and Cheldric back to the land from which they came. "I can't understand it!" he repeated. Under the spell of this Mazdean god, in whose power he didn't for a moment believe, he'd suddenly come to recognize that his real home was Ynys Prydein, and not just the princedom of Cunedda.

In the depths of this Cave and in a pulse beat of Cronos the Supreme Mystery, he had "touched bottom"; he had heard the echoes that move among the rock roots of the whole Island of Britain! No longer could he be shut up in the childish feeling that the forests and mountains and pastures and swamps of Edeyrnion were the be-all and the end-all of everything.

Well, there it was! Though the bull-slaying rock babe and the ultimate Cronos who begat him and must finally devour him were no more sacred to him now than Minnawc Gorsant's Three-Gods-in-One, there was no doubt that he had made some deep covenant with this grandson of a Greek freedman. With Rhun and Rhun's dog — and that the dog had shared it was a curious pleasure to him — he had touched rock bottom that eighteenth of October, four hundred and ninety-nine. They were brothers-in-arms henceforth in some cause, though just in what remained to be seen!

He stretched his muscles and drew a deep contented sigh. “After all,” he thought, “this Cave was once an aboriginal dwelling. Perhaps it was here that Edeyrn ap Cunedda found the woman he wedded, some infant girl left to perish by the giant brood of the Cader!”

Ah! The place was once more lighted, though very dimly. Rhun had at last succeeded, after causing much smoke and much spluttering, in getting the torch to burn. What in Jesus’s name was he doing now?

But it soon became only too clear what he was doing; and Porius disliked it with all his heart. He was engaged in tying up the dog for the night, a process which tested the wise creature’s philosophy almost beyond its powers of endurance. At this moment he was filling Drudwyn’s water trough with water while erratic spurts of light fell down spluttering the torch.

As these gleams of light descended they glided off the smooth leathery surface of the stooping man’s back and threw into relief infinitesimal ripples in the dog’s water trough; ripples which otherwise would have perished beyond recovery and been utterly lost, either in that desolate Limbo of inanimate matter, which Morfydd’s brother held was the end of everything, or in that happier reservoir of materials for the World Soul, concerning which the girl herself used to quote to him from Virgil.

These dancing ripples in Drudwyn’s water were rendered all the more noticeable by the pitiful sorrow in the eyes of the dog as from above those twitching nostrils and monumental paws they followed the man’s every movement.

Above the dog’s head hung a large carefully polished Roman shield, a legacy from Rhun’s Greek grandfather, and which had been the common soldier’s chief defensive weapon in that legion at Uriconium. The increasing torch flare brought it about that Rhun’s face — his hands were engaged in scraping into a wooden bowl some gobbets of flesh from the bone he had chosen for his dog's supper — was waveringly reflected in the shield's polished surface; while beside Rhun's face, less vividly but quite unmistakably, Porius's own features had begun to flicker.

How alike he and his foster-brother were! There was no gainsaying it. Not that he hadn't known it since his earliest days; for the Three Aunties had never been weary of referring to it and it had always caused him a peculiar sort of numb, dumb, sour-sweet, sodden, bruised discomfort, a discomfort like the taste of mouldy bread or of bruised pears.

But it had never occurred to him before to wonder what Morfydd thought of it! Wasn't it extremely disagreeable for her to be tied to a man whose double she was forever seeing?

The idea of Morfydd's weary distaste for this constant repetition of bony and heavily lowering foreheads, brooding underlips, rugged unclassic noses, deep-set greenish yellow eyes, was accentuated for him at this moment by the sudden memory — the brute thing was always catching him off-guard — of the bloody and mangled head of an ox he had once seen in a butcher's shop at the Deva market.

Since that day he and Rhun and that mangled head had rubbed against one another in his consciousness like imprisoned fish in a fish kettle. When he was most himself, as his foster-mother used to say, that is when he saw, felt, considered, and imagined things as he was "born and intended" to see and feel them, that ox's head was part of it, part of himself. And it was this not merely because by some fatality of sympathy he was bound to imagine what had been going on behind that look in the ox's eyes, but because he was bound to admit an actual resemblance between the bony corrugations above his own and Rhun's hollow and brooding eye sockets and those of that outraged beast head.

If the Mithras honey had linked them together and linked both of them with the dog, this older link was a more tragic one and went further down. Well! They were all children of Time, all children of Cronos, and henceforth he and Rhun and the dog and the mangled beast head had a bedrock understanding, even if their Mithraic fraternity enrolled for righteousness were a mirage and illusion.

He sighed heavily, feeling that this link with the chained, the devoured, the tortured, the sacrificed, weighed him down to the bottom. Had that giant-orphan, the bride of Cunedda's son, whom he could imagine so vividly here, looked about her helplessly in the darkness and given up all hope? With that beast head and those lost eyes he felt as though he saw everything in the world exactly as it was, yes, in all its unendurable reality.

"But this won't do," he thought. "This is life seen as it is. But this is madness. Moment by moment all that live re-create life and change this false reality!"

He was roused from his trance by Drudwyn. The dog had settled himself down to be left alone in a misery like that in which they had found him when they first came. But he now leapt to his feet, pricked up his ears, and uttered a series of excited barks. Rhun at once stopped scraping the bone he was holding and moved to the entrance of the Cave. Once arrived there he remained motionless in a concentrated intensity of listening.

Porius listened too, but he could hear nothing except the whisper of a rising wind, a faint rustle of dead leaves, and the murmurs of the swollen river.

Rhun now took off his Phrygian cap and put on his ordinary one. He possessed himself once more of Porius's hunting spear and handed over to him the water bottle and yet he kept on hesitating and delaying.

Meanwhile the torch above the dog's head was beginning to burn erratically, guttering, spluttering, hissing, and emitting jets of bitter smoke.

Porius still felt that his inmost life of sensations and imaginings had been threatened by some shocking vision of frozen reality. "But the animals," he thought, "change all reality every moment by the living energy in them. They create the world fresh every second just as we do! If Drudwyn saw things as I saw them just now he couldn't endure it. Body of God! But what's that?"

For an eyelid's flicker he thought of Morfydd in hysterics — flying wildly, desperately after him, fallen into the river while she fled from Minnawc Gorsant.

Seagulls! But who'd have expected seagulls tonight, when the weather was so calm? Had the wind veered? Was a storm coming up? But seagulls they certainly were, and a lot of them. Unmistakable those wild, high-pitched, unearthly cries, advancing and receding, rising and sinking, as they tossed and turned in the grey mist.

"Down, Drudwyn! Down, I tell you!" It was Rhun's voice. The dog had suddenly begun straining at his chain, pawing the air excitedly and giving vent to short, sharp, impassioned, and — strangest of all — extremely joyous barks!

But what on earth was Rhun doing now? Porius turned his back to the entrance of the Cave and stared with some uneasiness at his foster-brother. Something had come over Rhun just then that seemed inexplicable. What the man was engaged upon now, and engaged upon it gravely, resolutely, obstinately, was no less than grotesque.

He was automatically like a mechanised dummy engaged in undoing all that he had with such meticulous labour just done, and undoing it with the patient deliberate motions of a sleepwalker! He had just tied up the dog and here he was calmly, deliberately, mechanically, setting him free again!

The moment he was free Drudwyn shot past both the men with something between a hunting cry and a bark of recognition and disappeared in the misty twilight.

“Quick, Porius ab Einion!” cried Rhun. “There’s someone at the ferry!”

CHAPTER III. The Stranger

ARMED WITH THEIR ONLY WEAPON, Drudwyn's master followed the white hound, while, gripping the Roman water bottle with a force that would have broken any ordinary vessel, Porius followed his foster-brother. He was destined later to strip to its skin every impression of that confused moment, but this was one of those occasions when the dam of events has been pulled up so rapidly that the unsluiced imagination has difficulty in overtaking what the tide is carrying down.

Porius certainly needed every mental power he possessed to keep, mentally speaking, even a boat's length behind the rush of sensations. He was vividly aware of that special kind of shock that comes when a phenomenon that in itself is perfectly natural presses so hard against the sequence of things with which we're familiar that it discredits the very witness of the senses themselves.

Emerging from the Cave, Porius felt at once that the twilight was agitated by much more than the screams of a flock of seagulls. He thought he heard the bark of a fox. He was sure he saw the grey unshapely form of a badger; and the air seemed as ruffled by excited stirrings and flutterings as the earth seemed ransacked by wild scamperings and drummings.

He paused and gazed round him. It was one of the strangest sensations he had ever had. That yellow vapour was here again! Yes, that same stubble-coloured mist, like a conscious presence, whose motion across the sky he had followed from the Gaer gate, had left those dwellings by the church only to descend upon the Ford of Mithras!

His mind struggled to catch and clarify the confused ideas that came swimming into his consciousness as he listened to these scufflings in the undergrowth and cries in the air. And the more desperately he tried to get his sensations under control, the more this unnatural mist thickened about him. It could no longer be called stubble coloured. Twilight had darkened too far.

But the effect upon Porius was the same as if it could be so called; since there was something about it that differentiated it completely from the mist that cradled it and carried it. Thicker and thicker it gathered round him, till he began to wonder whether he was destined to reach Brother John at all that night.

And then all of a sudden he felt a genuine alarm. Had that curst Mithras business affected his brain? He certainly couldn't remember ever having a sensation like the one he had now! It was a chilly sensation and a frightening sensation. It was as if he felt the combined chill of heaps of bones piled upon heaps of bones, and heaps of leaves piled upon heaps of leaves, bones turning too slowly into dust, leaves turning too slowly into mould!

He was still groping his way slowly down hill, following Rhun as Rhun had followed the dog, and what he wanted above all was to keep his inner identity — the thing that said "I am Porius ab Einion" — intact. He wanted also to remember that he had the blood of the aboriginal giants in his veins as well as of the forest people! He uttered a kind of wordless appeal to the spirit of Creiddylad, the mother of Iddawc the Apostate.

The fear that troubled him most as he groped his way downward towards the river was the fear lest his human soul should suddenly lose its separate existence and merge itself into the souls of these agitated birds and beasts who were evidently yielding to some strange and unusual excitement.

What was happening down there by the Ford of Mithras? He felt as though it were something absolutely natural, not supernatural at all, but at the same time out of order, like an eclipse or an earthquake.

"We shall remember," he said to himself, "we shall remember this night in future time."

He could hear the dog now, down by the ferry, uttering the same quick excited barks; but the tone of these barks struck him as different in some way. They were barks of contentment, satisfaction, infinite relief.

"It's someone he knows," he thought, and he began following the sound down the slope, stepping very slowly and cautiously. As he went he tapped the Roman water flask against his thigh as if to reassure himself that he was what he was. He compelled first one and then the other of his deerskin-covered feet to carry the whole weight of his body. For some reason the rocks and stones beneath him seemed to be pulling and dragging at his legs.

The seagulls were still audible and a couple of rabbits had just dashed across his path, when suddenly the familiar cry of a nightjar, a sound that was entirely natural to both the hour and the place, infused into these other noises something weird, strange and almost shocking. He actually heard two or three splashes out of the darkness as if the very fish from the river were rising!

And then he saw the broad shoulders of Rhun himself emerging from the mist and beyond them the pallor of the flowing water the posts of the landing stage and the dusky shape of the ferryboat. Apparently the personage, whoever he was, with whom Rhun was in colloquy was crouching low down within the ferryboat.

Porius began instinctively behaving as if this personage were a wild animal that he was stalking, for he suddenly became absolutely motionless.

Nor was his immobility that of a casual hunter. It had the frozen rigidity of a predatory animal in the act of leaping upon its prey.

As he stood there it was impossible to catch the faintest glimpse of the creature in the ferryboat or even to be sure of its sex. All he could do was to listen to the dialogue, an extremely one-sided one, that was proceeding between the personage in the boat and the man at the side of the boat.

He felt no shame about listening in this manner, for, after all, as the son of his father he was used to listening carelessly and perfunctorily to the talk of tribesmen whose private affairs were no concern of his.

There was clearly some cynneddf, or "magical peculiarity," about this person in the ferryboat which like the presence of a large ship in a small harbour was causing all manner of vibratory disturbances!

Porius's senses were also aware at that moment of something else. This may not have had any connection with the stranger, nor, if the stranger had nothing to do with it, any connection with the agitation among the birds and beasts and fish, not to speak of Drudwyn, who was just then making extraordinary sounds of emotional satisfaction; but on the other hand, whether connected with the stranger or not, why shouldn't the cause of all this stir have an effect upon vegetable lives also? Why shouldn't it for instance draw out with a double intensity the peculiar death-and'Corruption stench of such an evil-smelling growth as the stinkhorn fungus?

Porius was certainly conscious of something at that moment very like the feverish, fetid, pestilential, and yet morbidly sexual smell of this weird cryptogamous growth, and the odour reached him just then exactly as that would have done, in wayward intermittent waftures.

"It's odd," thought Porius, "that Rhun should forget my existence like this!"

His foster-brother did indeed seem so completely absorbed in his colloquy with the man in the barge as to be oblivious of everything. He was telling the stranger now about their encounter with the young man on the white horse. He was telling it deliberately, slowly, and clumsily, but with an intense relish. The responses of the person in the ferryboat were inaudible, and Porius was not a little puzzled by his own restraint.

He didn't precisely shape the question to himself; but there was an uneasy tremor and twinge at some knotted nerve centre in him that amounted to a sense of humiliation. Why didn't he go straight up to them and announce to the stranger that he was the son of Prince Einion? But that would have been a moral humiliation worse than Rhun's neglect. He had not been a pupil of Brother John for nothing and as he listened to the screaming of the seagulls, the splashing of the fish, and the crying of the nightjar he blushed under his cheekbones at the pettiness of his pride. Had he forgotten Iddawc the Apostate's mother? Had he forgotten Einion's contempt for Brythonic tradition? But though he blushed at the unworthiness of his pride, his shame in it neither obliterated his obscure anger nor gave him the spirit to break the spell.

What was that? What he'd heard was the plunge of something much bigger than any fish. Had Rhun's interlocutor himself jumped out of the boat? No, Rhun was beginning to talk about the Cave. The other must be responding. Hadn't either of them heard the plunge?

Ah! He knew what that new sound was, that heavy breathing, that gurgling snort, that trembling of the massive flanks! And he could see the creature's horns — the majestic antlers of a full-grown stag. It was emerging from the river now.

There! It had leapt into the undergrowth only a score of yards from where Rhun was standing. But Rhun took no notice of the stag. He seemed to take no interest in anything in the world except giving the stranger a long and detailed history of the Cave of Mithras and its connection with that legion at Uriconium that had been the last to leave the country.

It was the tone of his voice and the unseasonable irrelevance of his discourse — just like that recitation from Pelagius which he had learnt by heart — that finally roused Porius into breaking the spell. His impatience to get away from the Ford of Mithras, his growing anxiety to reach Saint Julian's Fount before Brother John and his guests had gone to their sleeping quarters couldn't do it; but to have to listen to the praise of the legion at Uriconium compared with the legion at Deva, when he knew that there wasn't a real Roman in either of them, did it with a vengeance.

"A pilgrim for the Fount, eh?" he said. And then he added, addressing the river rather than anything else, "People keep the Brother up too late. He is old and he gets weary. God be with you" — he paused for a moment peering at the huge dark form that was hunched up within the barge, its back against the wooden stern and its legs stretched out in front— "God be with you, my Master."

"God be with you, Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda!" The man, who in that mist looked like a herdsman from far south of Lake Tegid, spoke in a low, hoarse, guttural whisper, like someone who had given up for long years the use of human speech.

He was clothed in a shaggy coat of coarse wool that descended below his knees but under this, twisted round his legs and reaching from his ankles halfway up his thighs, he wore rough cowhide leggings bleached and stained by weather. His sandals were bound to his feet by swathes of reeds, and round his ankles which otherwise would have been bare he had tied thin leather thongs round which he had twisted bracken stalks and river rushes. A straggly black beard was tucked inside his sheep's-wool coat and under his black bristly eyebrows his eyes in the darkness looked like the bosses of two metal shields seen on their concave or interior side.

After greeting him in this manner and receiving his greeting, Porius seated himself in the prow of the boat opposite the stranger, while Rhun, laying down the hunting spear in rather sulky silence as if grudging the breaking off of his discourse, untied the barge and began to use the punting pole. The grandson of Iddawc the Apostate and the black-haired traveller contemplated each other in silence.

The darkness, the flow of the current, their own mood, all this made the return crossing for both the foster-brothers a much slower business than the preceding one. Twice had Rhun to push out into mid-current and make a new attempt to bring the barge to the landing stage.

Dimly through the mist Porius could see, beyond the enormous dark head opposite him, the faint outline of the Roman steps descending to the river's brink. Was it from these or from the figure in front of him that there had been drawn out of that autumnal night a sudden ice-cold wafture that caused him to hug his knees, and sent an unmistakable shiver through his bones?

At a later time he tried to analyze just what it was that he experienced when he first sat down opposite this man; but beyond the association of this ice-cold shiver with the mysterious phenomenon known in most human tribes as "death" he never got any further in this analysis.

He began definitely to decide now however that the strange fungus smell he had noticed some minutes ago did proceed from the astonishing figure in front of him.

The man's head was bare of everything but a crop of coal-black hair and his ears were the largest appendages of that kind that Porius had ever seen.

All this he could clearly make out in spite of the obscurity. He could also make out as he bent forward a little to catch the fellow’s replies, which were still hoarse and husky, that his eyes were unnaturally circular in shape and so close together that when they flashed with an interior light, as they did several times during Rhun’s manoeuvres with the ferryboat, they created the illusion that they actually mingled with each other and became one, like the eye — Porius thought — of that monstrous Cyclops described in the Homeric scroll which Brochvael ab Iddawc had brought back from Alexandria and that Morfydd had patched with her needle as devotedly as her unfortunate brother had studied its tremendous contents.

The only weapon carried by this “herdsman from the south” — for so Porius tried hard to regard him — was the sort of fragment of a dead tree that Porius himself had been meaning to pick up ever since he gave that boyish rider his knife as a token.

It was a knobbed and knotted club, and nothing would have suited Porius better, he thought, as he contemplated it between the herdsman’s knees, than this ungainly weapon.

If the Emperor Arthur had told him to rush upon those Saxon pirates Colgrim and Baldulf with this club he would make fine play with it! Yes, for him too, as for this sulky herdsman, the weapons of the old giants of Cader Idris were still the best, though that curst magician Gwydion ap Don had killed the great Pryderi with his Gwyddyl-Ffichti javelin.

But Rhun had got his barge to the landing stage now, and Drudwyn, who had been lying at the stranger’s feet licking a particular place at the man’s ankles where between the swathes of bracken his skin showed bare, began tugging at the fellow’s garments to get him to move.

Before Porius rose to his feet he was aware of a sort of insect, a beetle or a spider it may have been, running across his hand, the hand that held the water bottle.

"Spiders too!" he said to himself. "God! I must challenge him for the truth; but I begin to be sure it is he." He rose up slowly.

As the representative of the chief it was the old Brythonic custom that he should be the last to leave the barge. Watching the "herdsman from the south" shuffle slowly out of the boat to the landing stage, the bent shoulders and his big woolly coat giving him the look of an enormous old woman, Porius's suspicions mounted to a certainty when he noted no less than three antlered heads silhouetted against the western sky on the top of the bank.

His excitement in this secret certainty, concerning which he felt sure Rhun was still in the dark, was now spoilt by the behaviour of Drudwyn. Rhun had already made fast the boat and it greatly troubled Porius as he watched him carrying their hunting spear up the slope to observe the distress of the white hound, as it hesitated whether to cling to this fatal intruder or follow its master.

Rhun decided the matter himself by seizing the dog by the collar and adjusting the chain of small steel links about his own wrist so that there could be no chance of their being separated; and as the pair of them thus linked together ascended the bank behind the herdsman the three antlered heads vanished.

But Porius now boldly overtook the traveller and brought out his challenge.

"Forgive me, my Lord, if it is an impoliteness" — he used the same Brythonic word "ansyberwyd" that Rhun had used earlier that evening— "but if I am not mistaken you are the emperor's famous counsellor, Myrddin ap Morfryn, known to some as Myrddin Wyllt, to others as Myrddin Emrys, and to yet others as Merlinus Ambrosius!"

The figure in sheepskins shrugged his shoulders and made an indescribable gesture with his free hand, while with his club he patted softly the palpitating sides of a young deer.

"I am what you see," he said in the same harsh, husky, muttering tone. "The creatures you see are my creatures. They know me and I know them. But I have come to bring you to the emperor's camp, and to bring Rhun ap Gwrnach to the emperor's camp. When Colgrim and Baldulf are dead, and when Cheldric is dead, there will be a ship in the Thames ready to take you where you will; but whether you will sail in that ship is hidden from me."

He sighed deeply. "Blind! Blind! Blind! Blind!" he muttered, and then repeated his old formula: "I am what you see and these creatures are what you see. They are my creatures, and before we go to the Fountain I must have fire to make them a sign."

Rhun with his hound chained to his wrist was now awaiting them at the top of the bank where he stood like a sulky sentry, erect, watchful, suspicious, jealous, indignant. Porius knew well what he was feeling. He was outraged by Drudwyn's obsession for Myrddin Wyllt. He was also angrily jealous of the prophet's transference of attention from himself to the younger man.

While finally the obscure hope he had been nourishing in his secret heart of making a convert of Porius to the Mithraic cult had been shattered to bits by the shock of this intrusion, Drudwyn's pitiful whinings and desperate strainings at his chain were clearly accentuating Rhun's irritation; and Porius's mind was divided between his excited interest in the emperor's famous counsellor and his fear lest in the growing darkness his foster-brother might shog off altogether.

Rhun had never done such a thing since they were boys, and it was hard to imagine him doing it now; but the two understood each other so well that, if it did happen now, each of them would know to a nicety why it had happened, and there would be no self-reproach about torturing the other's mind by enigmatic behaviour!

It was still that stubble-coloured mist within the mist that was making things strange for the young chieftain. From the time they left the Gaer that inner mist had been provoking, seducing, cajoling the long October twilight to turn into an unnatural darkness. The thought of the three of them suddenly becoming totally invisible to each other in a magic darkness at this particular point struck him now as not only a grotesque thought but an alarming and even shocking one.

As it was, the way the prophet kept on with this bewildering play of acting the part of a mad herdsman, when it was impossible to suppose he wasn't deliberately using the magnetic power he possessed to draw all these creatures towards him, was destructive of any ordinary understanding with him.

Porius felt he must do something without delay to bring these uneasy moments to an end; for the last of Drudwyn's desperate leaps had dragged Rhun forward and forced him to plunge the great spear in to the ground to steady himself.

"Did you say, Master, that you needed fire to make these creatures of day understand that night has fallen?"

"Yes, fire! Fire would be the best. Though I might... if it were not for... but fire... yes, fire would be the best."

"Rhun!" Porius had raised his voice so much louder than the distance between them demanded that the flutterings and screams above their heads, and the scamperings and snortings and patterings and scufflings in the bushes and bracken around them increased perceptibly, while the splashes in the water below became more frequent, one following another in rapid succession as if a large shoal of fish had been moving up the river in the darkness.

"The master wants your fire lighter, Rhun!"

Slowly the misty outline of the man approached them, pulling at the straining dog and using the butt of the long spear as a staff. When he was about a dozen yards away he stopped abruptly. "I'll throw them to you, Porius ab Einion. They're tied together." He dropped the spear and flung his arm about a birch tree and after a moment's fumbling with his leather pouch, while Myrddin Wyllt, who was all hunched up now in his rough garments and muttering and grumbling like an old witch-wife, gave himself up to caressing a young fawn for whom the agitated parents were waiting in the undergrowth in a turbulence of contrary instincts, the fire lighter flew through the air and landed at Porius's feet.

The prophet rose to his full height, a height which at that moment — for one of this singular personage's gifts was his power of causing people to see him as he wished them to see him — became, to Porius's fancy at least, a foot taller than Rhun.

"Give them to me, Porius ab Einion. I want to do it myself."

Released from his touch, the fawn he was caressing leapt so high that Porius had an uneasy sensation that he would drop dead from fright, but its second bound carried it well out of sight.

But the prophet now became an old woman again and began like any fussy witch-wife to grope about in the bushes for something inflammable wherewith to start a fire. Porius didn't like to help him in this, and he was content to remain quiescent now that he saw that Drudwyn was no longer straining and whining.

At last with the aid of fallen larch sticks and the rotten branches of a dead wild cherry the red flame was crackling and the pungent smoke was blowing this way and that.

But this wasn’t enough. Retaining his witch pose with all its accompaniment of grimaces and mutterings and complainings and groanings, the prophet now collected from the bushes round him the materials for a rough torch which, when he had got it together, he plunged into his bonfire till it was blazing freely, and then brandished it aloft in the air.

The strain of this action tore loose his woolly coat; and the result of this was that his black beard escaped and became free and as if it were a living thing stretched itself forth tense, quivering, alive, and by so doing changed at once, as if in some organic metastasis, his whole bodily appearance.

Porius confessed to Morfydd on a later occasion that he saw or had the hallucination of seeing a swarm of tiny fiery sparks fluttering amid the hairs of this distended beard!

“And did the birds fly away, and the fish sink down, and badgers and foxes go back to their holes?” was the girl’s next question; and the hardly perceptible irony of her tone was destined at that future moment to be accentuated by the mocking gravity with which, at intervals during their talk, she must needs quote for his amusement various characteristic passages from certain letters from the late Apollinaris Sidonius that she was copying for her father.

Porius was compelled to reply that he had been oblivious just then as to what did happen to these excited creatures. “There was certainly no more rustling or fluttering or scampering as we went on,” he said, “and Drudwyn was certainly quiet.”

But her mockery when he was telling her his adventures was not confined to the correspondence of the Prince-Bishop of Arverne. “I suppose it was what happened afterwards," she commented, "that put the stags and the badgers out of your mind."

After brandishing the torch and getting rid of his subhuman followers, Myrddin Wyllt relapsed into the same rough, silent herdsman he had seemed when stretched at the bottom of the barge.

What he was doing now was trampling out, with the meticulous care of an elderly forester, every spark of the fire. Had it been daylight the fire would have been reduced to blackness in a few minutes, but it was now so dark that there was forever reappearing some unexpected and annoying rebirth of blood-red flickerings that had a tendency to transfer themselves to the swathes of straw that bound the counsellor's feet.

But the interlude lasted long enough to give the foster-brothers an opportunity to have a private word together, an opportunity Rhun seemed delighted to take, for now that the dog had shaken off his insane infatuation, and the prophet was behaving in the ordinary manner of an elderly herdsman, and Porius was showing no wish to display authority either as a prince or a Christian, the grandson of Agenor y Gaethwas was in good heart again.

"If you'd prefer to go with him by yourself to Brother John," he hurriedly and eagerly whispered, "I could go back to the Ford for the night, or I could leave Drudwyn there and go to the Gaer for the night. Is there any message you want me to take?" He was silent but continued to stare anxiously into the obscure and mist-blurred outlines of Porius's face.

"He thinks I ought to send him to Ty Cerrig to reassure Morfydd," Porius said to himself, "in case Mother forgot to send down the news when the lad brought it; and I expect he's right. But it would be a shame for him to miss that Greek from Constantinople and miss seeing more of the emperor's men — and Morfydd might say I ought to have thought of that."

So he shook his head and was a good deal puzzled by the unconcealed sigh of disappointment with which this refusal to part with him was received by his boyhood's companion. But he had no opportunity to protest against the man's mood, no opportunity to give him full permission to hurry off if he felt disinclined to face all those strangers while his head was full of Mithras. He had barely time even to pick up the water bottle, which he had set down against a tree and of which he now suddenly thought. What would the old man say if his precious relic of civilization were lost in these heathen groves?

But there was no time now for anything but to plunge forward and obey a new gesture of the prophet who was now making a blind, groping, piteous appeal for help. The man had not so much been overstraining his nerves and overtaxing his magnetic power as putting too great a burden upon his physical endurance. As Porius realized clearly enough before nightfall Myrddin Wyllt's chief personal danger came always from the appalling tension placed upon his bodily frame by all these abnormal and superhuman mental gymnastics.

The whispered consultation between the foster-brothers had for a moment drawn their attention away from the figure trampling out the fire and they had missed the descent upon him of one of the curious physical collapses to which he was liable. On this occasion he seemed to have become for the moment completely blind, and it was queer to see him move towards them — and yet not straight towards them — in a crouching and stooping posture, muttering and grumbling and tapping the uneven ground with his club.

"My Lord! My Lord! What is it? Your eyes? The fire?"

For a moment the man made no coherent reply; but Porius noticed that he rejected Rhun's help and hung with his full weight upon the arms which first reached him. Many were the strange sensations, many the peculiar thoughts that Porius had as he held him there. He had supported far heavier men of his own tribe in the throes of the sacred sickness, and the emperor's counsellor was suffering, as far as he could make out, from no stroke or fit or seizure of any kind, sacred or profane.

He was suffering, our friend shrewdly guessed, from a collapse of the life force in his physical human body, a collapse which for the moment blotted out his sight.

"Jesus Christ," Porius prayed in his heart, "don't let the mist thicken any further!"

Indeed at that moment his chief fear was lest the normal mist, accentuated by the addition of the unnatural mist that had been playing tricks with him all that afternoon, should deepen into an impenetrable wall of darkness so that the three of them would have to take some desperate measures; perhaps even to tie themselves together and follow the white dog like ghosts through Hades.

The curious thing was that he found himself intimately suspecting that this collapse of the emperor's counsellor was only another piece of playacting, like his behaviour about the wild creatures, and like his choice of that savage club as a weapon. But playacting or not, he could hardly let this notorious personage sink to the ground for lack of an arm to hold him up. It was too dark to see more than the white blur of Rhun's face above the white blur of the dog's body, but it tickled his fancy to imagine his foster-brother's irritable disapproval while he watched him saving the counsellor of three generations of Christian monarchs from an ignominious collapse in the wilds of Edeyrnion.

Was it playacting? What if the strange being had really injured his mortal frame by all these magical antics? What if the emperor's counsellor were to die in his arms, here and now, within a bowshot of the sacred Dee? His father and the whole tribe would be held responsible. The emperor's vengeance would strike them all.

He stared obstinately at the two fading white blurs before him and decided that Rhun's face looked whiter than the white dog's body. From somewhere in his brain there arose the fantastic idea that out of their two bodies Myrddin Wyllt had made one body and that this monstrous new creation was even now preparing to set sail in a Greek ship for the book markets of Egypt. A crowd of fantastic notions now began to perch like moulting birds in the threshold of his brain.

Again he became conscious of the stinkhorn fungus smell, and of the ice-cold shudder that seemed to come from outside Time and Space.

"I must keep my head," he told himself, and he began to wonder whether Rhun really worshipped that god of Time with the head of a lion and a serpent twisted round its body. "Blood of Creiddylad!" he suddenly thought, "I would only have to hold him a little tighter—" Why was it that the idea of squeezing the emperor's adviser to death — as if the serpent of Time were to murder Time — gave him such a throb of peculiar shame? Was it because he knew it would please Minnawc Gorsant?

But before he could carry this problem any further the whole situation — with himself in the centre embracing the prophet — drew in and back and out and away. But though it drew away it became ten times more vivid, ten times more distinct.

His own consciousness — the identity of Porius ab Einion — seemed quietly and contentedly to approach so near to splitting itself into a multiple consciousness that it seemed to rock up and down in happy ease like a huge sea squid floating on a smooth invisible ocean.

There was nothing mystical, far less spiritual, in what he experienced as he thus came near to this squid-consciousness. “I mustn’t squeeze the life out of him,” he said to himself, “while I drain his thoughts.”

It was in fact just that, and nothing less, that he was doing! By contact with the man thus reduced, or pretending to be thus reduced, for it came to the same thing, he was tapping in some unknown way a great reservoir of magnetic ubiquity.

Morfydd’s complete lack of interest in all this when he tried to describe it compared with her avid curiosity about every detail of later happenings made him underrate its importance to himself; but he never forgot the impression it made on him at the moment it occurred.

What proved to him that there was no sorcery about it was the fact that all the time he was feeling it he was perfectly aware of a wafture of ground-ivy fragrance from under his feet and a lingering whiff of delicious pungency from some bed of water-mint on which he must have trodden as they came up from the river. The impressions of multiplicity for which he became a medium at this moment were as far-flung and telescopic as they were concentrated and microscopic.

He grew aware of vast continents and countries and cities. He grew aware of the unrolling of world-shaking events; of famines and plagues, of battles and migrations, of the births and deaths of whole civilizations.

And it seemed to him as he kept resisting the giant in his blood which would fain have tightened his powerful hold, that he shared the recession backward of the bones under his grasp into those animal worlds and vegetation worlds from which they had, it seemed only yesterday, emerged.

And by degrees the figure he was holding grew less self-contained, less buttressed-in upon himself, and the man’s very identity seemed slipping back into the elements.

The human frame he held became an organism whose conscious recession into its primordial beginnings extended far beyond the prophet's temporary existence. It was as if what he held, and what he could so easily have crushed, became a multiple entity composed of many separate lives, the lives of beasts and birds and reptiles and plants and trees, and even rocks and stones! This multiple entity was weak and helpless in his grasp and yet it was so much vaster, so much older, so much more enduring than himself that it awed him even while he dominated it.

There was a rich, deep, dangerous, sensual pleasure in feeling this tremendous entity, this huge composite earth creature, thus so helpless in his hands. How it yielded, and how much of it there was to yield!

In it was the dark greenness of leafy hollows and the dim passivity of ancient tree-trunks and the long endurance of rocks piled dumbly upon rocks; and yet there was in it too the fluttering of huge imprisoned wings, and the coiling of great serpents and the feverish relaxings of feline sinews and under it all the hushed growths of green mosses, yellow funguses, grey lichens, drawing their sustenance from the innumerable nipples of leaf mould and from the darkly scented pores of ribbed peat, and from the crumbling rubble of sandstone.

The restless mental observer who was hidden beneath Porius's giant muscles wouldn't allow him to remain content with the half-sexual pleasure he derived from his power over this captured god of Time.

It pushed him on to search into, to try to understand, to seek to share the power of this extraordinary being, the extent of whose underlife was so much larger than his own.

"I must fix in my mind," he told himself, "everything I am getting out of him. I must never forget it, now that I've once got it."

But what had he got? Anyway it was the extreme opposite of what Minnawc Gorsant preached every night in his “White Choir.”

Never had Porius’s restless mind felt more alert than it felt at this moment as it hovered like a hawk over the far-flung secrets with which his embrace was feeding his soul. His giant strength closed about the form of Myrddin Wyllt like the serpent round the body of crooked-counselling Cronos; but this devious wisdom he was dimly tracking down had to do with the inmost self within himself, had to do with the thought, as obscure as it was startling, that it was possible to enlarge a person’s identity till it embraced other identities, till it could escape at will into others, till it could even discover that all the while beneath the obstinate opacity of itself, it was on the verge of becoming these others.

Meanwhile there had always been those two white blurs in the mist before him that were his foster-brother’s face and his foster-brother’s dog; but now with the gradual return of his errant soul from its occult lesson in planetary metempsychosis he became aware that the two white blurs had advanced through the mist until they were well within the length of his own great spear in Rhun’s sulky hand.

“Porius ab Einion!” If Rhun’s appeal was that of a sulky and aggrieved man, Drudwyn’s was that of an indignant and suspicious dog. The way the white hound lifted his head to utter that one syllable, a rather high-pitched syllable that under normal conditions in this part of the forest would have meant the scent of a wild-boar, it was clear to Porius that if this delay in their progress continued, he might uplift in that unnatural mist a succession of those same long-drawn melancholy howls whose appeal to a far-away heaven their arrival at the Cave had interrupted.

“Quiet, Drudwyn!” he cried, addressing the animal and then to the man, “He’ll be all right now, Rhun. He’s coming to himself. He’s worn out. We’ll take him to Brother John's cell."

Whether or not the whole thing, as he had at first suspected, was a subtle piece of playacting, and his own recent excursion through Time and Space an illusion, Porius was not lying when he reassured both the man and the dog.

He would have been puzzled to explain to Morfydd, even if she had been interested enough to ask him, how it was that he knew that the conscious spirit of this mortality-smelling, death-cold burden in his arms was even now returning to its unsightly home; but know it he did, and what he had so recklessly announced as just going to occur, now did occur. And it occurred so suddenly as to cause Rhun to step back and Drudwyn to utter a growl.

The emperor's counsellor disengaged himself easily and naturally from Porius's arms; and that all his faculties were simultaneously restored to him was proved by the manner in which, bending down in the darkness, he fumbled about for his club.

Porius waited in patience till this singular "herdsman from the south" found what he had lost. But even then, instead of leading them forward, or letting them lead him, what must the man do but begin to pour out a stream of hurried, incoherent, disconnected words, but words of so ominous and alarming an import that Porius interrupted him.

"Master," he said, "do you wish both of us to hear all this?"

"I wish Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn to hear it; and I wish Rhun ap Gwrnach ab Agenor y Gaethwas to hear it."

At these words Rhun and the white hound came so close that Porius could feel the dog's tongue licking his free hand, while the hunting spear held by Rhun struck against the Roman water bottle with a sound like a suppressed malediction.

"You will find, Prince Porius, you will find, Rhun ap Gwrnach, what you least expect if you go tonight to Brother John's cell. The brother of Gogfran Derwydd, Llew ap Greidawl, is in the water, dead cold, lying on trestles that" — at this point both of his hearers uttered the name of God in such a long-drawn boyish whistle that Drudwyn howled in sympathy— "on trestles that I've raised in the water. Medrawd the emperor's nephew killed him. For twelve hours he has been cold. None knows how Medrawd killed him. His pretext was that he found the man trying to enter the tent of Nineue, my sister's handmaid. He is crazed with desire for my sister's handmaid, and well he may be! The slipperiness of her skin is like the smoothness of the leaf-shadows round the waist of Adam's first wife. The thirst for her must have drawn Llew ap Greidawl through the darkness as a newt is drawn up from the bottom of a pond by the petals of a water-lily! Only it is he, not she, who is lying dead on the top of the water now. That's why I had the trestles put there — to hold him and to keep them away."

Once more the white hound lifted up his head to howl but Rhun, catching him by the throat, knelt hurriedly by his side, murmuring threats and cajoleries.

"It was in fear of that," the prophet went on— "In fear of what?" thought Porius— "that I made the bier for the corpse on trestles — on trestles, I tell you — and raised it above the water — so that we should know if they came to carry it away."

The man's voice had become high-pitched and rasping. It had also become old and feeble. So feeble and husky had it become that Porius was reminded of the voices of the Modrybedd as the Three Aunties made their moan over the mutilated corpse of Morvran.

"How much longer," he thought, "will he go on murmuring about trestles and corpses and girls with satiny skins when, if this is true, we shall have

—”

He shifted the water bottle to his right hand, for it was his right arm that Myrddin Wyllt was now clutching in this access of volubility, but with his left hand he followed the surface of the spear till he could grasp Rhun’s wrist. This slight contact between them was quite enough to convey, each to each, their startled recognition of what it meant to them all if these crazy intruders had really murdered the druid’s brother.

“How much longer will he go on about satiny skins?”

But the prophet, dropping the arm he had clutched, called to Rhun in an authoritative voice to assist him once more with the fire lighter. The two Brythons were glad enough to exchange a comprehensive look when it became clear for what purpose he wanted this light. The extraordinary man had felt some small insect upon the handle of his club and he wished to make sure it wouldn’t meet an end that was contrary to its destiny.

While Rhun was occupied in flicking into the leaves no less than three small creatures, namely, a centipede, a woodlouse, and a dazed semi-hibernating moth, Porius was able to get a clearer and less equivocal glimpse of the counsellor’s physiognomy than he had yet been able to obtain. The prophet was certainly the ugliest individual he’d ever seen. The man’s ears were beyond all proportion in size. They were very hairy and resembled those of a horse. His mouth had a tendency to fall open like the mouth of one dead or asleep; while from his heavy and pendant lower lip there was a constant dribbling as if the healthy and mechanical motion by which we restrain ourselves from slobbering was in his case atrophied.

But what especially struck Porius was the colour of his eyes. These were of a greenish tint passing into the peculiar greenish blackness of forest twilights and further accentuated by thick black eyebrows and by that extreme closeness to each other of the eye sockets to which reference has already been made. He felt a curious interest in the prophet's eyes as the light of Rhun's glowworm taper caused them to appear and disappear; but it was an interest rather of a boy in a green beetle than of a Christian in the windows of an immortal soul.

It may be imagined therefore what he felt when, during these intermittent snatches of what was in truth a somewhat inhuman curiosity, their eyes chanced to meet! At that second the great-great-grandson of Cunedda felt his cheeks grow hot as Morfydd's might have done. And he didn't blush for embarrassment only.

In one piercing flash he recognized that Myrddin Wyllt had need of him, depended on him, and might very soon, if they remained together, come to cling to him!

Now the strange thing was that in place of this discovery giving him any pleasure he found it extremely distasteful. It not only made him shy and embarrassed; it made him obscurely hostile. He suddenly had a surge of longing to be alone with Morfydd again and to put himself more completely than he had ever done before at her disposal.

The words of that great passage from Pelagius concerning the creative power of the mind that imagines and tells itself stories about its own destiny came into his head, and he seemed to visualize the domination of Morfydd as a clear white sail behind which he could ride the dark waves of a free ocean, he and Rhun with him; liberated as much from the clinging honey of mystical caves as from the clinging greenness of prophetic groves!

And so while before his mind's eye rose the scene at the Fountain of Saint Julian conjured up by the prophet's words and an image of that ready expanse of enchanted water lying under an unnatural mist and surrounded by men and horses moving to and fro in gleaming armour, and among them the haggard lovesick nephew of the emperor, he was suddenly aware of a gross, rough, boyish impulse to call out to Rhun: “Come on, brother! Come on in the name of Alarch the Fair! Never mind the satiny skins of their court ladies! Let’s go back to Ogof-y-Gawr and ask the blessing of the Three Aunties! Let’s go back to Ty Cerrig and get hold of Morfydd! Let’s leave these pirates Colgrim and Baldulf and Cheldric to the horsemen of Arthur and the magic of Myrddin Wyllt! And with Morfydd and the blessing of the Aunties let’s go straight to that Greek ship in the port of London and hoist sail for the Bosporus!”

CHAPTER IV. The Tent

OF THE FOUR PERSONALITIES who were now approaching the neighbourhood of the famous Fountain of Saint Julian the white hound was the one who displayed the most lively signs of excitement.

The two men from Mynydd-y-Gaer were mentally as well as physically weary. Neither of them was accustomed to the expenditure of so much energy after the chief meal of the day, and though their encounter with Mabsant ap Kaw had disturbed Porius very little, and all this Myrddin Wyllt affair had been a gnat's bite to Rhun, their experiences in the Cave were a very different matter.

More than they realized they had been drained of magnetic energy and disturbed in their normal self-control in that weird place, and they had fallen into a mood that at very small provocation might grow explosive.

One thing they instinctively did in common, revealing the old crafty caveman blood in their veins. They put away to the back of their minds all thought of what the consequences would be if the emperor's nephew had really killed Llew ap Greidawl. Myrddin Wyllt himself had remained silent since his outburst about his sister's handmaid, so that it was round three very indrawn human beings that the white dog, now that he was liberated from the iron chain, was able to show his real feeling for his master accentuated by remorse for his recent lapse.

And so while Drudwyn gambolled, sniffed, scampered, and bounded, and the men wrapped themselves closer and closer in their own thoughts, the four of them advanced towards the west through the forest and the mist.

One remark alone, a remark that was practically a command, fell from the prophet as they went along. “I would like the ladies to see you both,” he said, “before you go to the Brother’s cell. Their tent has been pitched next to the Little Mound.”

It was too dark for Porius to see whether Rhun had caught the drift of these significant words, but in a moment he knew he had by his whispered command to Drudwyn.

“Y Bychan!” he murmured, as who should say, “The Little One!” and, perfectly aware of what was expected of him, the white dog fell into line at his heels.

The Little Mound was reputed to be the burying place of a certain Iscovan, whose mother was one of the forest people, but whose father was a Gwyddyl-Ffichti chieftain called Serigi whom Cunedda drove into Mona and there slew. But Iscovan became a hero among his mother’s people and lived to a great age. He was of small stature, hence the name “y Bychan,” or “the Little One”; but he was notorious for his strength and cunning, and, as long as he lived, was regarded by the legionaries at Uriconium as their most mischievous enemy.

The Mound of the Little One became therefore a rallying spot for all such local rebels as not only hated the Romans but had small love for the House of Cunedda; and the reverence in which it was held by the natives, combined with the uneasiness with which both Romans and Brythons regarded it, soon spread to the dogs of that neighbourhood who learnt to associate the place with an enforced quiescence.

Thus it was that by speaking of the Mound of the Little One as their destination Myrddin Wyllt cast a traditional restraint over the only one of the company who had regained his spirits.

It was no unfamiliar spectacle to Porius to see lights flickering through the trees as they approached y Bychan's Mound, for it had been a custom with the people of the forest, before Cunedda appeared on the scene, to celebrate the death of the Gwyddylaid outlaw with torchlit games; and the more youthful and daring among the hut dwellers still gathered here at the equinoctial seasons as a gesture of defiance to both the Romanized Arthur and his Brythonic representatives at the Gaer.

But the Gaer itself was different now, and the most rebellious could hardly accuse Prince Einion of Romanizing tendencies. Brought up by the Three Princesses and their beautiful niece to share the forest people's reverence for this place, it was no slight shock to Porius, when, at the end of a wide llanerch, or grass-covered expanse between the trees, he perceived the dusky bulk of a large pavilion from which several flickering lights were wavering into the forest.

It was really no more than a large tent, but the vast stretch of sailcloth of which it was made gave it an effect such as neither Porius nor Rhun had ever beheld before; the effect of a colossal fungus of a dusky brick-red colour. It was supported at the four corners by four enormous fir-tree posts and, inwards from these posts, the sailcloth sagged in shell-like curves.

It now became clear to Porius that, though the prophet's pavilion was so isolated from the tents of the other intruders, there was no guard or sentry, no watch or bonfire, anywhere about the place.

Porius's imagination kept transforming the shapes of the trees into stately horses, all coal black, cropping the dark wet grass, but it was not imagination that caused Drudwyn to utter a menacing growl. A couple of shaggy deerhounds, each of them of some dusky hue too vague to be distinguished in the mist, but each of them with a white breast, answered his growl; and if it had not been for three extremely active pages and the presence of Myrddin Wyllt their arrival might have been celebrated by the passing to Hades either of Drudwyn himself or more likely of both these handsome strangers.

But the prophet indicated to his visitors now that it behoved them to remain where they were.

“Porius ab Einion, one minute, Rhun ap Gwrnach, one minute, while I warn my sister.”

Never had Porius — no! not since he crossed the Mountain of the Mothers to go to the Bishop’s School — felt more thankful for a delay in the progress of events than when he saw the herdsman-prophet enter that illuminated pavilion. Two of the pages, each restraining a dog by its collar, held aside for that strange figure the thick folds of sailcloth that formed the entrance to the tent and vanished into the place behind him.

It became the destiny therefore of our two friends and their now docile companion, for the dog did not even utter the protest of a whine, to listen absent-mindedly, for they all three felt uneasy and embarrassed, to the lively discourse of the third page.

It was a comfort to Porius when he decided in his mind that the prophet had made a mistake, and that y Bychan’s Mound was after all a quarter of a mile away from where they now stood. The three visitors were too proud and too weary to attempt to take any sort of initiative; and they submitted like helpless chessmen when the wily page ushered them out of a particular stream of light that shot into the darkness from between the hanging folds of the tent’s entrance and, having got them into the thick darkness, became astoundingly indiscreet. He seemed to have no more fear of the great Myrddin Wyllt than the pages of the Gaer had of Einion ab Iddawc.

“Fflam and Tegvan,” he explained, and even Drudwyn seemed to comprehend that he was speaking of his fellow pages, “are envying me like the devil my attendance on you, Prince Porius — and on you, my Lord Rhun. Fflam serves the Lady Gwendydd and Tegvan the Lady Nineue; and though you might think Fflam's was the greater honour I can assure you, my Lords, that such is not the case. No! I should say not! The lowest turnspit and greasiest scullion in Arthur's court knows better. The Lady Nineue has more power than any woman in this island, more than the empress herself; for my master governs the emperor and the Lady Nineue governs my master.

"I expect you haven't heard but it's common news here — may I lose my soul if it isn't! — that the master is more besotted with the Lady Nineue than Prince Medrawd is with somebody else. You've heard of the killing of this imbecile brother or cousin or something of the local druid? Fflam and Tegvan say, and all the ostlers and all the outriders say, that the master did it himself and put the blame on Prince Medrawd. We know with whom Prince Medrawd is in love — not with the Lady Nineue but with somebody higher up. Fflam and Tegvan saw the poor man play Peeping Tom under the tent. He was up to no harm. And they saw Prince Medrawd walking up and down as he always does when he can't sleep and he never can sleep! Twas Prince Medrawd that found that man, all bloody and cold like a mallard in a swamp, but if he killed him you can cut out my tongue!

"We're the ones who saw him staring at him with his hollow eyes, and of course he had his tourney lance. He always does have that when he walks in the night. He uses it like a staff. It's funny, isn't it? The whole business is funny; and it's what's always happening. And Fflam and Tegvan and I are always looking on, looking on till we're tired of it; for when you've known Arthur's court you've known all there is; and all there is makes a person tired."

Porius broke in at this. “And what may your name be, Master Know-All?” He heard a gloomy chuckle from Rhun and something like an appreciative whimper from Drudwyn.

“Neb ap Digon,” replied the all-knowing one, unabashed.

“Aren’t you afraid, Neb ap Digon, of talking to strangers about the emperor’s counsellor?”

“Oh, he knows how I talk. He knows everything. And you see it’s like this; when a person knows everything it’s the same as if he knows nothing.”

Drudwyn expressed his opinion upon this aphorism by uttering a sound that resembled an uncomfortable sneeze.

But Porius laid his hand on the child’s shoulder.

“Let’s see your face,” he said, and began propelling him into the stream of light from the tent. Neb ap Digon looked about ten years old, but Porius decided that he must at least be twelve. Like his companions he was dressed in the imperial colours, that is to say, in green and yellow, and he wore his hair cropped close to his skull. His nose was long, his mouth pinched, bitter, and tight-lipped, but the presence of a pair of disarming dimples in his cheeks gave to his perpetual expression of satiric mockery a sort of whimsical and disarming stamp of innocence, as though Nature, who like Myrddin Wyllt knew everything, had been at pains to register this devilish infant as really quite harmless.

“Do all the pages in Arthur’s court,” enquired Porius, after surveying in silence the ambiguous little face before him, “talk to strangers as freely as you do?”

Neb ap Digon gave him a most curious look. “We can only say what we’re allowed to say,” he replied.

“Did you hear that, Rhun? On my soul, I believe the child’s right! I’ve been feeling all this time since we crossed the river that I too can only say what I’m allowed to say.”

But the colloquy was now brought to a close by a sudden drawing aside of one of the two heavy hangings that hid the entrance to the pavilion; and while the page they had heard designated as Fflam held back the hangings the other approached to usher them in.

Porius well understood what the hurried look meant which his foster-brother gave him now. He nodded emphatically, and Drudwyn, walking with grave solemn dignity, entered the pavilion with them. The warmth and fragrance of the place were an overpowering contrast to the cold mist outside. They heard at once the sound of ladies’ voices and they could see them too, but they were separated from them by a perforated screen.

The soldier of the Covenant of Mithras gave his comrade a second quick look, a look that seemed to say, “They’ve decided to cast a spell over us and he’s given them time to prepare it!”

But as Porius stared through the screen he felt disinclined to do anything except allow the dangerous charm exposed to his view, whether it was prepared or unprepared, to have its complete way with him.

The white hound also, though the hot and fragrant atmosphere caused drops of water to drip from his panting mouth, wagged his tail with as much pleasurable excitement as if he’d never tasted the Sacrament of Mithras.

And indeed, as Neb ap Digon took the water bottle from Porius’s hand, and little Fflam took the spear from Rhun’s, and the yet smaller Tegvan shifted the monstrous club of the “herdsman from the south” to make room for these objects, it rushed through Porius’s mind that Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd may well have experienced an ecstasy so intense as he peered through this screen that even had he known that the dagger, or whatever it was that Medrawd used, was already raised to despatch him, he still would have continued to stare, content to pay for such an experience with his life.

The truth was that what he now beheld through this rare object of Cretan workmanship, brought from Arthur’s llys, or “palace,” and presented to the emperor’s counsellor by a merchant from Constantinople, was a sight that might have disturbed the senses of Minnawc Gorsant himself.

Two beautiful young women were helping each other to put the final delicate touches to adornments that at Mynydd-y-Gaer went by the appropriate name of “love trappings.” One of them was fair in complexion to a degree beyond anything that Porius had imagined was possible in fair women. She was not only fair, but her skin was white in a completely different way from the whiteness of other women’s skin, different even from the whiteness of his adopted mother, Alarch the Fair.

This fair young woman wore a heavy black mantle which, as it hung loosely from her shoulders, displayed a tightly fitting vest of pale blue fastened at the throat by what looked, through the Cretan screen, like a massive brooch of ivory and gold.

Never had Porius seen such perfectly formed breasts as those which were outlined by that blue vest, while below the vest, which descended halfway to her knees, the soft lamb’s-wool drawers she wore only covered the upper part of her thighs and left her knees and legs completely bare, emphasizing the beauty of her golden sandals.

It was however towards the other young woman that the more lascivious portion of Porius’s attention was drawn, for though he certainly didn’t miss the unusual perfection of Gwendydd’s breasts, he had been taught by his mother to have such a poetic reverence for this portion of a girl’s body that to allow himself to concentrate upon simple amorous desire in connection with it would have shocked one of his deepest instincts.

Gwendydd’s head was modelled on large and grand proportions; and her long hair fell over her black mantle in two tightly twisted coils that had been braided so closely that they resembled a pair of shining and gleaming serpents descending from the shoulders of a caryatid.

The other beautiful creature offered the most lively and striking contrast to all this. In the first place her head was very small; and in the second place it was covered with dark brown boyish-looking curls. Seen through the fretwork of the Cretan screen this head of dusky enchantment seemed to be in perpetual movement, flickering and hovering and undulating like a bird's nest of dark twigs at the top of a slender tree. "And wherever that tree sways," thought the son of Einion, "there'll be a new skyline for somebody!"

She wore the colours of the emperor's court, those same unusual tints of yellow and green as appeared on the person of Neb ap Digon; only in her case the fabric was costlier and rarer and she wore it in a manner peculiar to herself. "Whatever she wears under that yellow and green," he thought, "it's as fine as moth's wings. And how on earth," he thought, "can stuff of those colours give the impression of concealing a soft, silky, slippery skin?"

Porius's youthful hero had always been Hercules and the most seductive story he used to tell himself at the Bishop's School was that one of the Hydra's heads had turned into a girl and had lovingly caressed the slayer of the others.

But he was now sure he knew what Myrddin Wyllt in his weakness and frenzy — or in his acting the part of these things — had been mumbling in that misty undergrowth to the woodlice and beetles and nightjars and badgers as they approached the Mound of Iscovan the Little. Wicked-innocent girls in the slim snake-shapes of liliths and lamias, twisting and turning and twining in the madness of unsatisfied desire, slid into his senses through every crack of the Cretan screen.

But the snake of eternity still embraced Mithras's Time god, and all these thoughts and images were apprehended not so much successively as simultaneously; for the pages had scarcely brushed the wisps of moss and cobwebs and wood rubble from the visitors' clothes and offered them water for their hands than the ladies could be seen moving slowly towards them. They only paused twice as they came, once to whisper something to Neb ap Digon, who had run to meet them, and once to enable Nineue to readjust the other's black mantle where it had slipped from one of her shoulders, but, as has already been hinted, Porius's thoughts were as rapid and reckless as his physical movements were cautious and slow, and at this juncture they had time to travel far.

They travelled faster than light. They followed an airy highway made up of the oddest memories; made up, for instance, even as he straightened his belt to face these women, of the memory of how his foster-mother, who was as fair as the one who was coming towards him now with her breasts under a blue vest, had given him a wooden sword and how his real mother, to counter his pleasure in this, had shown him the family's official sword, the sword of Cunedda, and of how Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda himself in his extreme old age took down this sword — it hung in the banquet hall — when there were symptoms of an uprising among the more Romanized of the Brythons against the growing power of the Three Modrybedd; and finally how his grandmother Indeg had shown him how much more could be reflected in this particular naked blade than in any Roman mirror!

"It reflects thoughts," she had said.

God! And what would the sword of Cunedda be reflecting now if it were balanced at the side of the spear and the bottle against that carved chest where Rhun was standing?

The two ladies had now reached the space between the perforated screen and the carved chest, and Gwendydd was already addressing him when there was a startling interruption. Drudwyn gave one short bark and began wagging his tail, and Porius swung around.

Emerging from the same entrance Rhun and he had just used was a totally unexpected but very familiar figure, that of the tall, simple, athletic youth whose special business it was to carry messages for the mistress of Mynydd-y-Gaer. The contrast between this homespun apparition, who showed himself totally unabashed, and the ironic civility of Neb the son of Digon cannot have been lost on the two ladies, both of whom now came forward so quickly that everybody met at the same second in these same close quarters between the screen and the downward droop of the tent.

The white hound seemed more pleased to greet the lad from the Gaer than the strange ladies; but the lad himself perceptibly lost his confidence in his startled surprise at being confronted by his mistress's son. With a deep blush and a stammered murmur about "my Lady," he hurriedly placed what he carried in Porius's hands and, after a stumbling attempt to step backwards, turned his broad shoulders on the whole company and began awkwardly fumbling with the hangings of the entrance through which the cold mist had followed him into that heated chamber.

The delay in the lad's escape however gave Rhun an unhoped-for opportunity and approaching the boy he explained to him that he wished him to take Drudwyn back to the Gaer.

Displaying as much indifference to the ladies as the rustic boy himself, Rhun now acted the part of the stern soldier of Mithras dedicated to the Blood of the Bull and the Honey of the Sun; and Porius, as he knelt to salute the counsellor's sister and turned to answer the greeting of her companion, was aware that Rhun also was on his knees, but not to either of the young women. He was on his knees by the white hound, eagerly, anxiously, remorsefully, explaining something into those noble and twitching ears; and what he explained soon became evident.

Porius, who had already guessed from the poor beast's lamentable eyes the general drift of this communication, was not surprised when he saw his foster-brother hand over the unhappy animal's chain to the youth before them and, pulling the tent hangings apart, dismiss them both with the sacrificial gesture of a stoical Mithraist into the darkness of the forest.

Porius had a pang of shame. The dog's eyes haunted him. Unless the prophet had grossly lied there was serious danger in the air. It had always been dangerous even for the Romans themselves to meddle with the druids. Cunedda had been warned against it and he had been careful to abide by the warning; so had Edeyrn, while Iddawc had actually used Cunedda's sword to protect the druid of his time.

It was therefore simply unthinkable that any company of men, even though they had Myrddin Wyllt among them, could commit a crime like this and get away unscathed.

Drudwyn's eyes as he followed the messenger struck him as saying: "You send me into the danger, while you and my master linger with the women!"

Gwendydd had indeed installed both himself and Rhun on a circular heap of Arabian rugs and cushions, arranged, after the Romanized manner of Arthur's court, around a burnished brazier of dusky bronze in the centre of the tent. Whether by previous arrangement between the two women, or by pure chance, or by some natural elective affinity at work upon these four young bodies, Porius found that Gwendydd quickly possessed herself of Rhun, while he was left to the dangerous attraction of "my sister's handmaid."

How different were Mistress Nineue’s eyes from those of Morfydd! Morfydd’s were brown, but so dark brown as to be almost black, whereas the eyes he was now contemplating were pure grey; not the grey that darkens under emotion or changes its hue according to the hour or according to the condition of light or shade, but a unique unearthly grey, a grey that never seemed to change, a grey such as he had never before seen in any human eyes. The girl’s eyebrows were as soft and brown as her skin and very flexible, but her long lashes were jet-black and this had the effect of accentuating the peculiar colour of the eyes beneath them.

It was their lack of all perceptible feeling that struck him most as he began asking her questions about Arthur’s court. The flexible eyebrows had intense expressiveness. So had every feature of her face, but the eyes never changed or altered their tint by the subtlest shade of difference.

Porius’s peculiar submissiveness to the women who dominated his outward life had been intensified by the religious discipline of the Bishop’s School beyond the Mountain of the Mothers and though he had never aimed at continence and had always been outrageously shameless in imagination, something in his temperament had protected him, before his betrothal to Morfydd, from getting involved with any of the Gaer ladies who surrounded his mother.

So it was no new thing for him to find himself, as he did now, faintly aware of a troubled irritability in his nerves, an irritability caused by the fact that while he had no difficulty in resisting the peculiar spell that the “brown lady” cast over him, the effort necessary for this resistance spoilt his pleasure in her company.

So while he kept his small greenish yellow eyes, eyes like those of a Russian bear, fixed on her face as she murmured on about the emperor’s various palaces, and how his guards preferred Caerleon because of the fishing and hunting, but the ladies preferred Caergwynt because of the romantic old-world villas in that region which even in their ruin and dilapidation retained a certain Roman magnificence and in some cases were actually inhabited by the descendants of the old patrician settlers, he tried to escape her attraction by a favourite trick of his, the trick of rapid mental journeys in various directions.

He knew that his fellow covenanter on the further side of this odorous brazier must be feeling remorseful about Drudwyn and as anxious as he was himself to get on to the Fountain and the Brother's cell; so, although he made no attempt to see Rhun's face through the brazier's fragrant smoke or to glance at the beautiful breasts under the blue vest, he set himself to make an interior effort to fling his soul to the support of Rhun's soul. Had he dared to risk the impoliteness of looking away from those unfeeling grey eyes he would have been put to the blush at his own calm moral assumption; for he would have seen an unquestionably happy and complacent Rhun, a Rhun who took that blue vest for granted, a Rhun who, as he stretched himself upon the cushions, felt he was being appreciated as it had seldom been his destiny to be.

Occupied as he was with Nineue ferch Avallach and not being able to gather from the tones of the others the true state of the case, he actually began in his innocence a silent repetition of the mystic syllables "Nama, Nama, Sebesio" trying to pass them on, like a talisman, to his foster-brother.

Nineue's brown curls and unearthly eyes were between him and what he now saw was a slit in the tent hangings at the back of the pavilion; and as he listened to a somewhat cynical description of the emperor's famous queen, he couldn't help imagining the ubiquitous offspring of Digon with the help of Fflam and Tegvan engaged in washing the feet, knees, thighs, chest, and neck of the prophetic "herdsman from the south" and his transformation into a figure more appropriate to ladies' society; while all the while, upon those trestles in the darkened lake, the dead face of the druid's brother stared upwards into the mist.

"To the devil with these Arthurian upstarts!" he thought. "If between them they have really murdered this man the fat'll be in the fire. But it can't be. They'd never dare!"

Meanwhile a word had passed between the two women, and Nineue, hurriedly rising from her cushion and circling round the brazier like a yellow-and-green moth, brought over to him — still unopened — his mother's letter.

"Read it aloud to us, please, Prince Porius," the counsellor's sister said.

He obeyed at once. He was glad enough for an excuse to end the tension of being compelled to resist this satin-skinned creature while what he longed to do was to get hold of Arthur's meddling horsemen and pick them out of their proud saddles like maggots out of apples!

Gwendydd had already broken the seal of the letter and had even unrolled it a few inches. Like other things in Mynydd-y-Gaer — like the mind of its mistress, for instance — the letter was extremely old-fashioned. It was written on an old bit of parchment in coloured inks, and it was rolled carefully round a polished ebony rod.

Nineue ferch Avallach remained standing behind him while he read; but as he went on and found certain of his mother's words hard to decipher, for Euronwy was an extremely poor speller and her stilted Brythonic archaisms, sprinkled with tags of Latin from Minnawc Gorsant's priestly ministrations, made her style in itself anything but simple, the girl bent over him, touching his shoulders with the tips of her fingers and whispering suggestions in his ear.

Even if the contents of this letter hadn't been so important to him these teasing interpretations and the feel of her breath on the back of his neck would have been, as long as he was resisting her, an intolerable irritation; but what his mother communicated, and there could be no doubt of its general drift, cleared the air, at least for the moment, of Syrian perfumes and Arabian oils.

"Since to know is to be prepared in advance, and since to be prepared in advance is to be prepared for the worst, the best way of avoiding danger is to take precautions in time."

"Mother! Mother!" thought the reader of these portentous words, as a whisper over his shoulder suggested, almost as if to itself, an extremely cynical interpretation, "you've gone to the old man, and he's brought out his Roman schoolbooks!"

But the letter soon began to grow more realistic. "In order therefore," it went on, "that you may know how... how..."— "How things are," murmured the voice at his ear— "it is my bounden duty as the second cousin of the Emperor Arthur's late father, to inform you that the sooner you and the Lady Nineue ferch Avallach, together with your brother Myrddin Ambrosius, or Myrddin Emrys, commonly known as Myrddin Wyllt, and together with all the ladies, knights, squires, men-at-arms, heralds, and pages"— "What on earth," thought Porius, "would Mother think of Neb ap Digon!"— "both on yourself and on Myrddin Ambrosius in duty and Christian service depending"— "The old man's schoolbooks again!"— "do promptly and presently, on receipt of this warning, set out, if possible this very... this very..."

"Sunrise," murmured the voice at his ear, while to himself he thought, "She did say 'night,' but the old man made her change it! I suppose Father's gone to the Modrybedd; he would be! and she's only got the old man,"—

"set out this very — this very next sunrise — for Castell Deganwy in Gwynedd to the counsellors, warriors, and churchmen of my husband's departed cousin and liege-lord, Caswallawn Llawhir, primary Prince of the House of Cunedda, and there beseech him, for the love of God, the honour of his House, and the salvation of his infant son Maglocunus, commonly called Maelgwn, to give you an asylum in his fortress until either the wrath of our people has died down or until the emperor sends a fleet to bring you home by sea.

"Were any treacherous adviser to persuade you to take refuge with my husband in Mynydd-y-Gaer, I must warn you, honoured Lady, that he would be playing the part of Judas; for here there is no refuge for those who have... who have done what we understand, from sure and certain news, has been done. The wrath of our people of the forest over the death of Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd has already spread to the mountains, and if you came to us the siege would be so sharp and last so long that your knights, your squires, your heralds, your pages, your horses, yes! and ourselves also, trying to do our duty to the emperor by defending you, would doubtless perish for lack of food and water.

"I beg you therefore to start immediately, on receipt of this warning, to Deganwy in Gwynedd and there demand sanctuary. You are lost if you try to return the way you came. But the way northwest is still open.

"Given at this our princely llys of Mynydd-y-Gaer on the eighteenth night of the month of October in the year of our Saviour and Redeemer four hundred and ninety-nine, under my own hand: Euronwy ferch Porius Manlius, ord-patricii."

There was a profound hush in the tent after the reading of this letter. Just because of the particular kind of irritation which his obstinate refusal to enjoy, even in the most cerebral manner, the bewitching Nineue had roused in him, Porius had read his mother's startling words with impressive dramatic effect.

He had been trained to read the Latin poets and orators while at the Bishop's School by an elderly rhetorician from the Gallic household of that famous writer of letters to posterity the Bishop of Arverne, and though no scholar himself he had inherited from Einion ab Iddawc a lively appreciation of verbal eloquence.

But the amount of feeling he put into his half-humorous emphasis of his mother's inhospitable words was not only due to erotic suppression; it was also due to the fact that this confirmation of his worst fears made him ashamed of lingering in this warm and fragrant place when such things were going on outside.

He was himself the first to break the silence, and he did so with obvious concern for the reputation of the House of Cunedda.

"My mother ought to have explained," he began, while the fact that the young women were so far apart, and one of them only just settled down again by his side, compelled him to make a rather awkward turn of his head and even a slight shifting of the balance of his whole body, "explained more clearly how it is that it should be possible for you to avoid trouble by riding northwest while it would be sheer madness to ride south or north or east. The reason is that although Mynydd-y-Gaer is in the centre of the plain of Edeyrnion, Edeyrnion itself is hedged round by inaccessible mountains and moors where isolated bands of Gwyddyl-Ffichti are still active, especially the remnants of the tribe of Vreichvras Llaw-goch into whose ghost-haunted alder swamps none of my father's people, whether Brython or Iberian, would dare to penetrate."

Mistress Nineue, who had again risen from the cushions at his side and was smoothing out the creases from a fold of her rich gown, turned quickly upon him with the abrupt and imperious question: "But how can it be when the Roman emperor himself appointed the House of Cunedda to clear these woods of Gwyddyl-Ffichti that this has not been done in three whole generations?"

Her words were clear and bold, and Porius and Rhun exchanged an uneasy glance. Then the former began speaking in his gentlest and quietest tone, a tone that compelled the Lady Gwendydd to look at him with grave intensity, while Mistress Nineue, stepping quickly across the room to her side, turned her back on both the men and waited impatiently for an opportunity to whisper something in her ear.

"Gwendydd ferch Morfryn," Porius began, "I am sure it will be clear to you that my dear mother wrote this and sent it off in great haste the moment she heard of this murder—"

At the sound of the word "murder" Nineue twisted about where she stood, with a movement that was so like that of an angry snake that Porius, though he went on speaking, thought of what his betrothed's brother, who was as critical of women as he was sceptical about God, used to tell him of the water snake whose poison festered in the foot of Philoctetes till the stench of it drove him into solitude.

"But this doesn't mean," he went on, "that my father hasn't by this time taken the necessary measures both to bring the murderer to justice and to ensure your safe return to Arthur's llys. My father is very rapid in his movements. He is revered by all the tribes of the forest except the tribe of Vreichvras Llaw-goch. None of you need have any fear but that the murderer of Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd will be found and punished, whoever he may be, and a large enough force summoned to put you all safely on your way.

"With the punishment of the murderer — and I would be greatly surprised if this has not already been achieved — the trouble will die down as quickly as it arose. So that I am in a position" — and as he spoke he rose from his seat and Rhun moved towards him— "to assure you that ladies like yourselves are in perfect safety in Edeyrnion and that my mother was ill-advised to suggest your departure for Deganwy. It may even be that I—"

It was on the tip of his tongue to add, "that I may conduct you myself to Arthur's camp," but at this moment all four of them became aware of peculiar sounds outside the entrance to the tent, sounds that struck them as human and yet not quite human.

The wild notion crossed Porius's mind that Myrddin Wyllt, driven mad by the image of the corpse propped up on those damned trestles, was scrabbling about on his hands and knees in the darkness making animal noises.

The foster-brothers were now standing side by side and they took the opportunity to exchange a curious look. It was like the look that one wild creature might give another when they are doubtful of the movements of the pack from which they have strayed.

Gwendydd too was on her feet now, strong and fair, her breath coming as evenly as ever, though with her rounded arms she made a movement to draw her mantle closer about her.

Nineue ferch Avallach's movements were on the contrary extremely premeditated. She glided to the back of the tent, drew aside the hangings, and listened intently for a moment. Then she went swiftly to her mistress's side, raised her small head of brown curls, whispered something into the other's ear, clutched with both hands a fold of the black mantle, and stared at the tent's entrance while her lithe quivering body in its green-and-yellow satin began to stiffen to so taut and tense a pitch of expectancy that it made

Porius, who by this time had been reassured about the sounds outside, once more think of the outstretched necks of that Hydra of Lerna whose poison tormented the best and last friend of Hercules.

Then the mystery was solved; for, half-dragging and half-dragged, lo! their eccentric guest at the Gaer, the Henog of Dyfed, about whose fate Rhun and he had had such agitating moments, was precipitated out of the darkness closely and confusedly entangled with Neb, Fflam, and Tegvan.

CHAPTER V. The Henog

THE UNFORTUNATE CHRONICLER from Dyfed after one hurried and bewildered glance round him stumbled forward towards the young women and fell on both his knees before Gwendydd. Having kissed her hand he made several attempts to rise but found his legs too weak. Nor would he allow Neb ap Digon or either of the other pages to approach him but beat them off with angry gestures, calling them in the Silurian dialect "newts and tadpoles of hell."

With the help of the two women, however, he was soon comfortably ensconced in a low carved chair by the brazier; and from this refuge he nodded familiarly, almost condescendingly, at Porius and Rhun.

"Lost! Lost! Lost!" he ejaculated. "Lost in this appalling mist! How dreadful, how Cimmerian, how Plutonian! I never thought the terrestrial air could thicken to such a density, or the darkness of Tartarus ascend so quick. On such a night a person needs a whole bodyguard of spirits; spirits that fear nothing but the Holy Trinity and the Illustrious Head of Bran the Blessed! To tell you the truth" — and he addressed himself confidentially to Mistress Nineue— "I don't believe even the counsellor could find his way on such a night. But I want to see him at once."

It was Gwendydd who answered. "Be content, Master Henog," she said. "We will enquire whether my brother is still sleeping or has begun to eat his supper. Perhaps the Lady Nineue will be generous enough to help us by finding this out. Neb ap Digon!"

The little creature was at her side in a second. "Run over to the Fountain, Neb, and collect all the news you can and come back as quickly as you can.

No! Leave the others! I shall have something equally important for them soon. Off with you now!” This was addressed to Fflam and Tegvan who scuttled off like brightly coloured beetles into the inner apartment, while Neb vanished by the way he had come.

Porius watched with an amusement that made his heavy features take on a specially stupid look, the peculiar manner in which “the brown lady” obeyed this unequivocal command. She behaved like a somnambulist; or perhaps to be more exact she moved like a person under a drug, a drug of such power that it rendered the relation between mistress and maid as negligible as that between two lotus eaters lying side by side on a waveless shore, indifferent to every mortal event, while ripple after ripple lap the yellow sands of their lotus isle in a scarcely audible monotone.

Porius began to take a sympathetic interest in this mask assumed by the girl. How could she be at once so seductive and so detached? What was she doing under that remote stare? Was she doing the sort of thing he did himself in that secret practise of his own which, thanks to a particular and peculiar experience, he had come after his odd custom to call by the fantastic name of “cavoseniargizing?”

“I ought to be getting on to the Fountain,” he told himself, “but the Brother will be asleep by now, and I’m not yet enough of a giant to meddle with dead men on trestles.”

When however the green-and-yellow lotus eater had followed the two little pages into the inner tent there was not only a relapse in his own feelings, back to common sense, but Rhun and the Henog, and even the counsellor’s sister, seemed also to become more themselves.

“Will you tell us now, Master Henog,” enquired Gwendydd, “what actually happened to you in the forest?”

This direct question seemed to break the spell cast over them by "my sister's handmaid" and one sign of such relief was the manner in which they all gathered closely round the brazier and began with a completely unembarrassed ease to rearrange the carelessly strewn rugs and cushions that surrounded it.

Another sign of relaxation came from the Lady Gwendydd herself. She had been busy for a minute or two but now she began moving quietly among the three of them, offering them with a most gracious smile crystallized fruit from the silver casket.

When she came to the Henog for the second time that gentleman took another sweetmeat but refrained from placing it in his mouth. "Let me enjoy myself to the full," he pleaded. He was luxuriously sucking, as he held it in one of his cadaverous cheeks, a sugary greengage, a greengage that only a year ago had been warmed into ripeness by the North African sun.

"Are you the prince's cousin?" enquired the lady, addressing herself to Rhun, but giving the preoccupied Henog a sympathetic smile as she seated herself on a pile of cushions beside the devotee of Mithras. "And does that beautiful dog I caught a glimpse of just now belong to you?"

Porius could not help noticing that this blue-robed, full-bosomed, gracious creature had managed to set his foster-brother more at his ease than he had seen him in the company of any woman except Morfydd. He was soon telling her, not only about Drudwyn, but quite simply casually and naturally about his cave.

Thus while the Henog sucked abstractedly at his greengage and while Rhun retained his plum in his fingers and politely nibbled at it as he had been taught to do by Alarch the Fair, Porius had an opportunity to relapse into the particular form of lotus eating which from boyhood he had always been accustomed to name to himself from his early years “cavoseniargizing.” He had once accompanied the elder Porius on an exploring expedition to the wild mountain slopes eastward and westward of Lake Tegid.

This excursion took place when after a serious illness the old man had decided that he ought to select a suitable place for his ashes. This classical way of disposing of the dead had from time immemorial been followed by the Manlian gens, and the family’s preference for burning over burying, in spite of his own fanatical adherence to the Christian faith, still dominated Porius Manlius.

Moreover he wanted his ashes to rest somewhere near Lake Tegid for a less traditional and more personal feeling; for the truth was that in this Lake Tegid district he was reminded of his ancestral estate on the edge of the wild Etrurian forests.

It is true that in selecting this portion of his son-in-law’s princedom for the repose of his ashes he had to control — ultimus Romanorum as he was — a by no means negligible dread, a dread that was as humiliating to his manhood as it was contemptible to his reason; his fear, namely, lest the old local divinities, turned now by the new faith into evil spirits but acknowledged to be more potent in this part of the country than anywhere else in Britain, should disturb his rest.

During this prolonged expedition undertaken in the laudable spirit of classic pietas and in which the boy Porius had a fascinated share, the old man had instinctively chosen two beautifully appropriate sites, only to find that in each case the spot had already been consecrated to two other Roman colonists, one of whom had raised an altar and the other a tombstone.

But the curious thing was that both these Roman colonists, who like old Porius had been reminded of Italy by Lake Tegid, had bequeathed the syllables “cave!” or “beware!,” as part of their patronymic inscription.

Thus it happened that round the puzzled ears of the child as they returned from their final choice of an unappropriated resting place, there had flowed and ebbed a lively discussion as to whether those two syllables represented a portion of the name of a family, possibly a Roman one, that had intermarried with the native lords of Penllyn, or were simply a warning to profane persons to hold aloof.

The secret use, however, to which the little boy put these debatable syllables had solely to do with his own most private feelings. He used the word as one of his precious sensation symbols and to serve as a description of those recurrent moments in his life when the gulf between the animal consciousness of his body, the body of a youthful Hercules, and the consciousness of his restless soul was temporarily bridged; so that his soul found itself able to follow every curve and ripple of his bodily sensations and yet remain suspended above them.

He had tried once to interest Morfydd in these feelings by explaining to her that they resembled what Homer describes in his catalogue of the ships, where he shows how the river Titaressus, as a branch of the Styx, flowed above the river Peneius "like unto olive oil" without mingling with its waters, but he had received no very reassuring impression as to how far she followed his blundering attempts to make this mystery acceptable.

But now as he recalled the way Nineue had passed into the adjoining tent it seemed to him that this girl, about whose satiny skin the great counsellor had mumbled such madness and who had made him think of one of the necks of the Hydra stretched to strike, must really be practising the same divinely delicious trick that in his own deepest mind he had come to regard as the wisest thing any human being could do! She was in fact playing his own secret game!

And that must be why she looked so detached and remote; for to feel this first and last sensation of the human body and soul in harmony you had at once to unite things and isolate things, to immerse yourself in things and to escape from things. It was anything but easy.

“I must wait,” he told himself, though his conscience was murmuring that Brother John might be waiting for him and not asleep at all, “till she comes back. It’s very important to me to find out whether she ‘cavoseniargizes’ or not!”

And now as he swallowed another fragment of Gwendydd’s sweetmeat and as he contemplated the bulge in the Henog’s hollow cheek growing smaller and smaller while the fragrant sweetness oozed down the man’s long sinewy throat and as he listened with a faint and faraway attention to the proud and happy responses of Rhun to Gwendydd’s questions, it presented itself to him as absolutely certain that “my sister’s handmaid” concealed behind that dazed, quiescent, obedient abstraction, with which she withdrew to seek Myrddin Wyllt, precisely the same mysterious sensation, exultantly maintained by an act of will, as he himself had revelled in all the days of his life since that occasion when even the stout heart of the elder Porius had failed before the invisible spirits of Lake Tegid.

Yes, he felt sure the daughter of Avallach was doing that very thing which Alarch the Fair had once made him confess to her he was doing when under the power of his delirious trance he had been deaf to some impatient command.

Of one thing he was certain. There was a secret in those remote grey eyes that neither the Henog, sucking so luxuriously at his crystallized greengage, nor the fair Gwendydd had the power to solve. But how did he know that Myrddin Wyllt, the invisible prophet in that inner tent, hadn't thrown a spell over them all?

How did he know he hadn't done what Alarch ferch Iddawc used to tell him the great Roman Empress Helena had done, thrown a love charm into the brazier?

He began watching the Henog with still greater attention. Yes! The queer fellow did look as if the fragrant heat from the red coals in that oriental firebox were throwing him into a mood in which the whole world was reduced to two things: candied fruit that was sweet in the mouth and scented smoke that was bitter in the belly.

Certainly the Henog was disturbed by nothing at that moment but how to obtain the fullest possible degree of warmth; and how to keep the thick black gown which he had twisted round his unathletic legs from being scorched by those red coals.

Crouching thus, the man resembled an ebony idol with an ivory head. He certainly did not look like a Christian historian. The shape of his skull was so grotesque that its conical shape, as the man struggled to reach the limit of skin warming without scorching himself, jerked Porius back just as he was beginning to "cavoseniargize."

And just because the spell was broken so suddenly our friend found himself analyzing, as he had never done before, the peculiar nature of this secret game of his.

It certainly was a non-human indulgence, but there was no malice or cruelty or pride or unkindness in it. It obliterated humanity as completely as it obliterated God. It obliterated the future. It obliterated every sort of worry and every sort of responsibility. It was above or below all love and all hate. It had nothing to do with any anima mundi or any soul of the world.

But why was it that certain dramatic and tragic, certain pitiable and comical things, if you didn't evade them, could — like this elongated up-narrowed skull before him — break the spell of his indulgence?

But the Henog was speaking now and speaking eloquently. Having gulped down the last of his greengage he had plunged without a moment's delay into a dramatic account of what had been happening at Saint Julian's Fount.

The story was so exciting and the events connected with it led to such vistas of agitation that Porius felt compelled as his father's representative to turn what public wits he had upon this whole dangerous situation and try to face its startling implications.

These implications were clearly nothing to the Henog! Solely, uniquely, exclusively, he was absorbed in what had happened. What might happen as a result of what had happened was clearly of no interest to him.

Porius looked at him in amazement as he spoke. He described everything with a certain laboured accuracy as though he were already practising the overtones and undertones of the words with which, as soon as he returned to the inks and pigments and books and parchments in his cell at the Gaer, he would chronicle those events for the benefit of men yet unborn.

As Porius listened to him and watched the eager attention of the lady, he began to wonder if her excited breathing, her parted lips, her heightened colour were entirely due to what the Henog was saying or had any connection with her interest in Rhun.

Surreptitiously now, and as far as his natural politeness and his long submission to women's rule permitted such a liberty, he stretched out his arms and legs among the cushions, a gesture which was accompanied by imagining himself wading up to the waist in the sacred lake of the Fountain, and with a hidden strength drawn from the mother of Iddawc tossing those horsemen of Arthur like leaves into the air and carrying off their victim, while the druid of the forest out-sorcerized Myrddin Wyllt.

But his attention soon returned to the Henog and his extraordinary discourse, and he began to wonder whether there might not be in the world of thought the same element of pure contrariness that existed between people in life; and whether it was not enough for them all to be overshadowed by the presence of the great prophet of the future to set this rival sage off on an impassioned eulogy of the past.

It certainly did seem as if the Henog attributed to every least detail of what had actually occurred a special and curious kind of consecration; as though merely to have happened made what had happened, whether tragic or comic, or even trifling and fortuitous, a sacred episode in a symbolic rite.

Whether the counsellor was at this moment being ensorcerized by his sister's handmaid or being bathed and anointed by Fflam and Tegvan, Porius couldn't resist the fancy that it was in defiance of his invisible presence, with its blind clutch upon the dubious things to be, that the elongated skull of the Henog was nodding its rhapsody upon the questionable things that had been.

But Gwendydd boldly interrupted the historian with a point-blank question.

"When did you first," she asked him, "find out that the corpse had gone?" Then the Henog stared at her. "When my brother left us," she explained, "before the mead drinking this afternoon it was still lying there in the midst of the water with its face uncovered, just as he had placed it."

But the Henog was too much in his element to be concerned with what other eyes saw.

"I never ceased," he replied, "thanking God that he had permitted me to see such wonders; but the truth is, Lady, that one thing followed another so naturally, so quietly, so surely, that it was as if they were not happening at all! Everything, if you understand me, was too silent in its approach to seem as if it were really approaching. Have you noticed, Lady" — the Henog said this in a curiously level and uncolloquial tone as if he were dictating a paragraph in a book, as if he were saying "Have you noticed, O dwellers in Britain a thousand years hence, how necessary for fresh life ashes and bones are?"— "Have you noticed, Lady, how the mind works when real events occur?"

Porius had certainly noticed that the lady kept smiling at Rhun, who though he leant back on his cushions as dumb as a great pike against the dam of a weir, was evidently as pleased with himself as when in his childhood Alarch ferch Iddawc let him take her queen at chess.

One absurd and contradictory aspect of the present coiling of the serpent of Time as far as Porius himself was concerned was the fact that he had become extremely sleepy. Here was he, as much concerned as anybody except his father with what was happening in their small dominion, listening while the man whom the Three Aunties called goreu kyvarwyd yn y byd, or "the best tale teller in the world," told of the most serious thing that had happened since the murder of Morfydd's brother, and all he could do was to let his head droop in sleep while the taste of the crystallized fruit followed the taste of the Mithraic honey through the stupefied cells of his "drugged senses!"

"The body's gone then," he thought. "The druid must be at work already." But though this was his thought, he still felt as if Rhun's "Nama, Nama, Sebesio," and the parchment of his mother's fantastic letter, and the wavering smoke from the brazier at their knees, and Gwendydd's tight fitting blue vest were all murmuring their own mysterious comment upon every movement of the Henog's black sleeves, as if indeed there were some choreographic conspiracy among elementals and inanimates to lure him into a world where names were more real than things and sensations more real than names.

But he jerked up his head and shifted his legs and told himself that if he slept at this moment it would be to betray Morfydd. "I must keep my wits about me!" he thought. "I want them as never before in all my days!" He set himself to listen. The Henog was speaking now of the chance confusions that are part of reality; and how they were absent, or present, or both absent and present, in regard to what he'd just been witnessing.

Porius's efforts to rouse himself were certainly costing him at that moment one species of most vicious reality, the reality of actual physical pain at a particular place in the forefront of his skull; but he compelled himself to take advantage of a pause, in what was really only an oratorical question, to enquire: "Wasn't Brother John doing anything? I know you couldn't see much because of the mist. But didn't you hear his voice?"

The Henog had opened his mouth at this interruption and he continued to keep it open while he stared at Porius with an expression of helpless, guileless, inoffensive, puzzled reproach.

"Do go on, Sylvanus Is-Coed!" threw in the lady. "I too, like Prince Porius, am longing to know what Brother John did; but we don't want to hurry you. We want you to tell it in your own way. All famous Kyvarwyddion," and she turned gravely to Porius, "tell their tales slowly. It is the final touch of their art. I wish my brother were here to hear this." As she spoke she looked vaguely towards the entrance to the inner tent, but to Porius's mind this gesture was somewhat made.

Then she added, and the sigh that accompanied these words did strike him as real: "My brother must be asleep, and Nineue must be watching till he wakes. But you can see," and once more she looked at Porius, "what subtle art the Henog uses in telling us all this by the way he keeps holding back the entrance of the chief actor."

The narrator closed his mouth, and screwing up his eyes and wrinkling their corners, along with the upper portions of his hollow cheeks, into a pose of respectful expectation, stared benignly and gratefully at the lady while a dark-lantern twist of his attention was automatically turned at regular intervals upon the impatient Porius.

"You mean I haven't brought in Prince Medrawd?" he hazarded cautiously, while Porius thought, "He's no more idea of all the intrigues and clashes and crosscurrents and convoluted abominations that are going on here than has that cynical baby, Neb. I don't believe Medrawd killed the man any more than did the counsellor. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if he was still alive. I'd like to talk to Rhun about this. The body on those trestles may easily not have been his."

"No, no!" he cried aloud. "Not Medrawd! But we mustn't be so obstinate in our views of what's important. Go on, go on, Sylvanus ap Bleheris! I was only going to say that the chief actor at the Fount of Saint Julian tonight as far as I'm concerned is Dion Dionides, the messenger from Constantinople! I hope he comes into your report."

But it was the words: "Like a silent descent of copper coins thrown into the deep sea and sinking down through the grey water, some northward, some southward, some eastward, some westward, while the swift fish nibble at them as they sink" that reached Porius's ears, when, after his next struggle with the sleep siren whose chosen ground — and the battle was real pain — was still at that same precise spot between his eyebrows, he again shifted his limbs on those accursed cushions and tried to keep himself awake by imagining that the Henog's countenance was a heathery slope and his own attention was a sparrow hawk flying just above its surface.

The Henog was certainly sitting up now extraordinarily alert and erect on his cushions. The black mantle with the thin hem of silver braid was tucked up to the man's knees, and his bony hands were mechanically moving up and down over his shins in an attempt to attenuate the pleasant heat of the brazier.

"It must indeed," thought Porius in the pain of his dumb wrestling with the she-devil of sleep, "be some special kind of technique he's got, to catch the waves breaking, the smoke blowing, the birds hovering, the fish leaping, to catch men in the midst of battle, women in the midst of childbirth — it must be some special kind of technique he's got."

In his struggle to give the man his full attention he kept sliding so insensibly into sleep that it was left to sleep to visualize for him in unreal images what he himself was trying to get clear. No sooner had he thought of himself as flying like a hawk over the Henog's visage than sleep transformed this hawk into a cloud of fluttering feathers, among which the man's face began to fade away.

Sylvanus Is-Coed ap Bleheris Is-Coed had a trick of lifting and lowering his eyebrows to emphasize certain dramatic moments in his narration, and a way of thrusting out and drawing in his lips at certain pauses in the tale as if they'd been acrobats making complacent bows to the audience, and a habit of distending the nostrils of his curious-shaped nose as if he were testing by a completely different sense the rhythmic rise and fall of his sentences.

The Henog's eyes were pale blue; and when the man was struggling with this complicated art of narration their expression struck Porius as in some way helpless, pathetic, disarming.

Though it was narrow intensity that possessed the man, Porius decided that it was an intensity extremely serious to the fellow himself and appealing to a completely different set of mental values from those accepted by the Christian Church; a set of values, in fact, according to which the manner in which thought was expressed was more important than the thought, the narration of events more important than the events, the style of the narration more important than the narration; and according to which the real problems of life only emerged when a person turned his back upon the future and began to unravel in its illimitable recession the sacred scroll of the past.

But he must not let his head sink again. This man was describing events that might bring down the most tragic repercussions upon their House.

Well! Rhun, anyway, was being treated by the prophet’s sister as no woman had ever treated him before. But what was that? The wind must be rising. He looked round, fully awake in a moment, for there had always been something in the wind, yes! in the wind from any quarter, or from any segment of any quarter, of the whole round sempiternal sky, that roused up in him what he liked to think was the old Cader Idris blood.

Yes! yes! He knew without turning his head, and he knew that Rhun knew too without turning his head, that the loose folds of the tent hangings at the outer entrance, behind the screen from Crete, had begun to stir! Every sense in him was alert now. Hitherto for all the hours of that whole half day, ever since the stubble-coloured mist had moved up the sky from beyond Lake Tegid, his mind alone had been active.

Yes, his body had obeyed his mind when he lifted that boy-knight out of his saddle, but it had obeyed it mechanically and automatically; it had obeyed it sluggishly; it had obeyed it after a perceptible gap between command and obedience; it had obeyed it as it had obeyed his mother till a few years ago and since then as it had obeyed Morfydd.

But the wind had risen at last, really risen for the first time that day, and his body had come to life to answer it. He was more than alert now. He kept his eyes on the Henog as he spoke but he could see Gwendydd's face too. Not her breasts but her expression concerned him now. Did Rhun really attract her, as a man attracts a woman? Or was she merely pondering his mother's letter?

The rising of the wind had certainly quickened his wits, for he told himself now that it wasn't the old Roman who had inspired her letter. How could he have been so dull? He would have bidden these people to the Gaer and would have been ready to perish defending them.

No! It was her husband who encouraged her to write it. And there you are! It was probably the very best thing they could do! Why should descendants of Creiddylad die for this Romanized Arthur?

He was listening intently to the Henog now and beginning to grow aware too of a quite definite impatience, if not of a definite agitation, in the breathing beneath those lovely breasts! If the wind rose strong this damned mist would be lifted and the Fountain of Julian would be visible!

And not only the Fountain. Well did he know that this little camp of the emperor's men must be surrounded by this time on every side by the forest people. All Edeyrnion must have heard by now of the death of the druid's brother.

And was that body after all never on those trestles in the reeds and water, with its face to the sky? And if it was, where is it now? Did "something happen" to it, as with the body of Morfydd's brother? He stared into vacancy almost in the manner of the daughter of Avallach and as he stared he saw again those queer marks in the snow.

Suddenly without the least warning there was a resounding crash. The Henog ceased abruptly, his mouth open. Rhun leapt to his feet and then instantaneously— "how polite old Rhun has grown!" Porius had time to think — gave Gwendydd his hand to help her up too. As for Porius himself, alert now from head to foot, his instinct warned him to remain exactly where he was. But he turned his head and that was enough. He saw clearly what had caused the noise. The wind had blown the tent folds inward — Rhun had omitted to fasten them when he let out his dog — and one of those flapping tent skirts had curled round his heavy hunting spear and brought it down. And the spear in its turn, falling against the old man's Roman bottle, had brought that down too.

But it seemed as if this same gust of wind, not content with these achievements, wanted to see whether human beings were subject to the same forces as wood and earthenware, and so for pure sport flung through the aperture into the tent no less an object than Neb ap Digon, newly returned from his exploring excursion to the Fountain.

Neb presented himself before them so torn, so wet, so rumpled, so dirty, as to make it clear that he hadn't contented himself with a detached glimpse of what was going on but had boldly jumped down into the thick of the arena. The little creature was trembling with excitement but he was quite as self-contained, when it came to a description of his adventures, as the Henog had been in the manner of his narration.

"Some completely new technique," Porius thought, "must have swept the board at the emperor's court, some damned newfangled trick," he said to himself, "of describing the precise details of an occurrence without the display of the faintest feeling one way or the other, in fact with a sort of diabolical neutrality."

But at any rate Neb was the reverse of fastidious and the reverse of literary in his style. In fact he rattled on like a precocious infant who has become, by careful training, an antic at a public show. "I made a wide circle," he began, gesticulating with one of his thin arms from which the colours of the emperor hung in tatters, "and the mist helped me."

“Lucky child!” cried Rhun. “The mist makes most of us go in circles when we want to go straight!”

Porius gave him a slow, amused look, a look that said: “What’s this? Is this the influence of Cretan screens and Syrian fruit?” But Neb ap Digon rattled on. “I got behind the first lot of them — wiry devils they are too, my Lady, but short, very short, and with nothing but bows and arrows and javelins! They’re not only forest people. They’re Gwyddyl-Ffichti from the swamps and wild Ffichti from the mountains.”

“I expect they took you for one of themselves,” remarked the lady; and this comment upon his tale, though it didn’t disconcert him, was clearly a remark which self-respect made it advisable to ignore.

“They whispered to each other very low,” he went on. “Their talk isn’t quite the same as our southern forest folk’s, but I understood it; I understood it perfectly. Death for Death was what they were saying, and that’s the same from Caerleon to Caergwynt. Prince Medrawd’s name too, though they said it in a funny way, I could catch. I could hear hundreds more of them in the forest, all the way round! I could hear them murmuring and muttering and humming and whispering. The forest must be alive with them! If they weren’t absolutely under the authority of your revered father, Prince Porius — long may he live in the land! — or if we lifted a finger to save Prince Medrawd, I wouldn’t give the skeleton of a shrew mouse for the life of one of us, no! not even for yours, dear Mistress!”

Saying this he made a fantastical obeisance, thrusting out his elbows, straddling his legs, and letting the long streamers of his red hair, which was tied in several extravagant knots and to which there adhered a filmy wisp of corydalis, a tangle of bog moss, and some fragments of dead leaves, sway to and fro till it nearly swept the floor.

"No! I can't," thought Porius, "I can't feel tragic about all this! I can't feel there's any real danger to these women or to Myrddin Wyllt. And as for Medrawd, let him look to himself! But, God! I'd fight like Gwri Wallt Euryn before they touched a hair of Brother John's head!"

"And I heard them say, my Lady," Neb went on, "that the druid had himself got back his brother's body and that he was already putting life into him again! They kept repeating the words 'pair dadeni.' If I heard those syllables once I heard them twenty times! Does it mean a 'kettle,' or does it mean a 'cradle,' Master Henog?"

Porius had long since become too tender of the Henog to enjoy seeing him fooled; and it did strike him that there was in the form of this question a touch of impertinent mockery. He never liked Sylvanus Is-Coed better than when with the utmost gravity he replied in a firm and emphatic tone, "Both the one and the other, my child! A pair dadeni is a cauldron of rebirth. There are only seven authentic ones in the whole world. From what they told me on market day here one of these seven is in Edeyrnion."

"But I've found something else, my Lady," murmured the wily page.

"What's that, my soul?" she responded, and as he listened Porius couldn't help making a humorous grimace of wonder. The word "enaid" or "eneit," meaning the human "psyche", was never used in the Cunedda tribe in this familiarly friendly manner; nor, it must be confessed, would any of that prince's descendants address a dependent — least of all a page — in this affectionately personal manner. "God!" he thought, "I pray I shan't forget myself and turn into a savage in Arthur's camp! I'll have to watch myself, and copy him over there, when that time comes!"

The mere thought of his father at this present moment, followed by the familiar piety of the fumbling movement of his head that accompanied this thought, till he caught himself wondering where the south precisely was, was a queer relief to him just then.

He had detected the eccentric chieftain's hand in that letter of his mother's and he now found himself wondering whether after all his father would miss him when he sailed for the Bosporus. "I'd better not come back here," he thought, "when I've got rid of Colgrim and Baldulf and Cheldric and the other pirates from Germania. I'd better take that Greek ship without further delay."

All this passed through his mind during the first couple of sentences of Neb's reply to the lady's "tell me, my soul," but his attention shot forth like the horns of a giant snail when he gathered from the page's third sentence that there had been talk of the appearance of Gwyddyl-Ffichti from the swamps beneath the Hill of the Seven Horsemen.

Every year, since he could remember, his father had sent a special troop of picked fighters to scour these outlaws out of their supposed fastnesses; but no good had ever come of these expeditions, and the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, though always spoken of as fierce bands of marauders, were never met with save as aged grandparents in remote forest huts or solitary fishermen in lonely hovels on the coast.

He glanced quickly at Rhun, only to notice that he was watching the boy earnestly too, while conflicting emotions of mingled admiration and envy crossed the Henog's face.

"What do you think yourself is going to happen, my soul?" asked the lady again in her tenderest and most reassuring tone. It was clear that this white-skinned, red-haired, pointed-nosed urchin was a special pet of hers.

"I think Prince Medrawd will escape," replied the son of Digon, "but I think the people will hold the Feast of the Sowing along with the Feast of the Dead."

"The Feast of the Sowing!" Gwendydd repeated these words in a tone that betrayed considerable perturbation. All over Britain the wildest rumours had been spread for centuries about the way the forest people of Edeyrnion and Ardudwy were wont to keep this feast.

The Henog's alert eyes gleamed like a pair of translucent but extremely pale precious stones. "Will you tell me, my dear child," he said, bending down till the tip of his own expressive nose was within a dagger's length of the ivory-white visage of the little green-yellow antic, "what the precise ceremonies are in this part of the country when the Feast of the Sowing is kept?"

Neb shuffled back a pace or two, and turning his head to one side flung a whimsically appealing look towards his mistress, not exactly a childish look and certainly not a mischievous boyish look but rather the look of an elderly diplomat turning to his hostess for aid when some bucolic fellow guest has clumsily plunged into a dangerous topic.

"But wait, wait, wait!" repeated the fervent Henog eagerly, "and you wait, I beg you, gentlemen, and you too, Lady, if your lovely graciousness will so condescend. 'Tis clear from all he says that nothing very alarming is happening now — isn't it, isn't it clear? — so I don't think we need disturb his Magnificence the Counsellor just yet — and I did want to get everything, everything you said, child, and everything in this day's history into some degree of order. What's done in this feast is drawn from what was done a thousand years ago in a similar feast, and that again from what was done ten thousand years ago in the primeval feasts of these islands. So tell me all in order, child — all and everything; and in order — yes! yes! one after another and not pell-mell — for we must make a story of it, a story of what's happened up to the last moment. Yes, everything, child... with your gracious permission, Lady — for it's clear these gentlemen can do nothing just now — but I can and so— ‘each to his kingdom,’ as the toad said to the snake. For — there — is — nothing, nothing of what is contained in the chronicles of the thousands upon thousands of years before we were born, that isn’t important. It’s the only thing that is important! So let’s have all you saw and heard in due order, child, and I’ll just... I’ll just jot down a few scrawls, with your leave, Lady, to remind myself; and when I’m in my chamber later I’ll be — able — to — get — everything — into — order.”

While the Henog was speaking, and he was speaking faster and more eagerly than Porius had ever heard him speak, he was settling himself on a couple of cushions which he flung down on a mat and he was pulling a stool towards him to serve as a table and he was extracting his writing materials from beneath his black mantle, and with part of them on the stool at his feet and part on his knees, he was scrawling certain curious hieroglyphs such as would be totally unintelligible to any person, however learned, except himself.

Porius noticed that Gwendydd, who was now leaning heavily against the central pole of the pavilion with her eyes on the ground while Rhun was saying something that was only audible to her, kept lifting her head with a nervous jerk as if to remind herself of the existence of her handmaid Nineue.

The heavily scented smoke from the brazier wavered up in spirals towards the roof of the tent; and as these spirals rose they seemed to reach a point where the irresistible beauty of the lady’s long bare arm, lifted high and straight above her head as she clasped the pole while the mantle slipped from her shoulder, drew their vagrant smoke curves out of their natural ascent as they fluctuated and wavered till they seemed actually to form themselves into her shape like the cloud that deceived Ixion.

All this time Neb ap Digon, twisting his long hair in his thin white flexible fingers into two blood-red horns that stuck out on either side of his head, was talking very quickly; and from what he caught of it Porius soon became pretty sure that he was simply inventing; and inventing with more and more liveliness and excitement as he saw his inventions being so meticulously transmitted to posterity.

It was at that moment that the curtains at the side of the tent furthest from the Cretan screen were suddenly pulled aside, and Myrddin Wyllt with one hand resting heavily upon Nineue's shoulder stood before them.

As Porius faced him with the special inclination of the head and the special movement of the hands to his belt which had been taught him by his mother and the old Roman, for both his foster-mother and the Three Aunties had quite a different notion of what was proper from their prince's heir, he was distinctly conscious of that same ice-cold breath, that same mortality smell of fungoid vegetation, which had disturbed him before.

He was also aware of another curious though probably quite natural phenomenon, namely, the presence of a palpable indrawing suction accompanying that chilly breath, a suction that created a species of vortex in the surrounding air.

Curiously enough, Myrddin Wyllt's actual appearance produced upon Porius's mind just the same effect as it had produced when he lay opposite to him at the bottom of Rhun's ferryboat. He had heard from his earliest childhood at Mynydd-y-Gaer about this weird person's shape-shifting disguises; but he realized now that there was much less in them than the legend proclaimed. Myrddin Wyllt might put on a sheep's-wool jacket and hide his beard. He might trim his hair and tie ribbons in his boots. He might mount like a prince a well-appointed war horse or ride bare-back like a mad devil behind the horns of a stag. He might clothe himself in uncured skins like a savage or comb his beard like the King of Assyria; nothing could conceal the jet-black sheen of his glossy Africa-thick hair; nothing could conceal the green-black enormity of his cavernous eyes; nothing could disguise the apelike lowness of his primeval forehead or alter the subhuman manner in which his skull bulged out so monstrously behind his immense ears.

The man was dressed at this moment in a long garment of soft black pali, or Arabian satin, that reached nearly to his feet. He wore black stockings and black sandals. His robe was trimmed with gold thread and his glossy beard was tied in the middle by gold thread, the ends of which hung down in golden tassels. Black and green were the predominant colours of his appearance, though actually the only green things about him were his eyes which at this moment, as the torch flare lit them up, gleamed like a couple of mossy holes in an infinitely receding cavern.

Porius had never seen so long or indeed so glossy a beard as the man possessed; and the predominance of this beard in his appearance was enhanced by its being knotted in the centre by this gold thread.

But what Porius couldn't help noticing with a voluptuous sense of pleasure was the effect of the man's jet-black robe contrasted with the green-and-yellow court colours worn by both Nineue and the page.

"I must describe all this to Morfydd," he said to himself. "Perhaps she or Uncle Brochvael can find something about the effect of colour upon the soul in that Timaeus book!"

And then as he watched little Neb slip off behind the screen and Rhun move away from the lady's side and make his surly abbreviation of the extravagant salute taught him by the Three Aunties, it occurred to him as peculiarly characteristic of the blunders of these civilized persons that the emperor's counsellor, as he came shuffling into their presence with his hand on the girl's shoulder, should reveal his complete preoccupation with his own feelings by making the most honourable obeisance known at the most ceremonious of all courts, not to his sister Gwendydd, not to the heir of Prince Einion, but to the impervious and extremely unsympathetic Rhun, who, being one of the few last worshippers of Mithras in Britain, regarded this Christian magician very much as the older Porius regarded Pelagius, namely, as an insular medium for every kind of devilry.

What really did amaze Porius at this juncture was the imperturbable self-confidence of the old Henog who, after the most careless and negligent of nods to the newcomer and without rising from his cushions, bowed his head over his tablets and proceeded coolly and calmly to adjust the amazing facts that Neb had been relating to them to the abstract rhythm of his measured prose.

"What the devil is the matter with the man now?" thought Porius, as he watched the counsellor's shuffling, stumbling steps moving slowly forward. "It looks as if this whole business of prophesying were a malady, a kind of sick fever."

He could see, as the two figures passed him, that the soothsayer was leaning even more heavily than he had thought at first on the girl at his side. Not a moment of attention had she left in her to bestow on anyone else; and he even fancied she was drawing in her lips and narrowing her eyes with the strain of supporting such a weight. And she was leading him to the entrance of the tent. So it was clear the fellow wanted air.

Now a desire for air was a thing that Porius could completely understand. Certainly this richly fragrant pavilion was more adapted to the satiny skins and sensuous apprehensions of court ladies than to the temper of a man who had the power of drawing foxes and badgers out of their holes.

Meanwhile, Myrddin Wyllt was mumbling something to everybody present and, as it seemed to Porius, to some who were not present, in the same monotonous singsong he had used in the forest when he informed them that those creatures were his creatures, and when he spoke so complainingly of the slipperiness of Nineue's skin.

The curious thing about this impersonal monologue — and Porius wondered if the fellow went on in this same manner at Caergwynt and Caerleon — was that its unappealing monotone hindered people from listening to it. Did the abstracted girl upon whom he was leaning listen to it? Porius doubted it; and as for Gwendydd and Rhun, they were once more exchanging thoughts on something that clearly had no connection at all with these occult murmurings.

Although Nineue gave him no sign to do so, Porius now moved to the entrance and held the curtains apart. Aye! But how this heavenly wind had cleared the air! The mist was gone. He could clearly see the upper branches of a great bare ash from whose lower boughs the leaves had already been swept away but to whose topmost twigs several clusters of derelict seed vessels still adhered, and as he tried to catch a glimpse of some auspicious constellation, for he was always superstitious about the zodiacal signs, he was struck by the manner in which one particular one among these ash-tree seed clusters fluttered and shivered and shook.

"Stop!" he said to himself. "No more 'cavoseniargizing!' Wait till I've talked to Brother John."

But though he made certain motions of the will against this mania of his, motions which Brother John assured him had been practised by Pelagius, he didn't scruple to indulge himself, while the girl supported the counsellor and the counsellor talked to the cosmos, in a little further soliloquy with this particular cluster of whitish-yellow ash seeds.

“You’re a fine family,” he told these sturdy seeds. “You’re all brothers! You know each other’s ways, under the wind, under the rain, under the frost!”

“I want to ask you a question, Master! May I do so?”

These words were spoken suddenly, harshly, unexpectedly; and they were spoken not by the ash tree in the air but by the Henog on the floor, and when Porius turned his head he saw that the man was sitting bolt upright and had a bold, harsh, authoritative expression in his face. He repeated his question, and though he used the conventional word of homage, his tone implied complete equality with the counsellor; equality, that is to say, in everything that belonged to mental and moral weight.

Gwendydd broke off her conversation with Rhun and came forward. She did not however advance beyond a point that was about midway between the spot where the Henog was sitting so upright on his cushions clasping his tablets, and the spot where Myrddin Wyllt was leaning on the girl’s shoulder and muttering to the invisible wind.

The prophet swung round with such a vigorous jerk that Nineue staggered away from his side and almost or altogether lost her balance. Porius, who was watching them both, decided that she really did lose her balance at first but only at first. In a second — so he decided when he pondered on the incident a day or two later — she had not only recovered her balance but she was in complete control of all she did. She continued to stagger, however, and to stagger in the direction of Porius who, just as she would apparently have fallen, caught her in his arms.

With Morfydd, when his arms were round her, he was always aware of a whole little girlish figure from top to toe, aware of her feet, of her arms, her legs, her hips, her knees, her calves, her neck, her chin, and her forehead.

As a rule too he was aware of her spine and, below her round childish breasts, of her ribs.

But with Nineue it was as if he were pressing against himself something boneless, ribless, formless; something that was a yielding image of femininity in the abstract, the resilient, lithe, magnetic, slippery Platonic idea of all the evasive allurements in the world that are the objects of impersonal desire.

The form of Nineue, the softness of Nineue, the flexibility of Nineue, the colour of Nineue, the fragrance of Nineue, and a sort of immaterial emanation of the inmost identity of Nineue was embraced for those seconds by every portion of his body.

No part of him was favoured above any other part. All had their share, and not only their share. All had all. There was nothing of Nineue that was not deliciously capable of being absorbed. And in the absorption of Nineue even for those brief seconds there was a sensation of the unfathomable and the infinite.

If she had fallen into his arms before the wind got up he would probably have yielded; but his body and soul were unusually at one at this particular moment and he had no need for any of those Pelagian tricks for strengthening the will which Brother John had taught. The particular detail that really saved him at this moment were those ash tree "keys" with whom he had just had intercourse. Something about them had so nearly set him off on his secret practise of "cavoseniargizing" that in the hangover of that mood much that he otherwise would have felt towards the maddening creature thus yielded to his embrace was overlapped by the feeling that the ash tree with its wind-tossed seeds had aroused in him.

It therefore took his rapidly moving mind less than a second — for the whole thing passed in a few beats of his pulse against her body — not only to make his body stiff and chaste, but to suggest to the restless and impious consciousness, now fully alert within his Herculean muscles, the shrewdest line of action.

It wouldn't do to dislodge this ravishing nestling as he had done with the young gentleman on the white horse. A much better way presented itself. Accordingly he deliberately tightened his embrace, using all his intelligence to avoid seriously hurting her while at the same time he exerted sufficient pressure to make her glad enough to extricate herself, at her own volition, and without a pang to her self-esteem, to slip from his hug and betake herself to Gwendydd's side.

CHAPTER VI. The Prophet

IT WAS INDEED an amazing encounter that was now proceeding between Myrddin Wyllt and Sylvanus Is-Coed.

“Ask me what you like, my good friend.” The counsellor’s words were sober and quiet. They were even gentle. Porius looked at him in wonder; and glancing at Gwendydd he could almost hear her sigh of relief.

“I am what I am,” the man went on, “and this wind blowing upon me is the wind I have called up, and while it blows upon me it makes my destiny more than endurable. Ask me what you like.”

The Henog accepted this permission without apparently being in the least degree struck by the impressive way in which it was given.

“Will the emperor,” he enquired, “be satisfied if in this ‘Historia Veridica’ I am writing about you I confine myself to the truth?”

Myrddin Wyllt gave him a quiet, easy, almost affectionate look. It was a childish look too, in a certain sense, open, guileless, and disarming. “The emperor,” he said, “will certainly be satisfied with the truth, Sylvanus Is-Coed, and so would he and he, and she and she, and every sane man among the forest dwellers who surround us at this moment; but though the creatures of the earth are my creatures and the winds of the mountain are my winds, and the waves of the water are my waves, neither you nor I nor any other who ever lived, no! nor any who will ever live, can call the truth our own. The emperor would know it as the truth and so would every creature alive, did you place it in our hands, Henog.

“But you cannot place the truth in our hands. It flows like water. It melts like air. It burns itself out like fire. It covers itself with itself like the mud with the mud, the moss with the moss, the grass with the grass, the lichen with the lichen.

"Scribble on, scribble on, Henog of Cerrig Gwynt! Write your 'Historia Veridica' at the command of him I have taught you to call the son of Uthyr Pendragon! Your Vita you will write; your Vita you will live; your death you will die; your wages you will keep; but when the age of Pisces is over and the age of Aquarius begins do you fancy that men then, men who can kill with balls of fire, men who can sail in ships of iron, men who can ride on horses of smoke, will give a denarius for a Vita of you or me, or an obol of brass to know what the Lady Gwendydd did or the Lady Nineue said, though all the forest was in arms around their tent?"

His voice died away, and the Henog straightened his long thin neck to answer, that neck which was the most characteristic part of him with its taut-knotted sinew, its jerking Adam's apple, its pulsing vein. Then suddenly, before uttering a word, he bent his head again and forced himself to complete the sentence he had been writing.

The two women by this time had slipped down upon their cushions, and Rhun with a freedom that astonished Porius had deliberately stretched himself out by their side. The incorrigible Neb had completely vanished. So had the other pages.

Porius himself as he stood holding open one of the flapping curtains of the tent's entrance so as to enjoy every breath he could catch of the newly risen wind could only see a small segment of the prophet's profile; but he could see the Henog's countenance face to face and he was amazed at the intensity of the emotion which Myrddin Wyllt's careless, incoherent, and irrational ramblings had summoned up in that queer visage.

"But what people these are!" he said to himself. "I know they're in no danger. But how, in heaven's name, do they know that? Here are these men arguing nice points in God knows what subtle metaphysic of past and future while all the while, in the immediate and most pressing present, the people of this place are gathering round them, gathering from far and near, threatening death for death!”

And then he felt, and felt as if it were an actual bruise in the recesses of his brain, that he ought never to have entered this tent tonight. His business was to have filled that Roman bottle at the Fountain, made sure that Brother John was all right, and got back to Mynydd-y-Gaer.

“I suppose Brother John,” he thought, “is sitting up all night, straining every nerve to soothe the alarm of Dion Dionides, who must be thinking he has indeed arrived at the ends of the earth.”

But as Myrddin Wyllt waited patiently for the Henog’s reply a much more unpleasant idea entered Porius’s mind. Suppose it were not merely the Feast of the Sowing that Gogfran Derwydd should decide upon? Suppose he decided to hold the Feast of the Fisher King at the same time?

Weird images of what he had seen, and alarming images of what he had heard, concerning both these ancient sex rituals passed through his mind. “The Sowing might be all right,” he thought. “But if it were the other — God help these people! We should indeed be forced to take them into the Gaer — and the Lord knows what would happen then!”

All this while he could not divest his mind of the notion that there was an unearthly war going on between the whole weight and pressure of the world’s past — thick and opaque and broken, but horribly clear-cut in its jagged edges — and the formless vaporous shapes of the unborn future, more formidable still because of their phantomlike terror!

He certainly found a peculiar fascination in watching the movements made by the Henog as he meticulously studied his own words, tracing with the end of his pen every line and dot and curve and flourish of every letter.

He thought about the snake twisted around the body of Cronos. Perhaps after all the best way was to impede, to hold back as long as possible the great curving spirals of Time! If in a few minutes they were all destined to be overwhelmed by a surging mob of the infuriated compatriots of the Modrybedd, didn't that in itself give to every moment of consciousness left to them a particular significance? Didn't it isolate it and hold it up in relief as though it were petrified or were like that dead body on the counsellor's trestles?

Suddenly to his startled surprise the Henog struggled to his feet, clutching tightly in his agitation not only his book and the special kind of pen he always used which was an invention of his own, but also his leather case containing silver-rimmed pots of black, red, and green pigments. "I cannot listen," he cried in a rasping high-pitched indignant voice, like the voice of a green woodpecker, "to such blasphemy against the greatest of the Muses, Clio the daughter of Mnemosyne! That I am writing your life, my Lord, the life of Ambrosianus, Chief Counsellor of Arturus Imperator, puts me under no obligation to yield to Myrddin Wyllt one single jot of my opinions!

"God has not given you, my Lord, his miraculous gift of seeing the future so that you should insult the past. And let me tell you this, Myrddin ap Morfryn; all that you see of the future are clouds and mists and vapours! All of it is dark and obscure. You see forms and features of gods and demons, of men and beasts, of men with the wings and horns and scales and claws of beasts, of beasts with the faces of angels, of gods with the faces of devils! All that you announce of the events of the future is doubtful and uncertain.

"Many are the interpretations of what you announce, and bitter to the end of Time will be the disputes between the interpreters; for the future does not yet exist. A dark gulf in Time and Space alone exists, a gulf that only in its hour, its day, its year, will be filled by what comes to pass.

“And when what comes to pass has arrived, why then, O son of Morfryn, it will be no more the future; it will have left your world and will have entered mine! From the past, upon which day and night I ponder and from which I seek — feebly and imperfectly but with all my mind and soul — to draw the truth, from the past, I say, comes all we have, all we are, all we shall be! It is there, O Master, it is there forever, firm, clear, unassailable, so that all our chroniclers and recorders of the future, some wiser than I am, some much less wise, may struggle to capture the living truth.

“And mark this, O illustrious Counsellor; these struggles of mine, and of others wiser than I am, to sift and winnow the truth from the falsehood in the great gold mine of the infinite past are themselves parts and portions of the mysterious power that out of the past — not, mark you, O Master, out of anything already existent in that dark obscure gulf — creates the as yet uncreated future!

“Your prophecies, O mysterious one, can never be more than the magical guesses of an inspired imagination! Many of them will come true. But what led you and leads you to hit on these? What pushed you on and still is pushing you on, O illustrious one, to guess so correctly? Nothing less, O Master, than your own long and sagacious brooding upon the past!”

Exhausted by his eloquence the Henog sank down once more into his former position; but Porius couldn’t help noticing how the chronicler’s hands so trembled with excitement that several drops of coloured liquid, shaken from the three small phials in his hand, fell upon the man’s rusty-black gown and even upon his black cowskin boots; so that it was as though, in his intense agitation, the sweat which poured down from his high conical skull was green and red and black!

But all eyes in that tent — and even Rhun turned away from the stately Gwendydd — were now fixed upon the prophet. Porius, who was nearest to him and who had already made acquaintance with some of his physical weaknesses, stepped quickly to his side and without a moment's hesitation threw one arm round his waist and the other round one of the large supporting poles upon which the weight of the pavilion rested; and in this position, like Samson in the Circus of Dagon, he straddled his legs and settled his feet to be ready for any shock.

But the shock did not come. Making a commanding gesture to Nineue to remain seated, the prophet's sister hurriedly approached them and laid her hand on her brother's shoulder. The wind was rushing into the tent in such wild gusts that as she began murmuring some eager appeal in a language Porius couldn't understand, though many of the words seemed half-familiar, her mantle was blown aside from the full length of her person, revealing its unequalled beauty in that sky-blue vest.

But a voice of awe-inspiring authority began now to issue from the swaying figure she was addressing. Sounding so near to him that he could feel its interior vibration in the body he supported, the startling power in the voice that now shook itself forth from this bearded victim of the future reached Porius's ears in a peculiar and unusual way.

He heard the voice in fact on three different levels of consciousness. He heard it through the troubled fungus-scented, charnel-chilly mass of flesh and blood he was supporting. He heard it in the actual words the prophet was using, words that in themselves were full of a weird, disturbing authority, like the authority of a person possessed of some absolute power over everything around him and yet helpless in the hands of the weakest.

But finally — and this was the most agitating of all the effects of this weird phenomenon — he heard it as if it were a voice multitudinous and manifold; a voice from the straining, labouring, struggling, pitifully grotesque hosts of the generations to be, and as if the terrible pathos of this cry from the future, backward-flung over its shoulders by the vanguard of the unborn till it pierced like a sword the outraged ears of the indignant past, were something that crushingly, deafeningly, and blindingly betrayed the last secret of life.

The counsellor made no attempt to answer the eloquent objections raised by the Henog. In a voice that was entirely his own, that was indeed more characteristically his own than any voice Porius had yet heard him use, this towering and toppling figure, whose repulsive body, as Porius pressed its left side against himself, seemed to reek of thousands upon thousands of earth chasms full of the black leaf mould of the original planetary forests, began uttering a sequence of sentences whose import was so momentous that it was lucky for Myrddin Wyllt that the man who was supporting him although not exactly phlegmatic was temperamentally sceptical, for otherwise he might easily have been hugged to death out of pure intensity of startled attention.

“My animals,” the man was declaring, “would understand me and they would come if I wanted them to come; for they are my animals and we understand one another. But I don’t want them to come; for the forest is full of the people from Africa, the people who put the verb before the noun and the mother before the father and who are ruled by witch-ghosts and unmarried women. Nobody understands me but my animals, and why should anybody understand me? It were wiser not to! Through my voice the Son of the Morning speaks, the god at whose word the heavens shiver and shake and all the angels hide their heads.

“Cronos is his name and he speaks through me; and my animals and my birds and my fishes hear his voice and rejoice; and the kings and the priests and the druids tremble! He is the future, and all the blind leaders of the blind and all the false astronomers and false prophets and all the kings and emperors are sick because of him, and their hearts melt within them because of him.

“This simple Arthur whose grandmother came from Africa and his grandfather from Rome will clear the land of the fair heads for a generation. Colgrim and Baldulf and Cheldric — all shall perish!

“This simple Arthur shall slaughter them all; and the black earth, nourished by their blood, shall grow thirty good harvests, rich and sweet and safely stored before their tribes from Germania come back again. But back they must come and possess all our land, they and the Black Pagans who will come after them.

“But our speech and our mountains and our mountain farms we shall keep; and they themselves will be conquered by others, crueller, craftier, and far cleverer than they are! One of our own they will take to rule over them, and he in return will try to destroy our speech, but to no avail. Driven from the plain and the sea-coast our speech will refuge itself in the mountains and from thence till the Day of Judgment it shall be heard!

“But when our Lord the Sun with his attendant planets has passed from the power of Pisces into the power of Aquarius the white dragon from Germania will cross the sea to trouble us again. This time it will not swim with its feet and with its tail through the water-breathing smoke and fire. It will... it will... that white dragon from Germania will... that white dragon will—”

He stopped for a moment, and there was an unpleasant gurgling in his throat as if blood was rushing into his mouth. There was something ghastly to Porius about those quiverings and tremblings and heavings and writhings of this fungus-reeking form whose life he literally held in his hands; for he could have squeezed him to death before either of the women guessed what was going on.

But why did this victim of prophesying suddenly stop short, gasping and gaping? Had that heaving body actually felt the first vibration of a catastrophic event that might take a thousand, or two thousand, or even three thousand years before it fell upon us?

Porius found himself forced not only to control his physical strength lest it should hurt this strange being who was now swaying like a colossal reed in the salt marshes of Cronos, but also to use all his will power to keep intact a remnant of his own humorous detachment.

“Comical! That’s what it is!” he said to himself, articulating the words under his breath as if to prove his detachment, “simply comical, that I should go on hugging this monster with his stinkhorn smell who’s been abusing all the three chief nations of Britain; Iberian, Brython, and Roman! Where does he come from himself, this bastard of the devil? From Lost Atlantis? Or is he perhaps the last of the Coranians who escaped destruction by Lludd ap Beli ap Manogan? He calls the emperor the ‘simple Arthur,’ and I suppose he’d call me the ‘simple Porius’; and all the time his own body stinks like ten thousand funguses, and he can’t move without leaning on a witch-girl!”

He ceased to articulate his feelings at this point, but the inexpressible feelings that followed this interior outburst completely contradicted everything he had just said. You could call them “feelings.” Strictly they were sensations, for they had to do with the ice-cold arctic breath which disturbed the air about this extraordinary person wherever he went; and Porius, try as he might to see the present situation as a ludicrous one, was aware of an uneasy, unearthly chill emanating from the being he clutched that seemed as if it were actually responding to a force outside human experience.

"But it's all too grotesque!" he said to himself. "If Arthur's 'simple,' what am I? A great Edeyrnion bear, I suppose, whose only weapon is muscle. This is the third of them I've had in my arms! First that silly boy, then that witch of a girl, and now the emperor's counsellor! Is this the way I'm going to behave when I reach Anastasius? Am I destined to hug him into good behaviour?"

The steadily rising wind was now beginning to make the folds of the tent hangings flap against his legs. "Could the time breath of Cronos," he thought, "really be caught as it blows backward from the remote future?"

Myrddin Wyllt's countenance at this juncture, as the man struggled for words, must have been such a painful spectacle to the Lady Gwendydd, that with a groan and a frantic gesture of her hands she drew away from him and began talking rapidly and in a low voice to Rhun.

Meanwhile the wind was blowing so gustily through the pavilion that Porius, who couldn't leave the afflicted man and who hesitated to interrupt Rhun's colloquy with the lady, began to think of addressing an appeal to Mistress Nineue, for at this particular moment the girl seemed isolated from everybody and appeared, as she bent over the brazier warming her hands, to be completely lost in her own thoughts. She looked to him very thinly clad to be exposed to this chilly wind.

"Where's that imp Neb?" he thought, and the idea did cross his mind that it would be only fair to interrupt the Henog, who had now calmly reseated himself, and to break up all his fussy preoccupation with his scroll and his three pigments by imploring him, as a sedentary scholar, to shut out this barbarous wind. But let it blow, and let the girl shiver!

Indeed he began to feel as if this wind were something that had reached them through Time as well as through Space, something that brought to this devil-bitten Decrepitude he was supporting an authentic message, just as those accurst Coranians used to get theirs, only this one was over the Limbo of unborn generations, over the waves of rising and sinking, sinking and rising uncounted centuries, and was answering phantom cravings and embryo hopes that in that uncreated future were no more than thrilling stories told by the gods to themselves!

But if the Henog were right and the future completely indetermined, why then there was no such thing as fate, and no such thing as a man's, or a nation's, or a world's destiny. All was chance, all was chaos, all was anarchy. "Nor am I quite certain," he said to himself, "that I wouldn't prefer it be so. I have a suspicion that such was the view of things natural to the giants of Eryri!"

At this moment he heard something on the wind which thoroughly disturbed him. It struck him with such force and as something so ominous that under the shock of it he came near to giving the counsellor a hug that would have plastered up forever this crack into the unknown and smoothed out forever the scales of the serpent of Time.

On the evening of his initiation into the traditional secret of his tribe Porius had been initiated into a still more dangerous and still older tradition, that of his grandmother Indeg and the Three Modrybedd. Both Rhun and he had been taught, what Einion and Alarch had learnt from their parents, certain primeval chants — obscurer even than the Mithraic "Nama, Nama" — taken from what was always referred to as "the Mystery of the Fisher King," a sex ritual whose origin reverted to North Africa. Only introduced at particular crises in their history, it was accounted the arbitrary privilege of the forest people's druid, if such a being existed among them, to insert this Mystery at any moment into the more normal ritual of the Feast of the Autumn Sowing; and it was one of the obscure incantations of this wild rite that Porius had caught upon the rising wind.

Had the man he was holding caught it too? With Myrddin Wyllt anything was possible. But if he had caught it, did he understand what it meant? He must at least have felt the nervous shock it gave his supporter, and it may well have been this that now broke the knot of psychic resistance that was restraining his utterance.

His whole frame heaved and shuddered; and Porius had for a second the sensation that what he was holding, and must at all cost be tender of, wasn't a man at all but a funnel or a vent through which — carried on a wave of ice-cold breath from this very future whose existence the Henog denied — there came some unimaginable intimation, an intimation confounding to human senses and staggering to human reason.

So overpowering indeed was the effect upon the man of the thing he was now being compelled to utter that its very violence, in the overcoming of the resistance offered to it, caused the unfortunate prophet such physical distress that as from a woman in childbirth there was wrung from him a rending cry, interspersed with strange words, among which all that his hearers could understand were the reiterated syllables: “Out of the air — out of the air!”

What he would have done had not Porius — now in full control of his own agitation — held fast to him, none of that group of people could tell. Perhaps he would have rushed out into the night, calling upon those wild creatures that he had declared alone understood him. In the end, however, it was not Porius or either of the women who brought him back to himself. It was nothing less than the grotesque and intense opposition of the Henog.

Without rising, but clutching against his lean ribs those precious utensils of his, and with the scanty wisp of hair on his narrow high-peaked cone-shaped skull rumpled up into an absurd tuft like the crest of a plover, the Henog began reciting, with the sort of voice in which a mummied scribe of Egypt might have repeated words dictated to him by some arch-priest of Ammon, a long traditional list of the first famous names ever recorded in this Island of Britain.

The list contained names of demigods and kings and bards and saints and lawgivers and magicians; the names in fact of all that the long memories and protracted studies of previous Henogs had been able to gather up from the past.

It was a peculiarity of this particular Henog to begin the relation of every new occurrence in the assiduity of his chronicling by a sort of invocation of these famous names. He had learned these by heart at his episcopal school just as Porius had done; for such repetitions, and not perhaps unwisely, considering their value in Egypt and China, were always the dominant note of Brythonic hieratic tuition, conscientiously exact and meticulously reverential.

To every Brythonic mind, educated or uneducated, each one of these names was a symbol of racial magic and racial power, and carried with it a disturbing aura of secret intimations revealed to the initiate and concealed from the profane. The mere utterance of these names, though their bearers may have been only men, and not angels, demons, genii, or gods, had an occult power, the power which gathers round any visible, audible, or tangible symbol that has — consciously or unconsciously — impressed the mind of many generations.

That the Henog should chant these names as a prelude to inaugurating a new chapter composed from the lies that Neb had just told him was, as Porius well knew, a natural occurrence; but all the same the young chieftain couldn’t expel the impression that under all these glidings of green and yellow and around this brazier of red coals there had been created a whirling vortex of fatal and fearful tension, something resembling a cosmogonic tug-of-war between the magnetic pull of the past and the magnetic pull of the future.

But he had grown impatient of this psychic tournament between historian and prophet; and though he knew there was a risk that the counsellor might collapse upon the ground when he moved from his side, he deliberately set himself to shut out the invisible cause of the whole disturbance, namely, the rising wind.

As he struggled with this task and held one great bellying segment of sailcloth between his knees and dragged the rim of the other towards it, he began to ask himself whether this expulsion of the wind, the element of Nature which in his own heart he loved beyond earth or fire or water, was undertaken solely for the benefit of the thinly clad Nineue, now warming herself, with an expression of complete detachment, over the brazier.

“No, no!” he thought, as he drew the connecting cord in such a manner as to leave a slit between two of the points where it was threaded so that an arm or even a head could be inserted from outside, “No, no, it’s for all the women of my life. It’s for Mother and Aunt Alarch and the Three Aunties and all the generations of mothers and foster-mothers and aunties, back to Mycenae of Argolis and Marrakesh of the Berbers.”

Whether due to his recent covenant with the Lord of Bulls and of Dogs and of Soldiers, or whether due to a natural explosion of long-accumulated revolt, Porius felt at that moment as if all the women of Edeyrnion were gathering about him to shut out the wind. Women alive, women dead, women half-alive, women half-dead, phantom women, werewolf women, lemurs, liliths, and lamias, all seemed to be crowding round him and forcing him to shut out the wind.

As he now bent over this task he saw without seeing, he felt without turning towards them, how absorbed in each other Gwendydd and Rhun were. “Put this down in your tablets, Brother Henog,” he said to himself, “for it’s the truth. When a man and woman meet for the first time nobody — not even those who’ve known them all their lives — can tell what will happen!”

Porius mingled these reflections with the satisfactory look of the four neat loops of cord he had just fastened; and he soon began absentmindedly testing each of them with his finger and thumb. “No, I never thought old Rhun would be the first to betray the Bull Slayer and go over to them!”

All this had happened in a few seconds, and when he swung round again he was amazed to see how salutary and restorative the hostility of the Henog had proved to be in its effect upon the counsellor.

Instead of glaring indignantly at his adversary or even turning contemptuously away from him, Myrddin Wyllt behaved as if the clash between them — which to Porius was a battle of universes — was a mere difference of opinion, a question as to whether it was better to keep the wind out of the tent or to let it in!

The prophet was now facing the tent’s entrance from which Porius had just turned. Several of the torches had been extinguished by the inrushing wind, but others that had lately been emitting clouds of thick smoke were now burning brighter than before. From one of these the light fell sideways upon Myrddin’s face, minimizing as Porius watched him the greenish blackness of his eyes and concealing the most monstrous and freakish aspect of his countenance, the aspect wherein, by reason of his low forehead, his eye sockets seemed to unite in one deep-set Cyclopean eye.

Porius hadn’t realized how much the man under normal conditions was in the habit of stooping. He realized it now however when the prophet drew himself to his full height and stared past him at that narrow, shivering, undulant, pendulous slit that he had only now been at such pains to cord up against the breath of life.

But while the counsellor was staring into the darkness of the forest through that narrow aperture, Porius was staring into the darkness of his own life through the cavities of the counsellor’s skull. “No, I’m not going to follow any rule. I’m going to do what I will.”

Such was in actual substance, although the confused run of his thought was less obedient than this to the laws of language, what Porius imagined himself retorting as he asserted himself against his mother and Morfydd. Though he felt he had shut the wind out at their command, he now felt sure with no less certainty, in fact with the mischievous exaltation of a beast that shakes the glittering rain drops from his skin while the muttering of the retreating thunder is still dying away, that both Morfydd and his mother would have reproached him indignantly for dallying so long with these ladies and these madmen in this stuffy tent when the whole population of Edeyrnion was surging round invaders, and when the Mystery of the Fisher King was on the wind!

“All right, sweetheart!” he thought, concentrating upon his betrothed, “I’ll get out of here in a moment. I’ll kill Colgrim for the emperor and then I’ll carry you off to the city of Constantine where we’ll soon show Anastasius how to defy the pope and canonize Pelagius. Yes, I’ll be out of here in a moment!”

As if to prove the vanity of this declaration, he had no sooner made it than a sound of heavy animal breathing invaded his ears and drew his attention back to the entrance of the tent, where through those very slits he had left open, two unexpected apparitions now presented themselves.

One of these was the head of a horse and the other the head of a cow. It was clear that the appearance of these two heads, the horse's a couple of feet above the cow's, a pair of horns and a pair of ears and four liquid eyes full of inquisitive and ensorcerized vitality, was a profound comfort to Myrddin Wyllt, even if he hadn't deliberately summoned them.

Porius decided in a flash, since the man's form concealed them from the interior of the tent, to make no revealing sign to the others. "I've waited on events so long," he said to himself, half turning to glance at Rhun and the ladies, "that I may as well keep the poor devil's secret. These beasts of his will be driven away by the first person who catches sight of them. I'm not going to meddle in this."

It was indeed plain that the appearance of the two creatures had put the prophet into full command of his faculties. It had given backbone to his body and confidence to his soul. He must have flung forth on the wind a desperate appeal to a world of life that was totally different from the one conjured up by his antagonist, a world older even than the giants of Eryri and Cader, a world that needed for its invocation no portentous list of historic names.

What he proceeded to do now after giving Porius a furtive, half shamefaced, half-conspiring smile, was to step calmly and firmly straight up to the two heads, the horse's grey and the cow's black, and begin caressing them, one with his left hand and the other with his right.

Porius couldn't help noticing how the creatures responded, behaving as if he'd been the one who had looked after them and fed them from the days when they were calf and foal. In fact the homely sound of their contented snortings, together with the delicious sweetness of their breath, affected the counsellor like strong wine. And there was something now in the man's face that he had never seen there before. What a creature of masks and disguises he was!

No wonder so many of the emperor's subjects thought of him as "Myrddin Emrys," and to so many more he was "Myrddin Ambrosius," and to yet others "the savage herdsman." Was it all a deliberate masquerade, a mad series of fantastic motions to enthrall an infatuated ruler?

Porius recalled the suspicions he had had of him when they came up from the ferry. He remembered what he had felt about him when he summoned that wild crowd of what he called "his creatures," or lit the fire that dismissed them. He remembered those amazing words about Nineue and how he seemed to grow blind for a space from sheer excess of nervous excitement. Could it be that he was simply acting one extreme part after another, and all for some deliberate and secret purpose of his own?

No, what Porius had just heard and seen could not have been acting. Not an actor but a medium was what he was; a medium for unseen forces. Certainly what he could see of his face now as the torchlight fell across it carried a completely new expression. It was a mixture of confidential revelation and sly reserve. It suggested a sort of maudlin secretiveness. And yet it was in league with Nature. It reminded Porius of all the most magical and evasive aspects of the forest. It suggested grassy avenues whose lights and shades were forever waiting for feet that had already become dust.

It suggested reedy pools and moss-grown recesses wherein long-fallen, long-mouldering tree trunks sank slowly, season after season, autumn after autumn, into ever softer and ever gentler dissolution. It had about it the non-human silence and expectancy, and the faint insubstantial sigh of a patience that is beyond expectancy, such as he had sometimes noted rising from the fields when his enemy Minnawc Gorsant said Mass at dawn at their Gaer altar.

The man was fumbling now with those knots in the cords which Porius so recently and with so much difficulty had drawn tight.

"Can I help you, Master?" he enquired.

"I sent for them and now I want them to come in."

"To come in here?"

"Of course. Why not? It's Mari Llwyd and Eigr Mallt. They're my creatures. I know them and they know me. Eigr Mallt ought to be milked and Mari Llwyd ought to have her sweetmeats. They think it's dawn, though it's only a little after midnight. They must come in."

Following his instinctive habit of giantlike humorous servility to the arbitrament of all the women of his life, the arbitrament of the Three Modrybedd, of his foster-mother, of his betrothed, and of his real mother, Porius glanced towards the Lady Gwendydd.

He experienced an automatic desire to be guided by a smile, a nod, a shake of the head. The admission into that ladies' pavilion of the terrific gust of wind that would shortly whirl in, not to speak of the entrance along with it of Mari Llwyd and Eigr Mallt, was an event about which every lady with whom he had ever had anything to do would, he felt, hold an identical view.

But while Myrddin Wyllt, having undone one of the cords, was already fumbling at the other, Porius's attention, turning from Gwendydd's blue vest to Nineue's brown curls and yellow-and-green sandals, was arrested by that same withdrawn entranced look in this latter's eyes that he had noticed before.

Gwendydd's eyes were fixed with a grave concentrated interest upon Rhun, who was describing something to her with an unusual freedom of speech, but Nineue's were abstracted and absorbed as if they were being used in some entirely personal mental vision. Could it possibly be that when she fell into a trance like this she really was indulging in some subtle sensation like the one he was wont to describe to himself as "cavoseniargizing?"

This thought caused him a curious twinge and it was a twinge he knew only too well, for it always occurred when his erotic nerves were excited by something to which the rest of his nature refused to respond; and the last thing he wanted was to find that Nineue and himself had this "cavoseniargizing" trick in common.

In his nervous discomfort he flung away every thought of warning the women against the intrusion of the beasts. "If they were the Pigs of Annwn," he said to himself, "I'd not interfere!" and in his reaction against all the femininity that had so long enslaved him he hated the very curves of the brazier because they reminded him of soft despotic bodies, and the very dolphins on the Cretan screen because they had mermaids' tails.

He set himself desperately, as he stared at these objects, to embrace the whole gamut of life, thick and slab, as it was presented to him then. Oh, it was a mistake always to be making these rational efforts after order and uniformity, when the wisdom of every creature lay in reconciling itself as well as it could to that mysterious mingling of Nature's purposes with accident and chance, which is the only world we know.

CHAPTER VII. The Milk Offering

PORIUS HAD BARELY SUCCEEDED in getting his feelings into a wiser groove when he was aware of Myrddin Wyllt triumphantly leading his animals into the tent. The man walked between them holding the grey mare by the mane and the other by means of an arm thrown round her smooth black neck.

Brought up among women, save for his brief years at the Bishop's School, Porius certainly felt a shock at the contrast between the Byzantine luxury of this nomadic palace and the wild-wood presence of these two creatures.

"Gwendydd," he thought, "will never submit to this! It is too much!" One thing was a relief to him. The wind didn't rush wildly through the tent hangings and through the ivory latticework of the screen at his side. In its own arbitrary caprice the wind had grown tame.

All that entered in the wake of the animals was one of those gentle night winds that carry something wistfully oracular, as though a timid and unassuming nymph had been charged with a Sibylline message. But though there was no cold wind, the familiar tone of feminine disapproval was not wanting. Myrddin's sister protested vigorously and indignantly, even going so far as to use the word "outrage," while from Nineue came a vicious unkind laugh.

Porius's strongest desire at this moment was simply to escape and he incontinently followed this desire. Leaving the prophet to justify his behaviour as best he might, he turned his back on them all and standing between the fluttering hangings peered out into the forest.

No, there was no sound now of that ominous chant on the wind! Either the unseen voices had moved away to a remoter spot, or, in his own Modrybedd-like superstition, he had simply imagined hearing what most he dreaded to hear. As he stood there listening, his hands clutching the sailcloth on both sides of him, he began wondering what the motive or instinct or intimation really was that went on keeping him in this unnatural place.

"Perhaps," he said to himself, "there's an instinct warning me that here in this tent is the real danger to my father and his tribe; and that, since we have nothing to fear any more from the Gwyddyl-Ffichti and since the forest people's druid is our druid, it is here in this mad prophet and his dangerous 'handmaid,' here in the presence among us of this murderous 'nephew,' that the peril lies. Old Rhun seems already bewitched. God grant they have left Brother John alone!"

Turning half round now, but still retaining his hold on the wind-stirred hangings, he peered through the interstices of the screen at the still preoccupied figure of the seated Henog, who all this while had remained crouched over his work, with his tablets upon his knees, his three pigments at his side, and his self-made pen which resembled an ordinary Roman stilus in size but had a curved and slightly hollowed point, a point which, as the final result of laborious experiments, might have been compared to the beak of a curlew and which he clutched with the intensity of a weapon of defence between his thumb and his first two fingers.

But as if he had known he was being watched, Sylvanus Is-Coed now suddenly rose to his feet and gravely and ceremoniously made three deep bows in different directions; one to Gwendydd, one to the prophet whose advance with his two beasts had been already halted, and one to Rhun whose hand was on the black cow's forelock. Then, gravely and hurriedly, he proceeded to pack his writing materials in their faded case of outlandish leather and without further words either of farewell or explanation strode up to Nineue, and took her by the arm.

"He must know her pretty well," Porius thought, as he watched their whispered colloquy. "He must know her very well," he concluded when, without so much as a glance at her mistress, the handmaid led the Henog out by the same interior entrance through which she had recently led the counsellor in.

But he now became aware that what he had expected would happen was already occurring. Gwendydd was protesting with considerable emphasis against the intrusion of the animals and was demanding their immediate expulsion. With Rhun at her side she was in fact barring their further progress towards the brazier.

It was indeed a curious scene and one which then and later struck him as adding a touch of fantastic and final grotesqueness to the impressions of that weird night.

He had seen both horses and cows before, yes! and even swine, escaped from their courtyard into one or other of the arched chambers of Mynydd-y-Gaer; but the primeval architecture of that ancient fortress lent itself to such occasional apparitions. Here amid the oriental rugs and the ivory and gold ornaments and in this heavily scented atmosphere, there was something that shocked and outraged and yet in a manner he could not understand gratified his secret soul. It was like the feeling he had had in Rhun's cave when the white hound shared their Mithraic Sacrament.

Unwilling to be involved in the dispute between brother and sister, and chuckling to himself at the thought of Rhun as the infatuated champion of domestic propriety, he deliberately slipped out into the air, letting the edges of the tent flap loose behind him. Wandering off for a little distance without any definite purpose save to escape an uncomfortable scene and shake off the impression left on his senses, and the curiosity aroused in his mind, by the personality of Nineue, he was suddenly seized by the notion of visiting the Mound of y Bychan.

It would be there, if anywhere round here, that the druid's people would instinctively gather, if "the call" had really gone forth as his mother's letter hinted. The wind had done its work in lifting the mist, both the natural October one and the straw-coloured other one, but the real darkness of the night had fallen now, and the sky, covered by a veil of dusky cloud, revealed no moon and no stars.

He moved with extreme caution, feeling that any second he might disturb some watchful group of forest people. He was aware of no particular alarm at such a prospect, but it was a possibility requiring caution, and he was unarmed.

Moving as lightly as he could and cursing his clumsiness when a stick broke under his soft tread, it was not long before he came upon one of the numerous mossy paths leading towards the place he sought. Yes! There it was, a dusky blur of darkness, thicker and more palpable than the night about it, the familiar burying ground of Iscovan ap Serigi, the Gwyddyl-Ffichti! He knew the Modrybedd were possessed by the idea that not only the spirit of the Little One, but the spirits of all the forest women who in their lifetime had been seduced by the diminutive rebel, reckless in love as he was in war, haunted this revered yet unhallowed spot; but it was not of ghosts he was thinking when, step by step, and every now and then touching some tussock of grass, or some clump of damp green moss, or dry grey lichen, or dead fern, or some exposed fragment of slippery rock surface, with outstretched fingers, he fumbled his way up the Bychan's Mound.

He was once more fancying he caught upon the air that special and peculiar refrain of the Fisher King's chant that had startled him before. It always had a peculiar effect upon him, this tune, ever since he first heard it at the funeral games in honour of Alarch ferch Iddawc.

His memory of the ceremony itself was faint, for in all the years he could remember of the Feast of the Sowing, only once, on the occasion of the death of Morfydd's mother, Kymeinvoll — and she was a Gwyddyl woman — had there been inserted into it this terrifying ritual of the Fisher King, and then he had been a child of five.

The ritual was a sexual one, its symbolic meaning obscure, but it always roused in him a singular emotion, the nature of which he had only revealed to one person, that is to say, to Alarch the Fair, Rhun's mother and his own foster-mother.

"You little Rhitta Gawr!" Alarch had cried with an indulgent laugh when he blurted it out. But that had been enough. After that he had held his peace.

The truth was that long before the Romans had used the tribe of Cunedda as a bulwark against the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, long before Edeyrn ap Cunedda had taken the place as his llys, or "palace fortress," the tradition had hung about Mynydd-y-Gaer that its primeval stones had once protected the cattle and sheep of Rhitta Gawr, the last of the giant-kings of Eryri.

The legend of Rhitta Gawr was one of the oldest in the province; and though none of the forest people doubted its literal truth, the descendants of Cunedda, with the exception of Iddawc the son of Creiddylad, took a different view. Naturally enough they tended to disparage the association of their rich inheritance, given to them for their own valour by Rome, with an aboriginal giant; and when it was discovered — Porius suspected by Creiddylad herself or at least by her Ffichtiaid nurse — that in a stone cist under the prehistoric slab that had served the Gaer ever since Edeyrn's time as a Christian altar there existed bits of human bones wrapped in fragmentary wisps of what seemed to be human hair, and when the rumour went through the forest that these were what was left of Rhitta Gawr's bones, wrapped in what was left of the robe he had caused to be made of the beards of his enemies, the purer blooded Brythons of the Gaer and all of Roman and Christian blood fell silent in contemptuous distaste.

But Porius had exulted; and "Little Ritta Gawr!" his foster-mother had cried with her indulgent smile.

And now alone on the summit of the Mound of y Bychan it was not of ghosts nor of Gwyddyl-Ffichti he thought, but of Eryri and Cader Idris. And at that moment, just as if he had been summoned by a pull at his navel string, he felt impelled to return to the tent.

Heedless now how many sticks cracked under his weight he hurled himself through the tangled brushwood, running in so straight a line that he was compelled more than once to thrust his fingers beneath his belt and bend his head low, lest when he reached his destination and discovered whether a prophet like Myrddin could persuade a lady of Arthur's court to allow the beasts of the field into her chamber, his face and hands should not be bleeding with scratches.

But fast as he ran, his thoughts moved faster. A new idea had just entered his head; for instead of exhausting him or making him long for nothing but sleep, all these agitating events, overlapping each other like breaking waves, as the Henog's past and the prophet's future seemed unable to do, gave his thought wings.

What if that straw-coloured mist that had followed him for so many hours and had only vanished with the freshening of the wind were at the back of all that was happening to him? Something was freeing him from all his accumulated submissions and pieties; hoisting them up, hauling them along, heaving them over, letting them drift!

Could it be that he was being noted, marked, selected, perhaps even summoned, by some secret descendant of those old sons of the mountain who were here before the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, before the Atlanteans, before the Coranians, before even the Modrybedd's forest people?

"I must open that cist," he said to himself, "before I sail for the Bosporus. Maybe a piece from those beards would win me favour with Anastasius. Like Rhitta Gawr's Island of Britain, Constantinople must be easy to invade though hard to conquer. He might find a saving virtue in those beards."

He couldn't have been away as long as he fancied; for it appeared that his absence had hardly been noticed. It was not even necessary for him to make any particular apology. Nobody accused him this time of ansyberwyd, that rustic incivility for which the tribe's distaste proved, so Morfydd's father argued, their descent from the Homeric Greeks.

It was at once clear to him that the sister's protests had been overridden, for Rhun was holding the mare while the black-robed figure of the emperor's counsellor was already crouched upon a stool beside the black cow, at whose head stood Gwendydd, pensively and patiently caressing its forehead and twisting into little wisps the black hairs with which it was studded. Of Nineue nothing was to be seen.

Exchanging a glance with Rhun over the mare's back, Porius moved quietly forward and stood waiting.

"He's been drawing me to him," he thought. "What's he up to now?"

But it was not long ere from beneath the fingers of the stooping prophet, who emphasized his success by a curious guttural accompaniment, there came the friendly arid unique sound of milk being squirted into a bowl.

Porius had had much less to do with horses than with cattle and sheep, but he had something of the horse in his own disposition and he was aware that in the matter of their excretory functions any sort of unwonted shock — and the milking of her friend Eigr Mallt in a place like this must have been such a shock — might lead to their dunging wherever they might be.

Thus it was neither a surprise nor a displeasure to him when, to the obvious discomfiture of Rhun, the long tail of Mari Llwyd was shamelessly uplifted and two noble globes of warm manure descended in a fragrant steam of vapour upon one of the Moorish mats that concealed the floor of the tent.

“Put her out, if you please, Rhun ap Gwrnach,” was Gwendydd’s only comment as she stood with her hand on Eigr Mallt’s black head. Our friend would have been puzzled to explain the connection between the effect upon him of this untoward event and his recent exultation about Rhitta Gawr, but as he went back to open the tent hangings for what he prayed might be the last time that night, he felt that the mare’s behaviour was yet another milestone on the road of his own liberation.

But as Rhun led Mari Llwyd to the entrance, guiding her by her flowing mane and talking to her in the broad friendly Brythonian dialect of Edeyrnion, Porius became aware that one black-green Cyclopean eye of the man who was milking Eigr Mallt was fixed upon the evicted animal with a most singular expression of concern.

He himself was so ignorant of horses that he first interpreted that tender look as no more than anxiety lest the animal should repeat her recent offence. As for Rhun, who was still less of an horseman, he displayed a tendency to treat the offending creature as if she were a reluctant sow and kept muttering the syllable “soch! soch!,” the old swineherd’s cry that kept the creatures moving.

Finally to hasten her departure the impatient Rhun— "his head's all dazed," thought Porius — gave her several heavy slaps upon the rump.

Under this rough treatment, Mari Llwyd turned her head and directed towards Eigr Mallt a look which expressed puzzled, surprised, but still trustful interrogation. "It's beyond me," the look said. "But when we meet later you'll be able to explain all." After this she burst through the aperture and went off at a gallop.

"That's how it, is when you've got a friend," Porius heard Myrddin Wyllt exclaim, as if he could follow the emotions of animals better than those of men. Porius himself stood for a while gazing into the night till the faint soft sound of the horse's hooves upon the grass died away and the free night breeze, unburdened by any further mortal trouble, carried its ferny coolness and mossy dampness into the interior of the tent.

"Soldiers of Mithras turned into herdsmen of Myrddin!" he found himself whispering a moment later in Rhun's ear when it was Eigr Mallt's turn to follow Mari Llwyd out of the tent and the foster-brothers rejoined the brother and sister.

The prophet was stooping over the earthenware vessel into which he had milked the black cow, and Gwendydd was offering him one after another various little mugs and wine cups and silver bowls so that he might select from among them whatever struck him as most suitable for his purpose.

Using an old device of theirs to which they often had resorted in their boyhood, Porius now began describing to Rhun in a clear emphatic voice how he had been to the Mound of y Bychan and found it undisturbed, but he took care to slide off at the end of each sentence into a murmured hint that there would be no need for Rhun to accompany him to the Fountain if they were invited to remain where they were, for, though he himself must go to Brother John's cell, it might be just as well, in the interest of the tribe at this ticklish moment, to divide forces.

Rhun had looked sulky at first, but as soon as he caught this underdrift of the words, his eyes brightened. Poor old Rhun was surely spellbound by the sister if not by the magician!

But it must have been the magician who had called him just now, and the question was — for what? Surely not simply to see how curious those two globes of horse dung looked upon a mat from Arabia!

But for what then? For the sport of making a person look a fool? For the interest of seeing if you could make the grandson of Indeg and the great-grandson of Creiddylad run to your feet from the Mound of y Bychan? Is he going to take his chance, now that that girl's out of the way, of confessing the truth about the trestles and about the corpse in the water?

Suddenly he saw Gwendydd approach her brother who, to all appearance, as he kept scooping the foaming milk from the big earth bowl he had selected and pouring it back again while his black beard wagged above them both, had fallen into one of his queer trances. She boldly touched the wrist of the hand on the edge of the earth bowl and murmured a question into his ear; a question to which he instantly replied with a sardonic chuckle.

His reply evidently took her aback, for a puzzled and troubled look came into her face, and moving across to the foster-brothers she hurriedly said something in an apologetic tone to Rhun that Porius could not catch.

"She doesn't approve of what he's going to do," thought Porius. "What in the devil's name is the man up to now?"

But the counsellor straightened himself, his right hand holding the silver bowl, the other resting on the edge of the big earthen one, which itself was balanced, Porius now observed, on the carved base of what must once have been some sort of heathen image. Then he spoke slowly and in that same harsh unpleasant jeering manner in which he had chuckled when he answered Gwendydd.

And to Porius's disgust, for the whole affair had begun to appear ridiculous and grotesque, he found that the man was addressing his remarks to him.

"I expect you know already, Prince Porius," he began, "that it was you who brought me here. Neither my sister nor her handmaid understand me. But you called me to come. My animals called me to come. You and my animals understand me and called me. There's no need for words between us. As to the Cewri of Eryri and the Cader" — he paused for a moment after using this traditional Brythonic word for "giants" and Porius's heavy brows creased themselves into startled folds round his little green eyes— "I have nothing to tell you, for I know nothing.

"But since Eigr Mallt came running to be milked and since you came running to make me milk her and since Mari Llwyd came running to offer us of her dung, I am ready to make the milk offering. Only you must all remember that I know nothing. For all I know the last of them may still live in the caves up there, feeding on your dead, or they may all have been lost for a thousand years!

"What is it to me? I know my animals and they know me. I know nothing of your Cewri. Let that fool of a Henog write about them! But since you and my animals have come running to me and calling for me to do something, I'll do this at least. I'll offer the milk offering. Let them drink that and leave your dead alone!

"What's the hour of the night, sister? Where's that water clock you brought with you? No! Let it go now. It matters nothing. It's somewhere between two and three. I can get that much from the smell of the air.

Somewhere about two is a good hour for the milk offering. Sylvanus ap Bleheris, where art thou? Write of it, with a pen of gold on a tablet of iron! Write of it, Chronicler! Write of it, Henog!"

Thus speaking he dipped the little silver vessel in the milk, scooped up enough to half fill it, and proceeded to stare in solemn silence at the two men and one woman standing before him. A moment's silence followed; and in this silence Rhun behaved as he always did at Minnawc Gorsant's Mass at the Gaer altar. He hummed in his throat. It was so low a sound and so inanimate a sound that it could have been taken for a physical infirmity. But it sucked all the mystical value out of what was going on as completely as a wood pigeon's egg is sucked by a magpie. Gwendydd meanwhile kept an apprehensive eye on the interior entrance.

"She's scared of that girl coming back," Porius thought. He was surveying the counsellor's performance without a flicker of interest. "He's acting a part again," he said to himself, "only it's a different part this time."

The towering figure with the black beard tied in the middle — and by this time Porius was wondering what it really was about the man that caused his appearance to vary so from moment to moment — was now holding up the little silver vessel with both his hands high above his head and he was mumbling, as he did so, a long rigmarole in a low, rapid, automatic chant, most of which to Porius was totally unintelligible.

But at regular intervals there did come words that struck a familiar chord in him. They were Homeric words. He knew that. And he recognized them as something much nearer his bones and his blood than old Rhun's "Nama, Nama, Sebesio!" They were words he'd often heard from Morfydd's father, who had a trick of using them when most men of his tribe would have crossed themselves.

It was indeed the famous invocation to the “powerless heads of the dead” that “the daughter of the sun” bade Odysseus use if he wished to call up the prophet Tiresias. In their youthful mania for anything that was contrary to the teachings of Minnawc Gorsant, Morfydd and Morvran would go out at midnight, having prepared the necessary libation prescribed by Circe: “first milk and honey, then sweet wine, then water, and finally barley meal”; and kneeling together in the very place where a year later Morvran’s body lay outraged and dead, murmur in their passionate young voices a bold defiance to the new faith in the name of nekuon ameneena kareena, the powerless heads of the dead!

“I’ve tasted the honey already,” Porius thought. “It now remains to taste the milk.”

The black-bearded figure was now turning slowly round, pausing in that circular orbit for a few moments at each quarter of the horizon, and each time he paused giving the bowl he held a cautious shake so that he caused a sprinkling of the new milk to fall north, east, south, and west; and quite heedless — though Porius, conscious of Gwendydd’s disapproval, was anything but heedless — whether it fell on Arabian rug or Gallic cushion or only on the weather-worn sailcloth, large as the mainsail of an Athenian trireme, that covered the tent’s floor.

Having done this he bowed his head in the solemn manner of a Christian priest when he is giving the Communion and called out, still in an oddly harsh and unpleasant voice, his sister’s name and the names of Rhun and Porius, offering to each in turn as they approached him what remained of the milk in that small vessel.

Porius was a little surprised that neither he himself, nor Rhun, nor apparently the lady, was moved to bend the knee as they drank; and he even noticed that the bearded celebrant was compelled to snatch away the vessel from Rhun, who was the last to whom he offered it, so that he might pour the final drop down his own throat.

"To the Cewri!" the counsellor cried in a startlingly harsh and mocking voice, and Porius, watching him closely, was aware that with his tongue — and there was something indecent and curiously repulsive to the young chieftain in the appearance of this intimate member — he was licking with lascivious satisfaction the inside of the silver bowl.

A feeling of sick revulsion swept over Porius. "He doesn't believe for a moment in the giants. It's a farce! The fellow's playing the fool simply to impress Rhun and me. Well! Let it go! I must get out of this and find Brother John. God! I shall soon wish I'd run straight from the Gaer to the Fount, instead of from the Mound to the tent. Honey of Mithras? Milk of Myrddin? Body of Jesus! I've room for them both and more. I'm of the blood of Creiddylad. And when I've polished off Colgrim, Baldulf, and Cheldric I'll do what Brother John wants, sail for the Bosporus and recanonize Pelagius and then, maybe, bring Theodoric in chains to—"

His thoughts were interrupted by the counsellor himself, who after handing the silver bowl to Gwendydd came up to him and led him aside by the arm.

"Ha! Ha!" Porius said to himself. "I thought so! It's all designed for Rhun and me — to divide us from the forest people! But you don't know my father" — and even as he listened to the man he automatically, after his manner, gave his head a jerk towards the south— "nor by God do you know the Aunties!"

But the counsellor had taken him by the arm and had led him to the entrance behind the screen. "Listen, Prince Porius," he said. "No! Let those curtains flap! My sister likes fresh air sometimes, and Nineue ferch Avallach must be helping our historian to bring his ‘Vita Veridica’ up to date. But a word in your ear, Prince—”

It was lucky for our friend’s politeness that the man did utter the word “ear,” for it gave him an excuse for turning the organs of his other senses in a different direction. If he hadn’t achieved this it would have been simply impossible to conceal his shrinking from contact with that black beard and that fungoid smell. The turn of his head too enabled him to escape all but a whiff of that weird breath of ice-cold air which he found still more disturbing.

“Shall I tell you a secret?” the voice at his ear whispered. “Nineue ferch Avallach is afraid of the Cewri. She fancies they’re not all dead! It’s her only fear. She’s not afraid of me, nor of Arthur, nor of the queen. As for Medrawd, she positively likes tormenting him. But of the Cewri she’s mortally afraid! And the truth of the matter is her fear is racial. It’s in her blood. She comes of the original Ffichti. Not the Gwyddyl-Ffichti, you understand, but the pure-blooded Ffichti; those whose feud with the forest people is implacable. Did you know, Prince, that some old Henog writes that the Ffichti were here in the beginning — before the forest people — and that they were the slaves of the Cewri? The Cewri are of course all gone. Nobody at Arthur’s court believes in them. Your father used to send messages to Caerleon about them, but the emperor never believed such survivals were possible; and as for myself, my dear Prince, to tell you the truth, I take no interest in bones and cinders and fossils and ruins. That’s where Arthur misunderstands me.

“Did you know he calls me a magician? Jesus Christ! Whereas not only have I no belief in magic, I am devoid of the smallest interest in it. As for the history of magic which our good Henog thinks is the very pleroma of all civilitas, I tell you, Prince, I would rather make a collection of snail shells than bother with such trifles. Power I have, as you have felt and as my animals have felt, and I know things about the future that no other man knows, or ever will know, and I'll tell you this much, Prince, here and now I'll tell you, in these early hours of the nineteenth day of October of the year of Jesus four hundred and ninety-nine. And you will be astonished to hear it.

"But you'll soon find, if you try the experiment, that not a human soul you tell it to will believe it! Any more than I believe" — his enormous body gave vent to a deep, harsh, and yet almost hysterical chuckle— "than I believe in the Cewri!"

Struggling to endure the stinkhorn effluvia and stiffening himself against a temptation to give way to a few deeply heaved shudderings under the impact of what felt as if it came from outside Time and Space, Porius noted with malicious pleasure that in spite of it being the cold heart of the night and in spite of the tent's civilized luxury, a small greenish yellow fly had quietly settled in peace and comfort upon one of the capacious rondures of horse dung that had been so inopportunely dropped by Mari Llwyd.

Now it chanced that the flickering of the nearest torch as it fell upon this unseasonable scavenger brought it about that the insect's wings took on the identical tint of the imperial livery worn by Mistress Nineue. Had the torchlight transformed the dung fly into any other colour, Porius might have found enough will power in himself to endure the prophet's propinquity long enough to encourage him to proceed; but the thought of Nineue brought back to him such an exact reproduction of the mixture of pain and pleasure he had felt when he had to get her as quickly as possible out of his arms, that now, though with a different urge to escape, he turned his head towards the black beard.

"I'm afraid I'm stupid in these things, Master Counsellor." He spoke in a low voice, but it was well above a whisper; and glancing at Gwendydd and Rhun he was not surprised to see that the former's attention had been aroused, though the soldier of Mithras remained oblivious to everything but the fair form under the blue vest.

Myrddin Wyllt was not unaware of the rebuff, though its significance, its brutality even, passed over him as harmlessly as weir water over an otter.

"I tried in vain," the young man went on, for as a true Homeric Brython whose ancestors came, not, as they declared at Arthur's Romanized court, from Troy, but from the other side in that huge upheaval of nations, he had been the reverse of flattered by being called "Prince" when to be ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda was enough. That made him the equal of any king. "I tried in vain to follow those great words that you, my Lord, exchanged with Sylvanus Is-Coed ap Bleheris when he—"

The strangest look came into the green-black cavities into which he was trying to stare with a bluff carelessness. "Words?" mumbled the voice in that mighty beard. "Did you say 'words?' Gone! It's gone from me now what my animals and I alone know. I was going to tell you — when I thought you'd be as quiet as Mari Llwyd and Eigr Mallt — how the future is, how all the futures are, present with me day and night; and that's because —"

Porius moved a pace or two away from him, fumbling awkwardly with his empty belt. "I don't understand what you mean, my Lord," he protested brusquely, "by many futures, or by all the futures. How can there possibly be more than one? But I must be thanking you now, my Lord, and I must be thanking the Lady Gwendydd for this memorable night; but it is imperative before this night's over that I go on to the Fount. Brother John may be asleep. I hope he is. But he may be awake and waiting for me. In any case I ought—"

But the man he was addressing had ceased to listen. He was staring through him as if he were a hollow shell. He was staring through the whole forest round them, and through the whole rondure of the night around the forest. He was staring through the wall of mist into which that moment of Time was being carried.

"Only my animals," he was muttering, "only my animals! They know and I know. Many creatures, many worlds, many gods, many futures!"

In his present mood Porius felt sympathetic with this blasphemous declaration. "I must remember that phrase 'many futures,'" he thought quickly, "against the day I defend Pelagius in the Caer Cystennin."

His mind rushed back for a second to the Bishop's School beyond Moel y Famau and how teased he used to be by the tricky reasoning in Plato's Timaeus about the necessity of their being only one cosmos since the Creator's paradeigma, or "model," was one.

But more arresting than his sympathy with Myrddin Wyllt's many worlds was a startling suspicion that had suddenly rushed into his mind, the suspicion that it was not only Nineue who was scared of the Cewri!

What if the counsellor's wise hint about Arthur's court being too enlightened to believe such fancies was simply a cloak for a distaste of his own — possibly even an obscure dread — of any such disturbing survivals from the Henog's adored past?

Well! He must let these enigmas go now and be off to the Fount and Brother John. Something had drawn him pelting back from the Mound of y Bychan with his head full of Rhitta Gawr; but this business of the milk offering was probably a coincidence, another example of the man's playacting.

Leaving Myrddin Wyllt to his thoughts of many worlds and many futures, and wondering vaguely as he did so how a prophet under such conditions could predict at all, and what happened to the “futures” that never came, Porius now concentrated his attention upon Rhun and Gwendydd who were clearly absorbed in each other.

It was one of the occasions when his restless mind, returning from its exile from his cumbrous body and diffusing itself through that body, became once more considerate, propitiatory, even princely. Thus in order to avoid embarrassing the abstracted counsellor he moved silently and stealthily from his side; while in order that the prolonged dialogue between Gwendydd and Rhun should not be broken up in any awkward manner, he proceeded with a gradually increasing clatter and noise to pick up not only the old Roman’s campaigning bottle but his own hunting spear which hitherto Rhun had been carrying.

These objects he ostentatiously examined, shifting them carefully from hand to hand, and at the same time flicking his hunting cap, in spite of its being made of that precious extinct hide, noisily and violently against one after the other of his tight-fitting leather sleeves.

After this — for neither the Lady of the Gaer nor the younger Lady of Ty Cerrig approved of clumsy interruptions — he sought to attract Gwendydd’s attention by means of a slight drumming upon the Cretan screen.

This he accomplished by aid of the silver stopper of the Roman bottle which was attached to the neck of the vessel by a metal chain and had the power of evoking a not unpleasant tinkle when brought into contact with the upper row of carved dolphins that were the screen’s chief glory.

But that he had begun to be amazed at the shameless manner in which he had washed his hands of the blood of Llew ap Greidawl was proved by the fact that before he knew what he was doing he found himself tapping out in silvery tinklings on those dolphin backs the very rhythm of the chorus from the ritual of the Fisher King which he had fancied he caught on the night air.

Even when he realized what he was doing he did not at once cease doing it. It satisfied some deep mischief in him to disturb Gwendydd ferch Morfryn's pleasure in Rhun ap Gwrnach ab Agenor y Gaethwas by a tune that was older than the fall of Troy, a tune that ambassadors from the pharaohs must have dreaded to hear among the palm groves of Marrakesh of the Berbers!

Set going by this disturbing tune, his mania for introspection shook off every restraint. He had found out long ago what little effect the motions of his blasphemous and shameless thoughts had upon his pious and muscular body.

It was a constant delight to him, and not entirely a malicious one, to widen further and further the natural gulf between his submissive frame and his restless soul. For it was his body that decided his actions. He had never exerted much will, and as to what Galen calls the "neurodes" or nervous system between brain and senses it worked as easily and healthily with him as with an animal.

He had crossed the Ford of Mithras to please Rhun. He was here because the counsellor had brought him here. And now he was going to leave them, not because Edeyrnion was in danger but simply because Brother John expected him. Well! He would certainly have to grow more independent when he sailed for Constantinople in the cause of Pelagius.

But both Gwendydd and Rhun had begun to approach him as he stood by the screen, and so to his surprise had the counsellor.

"I must bid you farewell, Lady," he announced firmly with a grave bow. "I want to see Brother John before I sleep, and I must sleep soon or I shall be ashamed to meet my father tomorrow."

“Need your foster-brother go with you?” enquired the counsellor, whose eyes were now fixed expectantly on the entrance to the inner chamber where Nineue had vanished with the Henog. He spoke as if he were weary of the whole matter and cared not a jot whether Rhun went or didn’t go.

It struck the prince, not so much that the man was growing anxious about the non-reappearance of Mistress Nineue, as that he would have liked to listen once more to the feverish attacks of his biographer! Porius was aware of a distinctly uneasy sensation, which, though it was not exactly awe or fear, made him look sharply at this prophet of “many futures” who had asked whether Rhun “need” go.

The tone in which the man asked this question with his eyes fixed on that interior entrance suggested a knowledge that was already in a certain sense “as old as the hills” that Rhun wouldn’t go; and as Porius watched that anxious glance, the weary question accompanying it sounded to him as if it reached the tent from a future so remote that all the human feeling connected with the doubt as to whether Rhun “went” or “didn’t go” had ceased to be of interest.

“Let such details,” his tone suggested, “be inscribed in the triple-coloured inks of Sylvanus Is-Coed. I have no concern with them.”

“There is certainly no need for Rhun ap Gwrnach to go with me,” Porius replied, thinking in his heart that Myrddin Wyllt resembled a deus mortuus, or “corpse god,” who was only roused to any natural life at all by his weird mania for Nineue’s satiny skin, his feeling for his animals, and the necessity, or “tynged,” he was under to refute the Henog’s justifiable onslaughts upon whatever ghostly “future” it might be that like a succubus was exhausting his life force.

“Not a bit of need,” Porius went on, for the first time in this queer scene meeting Rhun’s eye, “but I do not know—”

But the Lady Gwendydd left Rhun’s side and came forward. “Myrddin Wyllt and I,” she said quickly, “will be delighted to keep Rhun ap Gwrnach here for the rest of the night. I won’t try to persuade you to stay yourself, Prince. Brother John, as you say, is expecting you and would be disappointed. But his cell is small, and I’m sure he’ll be glad for us to look after your cousin. It’s easier for women to manage these things, and there’s Neb ap Digon and the others; so you needn’t fear for his comfort. Neb will see to everything for him. Besides, we shall all sleep sounder with a warrior of your blood among us. My brother has his own methods in case of danger, but Mistress Nineue and I will feel doubly secure with your kinsman here.”

During the utterance of these words, which, though spoken quietly and in the manner of a gentle appeal, had an air of authority that would have made refusal difficult, Porius and Rhun exchanged a second glance. They knew each other so well that this was enough; nor was Porius at all displeased at the prospect of having his spiritual director entirely to himself when they arose in the morning.

“I mustn’t let him talk till he’s had his sleep out,” he said to himself. “I shall sleep at his feet, and we’ll talk tomorrow. Sleep... tomorrow... tomorrow... sleep.”

CHAPTER VIII. The Prince of Edeyrnion

AS HE LEFT THE TENT Porius was conscious of a moment’s irritable regret that it should have been the fashion just then in the princely households of the Romanized Brythons to confine the drinking of wine and mead to breakfast and supper; at which times both the men and the women formally sat down in the banquet hall. At supper the women left the hall when after the meat the serious drinking began, but to see that the supply of liquor was sufficient for the company was their affair, and at the beginning of both meals they tasted what they had provided.

Being the sophisticated traveller he was, Brochvael ab Iddawc disregarded this custom. His casual Gallic habits in the matter of drink had been encouraged by his wife the Gwyddyles, and after his betrothal to Morfydd Porius’s Brythonic rule had been considerably relaxed.

At this moment he would have given a gold piece, yes! even with the head of Caesar on it, for the smallest bottle of the fragrant Greek wine Morfydd used to pour out for him at any hour in the Stone House. His brain felt at the same time exhausted and overexcited by all he had experienced since he left his watchtower on Mynydd-y-Gaer. He felt he could call on his physical strength to any extent in any kind of struggle as long as this exertion implied no sort of mental effort, no! not so much effort as to decide where to hit or where to dodge, when to attack and when to retreat.

“If the forest people,” he thought, “are really out for blood these Arthurians are in the worst predicament of their lives! I might save them but it’s doubtful! If I did it would be by sheer force, not by any particular awe of me. I think they respect me but take me for a simpleton, and I dare say they’re right. I probably am a bit of a fool.”

His imagination went on to conjure up what he mentally suspected and reasonably expected was actually happening in this huge expanse of moonlit forest. He found it singularly difficult to conjure up and visualize with any precision what was happening. There had been other risings. The one in which Morvran perished was different, for it included some of their fiercest Brythons and was really a Christian riot. The Gaer conspiracy in the days of Iddawc ab Edeyrn was entirely Brythonic and was due to the tribe’s suspicion of Princess Indeg and her three native sisters. In the days of Iscovan y Bychan both the Romans and the Brythons lived in constant fear of marauding attacks; and these marauders, though led by an outlaw of Gwyddyl-Ffichti blood, were largely recruited from the forest people.

“But why can’t I visualize these people,” he thought, “as they actually are at this moment? I can’t imagine whether they’re struggling to keep awake or whether in tense excitement they are waiting for the word from their druid which would be passed along from group to group and from watcher to watcher? Or have they received orders to hide themselves closely all night, sleep till sunrise, and then make an overwhelming attack on the Arthurian camp from every quarter at the same moment?”

“I don’t know them! I don’t know them!” he thought, “while he,” and Porius made his habitual gesture towards what he took to be the south, “thinks like them, eats like them, hunts like them, lives like them, deceives like them, is secretive like them, cold-hearted like them, sensitive like them, superstitious like them, incalculable like them, always defeated like them, and, in the end, unconquerable like them! That’s what he is, though he looks like Huw Gadarn himself, the first Brython who came from Taprobani, the Summer Country, where Constantinople now stands!”

Though he took the shortest way to the Fountain he had to walk warily, for not only was the sky clear and even a few stars faintly visible, but the most shapeless moon — so it seemed to his taut, wrought-up, and sleep-starved brain — that he had ever seen or could imagine seeing was beginning to cast cold, clear-cut, marmoreal shadows upon his path.

He carried his spear by its centre just as if he were simply carrying a heavy pole, not as Arthur's riders bore their thick lances, nor as the forest people clutched their light javelins. But at least he held it so that the point of its long knifelike iron head preceded his steps.

Advancing cautiously in this manner it was not long before he began to descend a grassy incline from which all the brushwood and undergrowth had been carefully cleared, and where at this hour — only two or three hours before dawn — the tall trunks of a group of majestic pines led the eye, like parallel avenues of monumental pillars, down to the very edge of the miniature lake, or large pond, which, from the days when the survivors of Lost Atlantis were still landing from their strange ships and when the "people of the forest" had but newly arrived from their far-off home in North Africa, had always been the most sacred and revered spot between Cader Idris and the Mountain of the Mothers.

Absorbed in the sight of that moonlit water he began walking freely and carelessly down the very centre of this avenue, till suddenly he stopped. "I deserve," he thought, as he flung his left hand, the one that held the Roman bottle, round the trunk of a giant pine, and pressed himself with his great spear as closely as he could to its rough, tar-scented bark, "I deserve to get an arrow through my crazy skull!"

The shapeless half-moon behind him threw the triple shadow — a tree, a man, a spear — upon the slope before him, and made a long rippling path of silvery light upon the water below. But more magical than the fluttering of the reeds by which that luminous path was broken, more intense than the watchful expectancy of the pines, more primeval than the healing, astringent scent of the roughly indented pine bark pressed against his face, was at that crucial moment the simple presence of silence. Though the nineteenth of October, in that last year of the fifth century, had already inscribed itself on the Henog's tablets there were still some hours, to wait before dawn began.

Time and Space, in complete fraternity for once, had begun like entwined serpents their dual and diurnal suction at the breasts of life; but the moment had not yet come for those breasts to respond. That strange insinking, insliding, ingulfing motion, as though something were being drawn downwards into the mouth of a dark planetary funnel where the spirals of the life torrent curve inward with such smooth rapidity that the heart of the earth seems to have stopped beating and the lungs of the earth to have stopped breathing, struck Porius at that moment to be actually swallowing up the mystery of sound at its ultimate source.

As Porius leant still harder against the tree, pressing his cheek so closely to its surface that his princely oxenskin cap was pushed awry, he grew aware of a wonderful loosening and easing of the tension in his brain which had begun to reach such a point that every thought that came into his head quivered like the string of an overtight bow whose arrow might be discharged at random.

With his head thus tilted on one side as he stared at the lake he recalled how Auntie Erddud had once compared such a moon to the corpse of a woman whom a demon lover has drowned in order to forestall the birth of a child. Then Auntie Erddud's drowned lady transformed herself into a distorted image of that part of his thick tournament lance which young Mabsant was caressing so proudly when he had it knocked out of his hand.

It was so soothing to rest like this, armed and ready, but letting his fancies drift free, that he was only saved from a really startling and unpleasant surprise by a small horny-scaled beetle that had taken up its autumnal abode between two of the wrinkled and fibrous ridges of the pine trunk he was embracing. This hard-headed forest dweller did not differentiate between Homo sapiens and the beasts of the field.

As carrion they might both serve a conceivable purpose, but alive and in motion they were simply "unpredictable acts of God." Thus the fragment of tepid matter covering the left cheekbone of a Brythonic prince struck the beetle's intelligence as identical for all practical purposes with the wet, glistening, naked nose of Eigr Mallt or the hairy neck of Mari Llwyd, or the more dangerous surfaces of the pointed antlers of the great stag of Coed Sarn Elen. It divined that this compulsory roofing of its familiar resort was only temporary, but Nature impelled it to probe into the mystery at once. To the beetle this process may have seemed lengthy, but to human computation the time it took was briefer than the stabbing of Caesar, and the result of its investigation was startling.

Porius at once removed not only his cheek but the back of the fingers with which he held his spear in order to scratch his cheek. In the process of these movements he turned away his eyes from the bewitched water and at once perceived a tall human figure emerging from the nearest patch of undergrowth at the base of a wooded slope, about a thousand yards to the southwest of where he himself was standing.

Something about the figure seemed familiar to him, but in any case he was ready to meet friendship with friendship and hostility with hostility, as occasion served. With his Roman bottle in his left hand, therefore, and his spear grasped by the middle in his right, he advanced to meet the figure.

"Christ and God!" These three syllables leapt up from the surface of his mind like spouts of foam over a swirling vortex of confusion; but below the surge of their utterance there swept instantaneously before his vision an amorphous mass of drunken warriors and wooden trenchers and pools of spilt mead. For, as the distance between him and the approaching figure lessened, his suspicion thickened itself within him into a troubled belief; and belief soon hardened into an agitating certainty that the tall man who was striding to meet him was none other than Einion ab Iddawc himself.

The sudden necessity of gathering all his mental forces together to meet his father; and to meet him, of all places and of all moments, just here on this hillside and above the sacred water, cut away at the root with one crashing blow all the wavering speculations of philosophical detachment, all the semi-humorous introspections of self-analysis, all the dramatic condensations of poignant situations, in which he would naturally have indulged in the presence of this event.

The mere idea of his father at any time and in any place was always disturbing to Porius, and an encounter in the flesh just here, when his brain was already strained to the limit, was hardly bearable. He knew well how the least whisper between them would upset the balance between his patiently obedient physical nature and his restless and critical intelligence.

He had derived a certain pleasure at different times from the man's incorrigible levity, but his own soul for all its roving thoughts was essentially serious. His thoughts might question everything; and they might leap at top speed from one seriousness to another seriousness while himself and everybody else remained at bottom ludicrous and grotesque. But his father's levity was so elusive as to be weird. It wasn't earthy enough to be humorous. It was the mockery of everything in life, of life itself. It was the mood of a mountain sprite or a water elf. It had no heart. It was a fata morgana, an ignis fatuus!

All that Porius felt just then in this luckless encounter was enhanced by the nature of the silence that surrounded himself and the approaching apparition. This silence had been growing moment by moment more palpable and oppressive. It surrounded him now like a vast bubble that had reached the limit of its power of expansion. He felt as though the moment of its bursting had arrived. And with its bursting both his father and himself might vanish away.

With each step he took this feeling increased upon him. The time of the night, he told himself, must have something to do with it. It was the time when the life pulse was at its lowest, the time of the life ebb, the low-water time.

But it was of course the unseen presence of thousands of forest people watching and waiting in their hiding places that was making it worse. With the two of them together — his father's sword in his left hand, his own spear in his right hand — they had only arrows to fear. And whence could the arrows come? From the tall reeds of the lake? No, their figures would be recognized.

None but Gwyddyl-Ffichti would draw a bow against the prince and his son. Oh, they were safe enough, and in another moment he'd be imploring this madman with the drawn sword to give up some wild impossible project that would wreck them all! Was it, or was it not, the Fisher King's chant he had heard from that tent entrance? At the moment he had been sure of it, but he was doubtful now.

The fact that Einion ab Iddawc was bareheaded and was carrying that naked sword — and what sword was it? — suggested that he had been roused in haste and had left the Gaer without preparation. But when did the man leave anything with preparation? He was capable of getting straight out of bed, clapping on his cloak and his boots, and setting off on the first horse, colt, mule, or ass he could find, to the White Tower in London or the emperor's llys at Caergwynt!

But the point now was, and this did look really serious, that he carried his long blade — God and Christ! and it was that sword — in his left hand. Now, though all the family knew and all Edeyrnion knew that their prince was left-handed, they were so accustomed to see him either with a weapon in both hands, or with nothing in either but a long staff, that his son experienced as he reached him that peculiar shiver of discomfort with which children behold a parent entering upon some dangerous sport whereof they know, while he doesn't, the intimate perils of the game.

Taller by a head than Porius, Einion ab Iddawc was in appearance the perfect type of a pure-blooded Brython. His countenance was at once rugged in its outlines and softly moulded in its contours, while his eyes, as deeply set in his skull as Porius's own, were of a peculiar tint of grey.

As he placed his empty right hand on his son's left shoulder and bending down a little began whispering into his ear, Porius knew at once that his premonition had been correct as to the tone the man would assume. Airy derision, as if he'd been persuaded to watch a puppet show, was the cue, and most of the playfulness was directed, as Porius knew it would be, against himself, his mother, and the old Roman.

The first communication conveyed in this manner through the grizzled moustache had to do with the Gaer Lady's absurd desire to summon the Gosgordd. This last word came to" him so muffled by those once golden and even now not wholly grey hairs that a stranger might have supposed the laughter to be at the lady's wanting to call up Cronos; but her son knew well what was meant — a Brythonic chieftain’s full-armed bodyguard of three hundred trained warriors.

“I told her,” the prince went on, “that the forest hasn’t been roused to a pitch like this since my father’s time. Morvran’s murder was nothing to this. Jesus Christ! Here’s the Derwydd’s own brother killed by these lunatics within a furlough of the death mound, within a mile of y Bychan’s Mound, and by the edge of the Sacred Fount! This Myrddin Wyllt must be a madman. The Henog has told me as much; and Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch — I’ve got him anyway safe up there — thinks the same. He’s not a madman, lad, this son of Anna and heir to Arthur. He’s a deep one.

“And I’ll tell you this, my grave and moral son, and ‘lay it up in your heart’ as my brother would say. When he comes into his own there’ll be no more of this ‘Emperor of Britain’ business. There’ll be a return to the old free ways and the old tribal divisions. When Medrawd comes into his own this whole farce of Pendragons and Maxen Wledigs and Bendigeitfrans playing at Roman Caesars will be finished!”

The recipient of this seditious outburst only sighed. He knew the man too well. He recalled how quite recently over his mead he had sworn that these very Saeson under Colgrim coming from Germania were no worse pirates and oppressors than the Romans themselves under Julius and Claudius and Hadrianus and the rest!

He recalled how he’d heard him once say to Modryb Esyllt that when he’d driven out the Saeson the emperor would turn his precious horsemen against the whole House of Cunedda and reduce them to “Counts of the North,” who must do homage to Arthur in the city of Lludd! Everything was a joke to Einion ab Iddawc, even his own Edeyrnion.

But the muffled murmur at Porius’s ear was going on still. “I told her they’d raised ‘the Fisher King’ and that it had brought the Gwyddyl-Ffichti down from the mountains. This of course was a lie, for the fellow hasn't been dead for a dozen hours, and unless the Derwydd has a few Coranians in his train, or is more of a wizard than he looks, the news couldn't have got as far!

"No, lad, no! Now don't begin all that" — and he lifted the hand that rested on his son's shoulder and touched the bare flesh of Porius's neck with a couple of his long thin fingers— "for you know what your mother is. Did you read that crazy letter she sent to these people? Think of her advising them to go to Deganwy! Of course the only thing is for us, for you and me, to whistle them back whence they came. And that's what I'm doing now and that's what you must help me in."

He took breath at last and drew back a space, making a faint gesture, both with the beautifully moulded hilt of his bare blade and with his own beautifully moulded head, in the direction of the wood, a gesture which his son correctly interpreted as meaning that they were being closely watched; watched by friends perhaps, certainly by enemies.

Porius was now completely under the aura of the man's personality, under what he felt to be a palpable projection of the man's soul; and he was vividly aware, as always when in physical contact with his father, of the peculiarly wholesome smell that emanated from him, like the smell of well preserved hay in some dry and sun-exposed shed.

"She never told me," the prince went on, brushing his son's cheek again and giving him the sense of being swaddled in sweet hay, "about that letter till after I'd been asleep for five or six hours. She must have been sitting up in bed waiting for me to wake."

Nothing was more painful to Porius than to think of the various dramatic scenes that must, from year to year, have gone on in that princely bedchamber at Mynydd-y-Gaer, where his mother slept in the carved oaken bed of Iddawc the Apostate, and Einion ab Iddawc upon a heap of rugs between her and the fire, while a powerful middle-aged Roman lay stretched across the threshold outside.

On this occasion he saw with a heartbreaking clarity his mother's troubled eyes turning from the ghastly indifference of the sick and shapeless moon, like a hunted nun heavy with child, that she saw through the window, to the beautiful and bearded warrior, cold, heartless, treacherous, irresponsible, the spoilt darling of the Three Aunties of the Giant's Cave, who lay on his back with his long bare ivory-white arms stretched out at his side upon the coverlet.

But there was more pain for him, more pain yet to come as always when he took Einion ab Iddawc's side against his Arthurian mother and her Roman parent. And this new pain, which was like the thumb-jerk of a mischievous schoolboy pointing at a tragic face, this new pain had to do with the elder Porius.

"It was one of his Romans who told me," the prince whispered. "He told me that when Porius Manlius couldn't sleep"— "And oh!" thought the younger Porius, "how your old gods must favour you, that you smell of hay and not of mead!"— "thinking the Gaer would be besieged and we'd all be killed, what he did was to take out, when he thought nobody on earth could see him, that tiny little image of Caius Julius which he keeps in an old bronze box. He didn't burn incense to it, the fellow says, but marched it up and down, and tapped it against that picture of Fortuna Victrix that hangs over his pillow."

These two images — the one of his mother sitting up alone in that big carved bed with her thick masses of grey-dusted, straw-bleached hair framing her statuesque face, and the other of the old man, furtively, secretively, in the familiar moment of military peril, bringing upon the scene the great dictator’s bald head, pinched cheeks, and fear-nothing mouth — may have had something to do with the sudden abrupt manner in which he now asked the prince who it might be who was hidden up there in the wood.

His father and he were now so closely linked by their bodily contact that the habitual clash of their souls on the familiar psychic level where all rational articulation is lost began to intensify to a point that was both infanticidal and parricidal.

But the more he hated his father, the more beautiful did his father grow. His hate seemed perpetually to create afresh the beauty upon which it fed. The learned Brochvael always maintained that the prince was a living proof that the Romanized Brythons were only trying to propitiate their masters when they claimed to be descended from the Trojans. It was from the Greek side they came!

But Porius always felt, when the aura of his father’s personality invaded him like this, that for all his fair Homeric exterior the soul within him was as Iberian as the souls of the Modrybedd!

One thing was certain. Neither with his Homeric body nor with his Iberian soul could this wanton creature comprehend what was the secret of his son’s hidden life; no! nor have the remotest conception of what it meant to be conscious of that titanic brood in your blood that was older than Troy, older than Argos, older than Marrakesh itself, and which left one of its daughters behind when it vanished from Eryri and the Cader.

“Who is it,” Porius asked again in a louder whisper, “you’ve got hidden away up there?”

The tall man slowly lifted his right hand to his face, gave an ostentatiously apprehensive look towards the summit of the slope, pulled deliberately at the tip of his pointed beard and at both the tips of his drooping moustaches, and then murmured casually, “Oh, they can wait. But you should have seen how excited your mother looked when she got me awake at last, and you should have heard how she talked of the greatness of Arthur and how tragic it would be if anything happened to the counsellor or to his sister.

“I teased her about this girl they call Mistress Nineue, and I asked her whether it would be so terrible if she should be hurt! You know what they are, your mother and the old man, they think, because Myrddin ap Morfryn sometimes calls himself Myrddin Emrys and sometimes Myrddin Wyllt, he can be in two places at the same time; and they think — you know? — because in his fits he’s always talking about the air, that he can transport Arthur ab Uthyr and all his enchanted circus of horses and pretty ladies through that same air!

“Aye! Yes, you should have seen the solemn looks I got when she did wake meat last and told me about that crazy letter! She had one of her happiest moments, lad, just then; though of course she thinks of herself as one of the ‘three tragic women of Ynys Prydein!’”

“Who is it, up there?” Porius’s tone had become so irritable that Einion smiled with profound satisfaction.

“Only old Afagddu,” he jeered, “and Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch! Why do you look so grave at me? I tell you, I wouldn’t have pulled Medrawd out of our people’s hands for a cartload of gold if it had happened before I’d been to the Modrybedd. They sent for me. They knew everything. They hadn’t gone to bed. They’d got in touch with the druid. They’d persuaded him to revoke his first order. But they were very upset. They said the emperor would blot us out from the map of Ynys Prydein if that man didn’t return safe. So for once your mother and the Aunties said the same thing!

“Well! That being so, most grave and revered son, what in the name of the Virgin could I do? It was old Afagddu who took me to where they’d hid him. They caught Medrawd when the body disappeared. There’s something queer about that. They — the druid’s people, I mean — deny they took the body. None of them, as far as I can make out, ever identified it, though there was a corpse laid out in Saint Julian’s Fount.

“It was because they’ve not found the body that they let me have him — Medrawd, I mean — but no doubt Cunedda’s sword and the Modrybedd’s orders had something to do with it!

“Well! You’d better come with me and see this noble assassin. Afagddu won’t be content till you’ve given your mature blessing to my plan of campaign. So come along, only please don’t spoil your innocent dad’s half-wit scheme at the last moment by anything oversubtle!”

He continued talking in this nervous, half-rallying, and as far as his son was concerned altogether disconcerting manner, as they moved up the slope side by side.

Every now and then the prince paused to take breath; and whenever he did so Porius snatched the opportunity to swing round a little and survey the moonlit water. He had already discovered he could do this without breaking the thread of his father’s discourse. Oh, if only the wind would rise again!

For some reason — by one of those inexplicable chances that seemed to govern the movements of the power he worshipped beyond all the other elements — the wind had sunk to the faintest stir of air. Oh, how he longed for it to return in full strength! What there was of it was evidently still southwest, and if he associated the south with his father, he associated the southwest with Morfydd.

The girl had become, for reasons he could only partly understand, a particular favourite with the prince who had got into the habit, ever since her betrothal, of using her to coax any crucial piece of political or racial information he might particularly need out of his learned brother; while that sceptical traveller would doubtless be warned of any recrudescence of Christian fury.

It was Morfydd's brother who had spoilt the prince's delicate diplomatic adjustment between priest and druid. Morvran's rash habit of expressing his atheistic ideas to anybody who would listen, not to speak of his tendency to enter into philosophic disputes with all the intelligent visitors who came to Saint Julian's Fount, disturbed the whole balance of religion and politics in Edeyrnion.

Porius's natural restlessness of mind was accentuated just then by his brain's exhaustion. He began reverting to every detail of the ghastly story of Morvran's death. He asked himself for the thousandth time what he would have done if he'd known of the plot. Would he have interfered? Would he have thrown to the winds his submission to his mother and stood between those fanatical Brythons and their victim? Would his strength have been sufficient to snatch Morvran out of their hands?

Never once had Morfydd opened her lips about it to him and he had respected her silence. But sometimes he thought — but it was better not to think, not to think either of the lad's death nor of what happened afterwards to his body!

It began to seem to him as they climbed the ascent that the sword his father carried was a third person ascending that slope, a person who was alienated from both of them in that silence, a person who despised them both as traitors to the House of Cunedda.

The weariness of his mind and its desperate need of sleep began to extend itself to his body. If only the wind, any wind from any quarter, would rise to blow on those moonlit waters! There did seem some faint stir; else how could there be those ripples of silver, shining scales, glittering sequins, wavering dazzlements, shell-like glimmers?

But they were all deathly cold, and the path they followed led always to that same distorted moon shape. He felt as though that shape were labouring to be delivered of some disastrous and baleful offspring, the offspring of parents who ought never to have embraced.

"I must take care," he said to himself. "I'm used to feeling a fool and I'm used to doing what I'm told. But I'm not used to getting the horrors. There's something wrong with me tonight."

It was just as if the sigh that accompanied the articulation of this thought had brushed by chance against the sensitive tip of one of the great outstretched wings of that particular wind, fallen now into so deep a trance, that from childhood he had associated with the man at his side.

Ever since they had been ascending this hill one particularly tall and sombre fir tree had thrown a long tapering shadow upon the path they were following, but suddenly the head of this tall tree made, or was driven to make, a sweeping inclination towards them, the immediate result of which was that a single glitter of moonlight struck the elder man's naked blade, which itself was the colour of water, causing, as Porius saw clearly enough and not greatly to his comfort, the distorted shape of the moon herself, that unearthly creature searching for the place of her deliverance, to be reflected under his father's very hand.

But it was the south wind, and its coming redeemed the night! He felt it on the bare skin of his cheekbones. He felt it on the bare skin of his forehead below the rim of his ychen bannog cap. He felt it on the still barer skin of his dry lips. He felt it on the crucially drawn-out, sleep-sick attenuation of his overwrought brain. It flowed over him, round him, through him; it bathed him in a release such as that very moon would have enjoyed, had she suddenly been delivered of her burden, had she suddenly become a crescent again.

It did for him more than any sacred waters could do. Myrddin Wyllt was right to lay the burden of his prophecy upon the air. It was out of the air that those strange Coranians from beyond Germania, from beyond even Dinas Cystennin, gathered the whispers of their enemies and thus could never be conquered.

He too felt unconquerable now, felt for the first time since they had met a power in him strong enough to deal as an equal with this tall man holding the sword of Cunedda and smiling with those obscure smiles that flittered and fluttered, and advanced and retired, like treacherous golden snakes, amid the intricacies of his beard.

CHAPTER IX. The Emperor’s Nephew

FATHER AND SON arrived simultaneously and side by side at the top of the slope. Pushing their way between the lower branches of a circle of pines they emerged into an open clearing, or “llanerch”, as the forest people called these retreats, an enclosure which in this case was as large as the bishop’s church on the other side of Moel y Famau. Here they both looked cautiously round them, the one leaning on the handle of his naked sword, the other on the shaft of his spear.

Porius could recognize at once that he was in the presence of at least three men and at least one tall powerful horse. One of the men was seated on the ground with his back to a rock and his gaze — for he was leaning far back — fixed abstractedly on the gaps amid the treetops, from one to another of which the shapeless moon was patiently gliding. The two others, one old and ugly and one youthful and handsome, but both of them proud, suspicious, self-absorbed, withdrawn, were trying without much success to soothe a tall black mare with a white mark on her forehead resembling the letter “W.”

While his father moved across to the seated man and began respectfully addressing him Porius gave himself up to drawing into his lungs, and indeed into every crevice of his body and soul, this blessed wind from the south. He hadn’t missed the fact that the old man, always an enigmatic and lonely individual, who had constituted himself some twenty-five years ago, when he was still with Alarch the Fair, his personal preceptor and attendant, was anxious to have a word alone with him. He hadn’t missed the fact that the proud youth too was stealing hurried glances at him of intense curiosity and reverence, but at the moment he felt as shamelessly preoccupied with his own profane sensations as if he were a priest at the altar with the body and blood of his redeemer.

He felt as though the south wind had liberated him from both his cumbrous body and his exhausted mind. He felt that his soul could move happily and indolently from one object about him to another, and lose and find itself in all. He felt as though the essence of himself, the real Porius ab Einion, need never again be harassed by his own confused purposes or by his father's complicated caprices. Porius's soul, revealed by the magic of this wind to Porius in its true identity, felt as though it had become a medium for all the sensations of the human race. He slowly shifted his long spear to his left hand which already held the water flask, thus leaving his right hand free.

His immediate purpose in doing so was to greet the expectant old man now awaiting him by the side of the black horse. Nobody knew this old man's real name or why he had, a little while before Porius's birth, come in to the service of Einion ab Iddawc.

The erratic prince had accepted his services, as he accepted all the accidents of his life, with an airy and sardonic indifference; and before the man undertook the training of the little boy in the martial exercises his chief peculiarities had been his devoted attachment to Einion's sister Alarch and his extraordinary skill as a swineherd.

He had let it be known at Mynydd-y-Gaer that the disfigurement which gave him such shocking and startling ugliness — earning for him the nickname of Afagddu, after the hideous son of the great goddess Ceridwen — was due to his nose having been slit from top to bottom by the javelin of a Gwyddyl-Ffichti.

It was lucky for Porius now as he approached his ancient master in the art of war that the wind had come in time to recover him. He had never looked stronger, more competent, more resourceful, more ready to face his destiny. Thus as he approached Afagddu and shook him by the hand he could see, even in that uncertain light, that the man's hideous features were illuminated with pride, wonder, admiration.

Before letting the hand go the swineherd raised it to his lips with a gesture so courtly that it once more set our friend off on the question that had baffled the whole Gaer, as to who this old man really was and whence he had come.

Only once in his whole experience had Porius been given so much as a hint, and he had come to the conclusion that nobody in the Gaer, unless it were Einion himself, knew anything about it. The hint he had been given had come, as might be expected, from the Henog, for whom Afagddu had displayed from the moment of his first arrival an unconcealed distaste, a distaste so strong that on one occasion he had actually got up from the table and left the drinking when the Henog began to discourse.

Not that the Henog had been loquacious about him. All he had said was — and that was said in a puzzled, conjectural, meditative tone, as if he were thinking aloud— "No one really knows what became of Pendaran Dyfed," when asked, however, who this Pendaran Dyfed was, he had turned the question away with a pedantic jest.

But even while Afagddu was mumbling and perhaps even weeping over his hand Porius became aware that his newfound strength was already faced with no small test of its power to bear shocks. He had seen his father standing respectfully above the figure that crouched against the grey rock, and he knew that his own presentation to him was the point of discussion.

But it was not this that bothered him, nor the fact that the emperor’s nephew neither rose to his feet to greet him nor even so much as glanced in his direction. Long ago had the Aunties explained to him that the childlessness of the empress was due to miraculous intervention, since it necessitated a break with the Brythonic custom of primogeniture. Great honour was accorded to the heir to his throne, whoever he was, by both races, and he had the right to remain seated in the presence of all rulers and princes, save only consecrated bishops and crowned kings.

It was on the point as to who should succeed the emperor that the Brythons of the Gaer and the Modrybedd took such different views. The Modrybedd held strongly that the ancient tradition of the forest people ought to be followed in Britain, since they, if the mythical giants were excluded, had possessed the land from the beginning; and they held that, in making the queen barren, Destiny had clearly decided to break the recent father-to-son tradition and to substitute the older African or Iberian method, a method which receded back to the Golden Age of Matriarchy, when it was not the king’s son — for who could be absolutely sure of a child’s paternity? — but the king’s sister’s son who was the king’s heir, since none could deny to a woman the fruit of her own womb.

No, Porius felt nothing at that moment of the touchy Brythonic pride that had made him so annoyed with Rhun when that honest Mithraic miles went on talking to the stranger in the ferryboat heedless of the presence of Porius ab Einion ab Iddawc ab Edeyrn ap Cunedda.

But his new strength was in danger all the same, for he felt as if an abominable power were emanating from that figure under the moonlit rock whose upturned face was apparently listening with becoming attention to what the Prince of Edeyrnion was saying; nor could he explain to himself what it was that he felt. He allowed the devoted old swineherd to take from him both his spear and the Uriconium water bottle and place them beneath one of the monumental fir trunks that made that grove of trees resemble a pillared temple.

While he submitted to this and exchanged a few more words with the old man he became conscious of the fifth human presence among them, and along with it the form of a tall coal-black horse. Porius fancied he knew the youth with his arm through the horse's bridle, but they were both too much in the shadow for it to be possible to read his face.

Conscious that he was being looked at, the young man greeted him with a respectful inclination of his head but did not utter a sound. As for the black horse, which was not only tall but unusually strongly built, it showed evidence of extreme uneasiness, tossing its head, fidgeting with its ears, and even once or twice raising one of its hooves and stamping soundlessly on the tender hairlike grass which covered the generations of fir needles.

The old swineherd, named after the hideous son of the goddess, perceived Porius's exchange of greetings with the youth in the shadow and coming close up to him began whispering energetically in his ear.

Porius listened to him considerately, almost affectionately, giving his words just enough attention to gather that this boy had been chosen to help in guiding Medrawd back to the emperor at Caergwynt because he knew the way and the dangers of the way.

But all the while he was listening to Afagddu his eyes were fixed on Medrawd's upturned face, a face that he soon began to realize was as beautiful as the old swineherd's was hideous. God and Christ! What a difference there was between them! But it was not beauty or the lack of it that was troubling him now and causing him to listen with only half an ear to Afagddu's murmurings. Had the face under the grey rock been the swineherd’s, and the face so near his own been that of the heir to the throne of Britain, it would have been the same. Faces were nothing!

As Pelagius taught, it was all in the soul, and all souls were equal, and all souls had power over themselves to be good or bad; not absolute power of course, for neither gods nor demons had that, but power enough.

But the wind was bringing up a filmy cloud or two now, and there was no more than a pale diffused light over the grey rock and a pale diffused light over old Afagddu, so that under this chance-brought, chance-wrought, magical equalization both these human faces were transformed into that oblong blur of unearthly whiteness, ageless, sexless, tribeless, without class, or name, or number, or nation, that is the eidolon of Homo sapiens beneath the moon.

Porius was struggling, he knew well enough, against a power as inimical to him as was that of Minnawc Gorsant the priest. “My brain’s too tired,” he said to himself, “to think this out now. All I can do now is not to be seduced by this handsome devil!”

“Are you sure you’ll be able yourself to stand a journey like this,” he said gently to Afagddu, “even if he,” he nodded towards the youth with the black horse, “has such an instinct for the right way? And listen, my friend. If there’s anything I can lend you — I haven’t got my knife; I gave it to that lad Mabsant — but if there’s anything else—”

But Afagddu had come nearer to him and was murmuring what Porius knew well enough to be the laboured prelude of what the old gentleman regarded as a staggering if not a positively unholy request. Along with the smell of his clothes, which so closely resembled long-dried pine-wood resin that contact with him might have been contact with any of the tree trunks around them, there emerged from that blur of androgynous anonymity a series of gasped-out words, breathed so low as to be almost inarticulate.

He had never heard this self-appointed slave of the House of Cunedda whisper like this before. As a rule his whispers were peculiarly high-pitched, more like gusts through arrow-slit windows than murmurs in sea shells; and it gave him a feeling of something uncommonly like shame as he began to gather the drift of the old man's communication.

But while he heard these unfamiliar sounds with one ear, Porius was vainly endeavouring to catch something of what his father was saying to that other white blur beneath the now darkened rock. And there was another voice too, that of his own exhausted brain, stretched out once more like a quivering gut string, and whispering, "I want sleep! I want sleep!"

But at last he did grasp what the old man was telling him, namely, that Prince Einion had not yet given him any personal token to bear witness to his identity and to his right to represent the chief of their tribe in the presence of alien or hostile interference.

He straightened himself at once, gripped the swineherd's wrist reassuringly, and without a word went across to the figures by the rock. There he snatched off his cap, bowed ceremoniously to the seated man, apologized for interrupting them, murmured something about the headgear in his hand, felt an unpardonable impulse to flick with it that hay-scented beard that now again brushed his face, and demanded in a whisper from the ruler of Meirion and Edeyrnion and Arwystli and Ardudwy and Mawddwy something that would be more impressive than even an ychen bannog cap, something that would be accepted by all stray Brythons and most forest people as unquestionable proof of loyalty and good faith.

The tall man made a polite apology to Medrawd and murmured at once an affable assent to his son's anxious words. "I know how you're smiling, though," thought Porius, "and I know you're thinking I'm a fussy fool!" Indeed he could see, just as if the moon had been bright and full, the subtle Iberian mockery that was flitting across those massive Brythonic features as the chieftain began easily and negligently complying with his son's request.

As unceremoniously as if it had been a spade or a pitchfork he thrust the sword of Cunedda into the earth. The white blur that was the face of Medrawd ap Llew might have contained no eyes at all so immovable did it remain, but Porius as he waited noted every one of his father's movements.

It was clear that the way the ancestral weapon sank into the earth — the man's first thought must have been simply to free his hands — gave Einion some special and peculiar pleasure. Through the grey rootless lichen, through the soft green moss, through the thick resilient floor of generations of pine needles, bleached and brown from many winters yet able still at this autumnal recession to supply nourishment for fungoid growths of incredible design, sank the great sword!

Porius watched him with amazement. Some irresistible vein of pure childishness seemed uppermost at that moment in this bearded man who had begotten him thirty years ago. Was he playing at plunging his blade into the bosom of the earth mother? That he should amuse himself thus at this moment of all moments... but Porius knew him. This was what he was, what he always had been.

With the naked symbol of their tribe in his hand and the heir to the throne of Britain by his side, and, for all he knew, thousands of poisoned arrows ready to be loosed from thousands of strung bows at the first sign of dawn, what must this grown-up infant do but amuse himself by leaning his full weight on the sword's cross handle just to see how deeply he could bury the blade!

But presently there was an ominous jerk and the chieftain, staggering forward over the handle of his loosened weapon, only saved himself from a fall by contact with one of his son's broad shoulders. Cursing and laughing he pulled out the blade and in the darkness felt its point. “Broken!” he muttered. “It must have hit a rock. Feel it, for Christ’s sake, boy!”

He held the weapon upright between them as it was the custom at Mynydd-y-Gaer for the priest to hold it when the prince lies dead and his son succeeds him; and Porius took the broken point between his fingers and felt it with his thumb. Yes, the extreme point was chipped off. How violently the man must have dug into the earth!

“It can be hammered into shape again as sharp as ever,” Porius muttered aloud. “Uncle Brochvael’s Gwrgi used to work an anvil. He’ll have to lend him to us for a week.” But he thought in his heart, “You’ll hang it up in its old place in the banquet hall and drown the bad luck in mead, and never let Gwrgi come near it!”

“And now,” he whispered almost peevishly, “for heaven’s sake give me something for Afagddu.”

Einion reversed the great blade and plunged its broken point again into the ground. Then he began fumbling beneath his beard. He appeared to have some difficulty in loosening the collar of his tunic and undoing the clasp of his woollen shirt; but it was done at last, and Porius, who could almost see his mocking smile, knew what this fumbling implied, for it was common knowledge at the Gaer that their chief wore more than one love token round his neck.

Porius felt weary and miserable. What a moment for an attack from the rebels, if there were rebels round them! He was certain that the emperor’s nephew was watching them both with his cold stare, and he was tempted to make a hurried clutch at his father’s hand and stop him before he did anything irretrievable.

“But what’s it to me,” he thought, “what he does? What’s it to me what he gives Afagddu? Oh, for God’s sake give me something for him and have done with it! Give me something they all know you wear!”

The chieftain unclasped a massive silver chain on which was hung a rough cross, carved after the Gwyddyl-Ffichti fashion. This he proceeded to swing to and fro in the air between them, very much as a parent might swing some glittering toy to amuse or tantalize an infant.

“He’s chosen Kymeinvoll’s chain,” said Porius to himself. “So that’s the one he can best spare — Morfydd’s mother’s. Well! So be it. That will certainly overawe any of the Gwyddyl-Ffichti who meddles with them. That’s probably just what he had in his mind. He’s at his shrewdest when you think he’s silliest. What a man for a person to have as his father!”

“Brochvael will be relieved it’s off my neck!” Einion muttered, and his voice had such mischief in it that it lifted his tone to something louder than a whisper. “Your mother always swore she wasn’t jealous of my wearing it, but that she couldn’t like my doing so because it was such an unlucky thing to do! I tell her it’s Alarch’s gold chain that’s the unlucky one! Yes, my grave son, make no mistake! It’s your foster-mother’s trinket that’s the danger, the lovely Alarch’s! God! How the gold one and the silver one hated each other! They’ll be glad to be parted — no more wet with the same man’s sweat. Well! Give me your cap!”

Thus speaking he took the sacred ychen bannog cap from his son, squeezed it into a roll with all his strength, twisted the silver chain tightly round it, leaving the Gwyddyl-Ffichti cross with its obscure inscription swinging from the little bundle, and handed it back to Porius with an audible laugh. “Now you and your Afagddu can be satisfied!”

But Porius did not even thank him. He held the little bundle in his fingers, pressing it against his ribs. He felt at the lowest ebb of his endurance. Even the south wind itself had dropped. It had deserted him. Its farewell sigh in the branches above them gave him no comfort. He felt as if he could burst into unmanly tears. Nobody but this man, nothing but his particular kind of mockery, could bring him so low.

“Well, silent one,” the chieftain said, drawing the chipped sword negligently from the earth and rising to his full height, “I must leave you now. I’ve got to go back to the Modrybedd. None of the three of them will have slept tonight. But they’ll know by this time, I’ve no doubt, whether Gogfran Derwydd will raise the cry at dawn on this nineteenth of October, four hundred and ninety-nine, or whether he will forbear! The Modrybedd thought he would forbear when I last saw them; but they’ve probably changed their opinion, and very likely he’s done the same! You’ll be sleeping in Brother John’s cell, I take it — eh? And you’ve left Rhun with the counsellor’s ladies? Very good. Most satisfactory. You have played at fate, my grave son, you have played hard at fate, and you have won! I bow to you as a successful player. Well! Sleep sound, my child, and remember that the heart’s the heaviest piece of luggage; and in these days we’ve got to travel light!”

Porius nodded grimly. He couldn’t trust himself to speak. His father’s power of humiliating him and making him feel a romantic imbecile had never been exerted more successfully. If he’d known for certain they’d both be dead before the dawn he couldn’t have uttered a sound. He watched the tall man bend the knee to Medrawd. He watched him lift the hilt of his sword to them all. He watched him leave the shelter of the fir trees and mount the hill in the direction contrary to that which led to the tent of Gwendydd. He watched him till a promontory of firs hid him totally from sight.

Then with a vague and weary inclination of his head in the direction of Medrawd as if to ask permission to defer his own farewell for a minute, he carried his double token, the cap of extinct oxskin and the Gwyddyl-Ffichti cross, to where old Afagddu and his watchful assistant were soothing their impatient black steed and making him ready to be mounted by this murderous heir to the throne of Britain.

“If I don’t get soon to Brother John’s,” he said to himself, while a couple of new thoughts, alighting on that taut bowstring that was his mind, pecked at it from opposite directions, “I shall go crazy.”

The first of these thoughts was an outrageous one, but just then it caused him pleasure rather than pain. It had to do with a scandal that had been current at the Gaer for years, the rumour, namely, that Einion ab Iddawc was the lover of Brochvael’s wife.

What then if Morfydd were his half-sister? He was neither shocked by this idea nor ashamed of not being shocked. He had brooded at intervals on this dark and riddling speculation ever since his public betrothal, and at this moment the idea of it gave him for some inexplicable reason a curious satisfaction.

But the second thought that twitched at that vibrating string was his remembrance of what he’d noted of his father’s farewell to that man under the rock.

Einion ab Iddawc had dropped on one knee before the seated man and had bowed his head. That much was clear; that much was natural and proper. But there may have been, he now felt, something else; only his own concern with the rustling of the branches by the twice-blessed south wind had prevented his being sure.

It was this second raven’s wing of ominous doubt that spoilt his pleasure in old Afagddu’s delight as he now proceeded to give him the double token. Afagddu’s disfigured countenance — though where they stood by the black horse there seemed no moonlight at all — conveyed the impression to Porius that it was positively illuminated by gratitude and reverence as the old man put away the cap and chain in some hidden recess next his skin.

But Porius knew him so well that his imagination could have filled out the hollows, and his tenderness could have smoothed away the ridges in every portion of that familiar face, even if they had met in complete darkness. Moved by an impulse that was probably not entirely single hearted even if it were not merely the expression of a revolt in him against the mocking and cynical tone adopted by his father, he impulsively sealed his alliance with Medrawd's guide by a filial kiss; and with that, picking up his hunting spear and his Roman water flask, he strode across to the crouching figure beneath the rock, and coldly but politely making the customary obeisance, bade him adieu. But he left the man with that sinister doubt still tormenting his mind. Had the Prince of Edeyrnion actually done what his son's instinct hardly dared to formulate? Had he really taken that murderer's two hands and folded them above his own upon the man's thigh?

If he had — well! the grandson of Edeyrn the son of Cunedda had paid the homage of a Brythonic prince to the crowned King of all the Brythons, the homage that was the exclusive right of the emperor alone!

But whatever Einion had done he was gone now; and Medrawd, mounted now upon the black horse with that young man holding the bridle and old Afagddu striding in front, was gone too, and what was to be would be! Weary and sick in heart and brain, he now moved slowly down the slope towards the Fountain of Saint Julian. His mind as he went down the hill was obsessed by what he had seen of the emperor's nephew at that final moment.

He himself at any rate had not offered the man a jot or a tittle more of respect than was the due of so near a relative of Arthur; but, as he did what he did, the moon had shone full upon the man's face, and for the first time in his life he knew the authentic shudder of supernatural terror.

The expression in Medrawd's face, and it was the most beautiful face he had ever seen, had been absolutely terrifying! The man had a look that ought not, no! not by the inherent nature of things, to be seen on the countenance of any man born of woman! It wasn't that it was an especially cruel look; far less that it was an especially savage look. It wasn't that it was a look of diabolical craft. There may have been elements of all these things in it, but neither Porius's insatiable mind nor his clumsy Herculean body had the kind of sensitiveness that would have been especially outraged by either cruelty or cunning. No, no! As the son of Einion ab Iddawc came slowly down that characteristic Edeyrnion hillside, with its grey rocks, its yellow-brown, reddish purple bracken, dying or dead, its emerald green mosses, its saffron bog grass, all of them bloodsucked into a metallic shimmer by that unshapely moon, he felt that he had caught on Medrawd's face a look that was much more appalling.

It was neither his mind nor his body that was hit by what he'd seen; it was his soul. It had given him a shiver of what might be called psychic gooseflesh. And it excited in him a horrible kind of pity.

As he pushed his way through the stalks of the dying bracken, and every now and then clutched both the objects he carried with a hurting intensity, there came into his mind a rough clumsily painted Byzantine picture that hung in his mother's bedchamber. It was a picture of the infant Jesus playing with a snake. The little Jesus, a comically plump babe, was lovingly and obstinately thwarting the one supreme desire of his dangerous plaything, the desire to escape. This desire had smouldered into such a recoil of tragic desperation that even as a boy Porius had read in the one small saurian eye which alone was visible the shuddering resolve, sooner than not to escape, to drag the world's hope of redemption down with him!

"It wants to escape," Porius said to himself as he shifted the Roman bottle to his left hand and grasped the spear with his right. "It wants to escape into Nothingness; and if God won't let him, he's ready to drag Creation down with him!"

Porius felt just then as if the pressure of his fingers upon these two things were sulky and obstinate questions, addressed to the wind in his face and to the cordlike stalks of the bracken that caught at his feet. From the wind he would have liked to know whether his father had done homage to Medrawd, and from the bracken whether he himself was just being wicked in his present sympathy with the serpent in his mother's picture.

Perhaps it was the rounded-off and final completeness of the Holy Family in this picture, surrounded by a triple circle of golden light, that stirred the blood within him such a blind, deep rush of revolt against that infant with the snake.

"It wants to escape," he repeated to himself, as he shifted the Roman bottle to his left hand and grasped the spear with his right. "It wants to escape into Nothingness or else to drag everything down with it!"

And as he walked round the edge of that marshy expanse of water towards Brother John's solidly built cell, and noticed no sign of those trestles in the Fountain to which Myrddin Wyllt had referred, far less any sign of a dead body, he actually found himself playing with a profane sympathy for his father's gesture of homage.

"If Medrawd," he said to himself, "had only seen old Rhun's image of the Time snake twisted round Cronos, and had heard the Henog conjuring with its tail and Myrddin with its head, he'd have had some cause for his look!"

Then suddenly a craving sprang up in Porius that felt to him like a craving in the very pit of his stomach, the vain and useless wish that he had been born soon enough, or that she had lived long enough, for him to have actually seen in the flesh his grandfather's mother, Creiddylad.

"I warrant," he thought, "when she gave suck to Iddawc the Apostate she taught him some old Cader Idris trick of lifting this jealous past and crazy future off their feet while you hugged the present!"

He was moving more awkwardly now that he was upon level ground. His enormous weight caused his feet as well as the butt of the heavy spear upon which he leaned to sink deep into the wet mud that stretched for some distance all round Saint Julian's Fountain. The simultaneous sinking at this particular moment of both his feet and his spear in that evil-smelling sticky blackness was an occurrence that annoyed him out of all proportion. The mental agitation to which he had been subjected for so many consecutive hours seemed to have sucked the natural resilience from every muscle in his body.

"I want sleep!" cried his neck, his arms, his thighs, his legs, his hands, his knees, in a general chorus. And taking advantage of this conspiracy in his soul's praetorian guard all manner of demon intruders began to invade his spirit's citadel.

Supposing his father had really made the traditional gesture of homage, did that mean he must refuse to send any Brythonic warriors to help the emperor if they weren't placed under the direct command of this sinister heir?

Nothing in the world did Porius find more difficult than the niceties of social and political discretion. These things from boyhood had bothered, perplexed, and infuriated him. The Gwyddyl-Ffichti mother of Morfydd had been always having savage quarrels with Rhun's mother over such matters.

All Gwyddyl-Ffichti women made much of ritual and ceremony, whereas Alarch ferch Iddawc resembled her brother Brochvael in contempt for such things. At that moment, with his feet in wet mud, with cold hollow reeds swishing against his knees, with the spear and bottle weighing him down, the intrigues of Arthur's court seemed intolerable. "I must get a breath of wind," he muttered aloud. "I must get a breath of wind, or I can't stand it."

Only a few times in all his life had Porius talked aloud to himself like this. He certainly was at a low ebb. "I've got to do something," he said to himself. "Medrawd must have put a tynged on me, or Myrddin Wyllt is turning me into an 'Avanc!'" This last notion tickled his fancy a good deal, for tales about this fabulous creature were constantly passing from one Auntie to another among the Modrybedd, and he imagined himself when the transformation was complete, dragging his monstrous and scaly bulk — he felt like it now! — through the cracking and crashing branches of the forest till he came to the rocks above the little group of houses and huts round the old marketplace and the new church of the place which Gorsant the priest insisted on calling "Corwen." Beyond Ty Cerrig and beyond Ogof-y-Gawr was the Cave of the Avanc, a hiding place that had been appropriated by a mysterious wanderer under the protection of the Modrybedd. It amused him to wonder what this disinherited traveller would do at the sudden reappearance of the Cave's primal owner!

The idea of Ty Cerrig and of Brochvael and his books made him think of Pelagius. "What would he do," he said to himself, "caught in a swamp like this at the lowest ebb of a night like this? Do philosophers ever practise their ideas when brute matter's got them by the throat? What would Pelagius do? Would he imagine himself free till he was free?"

Porius set himself to imagine himself liberated from this bog, not by a desperate effort of will, nor by a frantic confession of human frailty, but in what Brother John insisted was the true Pelagian method; by letting his soul imagine his rescue by his friend, the south wind, the wind that came from Cader Idris!

Using therefore his whole exhausted being, from his mud-caked hunting shoes to the top of his bare head, as a living bowstring he imagined himself, as vividly as he could, sending his soul like a released arrow towards the mountain; and with a sigh of relief waited the result.

And the result came. Whether its coming had in reality antedated this gesture of his imagination he refrained from asking himself; but the wind he prayed for, or prayed to, or simply aroused by a motion of his own soul, certainly did come. Very soon as it blew upon him, befogged, bewildered, and bedevilled though he was, his natural force began to return.

And it was not only from the huge upshrugged shoulders of Cader Idris that it came. It came from beyond the waters of Lake Tegid, from beyond the birthplace of the sacred river, from beyond the sand dunes of Harlech. It came from the vast sea that no ship has ever crossed since the sinking of Atlantis. Huge swirling moonlit waves, undulating up and down and carrying with them seaweeds and sea creatures from the rocks of Carbonek and the caverns of Caer Sidi, were giving it its power.

Phantasmal eidola of colossal ruins, white with sea brine, sea spindrift, and sea scum, and lit by glimmerings of phosphorus in the waste of waters that rolled above Lost Atlantis, let their buried mystery loose upon this wind! Nor was it only from mountain summit and ocean ooze that the wind reached him.

He felt it had searched out the deepest hiding places of the giant-children of the Cader; that it had descended into dried-up tarns and lakes and hollow caverns under forgotten cairns; that it had actually gathered into itself, into its very substance, the dust of the bones of the race whose blood was his blood!

"I can't understand it," he thought. "My mind's tired out, my body's crying for sleep, and yet my soul can shoot off to the ends of the earth and bring back miracles. Pelagius is right. Man's imagination and not God's will is what creates."

Quite easily now he pulled his feet out of the mud, and forcing his way through the reeds, reached the outer wall of Brother John's cell. The wall was of no very great height but it was majestic in its blank, unbroken austerity, and in the manner in which it rose from the mass of reeds.

Whether it was the new strength he had drawn into his deepest being from the wind's response, or whether it was that his craving for sleep made the sight of Brother John's habitation seem like a haven after stormy seas, Porius derived indescribable satisfaction from the mere appearance of that unbroken wall. "It comes straight out of the reeds," he said to himself. "The reeds can't keep it back!"

And his mind began drowsily and dimly — just as if he was beginning to go to sleep in a standing position — to think of that smooth windowless wall as his grandfather's Rome, and of the swaying reeds beneath it as the wayward forest dwellers it strove to control.

But suddenly all his sleepiness left him and his whole body grew taut. He was convinced he'd heard the sound between himself and that grey wall of the breathing of a man. It was too late to retreat even if he had dared to turn his back. He had a most unpleasant sensation, the sensation that a pair of unseen arms were aiming an arrow at him, an arrow dipped in the most deadly of all the poisons known to the forest people.

He jerked his spear out of the mud, but what he lifted as a weapon at that moment was not the spear but the Roman bottle. Two men, both somewhat stout and both very short, and each as he had suspected with bowstring drawn, leapt up from where they'd been concealed, and in absolute silence, without a cry or a word or a glance towards him, bolted off through the reeds in the direction of the nearest brushwood.

Porius drew a deep breath of limitless relief. "Druid's men!" he said to himself. And then, as he went slowly forward towards that blank wall, "Druid's men!" he repeated, not uttering the syllables aloud but articulating them to himself with childish satisfaction. He was beyond smiling but he could feel a particular muscle in his face twitching with excited amusement.

The truth was the sight of those two men fulfilled a deep craving within him. These people were the true natives, they and the Ffichti, and the giants; and oh, how satisfactory to see them bewilder and confound both their Roman and Brython conquerors!

What other race could do such a thing? A wrong had been done their druid — perhaps only had been rumoured to have been done, for he himself doubted whether Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd was dead — and though the wrong-doer might be heir to the Emperor Arthur, and though the greatest magician in Britain was among them with the pick of Arthur's horsemen, it was a throw of the dice whether these proud invaders would ever see Caergwynt or Caerleon again!

Aye! But it pleased him to think of these great ones being surrounded by poisoned arrows! It pleased him to know that they would always surround — yes! by day or night, by sun or moon, by land or water, by moor or mountain, with their precipitate arrows and still more precipitate magic — any intruders of whatever race, power, position, authority, who dared to approach their Fisher King's Fount, or touch with alien hooves and heels their sacred mounds of ancient ghosts.

He began to murmur aloud now, in an audible voice, the traditional and totally unintelligible words of the Fisher King's mystic chant. He did this deliberately, thinking as he did so: "This'll save me from dying howling under their druid's poison!"

But all the same he felt gay with a primordial gaiety that turned that mud and those reeds into objects whose mere existence on the earth was enough to justify the whole tragicomedy of life. Then the moment passed, and as he strode forward to that blank wall, his mind began playing again its old recessional tricks.

Who was he, who had the blood of the lonely cave dwellers of Eryri and Cader, to make so much of their pygmy successors? Who was he, who had shared the honey of the sun god with the white hound and become the covenanted comrade of that Greek's grandson, to glory in a people who had let their women be raped by the Gwyddyl-Ffichti? Had he not learnt at the Bishop's School to despise these little brothers of the foxes and eagles and deer and salmon, with their gorsedds of ghosts and their secret druids and their devilries from Africa?

The moment had passed. But what he had felt he had felt. The Henog was right there! No fluctuant and indetermined future could change what had been; though it could change the result of what had been. And how silently those two shooters of poisoned arrows had vanished! Like wisps of vapour they'd gone, and the forest without a sign or a sound had swallowed them up!

But he was under the wall now, and he couldn't help wondering how on earth Saint Julian ever got people to carry these huge stones to this spot, and when he got them here how he managed to sink their foundation in this mud. The masonry of the wall as he reached it now looked indeed far older than it could possibly have been if Saint Julian really built it. So old did it look that he began to wonder if the saint had not found it there and just appropriated it! Mud, lichen, moss, ferns, reeds, and ancient alder stumps pressed against it on every side. Unnumbered generations of dead leaves, secular death piled upon secular death, gave to the black pools between the rushes a strange, rich, foul smell, evilly sweet, lecherously drugging, and sinking down into the pit of Porius's stomach as his feet sank down into that moonlit mud.

The stones of Brother John's cell descended straight and deep into that same black mud, and when Porius reached them, the spear clenched in one hand and the water bottle in the other, and touched them with his cold knuckles, it was a rough, blind expanse of stone he touched, where miniature armies of moss and tiny ferns and little round-leaved trailing plants and squadrons of grey lichen seemed in league with the swamp and the forest in their slow tireless vegetative determination to go on invading this solitary outpost of human civilization until they had swallowed it up.

His exhaustion, both mental and physical, began to return now as he leaned forward with his knuckles pressed against that mossy stonework. A weird fear assailed him lest this whole place, with all its surroundings and with himself bending forward over his spear and his bottle, should be carried down into some faintly lit, greenish black underworld, where one illusion melted into another illusion and where all definite shapes and all definite thoughts shifted and shimmered and waxed and waned in a phantasmagoric mist.

He was aroused by the neighing of a horse oh the further side of the building, a sound that was responded to by a similar neighing at some distance to his right. "I pray Brother John's cell's unbarred," he thought. "And I pray he'll be too sleepy to do more than greet me. I shall certainly be too sleepy to want anything to eat."

He moved back from the wall and straightened his body. Then he dragged his feet out of the wet mud; and lowering his head a little while he kept his shoulders erect, he plodded resolutely round the angle of the edifice. He soon found himself on the familiar pavement of flat stones in front of the cell. The entrance was so low and narrow between the huge slab of the lintel and the huge slab of the threshold that a full-sized man had to squeeze himself through it.

Thank the Lord! The small inner door of oak, so old that it had become black, yielded at once to his pressure; and there he was, safe once more in that spacious low room, the room he knew best in all the world save his own bedchamber in the eastern wall of Mynydd-y-Gaer! He could straighten his back now, though the roof was only a few inches above his head; and he could chuckle too and relax all the muscles of mind, body, and soul, and groan and laugh and weep and in fact be himself to the limit, as he could be nowhere else in the whole wide world; no, not even in Mynydd-y-Gaer.

There was a small yellow flame flickering from a blackened wick floating in oil in an earthen bowl above Brother John's sleeping place. This was a bracken-stuffed mattress raised above the floor and resting on a number of wooden blocks and covered with a couple of sheepskins whose unbleached wool, apparently left just as it was when the sheep were killed, may have been the cause of the curiously pleasant and yet curiously unpleasant smell that from boyhood Porius associated with the Brother's presence.

The old man's eyes were open, and Porius sank down at once on his knees before his teacher and seized his hand. He was piously kissing it when he realized how exhausted the old man was. It seemed to be with difficulty that the hermit hoisted himself up on his elbow to give his pupil his blessing, and as he sank down again the life-weary expression in his face as that small flame flickered upon his eye sockets alarmed his visitor.

"Are you all right, Brother John?"

"Of course I'm all right, foolish one. It's you who're at the end of your rope! I've never seen you so done for, and your legs are soaking wet. How's the fire going? Better put more wood on!"

Porius rose, went obediently to the further end of the room, stirred the fire with a charred stick, threw on a fresh log, and returned to the old man's side.

"There is some wine and some—" began the recluse feebly, but Porius cut him short. "You go to sleep, Master of my soul! I don't want anything to eat or to drink. I'll just take off my shoes and stockings and I'll be asleep as soon as you are. No, no! I don't want anything. If I did I'd know where to get it. All I want is to sleep. Good night, Brother John!"

"Good night, my dear son!"

Porius had already noticed the empty couch so carefully and neatly prepared for him on the right-hand side of the fireplace, and very soon after a perfunctory and customary prayer to repeat which he fell on his knees by the fire and pressed his hands against the wall, he gave himself up to the not very easy task of unlacing his boots and leggings. When this was done he dragged off his tunic and belt and hung them on an iron bar. Then rolling himself up luxuriously on the blankets which had been prepared for him, he let his head sink down with delicious gratitude upon what he knew must have been a special pillow reserved for visitors, so dainty was it with its silken edges, and so soft with its wild-goose feathers.

"How long," he pondered as he sank down into what seemed a barge of swans-down, rocking on the waves of the Bosporus, "how long do goose feathers stay sweet? Perhaps Pelagius had these very ones under his head when he lay in this cell.” He felt blissfully sad that the enchantment of this divine moment could not go on longer, and he tried to prolong it without changing it.

He watched the flickering glow of the fire upon the stone wall beside him. He watched the smoke whirling in spiral curves under the black crossbeams that supported the roof, and finally escaping through the two deep window slits above Brother John’s head. It came intermittently in irregular gusts as some particular one of the older logs gave up the ghost and some less charred one burst into fresh flame.

He began considering vaguely what line of argument Brother John would advise him to take with Anastasius when his voyage with Dion Dionides was over, and he felt as if these spirals of smoke were moonlit ripples moving from one shore of the Hellespont to the other.

For a passing moment he was jerked back to reality by a broken catch in the old man’s breathing when some wisp of the escaping smoke crossed his face; and as he watched the small yellow flame from the oil wick at his side fall upon that hooked nose, that low bulbous forehead, that long sinewy neck, and heard a sound as if the old man were masticating the smoke with a curious gusto, there came into his mind a question he used to ask himself as a boy about the Grecian prince who embraced a cloud!

Could a man with the blood of the giants in him embrace air, water, and fire as though they were a cloud, and embrace them without ravishing or devouring any beautiful goddess, as he was accustomed to do with the elements in what he called his “cavoseniargizing?”

But the cloud that he was embracing now, the cloud made up of the life of that little yellow flame, the life of that fragrant woodsmoke, the life of the goose feathers in the pillow of Pelagius, was beginning to take a shape that had neither Morfydd’s arms nor his mother’s breasts. To his waking reason such a vision would have been monstrous, but as his limbs relaxed and his mind dissolved into quiescence he derived no shame but rather a luxurious, though not exactly a voluptuous pleasure from embracing the great Myrddin Wyllt himself, while the emperor’s nephew in the form of a small snake, with infinite gratitude in its Saurian eyes, melted into a stubble-coloured mist.

CHAPTER X. Brochvael

TY CERRIG, OR the Stone House, had been fully and somewhat painfully awake long before the first glow of the risen sun struck the watchtower of Mynydd-y-Gaer on the opposite height.

Even now the sun would have to be quite high in the heaven before its beams lit up the dwelling of Brochvael ab Iddawc or warmed the heart of that learned traveller's daughter; and there would soon come a season when, with its still shorter winter arches, it sank down behind Cader Idris without touching the Stone House at all.

Though two years younger than Einion, Brochvael looked at least ten years older as he now sat with an open book before him as was his wont when he broke his fast. He sat in his library by a large log fire in his usual place; and the chair, whose massive uncarved arms, oaken seat, and straight back had been rendered more comfortable for his gaunt figure by sheepskins of undyed wool, looked as it always did to his daughter when she entered the chamber as if it were an integral part of his person.

She herself was carrying in both hands her own morning meal which was a mixture of hot milk and barley cake.

He looked up when she entered and pushed his table a few inches nearer the other side of the fire where there was a horse block covered with an embroidered cushion. "Gwrgi not back yet, eh?" he enquired wearily; and then, before she had time to answer, "Sit down, child," he added, "you look worn out."

"Do I?" she said, making the particular movement with her mouth that was her usual substitute for a smile; but as soon as she was seated opposite him and had put her spoon into the steaming bowl she looked at him sharply. “You’re surely going to eat more than that?”

He glanced wryly at the dish of minced mutton that had gone cold, and breaking in half one of the small round loaves in the centre of the table which he had been meticulously arranging in a neat circle, he hurriedly began picking out little gobbets of breadcrumb from each segment, dipping them in his flagon of the red Arvernian wine, and masticating them with the air of a person appeasing gnawing hunger.

When Morfydd frowned the whole of the upper part of her face went through a convulsion of minute unexpected lines, and this happened now. “You don’t imagine you can last till hora decima on bread and wine? And there may not be any hora decima or hora undecima either. Nobody knows what’s going to happen today. By tonight we may be groping through Gwyddylgwern with Arthur’s horsemen after us and the Modrybedd’s druid throwing the same sort of mist on us as Caswallawn threw on the Seven Horsemen when he murdered Cradawc ap Bran!”

“Get on then yourself, child, with your bread-and-milk!”

The girl sighed and obeyed, but the frown did not leave her face, and through her narrowed eyelids and through the steam that rose from her bowl and spoon she continued to stare sadly at the grotesque motions of her father’s jaws.

The man had once fallen, in his reckless search for books, into an Ostrogothic prison in Italy, where for every day he had refused to reveal the hiding place of his Byzantine guide they had gouged out a tooth; and Morfydd never felt tenderer to him than when he made those faces. It was as if his whole skull were at work.

Brochvael’s library was a low arched chamber with arrow-slit windows in both walls at right angles to the entrance arch, which was narrow and low, and also to the fire whose smoke on a windless morning formed itself into twisting curves and feathery wisps above their heads, but when the wind was east departed in serpentine coils out of the west window and when west out of the other.

Save his own chair and his daughter's cushioned horse block which stood beneath a projection of stone against which she could lean when so inclined, the only piece of furniture was an old Etruscan couch, hardly two feet wide but very long, for which Brochvael had paid more gold pieces than he now cared to remember.

Here Morfydd would spend many an hour lying on her back reading, while Canna ferch Glam, who in her moods and her furies called herself gwrach-y-gogledd, or "witch of the north," and who had helped out at the birth of both Morfydd and Morvran, worked in the kitchen or scrubbed the floor of Morfydd's room upstairs.

The old man had already swallowed the inside of three barley loaves, and the girl had tilted into her mouth the last drops from the milk bowl, when she suddenly enquired in a low clear voice, but with a casual inflexion as if it were careless thought: "Gwrgi heard no more up at the Gaer last night?"

"Not a word! Euronwy told him herself she'd heard nothing; nothing since Drudwyn came back with the boy. They were both in that tent then. That's all we know."

"Father, listen! Do you think the prince went back to the Gaer after you left him? Or do you think he stayed all night with the Modrybedd?"

He finished his wine slowly, staring at her over the heavy goblet before replying. But she left her stool and came round to his side. "Shall I fetch you half a flagon more?"

"No, no, child! I must keep my wits clear for, as you say, we don't know from hour to hour what's going to happen. I feel sorry for Euronwy."

"I don't!"

He put his arm round her and she balanced herself on his chair's edge. But in spite of these intimacies his voice was troubled. "I wish I knew what's really in your heart when you say a thing like that."

"Just what I say! I hate Euronwy."

"Morfydd!"

"Well, I do. What's the use of giving a person a thing, and then, the moment you remember how nice it is to have it, snatching it back? What's the use of that, Father?"

Brochvael stared at her for a second and then caught her meaning. She was thinking of her betrothed. "How can you say such things, and today of all days, when we don't know what's happened to them?"

"To them?"

"Uncle Einion should be over there looking for them, making sure they're all right and that Brother John's all right and that those silly courtiers with their lancings and prancings haven't done any more harm." He tightened his hold. "I like you, little one, extraordinarily well when you mock at young men; but I don't like your bitterness over her up there. What has that unhappy woman got except this great hulking man of yours? He's flesh and bone of hers, and you two aren't even man and wife yet! It's cruel of you not to understand. I tell you she has nobody else. No, no! I know" — this was in answer to the impatient movement with which she would have slipped out of his grasp— "I know what you're going to say — that she has her father as you've yours; but girl, girl! Fathers cannot, in the nature of things, be the same as mothers. You're the fruit of my seed; but that boy of yours—"

She did escape now and standing erect before him gave him a long, steady, desperate look out of eyes which as she stared darkened before him till they became as black as pine-wood ashes. “I — sometimes — wonder —” she began in a curiously deliberate manner, “if I—”

“Mistress! Mistress! Come quick! Here’s Gwrgi running!” It was the gwrach-y-gogledd in the curtained doorway, and the girl flew round the table and was at her side before Brochvael was on his feet. They disappeared, Morfydd first, the old woman shuffling after, and he knew they were climbing the steps that led to the girl’s chamber.

He was a tall man when he stood up; and when he peered out of the arrow slit which commanded the slope towards the rock ledge where was the abode of the Modrybedd, his head nearly touched the library’s roof. Yes! There of a surety was Gwrgi; but though the method by which he was accelerating his descent certainly differed from walking, it had little resemblance to running. It was in fact a series of scrambling hops, on hands and toes, varied by even more rapid slidings on back or side where the rock’s surface was smooth, but such as it was it got him down with surprising swiftness.

“I must go out to meet him to save her the shock,” he thought, but he felt compelled as he strode past the fire hurriedly to close the parchment-bound manuscript that lay open by his empty flagon, lest the old woman in clearing the table should spoil one of those perfect pages. Once let his fingers, however, come in contact with this treasure, which was one of the earliest specimens of the classic piety of Cassiodorus of Calabria, and there was a chance that though the voice of Gwrgi reached him in a piercing cry proclaiming the death of the emperor’s nephew and the advance against the Gaer of the whole of Arthur’s force, he still would have sunk for a final second into the artistry of that noble foundation, and while the doom of his House hung suspended in the scales, have luxuriated in the lettering of Ovidi Nasonis Metamorphoseon Liber Primus!

But that moment's delay was decisive and when, stooping under the chamber's arch, he emerged into the passage, it was only to find that Morfydd was before him and was already across the threshold of the House of Stone and racing down the pavemented path to meet the messenger's approach.

But Gwrgi was so agitated and breathless that when Brochvael reached the pair, followed at some distance by the aged nurse, he caught the drift of the good news quicker than did his daughter whose hurried and interrupting questions confused the man's mind.

As they all four moved back together Gwrgi enlarged upon what he'd heard. The prince had returned before dawn only to find what the Modrybedd already knew; that the druid's people had been recalled, that those who had reported the murder of Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd were now denying that the corpse exposed in the Fount was his at all, that by hud and lledrith the druid had restored his brother, and finally that Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch had been escorted out of the country by Afagddu the Hideous.

Pressed by Morfydd to give further details, especially with regard to Porius and Rhun, all he could be persuaded to say was that they were well where they were; and that where they were was with the emperor's friends.

"But Gwrgi, man!" cried the nurse, "do you mean to say that the Derwydd will allow Afagddu Hagr to help that wicked young man back to the emperor? From the tales of him I hear, the emperor sent him to us to get rid of him; and here we go guarding him home like a Queen of Gaul lest he see a drop of blood that's not of his own spilling and a glint of death iron that's not of his own sharpening!"

To his own complete surprise and to the consternation of Morfydd this speech threw Brochvael into a sudden rage.

"Gogfran Derwydd," he announced sternly, "will allow what the Prince of Edeyrnion allows him to allow! And I'll have you all remember this, while I live and the sword of Cunedda's unbroken, the Gaer, not the Giant's Cave, rules here. If the Stone House held to the Gaer while Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles lived, it's not going to kiss the ground before Gogfran ap Greidawl, or any other derwydd, when she's dead!"

So seldom did Brochvael lose his self-control that the shock of this outburst upon the two women was extreme. Gwrgi was startled too, but with him it merely served to emphasize a sullen anger with his master that had been steadily growing since Morvran's death. Had he, he asked himself, come sliding and shuffling down those rocks with this good news only to hear his people's princesses disparaged?

"These proud Brythons are all the same," he thought. "They insult each other. They rob and maim and murder each other. But let us assert ourselves — and in a moment they've joined forces, in a moment they've become one bone, one blood, one tongue, one purpose! The Romans were just the same, and they made all the nations of the earth obey them; but who rules Rome now? A crazy Goth, more ignorant than my old ox Blackie. They say he can't even read the letters of his own name!"

All sorts of vague instincts and obscure intimations were at that moment stirring in Gwrgi's consciousness. He was aware of the Brythons like blurred images of domination, ruling, and building and making laws; and then — gone like smoke! He was aware of the Romans conquering the Brythons, ruling and building and making laws; and then — gone like smoke!

“Does this Arthur really think he can play at emperor with a pack of proud boys on long-tailed Cernyw horses? The yellow heathen from Germania will pluck out their bowels, proud horses and proud boys alike, until some other race conquers them in their turn. Romans, Brythons, Saxons, they all depend on conquering. They can’t live without it.

“And what does that mean? It means they’re the slaves of slaves! It means they’re not independent like we are. My old ox may serve me, but I’m not Blackie’s slave. I may serve Brochvael, but Brochvael’s not my slave. And why not? Because though we’ve grown up together we’re independent of each other. Old Blackie’s got a free soul. He looks at me and says, ‘So far and no further, Gwrgi ap Cyngar!’

“And I say to him, ‘My ox goad has no point. I’m neither your slave nor your conqueror, Blackie. You and I are two free souls! We work together, of course, for we’ve got to live. We work for Brochvael, of course, for we’ve got to eat. But our souls are free. Yours doesn’t depend on mine. Mine doesn’t depend on yours. And we wouldn’t turn a hair if Brochvael sailed to Carthage and never came back!

‘“But the Romans can’t live without the Sons of Cunedda, and the Sons of Cunedda can’t live without the Romans; and neither of them can live without conquering the Saxons or being conquered by the Saxons. What have we to do with conquering people, Blackie? We never even conquered the giants!

‘“Why, when Rhitta Gawr took refuge in the Gaer we let him alone there. We let him die in peace there. It’s because I let you alone, Blackie, and don’t put iron in my goad to prod you with, that my soul’s free of your soul. Conquering’s a sweaty job, Blackie, and conquerors’ souls are sticky souls. But ours are free and independent. They wander where they please. They have no desire to rule Edeyrnion.

'"But Edeyrn the Brython can do no more than put his name on our land, just as Manlius the Roman can do no more than put a toga on Edeyrn, or the emperor do no more than send his nephew here to murder and be murdered.'"

While these consolatory thoughts passed through the mind of Gwrgi ap Cyngar, he instinctively avoided meeting the eyes of Edeyrn's grandson and occupied the moment by picking up a broken stick and automatically clearing away the rubble from certain Roman words he had many times carelessly noticed on a stone in this path, the words "civis venedotius," a Venedotian citizen of Rome.

Brochvael himself had fallen into a fit of gloomy shame over his indiscreet words. He was standing where he had uttered them, staring straight across the river at the wooded ridge terminated by the wide circle of stone walls and the massive watchtower of Mynydd-y-Gaer.

What would his mother Indeg have done if she'd heard him speak in that proud Brythonic tone of her three sisters? But there it was! He couldn't change the marrow in his bones; and his bones, as that outburst showed, would till death be those of the House of Cunedda.

Gwrgi meanwhile, who had already scraped back with his heel the rubble he had just removed from the word "civis," was surprised to notice that the two female figures, the slight one and the squat one, had already reached the steps of the Stone House and were conversing with a tall lad who had suddenly appeared on the threshold.

"It's Gwythyr," he said to himself. "Something's happened at the Gaer! Like enough there'll be new trouble now for the master." And contemplating that silent, staring figure, a dim sense of pity stirred within him, and he found himself thinking that it was hard to quarrel for long with a man who had no teeth and whose voice when he lost his temper sounded so much like the wind in a cracked wall. “After all, he’s the son of Indeg,” he said to himself. “To the devil with this Emperor Arthur!”

“Well, Gwythyr!” said Brochvael presently, when they were all together on the steps, face to face with the same bucolic youth who had brought the letter to the tent and carried off Rhun’s white hound. “Has the prince got back? Is your lady well?”

“My Lady says,” replied the youth, making an awkward movement with a pair of dead geese he was carrying towards the old woman, who promptly took possession of this good gift, “that she’ll be obliged if Morfydd ferch Kymeinvoll will come to the Gaer as soon as may be to hear the news from Prince Porius.”

“Has he come back? Has Rhun ap Gwrnach come back?” It was Morfydd herself who asked these hurried questions, but Gwythyr was too simple and shy even to look at her. He kept his eyes fixed steadily and apprehensively on her father’s, and it was not until Brochvael repeated in a friendly voice the monosyllable “Well?” that the boy felt that whatever the mysterious authorities might be that ruled over the Stone House it was their destiny to be challenged now by the still more mysterious authorities that ruled over the Gaer.

“He haven’t seen him, nor he haven’t seen the other one, nor he haven’t heard nought that can be repeated; but there be a lot being said here and there, they tell him.”

There was no need to explain to Brochvael, nor indeed to any of the boy’s hearers, what this rigmarole meant, nor were they ignorant of the fact that when he said “he” it was only the forest people’s characteristic alibi from all personal responsibility. This “he” might be a “she”; or it might be the person, whether he or she, who was then speaking, or it might be the mass voice of the crowd.

Whoever "he" was, he was one who could not be blamed for anything. Nor did Gwythyr's hearers misinterpret his meaning; namely, that though not commissioned from headquarters to report on the event, the Gaer was, as a matter of fact, ringing and tinging with rumours about Porius and Rhun.

"You are a very good messenger, Gwythyr," said Brochvael warmly, "and since Gwrgi has just brought the good news I'll give him a piece of my Greek chain from Mitylene and you a piece of my African chain from Numidia. Wait a moment, Morfydd! I want you to touch them and put luck into them."

None of the three persons thus involved looked pleased. None of them even pretended to look pleased. But this did not prevent Canna ferch Glam from muttering with fury, "Why am I always the one to be left out? Why aren't women sent on such errands? They would bring home the real news!"

But Brochvael shared with the prince the Brythonic mania for scattering fragments of personal adornment upon their retainers; and so, while no one was discourteous enough to move away and even the old woman confined her protests to inarticulate mutterings, the toothless friend of Sidonius and Cassiodorus searched through the numerous pockets and pouches which were sewn inside the black Gallic mantle which he always wore over the customary leather tunic.

These receptacles were both wide and deep; and since the man carried them everywhere and derived such obvious satisfaction in distributing their contents, it was a puzzle to strangers why his local popularity was not overpowering. But overpowering it certainly was not. The murder of his only son, disciple of his studies and convert to his ideas, a deed he had neither forestalled nor avenged, provided a shadowy justification for this mysterious unpopularity, at the heart of which no doubt was the perilous rumour, encouraged by Gorsant the priest, that he dabbled in the black art.

Minnawc Gorsant had not been long in this vicinity before he began his campaign to have the name of the town changed from "Llan-Mithras" to "Corwen," and Brochvael's passion for Greek had offered just the sort of weak spot in the devil's armour that he was eminently qualified to turn to the advantage of Christ. That the owner of the House of Stone had lost his teeth in saving a Byzantine monk from the Goths made no difference. There was clearly some tynged upon him, what Homer would have called his Keer, that tempted him to play the very part most likely to bring him to destruction.

On this particular occasion Morfydd gave her father one quick, tender, hopeless glance and staring past him, with a look like and yet unlike his own just now, plunged again, as she fixed her eyes on the ramparts of the Gaer, into tragic pondering.

Forcing herself to smile on the unmoved recipients of the few broken silver and copper chain links which it was her destiny presently, on what Brochvael insisted was an historic moment in the life of Edeyrnion, to place in the hands of Gwrgi and Gwythyr, she turned his attention from the perfunctoriness of the men's response to an immediate and practical question.

Could she, she asked him, have the donkey saddled, so that Canna might accompany her to the Gaer? And would it be all right for Gwythyr to wait till they were ready to start?

He agreed cheerfully to the proposal. "You can both stay up there for the banquet if you like," he said cheerfully, visualizing a solitary traveller's repast, made by himself for himself, and eaten and drunk with the relish of the Metamorphoseon of Ovidius in that perfectly copied manuscript of the Gothic king's expert secretary.

Half an hour later, by the modern water clock, given him in Rome by Anicius Manlius Boethius — who like himself was rumoured to be a black magician — he watched the little party thread their way between the huts towards the narrow wooden bridge which led to the poorer part of the town. Here the river was flanked by the small wooden huts of such as lived by hunting and fishing, and by the somewhat more substantial dwellings of the semi-free serfs who worked for the owners of the barley and wheat fields. Gwythyr was walking a few paces in front of the donkey, whose bridle Morfydd held as she listened respectfully to the old woman's conversation.

He watched them till they were safely across the bridge, and when they vanished into one of the fragments of virgin forest which still clung about the eastern slope of the high promontory that terminated in Mynydd-y-Gaer, he turned his gaze upon the wide expanse of scattered wooden houses, larger than the fishermen's and hunters' huts, that from an era long before the coming of the Romans had constituted an important settlement of the forest people, and since that time had been considerably enlarged by the erection of the various stone edifices that Romanized Brythons regarded as necessary to civilization.

But it was not to the houses of men but to the house of the Christian god that Brochvael now directed his attention. And he fancied he saw, just as his nephew had done from his watch on the Gaer the previous day, the black-robed form — to him even more sinister than to Porius — of Gorsant the priest building his walls.

The walls had certainly grown both higher and wider in the last few months. Brochvael recalled them at midsummer when the heathen fires of the forest people to their ancient god Beli Mawr had been put out by the same fanatical Christians who murdered Morvran. “Yes,” he thought, “they’re a lot higher since then!”

And he saw this black-robed man building and still building and always building, and he saw these walls growing ever higher and wider, wider and higher; and he saw others worse than this man, and others again worse still; and he saw inside the walls horrible things being done; and he saw people like Morvran being tortured there because they had wiser and kindlier thoughts than those in power and because they spoke what they thought.

He had been looking forward to his afternoon meal with none but Ovidius Naso to share the Gallic wine and the cheese made by their “witch of the north,” but the thought of his son and the thought of those growing walls shutting out the natural world, and the thought of the power of fanaticism, whether spiritual or temporal, to pervert human nature and suppress the natural freedom of the soul fell upon him with a dark cloud of sadness. “I’ll help Gwrgi turning over that stubble,” he said to himself. “As long as I’ve got Morfydd, fate’s got me! Body of God! I wish she were safely married to Porius ab Einion!”

Repassing the front of his house and proceeding westward, he soon detected Gwrgi’s familiar figure standing by a black ox about a thousand yards off and he strolled leisurely in his direction. He was reluctant to pounce upon the plump little man at that particular juncture for he knew he rarely returned from the spacious chambers of the Giant’s Cave without a pitcher full of the heady elderberry wine, the making of which Auntie Erddud left to none, and the virtue of which none but a true Iberian like this son of Cyngar could properly savour. To a Roman after a draught of Falernian it would have been sickly sweet, and to a Brython after a draught of mead it would have been sickly sour. But to Gwrgi it was nectar.

He sometimes suspected Gwrgi of letting his ox, Blackie, have a taste of the princess's wine. The two were such close friends that he sometimes doubted whether the goad the man carried had any iron about it at all. At this moment the plough, the ox, and Gwrgi himself made one blurred image in the misty sunshine, and he was beginning to wonder just how in that curtained-off corner of Canna's kitchen where Gwrgi slept there could possibly be concealed such a token of the day's news as a silver trinket from Mitylene when a most exciting thought seized him. Why not write a letter in choice Latin to Cassiodorus himself and send it by the emperor's people? Arthur surely must have his own ships.

"What's the good," he said to himself, "of possessing all these letters of Sidonius, the greatest writer of modern times, and not use them to improve my own style from his lively touch? Cassiodorus would recognize it at once, of course. But why not? Sidonius Modestus — even though he was a bishop, permitting these innocent vanities — no doubt left copies for posthumous publication; but since I've got the originals?"

'"My servant Gwrgi,'" he began at once, pausing on the edge of the stubble field for the mental inditing of the projected epistle, "and I'd better add 'filius Cyngar'— 'My servant Gwrgi, filius Cyngar, is a plump, undersized, middle-aged individual, with roving black eyes full of a gregarious and glowing curiosity' — no! Sidonius would do better than that — 'full of insatiable curiosity tempered by amiable mischief; and as I visit my fields after our northern harvest and watch the harnessing of an old ox to an old plough' — no! at this point I must be honest— 'watch the land how rough it is, and the soil how sour, and any chance of a good crop how faint, I have need of all my philosophy. My custom is to buy my grain from the farms along the river which like the ploughlands of the Nile grow fat upon the sediment left by the floods, and as I have not scrupled to confess to your paternal illustriousness on previous occasions, I have considered it best, following many notable masters in the art of cultivation, not to exhaust expensive beasts and modern implements for the sake of what is doomed to be barren.'"

It was at this point, just when he beheld with a vivid interior vision how well the epithet "barren" would look on the parchment at the beginning of the sentence, and how beautifully the verb "exhaust" would clinch and conclude it, that he remembered the artfulness with which Sidonius would introduce into a letter his actual sensations at the moment of writing; and he wondered how the sentence would look if he groaned in it about his books being a furlong away while he shuffled through wretched stubble, and about his morbid amusement at Gwrgi's passion for elderberry wine, and the man's conspiracy with Blackie and his inability to give him even the mildest prod.

But his imaginary letter — now it had become an entity — disregarded his literary conscience as completely as Blackie disregarded his economic one. "My servant," it proceeded, "is vigorously ploughing with a handsome ox as glossy black as his own head; and although the plough" — at this point his conscience burst in with a rush— "although the plough has not yet turned over as much as a grave's length of these meagre patches of pallid straw I can still admire the glossy blackness of these two heads, the human and the bovine, as I see them outlined against ferny rocks and mossy stumps, just as if the scene had no connection with my personal fate and no relation to the contests that drench the land in blood."

But the letter to Cassiodorus was not apparently the only bodiless entity hovering over that stubble field and possessed of the power to administer shocks to the absentminded; nor were such entities more disposed than others to remain content with a minor role. Tearing through the heart of the half-created letter like an airy dagger through an insubstantial scroll, there came rushing once more upon Brochvael's mind at this moment that wild cry of Morfydd's addressed to the Lady of the Gaer— "I hate her!"

Gloomily and remorsefully as he plodded on, he cursed the weakness of his character and his lack of proportion and sound judgment that had worked such havoc upon them all. When at last — no very difficult task — he had overtaken Gwrgi and Blackie and had expressed his grievance against his Keer by a weary kick at one of the upturned furrows, he caught sight of a small familiar flower that had been broken off after its untimely uprooting from the disturbed soil.

"Fumus Terrae! Smoke-of-the-Earth," he muttered, and Gwrgi glancing sideways displayed so much interest that the ox, after a few plunges, stood like an image of black granite. "Gwrgi—" began the master of the House of Stone.

"My Lord?"

"Do you suppose your young mistress confides much in Canna ferch Glam?"

"She says not."

"You mean Canna tells you she doesn't?"

Gwrgi's black eyes narrowed into two such thin slits that they made the fanciful Brochvael think of a couple of barbaric sword cuts in ivory-coloured parchment. They also made him forget his letter to Cassiodorus, a lapse which certainly would never have happened to the deceased Bishop of Arverne if he had been composing in the fields.

"She curses her secrecy night and day, my Lord. It hurts her to the heart. The poor old gwrach is always telling me so."

"She doesn't bear her a serious grudge for it, I hope? She and my wife — well! You know what they were!"

The slits in the parchment mask at his side — as Gwrgi thrust his amateur ox goad into the ground and proceeded to lean on it, his round well-shaven chin pressed hard upon his knuckles — widened a little, till they suggested to his troubled master two peepholes into the interior of a brazen image wherein burned jet-black flames.

He sighed heavily, remembering the savage feud that had gone on without surcease for all the years of the beautiful Gwyddyles' life. He remembered his sister Alarch's warning that if that woman didn't change her ways he'd find his wife one day dead in her bed.

Had the old gwrach-y-gogledd formed the same sort of conspiracy with Gwrgi against Morfydd? Had the two of them betrayed his son into the priest's hands? No! That at any rate was impossible! No daughter of Glam, no woman with brothers like hers, outlaws to the last against Rome, would betray children she had once nursed.

But Brochvael still felt troubled as he stared at the plump little man leaning on his goad. What was going on within that glossy black skull? "I must get her married," he thought. And then that cry "I hate her" and her look as she uttered it rushed on him again. "Thanks be to the gods, my brother likes her! The sooner they're married the better it'll please him. A fool, a fool! That's what I've been over both of them; and now he's dead and she's unhappy. It doesn't pay to be a reader of books, at least not of Greek ones, in this modern age. Instead of writing letters to Cassiodorus I ought to have imitated him and served Arthur in Caergwynt, as he serves the Ostrogoth in Ravenna!"

He had been thinking all this while with extreme rapidity as he gazed at the curious-shaped little plant he held in his hand, and it was therefore with a shock of surprise that he had no sooner held it to his own nose and directed it towards the nostrils of his companion when Gwrgi, unclasping his hands, snatched the plant away and stepping quickly to the head of the ox placed it between the creature's moist lips where it was soon crunched up and swallowed.

"What the devil—" began Brochvael angrily.

"Master, please! I did it for the Lady Morfydd! I could see you didn't know; and I feared you might—"

"What on earth are you talking about?"

"It grew from the blood of the Avanc when Huw Gadarn's oxen pulled it out of Lake Tegid! 'Lucky for bread, fatal for bed' is the saying; and I know it's true from my own experience, and so does Canna ferch Glam for we've mentioned it only lately, and we're both blood relatives to girls who meddled with it, reading, as they say, the saying wrong. They thought what it said was: 'Lucky for bed, fatal for bread,' but of course it's the other way."

"Why 'of course?'" enquired the older man.

But Gwrgi was calm, even a little patronizing. "Because Smoke-of-the-Earth only grows where grain will grow, so it's lucky for grain; but the mist genders it without seed, so it's unlucky for offspring. That's the truth, Brochvael ab Iddawc, or may my bones be ploughed up by a Saxon plough!" He paused while the ox moved tentatively and cautiously a step or two forward, dragging the plough after him.

"Worrow! Hold on, can't you! What a doing, silly? Do'ee think Smoke-of-the-Earth only grows for your pleasure, Blackie? But there's something else, my Lord, if I may say so."

"Say on, Gwrgi."

"When I was up there just now," and Gwrgi gestured with his head in the direction of the Giant's Cave, "Erim ab Uchtryd wasn't there, but Amreu ap Ganion was there; and while I was waiting I heard him tell one of the maids that Arthur's people weren't to be let stay more than twenty-four hours, and if they weren't gone by then—"

"Are you absolutely sure you heard that, Gwrgi? I beg you to be careful in what you recall, more careful than you were that day when—"

Gwrgi interrupted him but lowered his voice to a whisper, as if afraid that Blackie might smell a whiff of the mist-gendered plant from the direction of his stall. "He said what I tell you, my Lord, and he said further that there wasn't a ford or a bridge where you take the Sarn Elen track that wasn't guarded by our best bowmen; and that there wasn't an arrow among them that hadn't been dipped by Gogfran Derwydd himself!"

Brochvael stared at the man, trying in vain to read what he had at the back of his mind, for well did he know the equivocations and indirections and tergiversations of his retainer. "He's been at that elderberry wine," he thought, "or he wouldn't be so loquacious. Must I go and find out?"

This perturbed question might have been addressed to the single liquid and lustrous eye, full of a mild and patient curiosity, which Blackie, by a tremendous twist of his neck, had just succeeded in turning upon him.

"What a life!" he inwardly groaned as the image of the wine from Arverne, and the Ovid from Brutium, and his sheepskin-covered chair, and his favourite cheese, swam before his mind.

"Yes," he replied to his own heart, for Gwrgi had resumed both rope and goad, and Blackie's head was in its normal position, "I must go. I should curse myself to hell if anything happened that I could have prevented by going."

Sadly and slowly he removed his unconventional mantle; that mantle which made his friends uneasy, his enemies derisive, and visitors to Edeyrnion more than suspicious. He had acquired it in Etruria, but that fact did not prevent Porius Manlius from regarding it with superstitious horror.

It made the old Roman think of a figure in his childhood from whom he and his youthful companions had always fled in panic. Like the Virgilian Sibyl, this being inhabited a lonely cavern and, like her, he knew the descent to Avernus.

“Take this home when you go, Gwrgi, and if you don’t mind I’d rather you didn’t strap it on Blackie’s back. You can put it on yourself to go home in if you like. And don’t let my fire or Canna’s either — but I needn’t tell you that — get too low.”

“Put it on?” muttered Gwrgi in Blackie’s ear when Brochvael was out of sight. “Put it on?” he repeated as he allowed the animal to lick up a drop of the princess’s wine out of the palm of his hand. “Did you hear that, Ox of Huw Gadarn? Put on the mantle of Satan’s master? Risk my spirit with the priest of Jesus, my soul with the priest of Mithras, and my skin with Gogfran Derwydd? Have I become as crazy as Brochvael ab Iddawc to take such risks? No, no, such is not our nature, is it, Blackie? But we’ll do what we’re told to do. ‘Watch the race and praise the winner’ is my motto. But as he says in his thoughtful care, we won’t strap it on you, we’ll just throw it across you, and leave the rest to Beli Mawr.”

Twenty minutes later Brochvael stood at the entrance to the dwelling of the Three Aunties. The Giant’s Cave had been so enlarged during the last three hundred years that its original nature was quite lost to a casual view. Its overarching stone roof was entirely covered with ancient oak beams, blackened now by the smoke of generations, and divided into many chambers, most of which had their own narrow window slits into the air and light. The main entrance was wide and a good deal higher than the more modern one that led into the House of Stone.

It was surmounted by a deeply carved inscription in ogham, that is to say, in letters composed of straight lines; but the words represented by these lines were neither in Greek nor Latin, neither in Gallic nor Brythonic, and their meaning had long since been lost.

Conversing together in lively excitement within this wide entrance was a considerable group of men and women, some retainers of one or other of the Three Modrybedd; others, as could be seen from their garb and their weapons, natives from the foothills of the mountains, or from the remoter recesses of the forest, or from the huts beyond the Gwern, or "Alder Swamp," a region that got its name from some specially pitiful slaughter in the struggle with the heathen Gwyddyl-Ffichti dating back to the first coming of the Sons of Cunedda, along with their Christianized Brythonic tribe.

At Brochvael's appearance there was a sudden hush, and several of those who had been most lively in their excited talk withdrew hurriedly into the interior of the building, while others, falling back, instinctively grouped themselves behind a striking-looking personage of enormous proportions who had been taking little part in the discussion but had been surveying it all and listening to it all with amused and genial satisfaction from a recumbent position under one of the gigantic doorposts, if such they could be called, that were really the two rocky sides of the prehistoric aperture, out of which in all probability, when the aboriginals first used the cave, flowed a subterranean river.

Slowly and lazily, but with an animal suppleness and grace, this person now rose to his feet, took a few easy steps forward, and saluted the prince's brother with a large and friendly and sweeping obeisance.

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee, Amreu ap Ganion!" responded the nephew of the Three Princesses. "Which of our revered Aunties would find it easiest to give me a few minutes? I don't want to bother Auntie Esyllt if she's busy. Perhaps Auntie Erddud could — you see, I'll probably be going over to the Gaer before nightfall, and if you wanted any news conveyed up there I'd be able to take it. You know what my brother is at banquet time; and I fancy I'm about the only person to whom my sister Euronwy grants the privilege of going up to her chamber after she's left the hall."

Amreu's gesture of welcome had been spontaneous and free, but the moment Brochvael spoke of conveying news to the Gaer the aspect of his countenance changed. And it was not only that he ceased to display his gleaming teeth in a heart-warming smile or to wrinkle up his swarthy cheeks into criss-cross channels for every kind of magnetic response; the huge bulk of the enormous man seemed actually to lessen and dwindle, to wither and shrink. Brochvael perceived in a flash that he had completely underestimated the power, in his father's princedom, of this rival court at the Giant's Cave. He had always known that the Modrybedd were a formidable influence in Edeyrnion.

He had indeed seen a glimpse of it in the tragedy of his son; and he had his youthful memories of Brythonic opposition to it, though this had been overcome, in the Gaer conspiracy against his own mother, the wife of Iddawc the Apostate.

But it was the Brython that was uppermost in himself now, the fierce pride of the blood, as he was never tired of assuring Morfydd, that ran in the race that sacked, not perpetuated, Troy; the race whose protectress was the spoil-bestowing aegis-bearer, not the amorous mother of dutiful Aeneas.

"I think I'd better have, yes, as a matter of fact I think it would be propitious for us all for me to have a little... a little confabulation" — he deliberately used the modern word "confabulatio" rather than the classical word "colloquium," for he had noted how his friend the great Bishop Sidonius, saintly artifex and patrician princeps as he was, when he had to propitiate a despotic barbarian always hearted himself for the encounter by making use of this frivolous and rather fanciful expression— “a little confabulation with you yourself, Amreu ap Ganion. Could you take me into your private chamber? Or could we stroll for a few minutes on the eastern terrace?”

The imposing bulk of this full-lipped, narrow-hipped, dusky-skinned man, whose hair was almost as glossy as Gwrgi’s and much more curly, seemed to the fanciful eyes of the friend of Caius Sollius Modestus to be diminishing and dwindling moment by moment before his eyes.

“My... my room... “ he stammered, “is hardly fit... The... the terrace is... extremely frequented at this hour... nor do I quite know what—”

But Brochvael had no wish to torment any further his aunt’s handsome steward. He had caught enough to make it quite clear that in the interests of the House of Cunedda it was imperative he should see Modryb Esyllt and if possible Erddud and Tonwen as well.

“No need, no need,” he replied soothingly. “Of course, the terrace is crowded and the maids at this early noon haven’t tidied up. I’ll just wait a little and then go and look for Auntie Esyllt myself. I won’t bother you any more, Amreu ap Ganion. Besides, it was silly of me” — and he watched with pleasure the steward’s natural impressiveness and aplomb returning— “to talk about ‘the eastern terrace.’ There’s only one terrace here of course, and that looks due north. I was thinking of you. I was thinking how I envied you your” — he was going to say “teeth” but he thought better of it— “your beautiful smile, my friend.”

The smile he referred to had indeed begun to return to the steward’s expressive face; but it had hardly done so when it vanished again and with a gesture of something almost like panic the poor man murmured nervously, “I see Erim ab Uchtryd coming back, my Lord. Will you excuse me if I go to meet him and tell him you are here?”

Brochvael followed the steward's gaze and recognized the approaching figure. "I'll go and meet him myself," he said, and moved hastily towards the newcomer.

This was none other than the "silentiary" of the establishment, an official whose position in the Modrybedd's household had had its parallel at the court of Byzantium ever since the reign of Constantine; nor was the person whom Brochvael now proceeded to greet less remarkable in appearance than the famous ex-silentiary of that court, the Emperor Anastasius himself.

Erim ab Uchtryd was a frail-looking individual with a big forehead, thin hair, and hollow cheeks. He was extremely pale, but possessed eyes so lustrous that they were in themselves a sufficient justification for his promotion by Modryb Esyllt ten years ago from an extremely subordinate position in her service to his present dignified and important office.

For it was the business of Erim ab Uchtryd to do for the Three Princesses themselves what Amreu ap Ganion had to do for the whole household; in other words, he had not only to pour oil on three separate currents of troubled waters, but as the confidant of each, the interpreter of each to each, the diplomatic ambassador of all to the outside world, to preserve at least something, in the wilds of these mountains and the recesses of these forests, of the traditions of a race that had in its day treated Egypt as a rival, Phoenicia as an interloper, and Hellas as a youthful prodigy.

The silentiary greeted Brochvael with even more than his usual self-possession. Bowing courteously with just the right amount of respect — neither a shade more nor a shade less — due to the only brother of Edeyrnion's ruler, he escorted him at once to a small postern on the left of the main entrance, escorted him down a narrow passage running parallel with the outer wall, a passage so low that Brochvael, who like his brother was a tall man, had to bend his head the whole way; and then, holding aside a heavy purple curtain so that the visitor should enter first, ushered him into his own private chamber. Even here Brochvael, though he was able to stand upright, could without rising on tiptoe have touched the beams above his head with his hand.

In the centre of the room there were a couple of blackened flagstones sprinkled with ashes; and, although the beams of the ceiling above these stones were no blacker than the others, the visitor realized that not long ago, probably not later than last night, there had been a fire burning upon them. By the side of this now desolate hearth were two large heaps of piled-up calfskins, while at right angles to the entrance there stood, with their backs to the wall and covered with dusky embroidery threaded with gold thread, two small straight-backed chairs.

Upon one of these Brochvael was invited to sit, and as with a very poor measure of success he adjusted his lean haunches to the comfortless angle indicated and bent his head so that the shaft of sunlight that streamed through a slit in the wall should fall on his head rather than on his hooked nose and tired eyes, he saw that Amreu ap Ganion, who must have been following them down the passage, had also entered the chamber.

The odd thing was that Erim took not the smallest notice of the steward and it was a curious relief to Brochvael when, without even a nod from the silentiary, the big man relaxed upon one of the heaps of calfskins and proceeded to hug his knees and rest thereon his bowed head, so closely covered by its small tight curls as to resemble a ball of black cowslips.

Under the influence of his demon of untimely fancies, Brochvael could not help wondering, as he sought to twist his own high, narrow, deeply indented forehead out of that disturbing shaft of sunlight, whether the steward hadn’t decided that the surest way to dodge these painful shocks to his grandiose aplomb, which he must have felt through every pore of his skin had the power of actually diminishing his physical stature, was to assume the primordial attitude of the unborn child, helpless and grotesque but by no means altogether inert.

But the silentiary was speaking at last. “I needn’t bother you,” he said, “about your purpose in coming here this noon, my Lord. These disturbing events naturally draw us all together, and — as I took the liberty of mentioning this very morning to Euronwy ferch Manlius — draw together also our three chief centres of authority, the Gaer, the House of Stone, and the Giant’s Cave. This is natural. This is proper. This is one of the few redeeming characteristics that a state of war — that maimer of men and despoiler of women — produces in a community like ours. At the same time I am sure you will agree with me, my Lord, when I say—”

But Brochvael had grown impatient. “A state of war? Surely it isn’t as bad as that? I understood that the Derwydd has withdrawn his disturbing mandate; and besides, an embassy from the emperor, accompanied by his counsellor and even by his nephew, can hardly be described—”

But the silentiary, who had remained standing with his back to the shaft of light which was provoking his interlocutor, interrupted in his turn. “Blood,” he remarked, with a dangerous flash from his burning eyes, “blood, my Lord, has been shed. The princesses know it has been shed and they know why and by whom. They are, my Lord, in hourly touch with the Derwydd and from what they have learnt this morning—”

“After my messenger returned?”

“After Gwrgi ap Cyngar was sent back to you.”

Brochvael looked at the man. He himself was not a bit less self-conscious than his nephew Porius; but unlike the self-consciousness of Porius, his awareness of himself was no restless mind in a somnolent body. It was the very essence of his body. It was his body feeling, thinking, remembering, divining, predicting, comprehending, uniting, dividing, loathing, enjoying.

His nephew's consciousness was like a fast-burrowing mole with a glow-worm lamp in its skull that was forever making tunnels just under the surface of a huge moss-covered tumulus; whereas his own was like the consciousness of all the little weeds and plants and grasses and mosses of the tumulus itself.

He must have looked into the silentiary's burning eyes with an expression exactly corresponding to his actual feelings, that is to say, with a confused look, a puzzled look, an anxious look, a mildly uneasy look, and finally with what must have appeared to the silentiary as nothing less than a stupid look.

In actual reality Brochvael experienced at that moment what the quicker mind of his nephew might well have called the "sensation of stupidity," and which indeed was as much of a favourite sensation with the elder man as the curious process entitled "cavoseniargizing" was with the younger.

But Brochvael had the power not only of enjoying the "sensation of stupidity" — a sensation that made him feel like an animal cropping the grass of a secretive mound, a mound that wanted to make him worry over its mystery — but of using his stupidity to gain time while he took his bearings and smelt the air. And as he looked into the silentiary's eyes he became conscious that in his long absences from Britain, in his absorption in his books, in his preoccupation with the causes of his son's murder, he had lost touch with the tribal traditions of his mother and the Three Aunties.

The man opposite him was clearly obsessed with one single aim, that of outwitting and outmanoeuvering every open enemy of the forest people, and of compelling every traitor within its purlieus to betray his existence. It became clear to him that, apart from Medrawd's violence, the mere presence of the emperor’s horsemen within the confines of Edeyrnion, especially their sudden, secret, and unescorted appearance, was a firebrand of disturbance.

And the idea suddenly reached him before he averted a gaze that had already grown considerably less stupid, that Erim ab Uchtryd nourished thoughts in that smooth capacious forehead that went further than hostility to Arthur’s horsemen, went as far in fact as to imagine, if not the complete overthrow of the House of Cunedda, at least the supplanting of the younger Porius — with his Arthurian mother and his Roman grandfather — by some member of the family less involved in the Caergwynt court of Arthur ab Uthyr Pendragon, and more involved in the forest court of Gogfran ap Greidawl Derwydd.

Was it not the forest people’s custom for the son of the ruler’s sister to succeed him rather than the son of his wife? Didn’t they hold that a woman’s childbed was harder to hide than a woman’s love? Wasn’t the son of Alarch, for all his Mithraic madness, a skilful hunter and the fleetest footed of the whole tribe?

“Forgive me, Brochvael ab Iddawc,” were the words now issuing from the upper portion of the dusky presence so clearly outlined before him, as the uncomfortable chair continued to hurt his thin flanks and the dancing sun motes to menace his blinking eyes, “if I tell you things for which in your scholarly abstraction and your exalted and privileged seclusion you may perhaps be unprepared. But the truth is, things in Edeyrnion are moving faster than it is possible for you — or even perhaps, though for different reasons, for your princely brother — to follow with any confidence or assurance. Does it not sometimes occur to you—”

“Don’t become too insulting, my good man!” thought Brochvael. And he sighed bitterly, thinking how that affair of his son still clung to him and tied, as it were, his fighting hand.

" — that our Roman masters are just as deeply our enemies and exploiters as any pirates from Germania? The princess — I speak of course of Princess Esyllt — understands this. The princess has done me the indescribable honour" — here Erim ab Uchtryd actually swung half round and bowed towards the invisible object of his devotion across the ashes on the flagstones and across the curly head bent above them— "of taking me into her full confidence. No one, no mortal person, although they say he converses with the wise of our race who perished a thousand years ago, knows for certain what the mind of the Derwydd holds, but this I can tell you; to none has he revealed more of his mind than to Princess Esyllt, and it is straight from her very lips, my Lord, that I am now informing you as to the gravity of this crisis."

Very deliberately — for he had by now made up his mind that nothing should prevent his seeing his mother's sister before he left the Giant's Cave — Brochvael rose from his uneasy seat. As he did so he fancied he saw the enormous shoulders of the curly-headed steward quiver and shake a little. Was the man weeping? Had he himself or this flashing-eyed baldhead hurt in some fatal way his primitive Iberian self-respect?

"I must ask you," he was beginning, when there was a startling interruption. First came the sound of voices in the distance, then of voice answering voice much nearer, and then of a pair of feet scampering down the passage. And finally the curtain was pulled aside and a little boy, gasping with the glory of being the successful messenger, panted out the words: "Master Silentiary, to my Lady at once! Master Silentiary, at once, at once!"

Dragging the child by the arm and murmuring rapid questions to him as he hurried him away, Erim ab Uchtryd had only time to bid the steward go to the eastern gate, and to assure Brochvael of his own speedy return. It was then and then only, as the curtain folds fell into place, that Brochvael realized that the large indolent body of Amreu ap Ganion was convulsed not with weeping but with laughing. Evidently hugely tickled by something that completely restored his self-esteem, the big man showed his white teeth and rolled his Iberian eyes towards their visitor and for a moment appeared unable to speak. Then with a bow and a flourish of his hand: "You see, my Lord, what he thinks he is! And nothing but the bastard of a Gwyddyl-Ffichti! Telling you, my Lord, our prince's brother, you, my Lord, the father of our future Lady of the Gaer, about how to stand up to the Emperor of Ynys Prydein!

"To hear him boasting about what we will do, and the plots we will make, and the magic we will use! And all because his grandmother spent a rainy autumn under rock and canvas, under carnedd and cromlech, under oak and thorn tree, by torrent and tarn, with Iscovan y Bychan, when her husband was soldiering in the legion!

"As for me, 'I serve' is my motto. I am a Christ's man, I am! 'Tis the Princess Erddud herself who made me what I am. And do you know how she did it, my Lord? She gave me my Lela, her own Egyptian maid. And now Lela and I serve Christ and the princess. It's true we talk sometimes of serving the queen-empress at Caerleon or Caergwynt, for those who serve live longer than those who—"

"Listen, Amreu! If I were to go now, at this very minute, to see my aunt Erddud, your wife's mistress, could you tell me where I should be most likely to find her?"

The enormous presence lost its happy glory. The world-embracing smile vanished and a pair of black orbs rolled apprehensively round the room. The massive shoulders, recently heaving with suppressed laughter, sagged and shrank like withered globules of seaweed deserted by the tide. It was clear to Brochvael that if the incentive to serve a queen rather than a princess came from Lela the Egyptian, it would be important for that young woman to be at the steward's elbow when one authority pulled him by one arm and another by another.

But he felt no urge to press the man. He had not been to Constantinople for nothing, nor to Ravenna either. And all he had in his heart just then was a comic sense of the craziness of the whole business.

"Well! I expect I'd better change my mind," he remarked gently and without bitterness. "And I expect you, Amreu, my friend, had better go where he said — to the eastern gate, wasn't it? Is your wife in constant attendance upon my aunt Erddud?"

The servant of Christ faintly nodded. Then in a piteous effort to work himself up to the height of his contempt for the silentiary: "You saw how that madman bowed just now when he was talking of Princess Esyllt? Could anything reveal his folly more than that, when all the world knows that your brother the prince honours the Three Modrybedd equally, and that if he does prefer one of our ladies above the rest it is not Princess Esyllt, but my Lela's—"

At that moment there reached them from the distance a new clamour of voices, and Brochvael using his most peremptory Brythonic manner, bade the man be off to the eastern gate.

The moment the fellow was gone he himself tore aside the curtains and making sure the passage was empty hurried off in the direction opposite to the eastern gate. He was soon ascending a narrow flight of stairs leading to the next floor of the Giant's Cave. He had known this whole establishment well enough in his boyhood, but since his marriage and the constant quarrels between Kymeinvoll and the Modrybedd, he had lost touch with the labyrinthine intricacies of the old place.

"I must find Auntie Erddud or Auntie Tonwen," he thought. "This business is getting out of control. If Einion won't cope with it I must do something myself." He felt vague as to the precise direction his interference should take, but he must be guided, yes! he must be guided by Tyche Soteer, by Chance, the great Saviour of all things!

Not for the first time in his life did he mutter an inward prayer to the mysterious power, worshipped alone of all the gods by the first and greatest of the imperial invaders, by that Ul-Kessar or Julius Caesar, whom this burning-eyed Erim regarded as no better than the piratical Saxons.

At the top of the steps he found himself in a wider and higher passage than the one he had quitted. For a moment he hesitated in which direction to follow this dim corridor; but a stream of golden sunshine coming from an opening at the top of yet another flight of wooden steps decided him, and reaching the foot of these steps, which were little more than a balustraded ladder, he boldly ascended.

He now began to feel surer just where he was in the Giant's Cave. Memories of his childhood began returning across forty years of absence. "There's an outlook up here somewhere," he thought, "and I remember once—"

What he remembered came back with a rush now. It was Auntie Erddud who had — And there she was. And so the first Caesar's wanton divinity, the goddess, from the beginning, of all atheists, had heard his half-humorous prayer! There she was, Auntie Erddud herself, on her old knees against the high stone parapet, worshipping, it would seem, or at any rate watching with concentrated attention, the serpentine curves of the river-goddess as she flowed beneath the walls of Mynydd-y-Gaer and down the long narrow eastern valley, so different from the level fields of Edeyrnion, till she swept past the feet of Dinas Bran!

He saw her the moment his head reached the stone floor of the rampart, and the sight of her, just like that, with himself unseen, as had happened so often in his childhood, brought back those far days with such a rush of memory that tears rose behind his eyeballs and he found himself making a queer emotional grimace with the thin lips covering his gums, as he pressed his chin against the top rung of the ladder and his nose against the stone edge of the platform.

She was in an ash grey woollen garment, not the garment she slept in, nor the one she faced the world in, but the one she habitually wore in the privacy of her own rooms; for the Modrybedd lived quite separately, all of them with their own occupations, each with her own attendants, and only encountering one another at the general meal of the household at the end of the afternoon. Auntie Erddud’s hair was fuzzy rather than curly. It was snow-white and on this particular day it was so tightly gathered up above the nape of her neck, after the ancient fashion of the forest people, that it reminded Brochvael of the heads of certain Egyptian ladies, wives, and sisters of the keepers of the manuscripts, at whose houses he had been entertained in Alexandria.

He felt a pang of shame to have allowed his wife’s Gwyddyl-Ffichti jealousy to come between him and this faithful champion of his nervous and touchy boyhood. But a second later he pressed his toothless lips against that ladder rung and cursed himself for blaming his wife. No, it was time and chance and circumstance and his long absences, far more than Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles, and most of all it was his books. All three Modrybedd were hopelessly illiterate, and he had known for the last ten years that Erim ab

Uchtryd was only doing for Auntie Esyllt what he himself might quite well have done for Auntie Erddud.

No! It was fate. Poor Kymeinvoll was only a straw herself on the great tide. Panta rhei; “all passes”; nothing abides.

But how was he to approach his aunt without giving her too great a shock? How would she feel if, her prayers finished and glancing casually round on her way to the usual descent, she were suddenly arrested by the grizzled head of her favourite nephew protruding from this mouse hole?

It came to him with the dart of a swallow and very softly, first inaudibly, then just audibly— “I don’t even know,” he thought, “if Auntie Erddud has grown deaf — then at last to the old, sweet, wistful, gay tune, like a blackbird’s jaunty sob, with which she had so often comforted him after quarrels with the mocking Einion, and trilling the words as gently as he could, he broke into the Pervigilium Veneris.

“Cras amet, ‘let him love tomorrow,’” — and the old lady, turning at once but without rising from her knees, heard what looked to her dim eyes like the bodiless head of an unbearded warrior with a great nose trundle towards her along the ramparts— “qui numquam amavit!, ‘who has never loved before.’”

For the first second she was not frightened at all, and for a singular reason. Then, when the singing head was followed out of its hole by a man’s broad shoulders, she felt as if she had swallowed her heart, but before her senses had time to transfer the shock to her nerves a great wave of reassurance flooded her whole being.

“Brochvael!” she gasped, and with one thin bare arm extended along the battlements she stretched out the other towards him. He was by her side in a moment, and lifting her to her feet clasped her in his arms.

"Auntie, forgive me, forgive me! I didn't mean to scare you. I felt I must see you and down there they made such difficulty—"

But she had now completely regained her composure. "I know, I know," she whispered. "It's those men. Men are all the same. All stupid, all quite mad. You're the only sensible man, Brochvael, I've ever met except Father. Even Porius, now he's grown so big and is going to marry your little girl, has become like the rest. He thinks nobody knows how mad he's become because he hides it up and does just what Euronwy tells him, and just — don't be angry, Brochvael dear" — and she pressed his arm coaxingly as they leaned side by side against the wall with their backs to the Gaer and the winding river— "just what your dear child tells him! But I know — others may not, but I do — that, in spite of all, he's become as mad as the rest."

She couldn't see her nephew's face, either while she spoke or when she took breath, so she had no cue to the way he received it. But even if she had kept her dim eyes steadily upon him she would have detected nothing but reckless, irresponsible sympathy in the depths of his fascinated stare, and hopeless bewilderment in the criss-cross lines, confused as those above the lintel of the eastern gate, that deepened upon his forehead.

"You know, Auntie Erddud, you were wonderfully brave not to scream out when you first heard that old tune and saw my head."

She clutched his arm tightly. "Shall I tell you why I was so calm and quiet? Because I'd been praying to Bran the Blessed that he'd let me see the watchtower on his Mount before I went down; and as I prayed I thought of what that Henog from Dyfed told my sister when she went to the Gaer; that after Bran was killed by the Gwyddylaid he made his friends cut off his head, and the head was with them for many summers and winters at Harlech and the head prophesied to them so that they forgot their sorrows; and the birds of Rhiannon sang to them because the head was with them and their souls were content. And so when I first saw your head, and couldn't see your body, and heard that tune —

"But can you stay, Brochvael dear, for our general meal? We have it earlier than the prince does, and earlier I think than you do. We have it at the ancient hora nona at this time of the year — that's well before twilight — but of course with your water clock it's all different. You can keep the hours really carefully. But we still go by the old dial, and Amreu has his own ways of reading it. But he always blows the trumpet about half an hour before, so we know pretty well, and it doesn't matter. I wish you would stay, Brochvael. It's been so long since I've seen you eat a morsel."

But he shook his head. "I'm sorry, Auntie dear, but Morfydd's gone to the Gaer. If she stays for their meal I'll have to fetch her; and if she doesn't she'll want to find me at home. But please tell me one thing before I go. Does Auntie Esyllt really know about these murderings and uprisings and all these orders from the Derwydd and all these threats against the emperor's nephew? And if she does know, does she tell Einion what she knows?"

A most extraordinary change came upon the fragile old lady. Instantaneously she stiffened while her eyes lost their tender mist. Leaving the support of the wall she moved forward a step or two. Then she turned on him fiercely. "So that's what brought you here to find me! To ferret out our secrets from the one who loved you the most! To use our... our... our old" — he knew she meant the Pervigilium and a pang went through him— "to make me betray my sister, my ancestors, my people — yes! and this land which was ours long before you or the Romans or the Gwyddyl-Ffichti came. You can return, son of my sister, by the way you came! May our sacred river and our Mount of the thrice-blessed Bran change your false heart before you... you... come again with your songs to me!”

And with a contemptuous toss of her finely modelled head with its Egyptian knot she turned her back upon him. He made no attempt to interrupt her departure. He watched her figure pass from his sight as it moved proudly round the carved pedestal that hid the ascent to the rampart. Then with a wry twitching of his toothless mouth and a feeling as if one of the Derwydd’s poisoned arrows had struck a vein in his throat, he climbed down the ladder and followed the corridor by which he had come.

As he passed the entrance to the silentiary’s chamber he was moved by a sudden impulse, though he had no wish to face the bulbous forehead and obsessed eyes of Erim ab Uchtryd, to pull aside once again those dark heavy curtains. He hesitated, however, to follow this impulse when with hand outstretched he was aware of voices within the chamber.

For the first time in his whole life the descendant of Cunedda found himself — though he felt the blood mount so hotly to certain shame-shocked cavities beneath his cheek that he touched his face with his uplifted fingers — in the act of eavesdropping.

The prehistoric dilemma — insoluble by the subtlest casuistry — at what point it is lawful to act contrary to your conscience for the sake of your country or your cause held him in its iron clutch. All the blood he had in his body seemed to have gathered in his head where it apparently was stealing a march on his reason by usurping that power’s very citadel.

What he felt was that he had to stay long enough to find a place with his feet whence he could jump to firm ground; but by one of those paradoxes which fate had nailed to the mast of his Brythonic honour, the leaping-off moment of his rejection of further temptation was the moment that sent him striding down the passage, with his accusing blood rushing back to his heart, leaving his face pale, and with the one single purpose in his mind, that of getting in touch with Porius ab Einion before nightfall.

"It's no good going to Einion," he said to himself, "and the old Roman would only make trouble. That boy is square-headed. 'Twould have been better for my son if he were less so. 'Tis impossible for him to act on impulse. But he's trustworthy enough. And he's got Alarch's son Rhun to steady him, and for all his slave's blood and his Mithras nonsense, Rhun's a brave lad and a very shrewd one. I used to wonder sometimes if Morfydd —"

But the image of his daughter hastened his steps and strengthened his resolve. He had nothing of the waywardness of his father or his brother in this matter of race. It never entered his head that the maternal strain in a person's blood might account for as much or even for more than the other. That the girl should remind him of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles was natural and endearing, but that in any race struggle between Brython and Gwyddyl she should take the part of the latter was unthinkable.

This indeed was the point where his son had caused him his greatest trouble all through the lad's short life. Had Iscovan y Bychan not been dead ere he was old enough for such exploits, he might even — Brochvael had thought of that more than once — have run away to join the outlaw.

With the image of Morfydd as the mother of a prince of Edeyrnion, to whom the emperor of the future would owe the safety of the north, Brochvael passed under that thousand-year-old inscription and through the chattering crowd that always thronged the eastern gate of the Giant's Cave. He walked so fast and his face was so tense that all who saluted him turned when he had passed and looked significantly at one another.

"He's learnt something," was the general impression. "How much has he found out?" was a rarer comment. But "Has Princess Tonwen said anything?" was what a subordinate of the silentiary murmured to a subordinate of the steward.

It wasn't till he got altogether clear of the place and indeed not till he had begun climbing down that final series of rocky descents that Gwrgi's experience had discovered were better adapted to a crafty sliding on a person's flanks than a stumbling and slipping on a person's feet, that he dared to drag forth into full awareness — so that he could, as it were, see the monstrosity in the round and poke his fingers into its unspeakable shape and even look into its appalling visage — what Chance had forced him to hear.

Chance now, this favourite goddess of Julius Caesar, so arranged it that it was only when he had been reluctantly compelled to imitate Gwrgi, and had clutched with his fingers not only the dead heather but the cool fresh leaves of the plant called Scabiosa succisa with which Galen had cured leprosy, that he was able to force himself — the shock of his contact with the earth doubtless helping him — to repeat, and he did so aloud, the words he still hoped he had been unable to help hearing from behind that curtain in that low-roofed passage.

There had been two voices speaking, only two. One of them had been Erim's, and he could see, as he lay for a passive moment — as Gwrgi had not done — clutching the heather stalks and the leaves of the leprosy plant, that bulbous forehead and those burning eyes; but the other was unknown to him.

"Go straight to Colgrim and tell him—"

The slippery rock, the heather stalks, the cool soft leaves of Scabiosa succisa, and the October sun streaming mistily up along the shining river from Dinas Bran, received these fatal words without a shudder. And yet they were the very substance of the land those words betrayed.

“Go straight to Colgrim and tell him.” It was enough. No more was needed.

Auntie Erddud had said that her men were all mad. But what was this? Something worse than madness. Treachery! Treachery! Treachery!

“Go straight to—” He saw those words in the rock. He saw them in the heather stalks. He saw them in the leprosy plant. The stream of misty gold sunshine carried them like carrion on its breast. But still the Divine River flowed on; their weight did not impede her, though to him they were the corpses of all the years of the life he had lived by her side.

“Go straight to Colgrim and tell him.”

“I must go straight,” his heart said to his head as he scrambled to his feet and continued his descent, “I must go straight to Porius ab Einion!”

CHAPTER XI. Morfydd

MORFYDD'S HEART WAS in a turmoil as she watched Gwythyr lead the donkey away at the tower gate of the Gaer. The old dark familiar doubt in the depths of her being as to whether she had done right to let herself be betrothed, and what would come of it, for herself, for Porius, and for Rhun, remained as usual at the back of all else; but the immediate situation was what at this moment set her pulses beating. Though her nurse had made, throughout their lingering approach, all the attempts at her disposal to discover something definite, these attempts had been fruitless.

But something definite now — and not at all reassuring to this particular pair of women — was under their eyes as they approached the massive archway. Seated in negligent groups round the gate and occupying a space wide enough to suggest the presence of at least a hundred armed men was that phalanx of picked warriors called the Gosgordd, a bodyguard of experienced and pure-blooded Brythons, whose duty it had been from the days of Cunedda himself to assemble in arms when called upon by their prince.

At this moment they were resting carelessly and casually enough, some on wooden benches, some on the piles of roughly trimmed tree trunks that were always kept at that spot for the purpose of barricading the entrance in the face of an assault.

None of the Gaer people, in fact none of the people of Llan-Mithras or Corwen, could imagine the grassy slope in front of the tower gate without these tree trunks. Local tradition declared they had been there for centuries, had been there in the days beyond history when the race of giants ruled over by Rhitta Gawr could lift them in their arms as easily as the men of today could lift sacks of corn; and this was borne out, it was argued, by the number among them that were already resolved into ridges of weeds and rubble, mingled with yellow powdery dust.

The passing under the archway of the two women created a certain amount of stir. Some of the men even rose to their feet striking their round shields with the handles of their favourite weapons — long swords or short spears, as the individual warriors preferred, for javelins as well as bows and arrows they left to the forest people — as they recognized the betrothed of the son of their prince. Others raised their right hand in salutation. Others just stared at the pair and asked questions of their neighbours. A few scowled angrily and even spat on the grass between their knees.

These last manifestations were not lost upon old Canna, but when she gave her companion a sidelong glance she found it impossible to tell whether the girl, who seemed absorbed in her thoughts and walked quickly, looking straight in front of her, was aware of them or not.

Avoiding the spacious banquet hall, the three doors of which were wide open, displaying already lively preparations for the main meal of the day, they entered a long low-arched corridor flanked by several stone chambers, most of which were open, while others had their privacy protected by removable wooden screens, an innovation introduced by Euronwy herself when she and her father came to live there.

The corridor was so long that, as the chambers through which the daylight could enter grew fewer and finally ceased, it became almost dark. But before that pallid twilight quite died away the passage terminated in a pair of massive folding doors illuminated by a suspended oil lamp that was never allowed to go out. These doors were divided into panels of several different kinds of precious wood and were adorned with so many bars and bosses and knobs and handles of polished silver that they gleamed under the light of that flickering lamp like a perpendicular model of the celestial vault of autumnal stars that within a few hours would begin to overhang Edeyrnion.

Not greatly coveted in Mynydd-y-Gaer was the post of porter to my Lady’s chamber. In Princess Indeg’s time this dimly lit end of the passage, where the silver-shimmering doors, whether ajar or closed or wide open, gave the spot a curiously enchanted air, was wont to be crowded with loitering and chattering people just as was today the eastern gate of the Giant’s Cave; but Euronwy had introduced into the Gaer the simpler ways of the Roman villa at Uriconium where she had been brought up in the austere habits of the Manlian tradition, a tradition which had experienced little difficulty in substituting the puritanism of the Stoic principles for the refinements of the Christian faith.

At this particular hour of the day when Euronwy, as Morfydd and the nurse knew well, would be resting after superintending every detail in the kitchen and visiting every larder and pantry and scullery in the place, it happened that the guard at her door was an ex-centurion from the legion at Castrum Deva. Born in Mantua of free parents, he had served the family of Manlius in many capacities, and when the elder Porius was appointed second in command of the legion at Uriconium, he was in a position to get his old friend relieved of his military duties in order to become the general manager of the household at the Villa Nova Praeneste; and it was here with the impregnable camp in the background, and the comings and goings of soldiers from half the world in the foreground, that Euronwy’s girlhood was passed.

The two women, each of them with a deep admixture in her veins of Gwyddyl-Ffichti blood, could not resist a pang of jealous admiration for the noble dignity of this professional soldier’s pose as they approached him. He was wearing his centurion’s official garb, kept as beautifully fresh through all the years of Euronwy’s life as it was when Porius Manlius, lonely and heartsick at the death of his child’s mother in this remote and alien land, established the old man in Villa Nova Praeneste as his overseer and manager.

And if his garb was beautifully preserved, the short sword suspended at his side and the long gilded rod of his office were both so polished that they rivalled in their gleaming the silver adornments of the folding doors he guarded.

“My Lady expects you,” he said with a curt bow to Morfydd, keeping his clean-shaven old face as completely devoid of expression as if he were on the parade ground at Castrum Deva. “But she wishes to see you alone.”

The old woman and Morfydd exchanged a few hurried words. “May Canna ferch Glam go to the kitchen, Aulus?” enquired the latter.

But Aulus had already turned and was slowly and deliberately pushing back the heavy silver bar that kept the folding doors in place.

“My Lady gave me no instructions,” came from that decorous profile; while the doors, a little open now, emitted such a stream of pallid daylight that in its presence the lamplight dissolved like a cup of yellow wine in a grey pond.

“No instructions,” he repeated, keeping his arm, substituted now for the silver bar, still across the entrance while his old-fashioned legionary’s sword stuck out rather absurdly from the embossed leather belt beneath which were tucked the voluminous creases, scrupulously pressed into neat folds, of his loosely fitting tunica.

Morfydd’s mouth twitched, and the tiny lines in that miniature ogam that were her spirit’s declaration of war displayed themselves between her eyebrows. But at that moment a young girl's head, covered with black curls, dived under the old soldier's arm and was immediately followed by a lithe body already attired for the banquet in black and silver, the colours of the House of Cunedda, and accompanied by a cascade of chatter.

"My Lady sent me to bid you go straight in, while I am to take you, Mistress Canna, to the buttery for a pint of wine, then to the kitchen where you're to have a chair by the fire. You'll find my Lady," she added, addressing Morfydd, while she clutched Canna by the elbow with a frivolous familiarity, "in the little room." Then she added in a more serious tone, "If the place gets too full of smoke perhaps you wouldn't mind" — her voice became almost pleading now— "taking away the plank I've put over the window. My Lady never remembers till the smoke gets into her throat — the plank's only balanced. It's not heavy. And when it's away there's a fine draught and the fire burns as bright as hell."

Something resembling this beneficent plank had evidently been freshly removed from the old nurse's heart, for she went off with this girl in the best of spirits, asking question after question of the most shameless kind, and being as craftily reserved and as flagrantly garrulous in her response to the other's questions as the girl was in regard to hers.

But the doors were flung open wide enough now, and with a grave nod to the old legionary, Morfydd crossed the antechamber, swept aside the curtain in its western wall, and entered the reception room. Here she found a couple of elderly ladies, seated side by side on a cushioned bench at their embroidery frames, each of whom greeted her with grave recognition and motioned her with faint and rather nervous smiles into the chamber beyond.

When the hangings concealing this remoter retreat fell behind her she was at once aware that the girl's warning about "the little room" had not been a fanciful one.

The Lady of Mynydd-y-Gaer was seated alone in a stately high-backed chair in the centre of a small apartment. Before her feet, which rested on a square footstool, was a large flagstone raised above the floor on four clay bricks and bearing a brightly burning log fire, from which the fir-scented smoke was mounting intermittently in wavy columns to the vaulted roof.

"Thanks be to Christ you've come at last, child!" was the lady's greeting as Morfydd dutifully bent down and kissed her hand. "Bring up one of those stools, will you, dear? That's it! Now please sit down. No! A little nearer! We've much to talk about."

The girl sat down obediently, her hands folded on her lap, her eyes lowered.

"My son and Rhun ap Gwrnach are still at Saint Julian's Fount."

Morfydd tightened her clasped hands but did not raise her eyes.

"But the prince said they will probably be back before the end of dinner. What he meant by 'before the end' I don't know. I only saw him for a moment and he was — he generally is — in a great hurry. If I said 'before the end of dinner' to you, you'd understand me perfectly well. I should mean before everything there is to eat on the table has been eaten! But when a man's saying it — at least when the prince is saying it — the meaning might easily be 'before sunrise,' since to them the serious part doesn't begin till the drinking and that often lasts till dawn. Why don't you look at me, child? I tell you we've got to talk things over. Painful or not, we've got to! And that leads me to what I want to say."

The girl looked at her as she was bidden. What she saw was a figure so completely dedicated to a particular kind of proud acceptance of fate that everything about it — features, expression, complexion, bearing, even the very clothes it wore — coalesced and fused themselves together in one single effect, the effect of an acceptance of destiny so complete as to be a kind of revenge on destiny. For once in the long tumultuous chronicle of Mynydd-y-Gaer, for once between the primeval savagery of Rhitta Gawr and these Romanized modern times, the nectar of stately resignation was encouraged by its victim to fill the cup so full that no dregs, no scum, no foam, no bubble, no slightest drop of any alien element spoiled the perfection of that obsessing draught.

As for Morfydd, she simply felt she had so deep a justification for her hostile feelings towards this image of patient pride that her conscience had no right to reproach her, even though she piled up her condemnation of the woman's attitude with every obloquy she could scrape together.

Morfydd wasn't by any means unaware — indeed it increased her nervous irritation — of the quaint contrast the two of them made, and as she glanced at that orifice in the western wall, now dimmed by a rough piece of board, she began to feel an absurd dread lest the smoke should throw such a spell on them that they would sit in silence there, opposite each other, on those two seats, like pictures on Cretan vases for ever and ever.

All this while Morfydd had retained round her own head and shoulders her favourite black cloak. The stately image of heroic suffering opposite her had so far been too absorbed in awaiting the issue of what it was bent on revealing to think of helping her lay this object aside.

The girl performed this service now for herself and it gave her something to do with her active slender fingers when she set herself to smooth out those ruffled folds and arrange them neatly on her lap. She was now displayed, to the sad eyes regarding her, in her ordinary day-to-day attire wherein, though she was not one for being particularly self-conscious about clothes, she felt especially at ease. Her slender figure was not made less girlish by the fact that over her lamb's-wool vest she wore a single garment of unbleached linen caught in at the waist by a purple belt and reaching to where the soft straps of calfskin criss-crossed round her ankles and were fastened to her sandals.

Whatever were the grievous differences — grievous to him as well as to themselves — dividing the two women who dominated the life of Porius ab Einion, their behaviour on this momentous occasion proved that they had at least one thing in common. Emotional excitement — and this was the normal condition of both — obliterated their power of drawing conclusions of any kind, favourable or unfavourable, malicious or friendly, from what they detected around them, whether in things or in people. It didn’t of course prevent them from detecting things. They were women and they were intelligent. But it freed them from itching spites and petty sneers.

Thus when Morfydd condemned the melancholy priestesslike self-pity of Porius’s mother it never occurred to her to sneer at the preposterously old-fashioned robe, almost hieratic in its voluminous folds, of snow-white cloth which she was wearing, or at the sandals, snowy white as the robe and embossed with outlandish bronze ornaments, that rested on that antique footstool.

What the unloved wife of the Prince of Edeyrnion had indeed reverted to wearing were nothing less — though how could Morfydd know this? — than the fashionable robes of the Romanized matrons of half a century ago, such as Euronwy had seen in her extreme youth at the villa at Uriconium; but it was not the white robe nor the footstool nor the bronzes on the sandals that Porius’s betrothed loathed in this woman. It was her attitude to the tragedy of her life.

The girl knew as well as Porius himself how tragic that life was. She had on several occasions startled her betrothed by the tone of her references to it and by her wild hints as to what she would do if he ever treated her like this. But though she had recently approached the danger point with him she had never gone so far as to tell him what she really thought; namely, that Euronwy was in love with Gorsant the priest, and derived not only a morbid joy from letting him immolate her at the altar, but a morbid joy from following out to the very letter what he revealed to her as her duty towards her irresponsible husband.

Euronwy was speaking rapidly now in a low emphatic voice, a voice that was at once calmly self-controlled and intensely excited; and the purport of her words was such that Morfydd forgot her suspicious hatred of the proud woman's "Lady of Sorrows" pose, forgot the smoke, forgot the plank at the aperture in the wall, and listened with her brown eyes growing steadily larger and larger, and the curve of her left eyebrow, always the gnomonic sign of her attention, growing steadily higher and higher.

"The young eques—" the lady began.

"Why can't she say 'horseman' if she wants to be correct?" thought Morfydd. "These boys aren't equites; they're just young men on horseback."

But the lady went on, "The young eques who brought my son's knife as a token was the son of a man I knew well in the old days and I couldn't doubt him. Besides, he told me many things I know to be true about the court at Caergwynt. Well, child, it was from him I learnt the real purpose of this mission. And the importance of it is proved by the presence at its head not only of Arthur's counsellor but of Medrawd ap Llew ap Cynfarch, the emperor's heir. I won't talk now of this miserable trouble that has arisen, for that's beside the point. We are only concerned — and in this I know you'll agree — with the question of how it affects Porius ab Einion. It appears that the Saxons from Germania have divided their forces. One force — the young eques was most explicit about this — under their chief, Baldulf, has fortified itself at Caer Badon, while another, under this horrible Colgrim, of whom we've heard so much and who's lately withdrawn from Caer Efrog, is hurrying south towards Caer Llyr with the purpose of joining Baldulf at Caer Badon. The young eques — and this he must have learnt from Myrddin Wyllt himself who can, they say, catch news from the air, like those Coranians of old — confided to me after dinner, for in Einion's absence I refrained from leaving the hall till after the mead had gone round, that he had last been heard of in the district of Pengwern and that—"

Here Morfydd interrupted. "But, Arglwyddes, but, my Lady, the road from Caer Efrog to Caer Llyr doesn't pass Pengwern. Surely to reach Pengwern, or anywhere near it, these Saxons must have debouched through many cantrefs to the west of their natural way south?"

A flicker of a smile crossed Euronwy's melancholy features. "You're a wise child, my dear, a wise child! But the truth is I thought of that myself and said as much to Mabsant. But he answered that in war an invader rarely proceeds by the natural way to the point at which he's aiming! And he added that what was certain was that the Saxons in the north were marching south, evidently to join the others at Caer Badon; and that what the emperor wanted — and this is what concerns you and me — was that my son should take the pick of our people, well armed and if possible mounted — but that of course is out of the question — and intercept these" — she was on the point of saying "heathen" but caught herself up, fearful of reminding the girl of her brother— "these accurst barbarians and toss Colgrim's head into Baldulf's camp!"

"Not a word till she's said all — not a word till she's said all — not a word— "Such were the commands uttered by Morfydd's soul to her heart as she clutched with her fingers at the folded mantle on her lap and squeezed it against the pit of her stomach, feeling as she did so as if she were throwing it over the wild and rebellious thoughts that were causing the brown of her eyes to darken, using it in fact as her mother, the Gwyddyles, was wont to use a similar one, for the quieting of caged birds.

"You see I am talking quite frankly to you, Morfydd ferch Brochvael, and I have every reason to do so, and don't you see why?"

She made the first physical gesture she had permitted herself to indulge in since this encounter began. She lifted the couple of priestesslike folds with which she had covered her head and let them fall against the back of her chair.

"Don't you see, child, that up to a remote point — a point that's far away at present — you and I want the same thing? Don't you see that our interests, our desires, our hearts' longings are the same?"

"Not a word till she's said all — not a word till she's said all!"

"The point is this, child. You know, for all the women in Edeyrnion know, how things are with the prince and me and what little influence I have over him. If something doesn't happen, soon — and all Edeyrnion knows this too — the Modrybedd will be the rulers of these forests from Dinas Bran to the Cader. Einion will remain prince in name for a while longer — and then... I'm more than twice your age, little one, and I've seen this happen with our princes of the north. I've seen it, I've seen it! This House isn't the only House of Cunedda. If Mynydd-y-Gaer was known across the four seas before Deganwy had a name put on it, the Lord of Gwynedd may end by being crowned king in the city of Lludd when wolves and ravens are lording it in the halls of Edeyrn.

"What can we do then? Your father's heart is the heart of a true Brython, but his head is the head of a Greek sage. He thinks he's a political figure like his friend the Bishop of Arverne. But you, my dear, know better than that. He could no more save this House, if it tottered to its fall, than... than my own dear father!

"We women know these things. And that's why I'm talking to you like this. Morfydd, Morfydd, listen to me." And to the girl's amazement she became aware of a strong white hand freeing itself from the heavy robe and laying a finger on one of her knees. "You and I together, child, you and I with one mind and one purpose — I tell you it's we, and we only, for my son will listen to us both — who can save this House and... and save him with it!"

"There's more yet — not a word yet!" But though she still kept silence and never ceased hugging her folded cloak the girl suddenly felt a queer new strength steal into her heart and from her heart begin to rise into her breast. It was a sign of this that she actually was able for the first time that evening to glance at the burning fir logs, at the gathering smoke, at that ridiculous piece of wood balanced in the window slit.

The thought swept across her mind: "Shall I touch her hand? No, no! Not yet — time for that later. Time for that when she has said all!"

"I've no fear for him with these Saxons," Euronwy went on. "Nor, I fancy, have you. We know his strength. We know his caution. None better than you and I! But we know too that while you and I draw him different ways, his power, his strength, his caution, his tynged, are only half what they might be. With us behind him, as one and no longer as two, there'd be no limit to his" — she stopped, drew her hand from the girl's knee, straightened herself in her chair and gave a series of short quick gasps as if she were swallowing in forced gulps and bitter mouthfuls something naturally revolting to the human palate— "no limit to the distance he'll go!"

Then with a quick movement of her wrists she disentangled her other hand from the folds of her mantle and clasped with it the one wherewith she had touched the girl's knee, and leaning forward, her fingers growing every second whiter as she pressed them together, she began speaking more rapidly than before, and so fast, that if her tone hadn't been intensely clear, and what she said so startling, and her face only an arm's length away, the girl might have had difficulty in following her.

"I want you to marry my son at once, now, as soon as possible! The marriage needn't be performed here or performed by... him down there. Brother John has priest's orders, though it isn't generally known. It was he, down there, when he was complaining about the Brother and saying he ought to be excommunicated for his Pelagian ideas, who told me. There'll be no difficulty from the prince. He's very fond of you. He'll hope to see more of you. You'll have no difficulty with your father, who's fond of my son — never mind what he thinks of me! Never mind what anyone thinks of me! It's my son we're considering. I'll tell you, girl, since Cunedda and his sons first came to the Gaer their House has never been in such danger!

"It, they, we, I tell you, are in danger of extinction. But once you two are married everything will right itself. Your marriage will add interest to the Feast of the Sowing. It'll upset the calculations of the druid. And above all it will be rousing news to all the Gwyddyl-Ffichti! There aren't many of them about here, I know, but in the mountains they say there are a lot left. And every one of them remembers your mother and worships her memory. I wouldn't be surprised if some of the old Iscovan band were still alive."

Here she stopped to take breath. "Mercy of God! But what would my poor father say if he heard me? When I was a little girl at Uriconium it was always 'y Bychan this,' and 'y Bychan that,' and 'y Bychan has burnt another village!' But I certainly never thought I'd be saying things like this to the daughter of Brochvael ab Iddawc. O girl, girl! You mustn't feel you've got to be a daughter to me. Get that out of your head. I'm not asking for your love; I'm not asking even for your consideration as my son's wife.

I’m only asking you to join your wits with mine and be one with me where he’s concerned and for his sake.

“You can hate me, you can despise me, like all the others do, apart from him; and when you have children of his and are the mother of a Prince of Edeyrnion you can send me away, you can do what you like with me, if only now, now at this fatal moment, you’ll let us be one in wit and will; one for once, my Morfydd! Don’t think I’m mad, child. My unhappiness hasn’t clouded my woman’s brain, nor my loneliness either... don’t look away, child! We’re nearer each other than you guess, you and I. We both love him well. You do love him well, don’t you? And your dear father — he’s been always kind to me — is, like my father, lost in a past that’s passed away! You are young, child, and I am — what I am. But in his interest youth and age are nothing! Let it be said of you and me by the Henogs of the future: ‘Those two forgot everything in that hour to strengthen the hand of the man they loved!’”

“She has said all,” thought Morfydd. “I can speak if I want to.” But before speaking she rose quickly, put down her cloak, and moved to the window slit. Then raising her bare arms above her head and standing on tiptoe she jerked the plank from its place in the ledge and let it fall with a crash on the stone floor.

With a strong eddy the thick cloud of smoke above their heads broke in the air that rushed in, broke and divided, some of it sweeping out through the exposed aperture, some of it escaping through the thin spaces left unfilled by the swaying curtain across the door. Then she came back to her place, picked up her cloak, and began very quietly and deliberately replacing it about her shoulders.

Euronwy also rose. Did she take the girl’s gesture as a sign of contemptuous rejection of her offer? Once on her feet she made a faint retreating movement and pressed one hand upon the high back of her chair. But if the woman did for a second think such a thing she was pathetically mistaken; for Morfydd hardly knew what she was doing. One confused feeling followed another, one wild doubt followed another, one desperate resolve followed another. For some seconds she stared at the tall white-robed figure before her with a frowning intentness.

Then she said, “I thought in all you did, my Lady, you obeyed him down there.”

“Gorsant, do you mean?” Euronwy’s relief in the respite gained from this was so great that she actually smiled. She hadn’t done this in Morfydd’s presence since the young woman had been engaged to Porius, an event which had been almost immediately followed by Morvran’s murder which had made the gulf between them impassable. The two women were looking now straight into each other’s eyes. Euronwy relaxed her hold upon the back of her chair, stiffened herself a little, and began speaking rapidly but in a much lower voice.

“You think,” she said, “and you have all thought, that because I... because I hear Mass so often and listen to his preaching, and believe in Christ as he does, and let him give me the Sacrament, that I’ve put my whole life in his hands. Child, it is not true! No one, I tell you, not he nor the blessed saints, not Christ Himself, comes between me and my son! My son has always come first and always will come first. What I give to Christ and His priest” — here she made a step forward and pressed both hands against her breast— “is what of my poor soul is mine to give. It is what — why should I hold this back from you who love him as I do? — who must love him as I do! — it is what his father has trampled on and thrown away! Girl, girl, would I tell you this if it wasn’t the truth? Ask... ask Christ’s Mother! It is for my son I live, for him, I tell you, that all of Euronwy that’s left feels, thinks, plans, and schemes. I want him to be himself, to be strong and powerful as he was born to be! I knew he wanted you — knew it before he did, before you did! I knew he needed a wife like you — like any of the others, and that is why — though the prince and your father are brothers and though ‘he down there’ opposed it, opposed it, I tell you, in... in ways you’d never guess at — I let the prince have his way. You have power over the prince... he has taken... but we won’t talk of that now — but once married to my son — I know Einion ab Iddawc through and through — you and he will have no trouble with him — you and he will have all, all I tell you, in your hands.

“Hear me, hear me, Morfydd! We are the two he loves — only us, none but us — and if we become one in this — I don’t ask you for more — I don’t ask you to love me — you can hate me if you like apart from him — but where he’s concerned, child, where he’s concerned, let us — I’m begging it of you as I’ve never begged anything of a living creature! — let us put away, let us put away and forget, everything but him!”

Her hands had left her breast and her fingers were clutching the front of the black cloak which the younger woman had automatically resumed and which now hung loose upon her.

Morfydd remained plunged in deep fathoms of thought; and the quaint thing was that in complete ignorance of what she was doing one of her own fingers began gently stroking in a monotonous seesaw the knuckles of the hands that were clenched upon her cloak. Thus the two of them stood, the younger frowning and thinking, the elder trembling and praying.

At length Morfydd began to speak. She spoke quietly and naturally, though rather wearily, as if the decision she had been compelled to reach had necessitated either an exhausting effort of thought or a life-draining outrage to her feelings.

"Do you mind if I put back that piece of wood? Your fire's lower now. I don't want our — participatio my father would call it — to be hurried."

The girl hardly knew what she was saying now for her mind, moving rapidly and resolutely from point to point, like a young gladiator in the Coliseum, was deciding on a daring and dramatic course of action.

Euronwy let her lead her back to her chair, but when the plank had been replaced and she had returned to meet those staring eyes again, she tried to feel that a final and tremendous gather, like an invisible cloud of something more invasive than smoke, had descended upon her. She had decided — even while she was covering, with anything she could lay hands on, the unbearable nakedness of this woman's exposure — exactly what she would say and do.

She also would be frank, but frank to definite effect, and if this daughter of Porius Manlius, this cousin of Uthyr Pendragon, could suggest their arranging for a future for the man they loved, she, the child of Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles, must decide what precise future this should be. She must have no mere vague emotional "participation" between them but a fatal and inescapable pact!

Calm she certainly did feel, calm and resolute. But she had to confess to herself even in the brief moment during which she came back from that double effort, the physical one with the great piece of wood, and the mental one to be at rest with her decision, that at the bottom of her soul there still lay something, something that she was standing upon as she lifted the fallen plank to the window, which she must keep out of her thoughts if she was to do what she had determined to do.

"Arglwyddes," she said, looking into those dazed and tired eyes, "I do understand you much better now. You are a wise and a good woman and have lived in the great world. Until I loved Porius I lived only with books, only with the thoughts of my father and the thoughts of my brother about books. Since the man down there made them... I mean since Morvran was killed... my father has shared his thoughts with me.

"Porius has been very good to me, and we've been happy together; and though Rhun ap Gwrnach is longer away at the Ford than he used to be he has not deserted us as so many have, and Porius says he will go with him when the time comes for serving the emperor."

"He does talk to you then of serving the emperor? He will be ready then to do what Arthur wants and drive Colgrim and his Saxons into the lion's mouth?"

The light had come again into Euronwy's eyes and she had ceased to lie back in her chair as though her very soul had been poured out on the ground. "He has talked to you then about serving the emperor?" she repeated eagerly.

"He certainly has, and I've often heard him discuss with Rhun ap Gwrnach what particular men he'd take with him if he decided to go."

"You're like me then? You're not afraid for him any more than I am with these Saxons?"

"I will be frank with you, Lady, as you've been with me. At least I shan't have to fear for him here since I have made up my mind to go with him!"

"With him?"

The girl nodded. "After we're married," she added, "though my nurse swears that many of the emperor's horsemen are maids in disguise! You, my Lady, have seen much more of the world than I have, and you must correct me if I'm wrong, but I believe things are very different in the court of Arthur — just as they are in the court of Anastasius — from what they were in the old times when Ul-Kessar and Gloyw-Kessar came here from Rome. Porius says Arthur's ladies go with him to all his camps; and it seems that this present trouble about Llew ap Greidawl Derwydd came about from Myrddin and Medrawd bringing their women with them to Saint Julian's Fount."

All this time Euronwy had displayed a steadily increasing relief and eagerness, a relief however that was still intermittently overclouded by waves of distrust and doubt, although the girl could see that these got rarer and rarer.

But now the Lady of the Gaer rose suddenly from her seat and stretched out her hand. The other clasped it, but straightened herself while she did so and even drew back a little, making it unmistakable that she had no intention of closing their agreement with an embrace.

"This," announced Morfydd in a hard, clear voice that made the older woman think of the girl's atheistic brother and how coldly he had retorted to her hesitating attempts to soften his unbelief when he first came back from the school' beyond the mountains, "this is only the first move between us. You are a lady of many courts and of wide experience. I am only a girl-student of old books; and I dare say this whole idea of mine is laughable and childish. But it is my idea, and like my brother — it must be our Gwyddyl blood — I'm absolutely fixed upon it and nothing anyone could say will turn me from it. Of course my poor father — the devil himself could talk him round if he quoted Plato!"

"What is your idea? I may not find it at all childish."

"May I really be frank with you, as if with... someone of my own age?"

"Of course."

"Well then, it's like this! You and I being what we are — you pure Brython and pure Roman and I such a mixture — it's impossible, as the mother and wife of the same man, however much our love for him conquers our jealousy, for us to trust each other's mere word. But trust something in each other we must, if we’re to have a real agreement and stop trying to pull him in half! And I have thought of a thing, a thing that we can trust, even if we feel ourselves hating each other and wishing we could do something terrible to each other!

“Countries and provinces, tribes and races on whom there’s a tynged that they should distrust and misunderstand each other like — well! like the Romans and the Gwyddyl-Ffichti! — when they make solemn promises to each other, make them on something, not of course on the same thing, for they hold nothing sacred in common, but each on their own special thing. Now you hold most sacred of all the altar of Christ; and I have come — never mind how — to hold sacred the relics, kept here in your Gaer chapel behind that altar, of Rhitta Gawr.”

Here the girl paused, watching intently the flickering expressions of wonder, bewilderment, fear, and hope that crossed the face before her. Then she went on calmly and resolutely.

“Let’s go together now then, while they’re all in the hall and the kitchen, and make our treaty in your chapel before Christ and that other, calling upon them both to rot the flesh from our bones if we break faith. But we mustn’t swear an inch further, no! not a word beyond a clear-cut simple practical promise to aim for the same good, the same kind of future, the same kind of success and happiness and greatness, for your son and my husband.”

Again she paused, but only to add in a grave but less certain voice: “And this of course means that, as over my immediate marriage and over my going with him, and over Rhun ap Gwrnach and the other picked men going with him — the things we’ve already decided — we should agree together, later as now, just what it is we do, both of us, want most for him. Does this seem silly and childish to you, Euronwy ferch Porius Manlius, or doesn't it?"

The final expression left now upon the face she'd been studying as she talked — studying even more closely than she was wont to pore over her brother's Virgil but with the same quaint lines in her forehead — was an astonishment to her and not a little disconcerting. For Euronwy was actually smiling, and smiling with a smile that puzzled her completely, for it was at once tender and profoundly amused. This was the last thing she expected, and in all her life nobody, not even her father, had looked at her just like that.

"Is it too silly — what I've been saying?" she burst out in an unexpected rush of confusion and shyness.

Euronwy shook her head. "Not silly at all, child. And we'll go at once and do what you want. But, God in Heaven, Rhitta Gawr! What a queer little girl you are!"

"No, I don't want anybody," the Lady of the Gaer said presently as they passed together through the anteroom. "Morfydd and I are going to find Canna ferch Glam."

They reached the small chapel at a moment that might have been bestowed on them as a special benediction by Brochvael's goddess of chance. There was no ordinary arrow slit into the open air through the wall of this place; but there was a round hole that looked as if Nature and not man had made it, and through this round hole at this particular moment the October sun, its rim nearly touching the mountains, showed as a red ball of fire.

So large was it, and so filled with its crimson bulk was that small orifice in the massive wall, that for a moment it gave the girl the impression that she was gazing down a deep well, not a perpendicular well but a horizontal one, a round trumpet-shaped hole in fact, leading only too quickly into a sea of blood. No ray from this circular postern into an ocean of blood penetrated the chapel, nor did its presence suggest a fiery furnace.

What it suggested was only blood; a sea of blood, a sky of blood, an infinite expanse of air composed of blood! The Gaer chapel was almost savagely bare. It contained no seat, no bench, no image, no picture. It contained nothing but a huge stone altar upon which was a golden cup of prodigious height standing on a golden platter. On each side of this cup and platter stood a roughly wrought golden sconce containing a small burning wick fed by fragrant oil.

The wall against which the altar had been placed was clearly a portion of some original stratum of rock that the builder of the Gaer — Rhitta Gawr himself, according to tradition — had left undisturbed. The altar was simply an exceptionally large and exceptionally smooth slab of the local stone, the then famous stone of Rhyd Mithras but now, since the priest had rebaptized the place, the stone of Corwen; and it stood on four square blocks of oak.

There was a yard of clear space behind the altar; and it was here, a little lower than the altar stone, that some cosmogonic movement of primordial elements sidetracked even in that remote epoch by some friendly caprice of Chance, the Saviour, had caused to be created a natural sarcophagus.

Here had been preserved by the men of old time, ancestors of the forest people, the famous relics of Rhitta Gawr. Euronwy looked calmly about her in that familiar place where the ministrations of Minnawc Gorsant had proved so deep a consolation. There lingered still about her lips that same faint smile that at the last had so disconcerted and puzzled Morfydd, nor was it dissipated by a dimly amused wonder as to how much longer her priest of Christ, whose impassioned features she could now visualize in imagination so clearly above those golden vessels, would be able to keep his reforming fingers off the profane relics of this heathen giant.

Certainly the christening of the place during the recent years had not destroyed the age-old atmosphere of prehistoric religion that still emanated from all but the golden platter and the golden cup. There was no image, no icon of Jesus. There was no semblance of a cross. There were no sacred books. All such things, though he possessed them in his newly built shrine by the river, the priest had shown a curious reluctance to leave behind him in the Gaer. In spite however of this heathen atmosphere, of the two women standing in that darkening chamber it was the elder, as she waited in patient amusement for what her surprising rival would do next, who was the more at peace with her own heart.

Morfydd on the contrary was once again in the throes of her darkest and secretest trouble. That blood-red hole in the wall was the thing that had revived it, now when above everything else it was necessary to crush it down. She had discovered what his mother had no idea of, the strange and peculiar spell that any mention of those mythical creatures, the giants of Eryri and the Cader, possessed for Porius. Would what she had decided upon just now, as she struggled to replace that grotesque piece of wood, finally and irrevocably commit her?

The scepticism she had so lightly acquired from her father and brother could deal easily enough with Euronwy's Christ. Could it deal with Porius's Rhitta Gawr?

"It's all fancy," she thought. "It's all the Modrybedd's superstition. Morvran would laugh at me."

Well! It was she herself who had decided. It was she herself who must now commit herself over these un-Christian relics! Sooner or later the time would have had to come. Well! It had come now, and by her own contrivance. Little did this white-robed woman, who stood there so calm and patient before the refuge of her ruined love, guess why her son’s bride was delaying so, delaying when she was in the very place she had wanted to be in, the place where both their Mysteria could be invoked!

But the woman seemed reluctant to shake off the brooding reverie into which those golden vessels had plunged her, and Morfydd could see that for her the place was so full of a mystic felicity that any bond to which she abandoned herself here would be as sacred, if not as super-sacred and final, as if it had been borne witness to by an angelic vision!

“You don’t know this place as well as I do,” Euronwy suddenly said, and she said it in so detached a tone that Morfydd could only give her a conventional nod full of every ingredient of distrust and reserve. “Don’t stop watching the sun go down,” she went on, “I’m so used to seeing that hole in the wall that it doesn’t seem as strange to me as it does to everybody else. Stand back a little further and you’ll see it better. I’ll say a prayer till you’re ready.”

She knelt down as she spoke with her clasped hands on the edge of the great stone and her forehead pressed against her hands.

Morfydd’s heart had become so oppressed by the sudden irresistible mounting up of the trouble she had all day been fighting that it was with a relief resembling that of a reprieve from execution that she now stepped back as instructed and surveyed the crimson hole from this new position.

But it was not at the hole, nor at the rim of the red orb, sunken enough now below the upper curve of the hole to reveal in the narrow arch of space set free from that fiery rondure an indescribable recession of blue nothingness growing darker and darker as it withdrew, nor was it at the weird greenish tint which the jagged edges of the hole had begun to assume as if the whole Gaer had been fathoms deep below the sea, that the girl was staring.

She was staring at a series of rocky ledges and mossy descents, a series of willows and birches, of secret brooks and miniature waterfalls, caught in quick succession one after another, as she fled, wildly, exultantly, recklessly, towards a far-off mountain torrent; a torrent that issued from an impenetrable recess in a wall of solid rock.

She was a grown-up girl when it happened, but the three of them were only playing the game they had always played, and Auntie Alarch — Rhun's mother and Porius's foster-mother — had never interfered, nor had her own mother, Kymeinvoll Gwyddyles, given it a thought.

The game was for her to hide and for the foster-brothers to hunt for her; and at the first glimpse either of them had of her, she had to race for home and try to get there before she was caught. Home was never the old wooden house of Gwrnach ab Agenor y Gaethwas between the shrine of Saint Julian and the river; nor was it the House of Stone. It was a little treeless rock-plateau covered with small flowering plants and masses of soft grey lichen and it was a "home" that gave a person the feeling of being in a jackdaw's nest, able to look down on the tops of the tallest trees.

The older she had grown, the more exciting she had found this game, and she seldom got caught because she took care never to be seen before she had an easy start.

On the rare occasions when Porius caught her he always did the same thing, picked her up in his arms and carried her home, selecting the longest way round he could think of, and ending up — if Rhun hadn't got home yet — by lifting her high above his head to look out for him.

But what she felt with her heart now, as with her eyes she watched the red rim vanish and the jagged edges of the hole lose their greenish tint and the small circle of space grow dim, was her first sight of Rhun climbing the slope towards her hiding place. What a chase had followed! Never, never, though Porius took her to the court of Anastasius, though she became the mother of a long line of princes, princes not only of Edeyrnion but of all Gwynedd, could she feel like that again!

She had thought afterwards and she thought now, “It’s the blood of Gwrnach; it’s the blood of Agenor the Greek slave that makes him the great runner! That’s what must have melted the bones of Auntie Alarch when his father saved the House of Cunedda by his godlike speed.” To be as swift as a deer, as a greyhound, as a wave of the sea, as the wings of the north wind, oh, how much more godlike that was than to be as strong as Hercules or Samson or even Rhitta Gawr!

And all the feelings she had been forcing down shook themselves loose and rushed upon her as she turned from that chilly hole in the wall to the white figure with its head against the stone slab!

She felt again how her knees had loosened beneath her as he drew near. And then he had caught her, and in his hands she was happier and more helpless than she was ever likely to be again! That was the way to be taken by a man — on the mountainside and after a desperate chase — not handed over by fathers and mothers and aunts and uncles like a bundle!

But Rhun hadn’t taken her; he hadn’t ravished her, as those young heroes ravished their Greek girls in the books. And though the memory of that heavenly chase and how he’d caught her and held her made her breasts tighten and her veins burn, and made delicious aching shiverings go up and down her body, Rhun had never seemed to know what he’d done to her.

After that day by a sort of instinct in all three of them they’d stopped playing that game. They’d found Porius waiting for them when they got home to their jackdaw rock; but he’d shown no jealousy. He never did show jealousy, either of Rhun or anyone else! It was his way. He took everything for granted. He seemed as fond of Rhun as ever and Rhun of him.

Neither of them seemed to forget that after the death of her second baby it had been Alarch, and not that woman there on her knees, who had suckled Porius! And when Rhun's father died and Rhun got this Mithras mania and was always away at the Ford, he too seemed to take it for granted, just like Porius himself, that she was to be Porius's wife.

How different from both of them Morvran had been! He never played their games. He never would even come to see their jackdaw rock. He shut himself up with his books and read and read — till he paid for his ideas with his life!

"Goodbye, Rhun!" It was the hidden thing in her heart that cried out that "goodbye," and it was almost as if the kneeling woman had heard it, for she got up now and looked at her — still with that same queer smile.

"Well, child?" she said gently.

The chapel was full of a deathly twilight now and a deathly silence; and it seemed to Morfydd, as she moved round the stone slab and laid her right hand on the rock behind it, that she stepped over something dead to reach that place.

"Lay your right hand on your most sacred thing, Lady, while mine's on this one. Touch the platter, where he turns bread into Christ's flesh!"

The elder woman stretched her arm quietly and patiently across the slab of stone and clasped with her fingers the long narrow stem of the cup.

"Wine into blood," she said in a clear voice, "is more sacred to me than bread into flesh."

"And now let's both say the same words!" And Morfydd paused, biting her underlip and frowning.

It was clear, Euronwy told herself, that this young priestess of Christ and Rhitta Gawr had not yet composed the words for their united invocation. “She must be pondering,” the Gaer Lady thought, “how on earth to reconcile the Son of God with this fabulous giant!”

But the girl lifted up her voice now, quite loud and clear. “If I don’t think of him,” she repeated, “in peace with you may I not be happy!”

It must have been with some vague idea of an invocation that should be both retrospective and prospective that Morfydd uttered this final sentence. For it was spoken in the accent of her nurse and it carried the lilt of an old ballad burden that Canna must have brought with her from the north. And patiently and humbly Euronwy began to repeat the fantastic words, but when she reached the “may I not be happy” her voice faltered.

She only got through that final heathen tynged by throwing her emotion into the desperate grip with which her fingers now tightened on the sacred cup. The moment it was said she withdrew her arm; but this she did so hastily that the golden cup, adhering for a second by reason of the warmth of her hand to the fingers that so hotly clutched it, fell down with a bell-like tinkle upon the platter.

She readjusted it at once, reverently enough, in its former position; but the accident completed the disruption of her peaceful mood.

Morfydd, on the contrary, as she came round the altar from that sarcophagus behind it which very well may have contained, amid its dust, relics of human bones and human hair, had succeeded in throwing off her trouble. Her eyes showed large and eager in the dim light, and their colour looked amber rather than brown.

“They may have come back already,” she cried excitedly, “while we were here taking our oath. Will the prince let them off the drinking tonight? If I stay, Father’s sure to come and fetch me, and Gwythyr could bring back Canna and the donkey tomorrow! She'd adore to stay the night up here. Do you think they'll tell us everything that's happened? Oh, I pray the prince won't make them drink!"

"Them, child?"

And suddenly to Morfydd's astonishment this woman, who had just now been so calm and detached, lurched forward and caught her in her arms.

"You... don't... know... how... you hit me to the heart!" she sobbed out; and as the woman's breasts pressed closer and closer against her body, Morfydd could catch the sweet scent of the root dust of the special local plant that Canna also used in the washing of woollen garments.

"Child, child, don't you see how piteous life is — how cruel to us women! 'He'— 'them' — that's the way it always is! 'They' go — and we wait and wonder. 'They' come — and we plot and scheme. The mother's hand there — the wife's hand here — and what really do we know of them and their thoughts? Nothing! We know when they want us — we know when they don't want us — that's all we know, all we're allowed to know! Will the prince make them drink? — that's what you ask me! What does the prince want to forget in his drink? — that's what I ask you!"

She became silent then and gradually her weeping ceased; and Morfydd wondered vaguely why it was that this outburst left her own heart so cold. With her mind she pitied her. In her mind she felt sympathetic and even tender to her, but every nerve in her young body cried out to escape, to put an end to this. But this was all part of the rash bond into which she herself, with her crazy notion of getting things clear and clean-cut and final, had rushed them!

"She's right," she said to herself. "I'm a childish idiot! What do I know of the lives of men, or the lives of the mothers of men either?"

And then when she found Euronwy had let her go and was even trying to smile she thought, “Did I really say them instead of him? And has she guessed about Rhun? If she has guessed, she’s much cleverer as well as nicer than I ever imagined—”

But her thoughts were interrupted by the sound of familiar voices, then by the approach of heavy footsteps, and finally by the rattle of weapons in the passage outside their retreat.

Both women looked aghast and exchanged a significant glance. A wild rush of the same impulse seized them — to escape anyhow, anywhere, anyway, rather than be caught indulging in this unheard-of colloquy, off guard, dishevelled, exposed, squeezed in between Jesus and Rhitta Gawr, by a drunken husband and an agitated father! But this is precisely what they were destined to endure.

Closely attended, or to put it more correctly, preceded and followed by several excited striplings, full of pride in their new Gosgordd equipment, the prince and Brochvael burst with such a rush into the chapel that both the wife of the one and the daughter of the other found themselves swept back clean against the altar. Here they were forced to face the intruders, the woman with the long subsiding of her sobbing fit only just over, and the girl with her cloak dragging on the floor and a lock of loose hair trailing across cheek and shoulder.

The influx of the blazing torches carried by two of the guard increased the shock of this eruption, transforming that mystic twilight into a troubled pool, whose dark ripples and darker reflections were rendered dangerous and threatening by the yellow beams that rose and sank among them like leaping fish with glittering scales.

As for the Lady of the Gaer, her calm composure and gracious dignity as the two men approached her and kissed her hand struck the girl with positive awe, for all she could do herself was to tug impatiently at Brochvael's Etrurian cloak and implore him for news of Porius and Rhun. With him she had no hesitation about mentioning both their names, and the news that they were both safe at the Fount changed for her the whole atmosphere of the moment. In her liberation from her great dread she felt able to enjoy with an irresponsibility worthy of the prince himself the lighter aspects of the drama around her.

One of these aspects — though, as the girl knew well, it was tragic enough for the Lady of the Gaer — was the obvious fact that the prince had already been drinking. She didn't miss the looks exchanged between the young Gosgordd men when he began addressing his wife and everybody else in what, for all his charm of manner, was hardly less than a tipsy harangue. It was uttered with his usual mockery and it was thoroughly natural but, all the same, she caught in it a note she'd never detected in him before.

"He's had a shock," she said to herself, "and he's trying to carry it off." Her interest in the prince and his condition, and the effect of both on the lady, made it hard to listen to what her father was telling her, for though he couldn't have been accused just then of practising the epistolary style of the lively Sidonius, his intensity of feeling and his desire that she should share his feeling made him the reverse of laconic.

Thus it became the destiny of these extremely new feminine allies to pick up what truth they could about a crisis that affected them to the very depths, from the particular men who of all the inhabitants of that princedom who lived most removed from the things that necessity makes so real to women.

Less experienced than Euronwy in extracting this particular essence of the multicoloured bubble of life from an excited man's version of it, Morfydd permitted her attention, when once she was assured of “their” safety, to wander to the flickering torchlight as it wavered among the warriors’ accoutrements.

It was while the fading of her interest in Brochvael’s discovery of the treachery of Erim ab Uchtryd made her surroundings grow more arresting that she was suddenly struck with dismay by noticing that the prince was carrying the sword of Cunedda under his arm and that its point was broken clean off. Had he been attacked? No, he must have just been playing with it — the idiotic fool! Morfydd was more than a little horrified.

All her life she had been taught by her father to regard that sword, hanging in the banquet hall of the Gaer, as the symbol of the House of Cunedda’s lasting dominion over Edeyrnion. And now its point was missing! Poor Euronwy — had she noticed it? She must have; and yet here she was, smiling just the same, while that handsome clown went on with his tipsy tirade!

“You mustn’t think I was listening at Erim’s door,” her father was now assuring her, “nor did I wait to hear more than that one word about Colgrim, for though chance had given me—”

But the syllables “Colgrim” were to Morfydd at that moment no more than the tap of a blown leaf against the corrugated ruggedness of the prince’s forehead. How royal-looking the man was! Twenty times handsomer than poor old Porius! She could see a gleam of gold still lingering in the curls of his grizzled beard. His whole face had a curious softness, a sophisticated charm. “But he isn’t half the man Father is!”

And though at that moment, glancing instinctively at Euronwy, she caught a look that warned her that the supreme test of their new compact was at hand and that at any second they might be swept — not separately but together — into this weird council of war, she couldn't help feeling a thrill of pride in her father.

It wasn't the clear-cut reason that she regarded as her special characteristic that at this moment was so thrilled; it was her whole body and soul. With a sigh of relief she thanked the blest gods that she wasn't the daughter of the Prince of Edeyrnion but of this toothless old man hugging his cloak and leaning on his staff. For all his pedantries he was the man and not the other.

"If I were poor Euronwy," she thought, "I'd poison this heartless rogue! Is Canna right after all? Does she love that awful priest? Or has she grown too old for such feelings? If she's too old," she chanted bitterly to herself, "and I'm too young, why then — it's pure tynged, pure destiny, for women and girls alike! Men are different. They can love without fate. Whether seduced or seducing, it's all a mixture of chance and choice!

"But it's no more chance with us than it's choice. Neither we nor the men we love have anything to do with it. Of itself it comes. Of itself it goes. We don't choose it. It chooses us."

Suddenly Morfydd fancied she heard the sound of mocking girlish laughter wafted down the corridor from the entrance to the Gaer, and it made her think of the mischievous pleasure she'd been deriving of late from teasing this handsome fool by letting him take her on his knees. She had enjoyed teasing him, and as for feeling any fear of him — heavens! She had more fear of Porius.

There was that, voice again! And she knew it now. It was Sibylla's, and it came from some considerable distance behind the torch bearers; yes! almost, she fancied, beyond the entrance to the banquet hall. And the shrill voice of Sibylla was repeating over and over again: "I will see him! I must see him! He told me to see him!"

It was plain enough that neither the prince nor Brochvael heard these far-off sounds. But did Euronwy hear them? She glanced hurriedly to see, and their eyes met. But Euronwy's response had only to do with their private compact and all it signalled was: "Don't precipitate matters. Our moment will come."

But how well could Morfydd imagine what was happening out there! Sibylla was a Gwyddyl-Ffichti girl from beyond the Swamp whose amorous blood, bitter tongue, and wild tales of y Bychan must, with her youthful daring, have captivated the prince on his hunting excursions long before any open scandal began. No one could call Sibylla beautiful and Morfydd had heard Brython women describe her as ugly. But she was feared and respected by the forest people, and though the Romanized ladies despised her, they treated her with caution when they crossed her path at the market. Old Canna had known her from her infancy and Morfydd's own mother had made quite a pet of her. Sibylla's particular kind of devilry was exactly what would delight the irresponsible prince, while the prince's good looks and golden graces were dedicated to fascinate Sibylla.

Oh, how clearly Morfydd could envisage the girl's Gwyddyl-Ffichti fury at not being allowed to burst into the Gaer chapel heedless of what was going on! And how well too she could hear the derisive contempt in the prince's voice with which he would retort to every protest if such an event did occur!

But what was this? Her brown eyes positively widened in their sockets as she saw the expression on her father's face. She knew him so well, knew him in all his moods, and she could see now that he was listening with an intense and absorbed interest to what the prince was saying.

For herself, she hadn't given a thought to what he said, taking for granted that it was some silly drunken nonsense. Yet here was Brochvael, with his eyes narrowed and illuminated, his toothless lips a little sucked in, his hands alternately drawing his mantle tighter to his ribs and tapping the floor with his precious staff, the staff given him by the Gallic philosopher Claudianus!

It annoyed her that with that girl scolding outside, and probably biting and scratching to get in, this handsome idiot who had broken Euronwy's heart should have it in him to draw that look of inspired interest from a man as clever as her father. She had always laughed at Porius's fear of him and his talk. Was this the way he discoursed at those mead drinkings in the "shadowy hall?"
